We speak for millions of reasoning people fighting to preserve our environment from greed and from stupidity. And we speak for reasonable people who are fighting to preserve our very existence from a macho intransigence that refuses to make intelligent attempts to discuss the possibility of nuclear holocaust with our enemy. They refuse. They refuse, because they believe we can pile missiles so high that they will pierce the clouds and the sight of them will frighten our enemies into submission.

Now we're proud of this diversity as Democrats. We're grateful for it. We don't have to manufacture it the way the Republicans will next month in Dallas, by propping up mannequin delegates on the convention floor.

But while we're proud of this diversity as Democrats, we pay a price for it.

The different people that we represent have different points of view. And sometimes they compete and even debate, and even argue. That's what our primaries were all about.

But now the primaries are over and it is time when we pick our candidates and our platform here to lock arms and move into this campaign together.

If you need any more inspiration to put some small part of your own differences aside to create this concensus, all you need to do is to reflect on what the Republican policy of divide and cajole has done to this land since 1980.

REAGAN'S PROMISES

Now the president has asked us to judge him on whether or not he's fulfilled the promise he made four years ago. I believe that as Democrats, we ought to accept that challenge. And, just for a moment let us consider what he has said and what he's done.

Inflation is down since 1980. But not because of the supply-side miracle promised to us by the president. Inflation was reduced the old-fashioned way, with a recession, the worst since 1932. We could have brought inflation down that way. How did he do it? Fifty-five thousand bankruptcies. Two years of massive unemployment. Two hundred thousand farmers and ranchers forced off the land. More homeless than at any time since the Great Depression in 1932. More hungry, in this nation of enormous affluence, the United States of America, more hungry. More poor—most of them women—and he paid one more thing, a nearly $200 billion deficit threatening our future.

Now we must make the American people understand this deficit because they don't.

The president's deficit is a direct and dramatic repudiation of his promise to balance our budget by 1983.

How large is it? The deficit is the largest in the history of this universe; President Carter's last budget had a deficit of less than one-third of this deficit.

It is a deficit that, according to the president's own fiscal adviser, may grow as high as $300 billion a year for "as far as the eye can see."

And, ladies and gentlemen, it is a debt so large that as much as one-half of our revenue from the income tax goes just to pay the interest.

It is a mortgage on our children's future that can be paid only in pain and that could bring this nation to its knees.

Now don't take my word for it—I'm a Democrat.

Ask the Republican investment bankers on Wall Street what they think the changes of this recovery being permanent are.

You see, if they're not too embarrassed to tell you the truth, they'll say that they are appalled and frightened by the president's deficit. Ask them what they think of our economy, now that it has been driven by the distorted value of the dollar back to its colonial condition—now we're exporting agricultural products and importing manufactured ones.

Ask those Republican investment bankers what they expect the rate of interest to be a year from now. And ask them, if they dare tell you the truth you will hear from them, what they predict for the inflation rate a year from now, because of the deficit.

Now, how important is this question of the deficit.

Think about it practically: What chance would the Republican candidate have had in 1980 if he had told the American people that he intended to pay for his so-called economic recovery with bankruptcies, unemployment, more homeless, more hungry and the largest government debt known to humankind? Would American voters have signed the loan certificate for him on Election Day? Of course not! That was an election won under false pretenses. It was won with smoke and mirrors and illusions. And that's the kind of recovery we have now as well.

And what about foreign policy?

They said that they would make us and the whole world safer. They say they have.

By creating the largest defense budget in history, one that even they now admit is excessive. By escalating to a frenzy the nuclear arms race. By incendiary rhetoric. By refusing to discuss peace with our enemies. By the loss of 279 young Americans in Lebanon in pursuit of a plan and a policy that no one can find or describe.

We give money to Latin American governments that murder nuns, and then we lie about it.

We have been less then zealous in support of our only real friend, it seems to me, we have in the Middle East, the one democracy there, our flesh and blood ally, the state of Israel.

Our foreign policy drifts with no real direction, other than an hysterical commitment to an arms race that leads nowhere—if we're lucky. And if we're not, it could lead us into bankruptcy or war.

Of course we must have a strong defense!

Of course Democrats are for a strong defense. Of course Democrats believe that there are times when we must stand and fight. And we have. Thousands of us have paid for freedom with our lives. But always—when this country has been at its best—our purposes were clear.

Now they're not. Now our allies are as confused as our enemies.

Now we have no real commitment to our friends or to our ideals—not to human rights, not to the refuseniks, not to Sakharov, not to Bishop Tutu and the others struggling for freedom in South Africa.

We have in the last few years spent more than we can afford. We have pounded our chests and made bold speeches. But we lost 279 young Americans in Lebanon and we live behind sand bags in Washington.

How can anyone say that we are stronger, safer, or better?

That is the Republican record.

That its disastrous quality is not more fully understood by the American people I can only attribute to the president's amiability and the failure by some to separate the salesman from the product.

FOUR MORE YEARS OF REAGAN

And, now it's up to us. Now it's now up to you and me to make the case to America.

And to remind Americans that if they are not happy with all the president has done so far, they should consider how much worse it will be if he is left to his radical proclivities for another four years unrestrained. Unrestrained.

If July brings back Ann Gorsuch Burford—what can we expect of December?

Where would another four years take us?

Where would four years more take us?

How much larger will the deficit be?

How much deeper the cuts in programs for the struggling middle class and the poor to limit that deficit? How high will the interest rates be? How much more acid rain killing our forests and fouling our lakes?

And, ladies and gentlemen, the nation must think of this: What kind of Supreme Court will we have? We must ask ourselves what kind of court and country will be fashioned by the man who believes in having government mandate people's religion and morality?

The man who believes that trees pollute the environment, the man that believes that the laws against discrimination against people go too far. The man who threatens Social Security and Medicaid and help for the disabled.

How high will we pile the missiles?

How much deeper will the gulf be between us and our enemies?

And, ladies and gentlemen, will four years more make meaner the spirit of the American people?

This election will measure the record of the past four years. But more than that, it will answer the question of what kind of people we want to be.

DEMOCRATIC CREDO

We Democrats still have a dream. We still believe in this nation's future.

And this is our answer to the question, this is our credo:

We believe in only the government we need but we insist on all the government we need.

We believe in a government that is characterized by fairness and reasonableness, a reasonableness that goes beyond labels, that doesn't distort or promise things that we know we can't do.

We believe in a government strong enough to use the words "love" and "compassion" and smart enough to convert our noblest aspirations into practical realities.

We believe in encouraging the talented, but we believe that while survival of the fittest may be a good working description of the process of evolution, a government of humans should elevate itself to a higher order.

Our government should be able to rise to the level to where it can fill the gaps left by chance or a wisdom we don't fully understand.

We would rather have laws written by the patron of this great city, the man called the "world's most sincere Democrat"—St. Francis of Assissi—than laws written by Darwin.

We believe, we believe as Democrats, that a society as blessed as ours, the most affluent democracy in the world's history, one that can spend trillions on instruments of destruction, ought to be able to help the middle class in its struggle, ought to be able to find work for all who can do it, room at the table, shelter for the homeless, care for the elderly and infirm, and hope for the destitute.

And we proclaim as loudly as we can the utter insanity of nuclear proliferation and the need for a nuclear freeze, if only to affirm the simple truth that peace is better than war because life is better than death.

We believe in firm but fair law and order. We believe proudly in the union movement. We believe in privacy for people, openness by government, we believe in civil rights, and we believe in human rights.

We believe in a single fundamental idea that describes better than most textbooks and any speech that I could write what a proper government should be. The idea of family. Mutuality. The sharing of benefits and burdens for the good of all. Feeling one another's pain. Sharing one another's blessings. Reasonably, honestly, fairly—without respect to race, or sex, or geography or political affiliation.

We believe we must be the family of America, recognizing that at the heart of the matter we are bound one to another, that the problems of a retired school teacher in Duluth are our problems. That the future of the child in Buffalo is our future. That the struggle of a disabled man in Boston to survive, and live decently, is our struggle. That the hunger of a woman in Little Rock is our hunger. That the failure anywhere to provide what reasonably we might, to avoid pain, is our failure.

DEMOCRATIC FUTURE

Now for 50 years, for 50 years we Democrats created a better future for our children, using traditional Democratic principles as a fixed beacon, giving us direction and purpose, but constantly innovating, adapting to new realities; Roosevelt's alphabet programs; Truman's NATO and the GI Bill of Rights; Kennedy's intelligent tax incentives and the Alliance for Progress; Johnson's civil rights; Carter's human rights and the nearly miraculous Camp David Peace Accord.

Democrats did it, Democrats did it—and Democrats can do it again.

We can build a future that deals with our deficit.

Remember this, that 50 years of progress under our principles never cost us what the last four years of stagnation have. And, we can deal with the deficit intelligently, by shared sacrifice, with all parts of the nation's family contributing, building partnerships with the private sector, providing a sound defense without depriving ourselves of what we need to feed our children and care for our people.

We can have a future that provides for all the young of the present, by marrying common sense and compassion.

We know we can, because we did it for nearly 50 years before 1980.

And we can do it again. If we do not forget. If we do not forget that this entire nation has profited by these progressive principles. That they helped lift up generations to the middle class and higher: gave us a chance to work, to go to college, to raise a family, to own a house, to be secure in our old age and, before that, to reach heights that our own parents would not have dared dream of.

That struggle to live with dignity is the real story of the shining city. And it's a story, ladies and gentlemen, that I didn't read in a book, or learn in a classroom. I saw it, and lived it. Like many of you.

I watched a small man with thick calluses on both hands work 15 and 16 hours a day. I saw him once literally bleed from the bottoms of his feet, a man who came here uneducated, alone, unable to speak the language, who taught me all I needed to know about faith and hard work by the simple eloquence of his example. I learned about our kind of democracy from my father. And, I learned about our obligation to each other from him and from my mother. They asked only for a chance to work and to make the world better for their children and they asked to be protected in those moments when they would not be able to protect themselves. This nation and this nation's government did that for them.

And that they were able to build a family and live in dignity and see one of their children go from behind their little grocery store in South Jamaica on the other side of the tracks where he was born, to occupy the highest seat in the greatest state of the greatest nation in the only world we know, is an ineffably beautiful tribute to the democratic process.

And, ladies and gentlemen, on January 20, 1985, it will happen again. Only on a much, much grander scale. We will have a new president of the United States, a Democrat born not to the blood of kings but to the blood of pioneers and immigrants.

And we will have America's first woman vice president, the child of immigrants, and she, she, she will open with one magnificent stroke, a whole new frontier for the United States. Now, it will happen.

It will happen—if we make it happen; if you and I can make it happen.

And I ask you now—ladies and gentlemen, brothers and sisters—for the good of all of us—for the love of this great nation, for the family of America—for the love of God. Please, make this nation remember how futures are built.

Thank you and God bless you.●

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, at the London Economic Summit, leaders of the Allied Nations acknowledged that barriers to international trade are both damaging to the producers of exports and costly to consumers who are denied the right to buy these goods at world prices. One might expect, then, that support for protectionist policies would be a trend of the past.

Yet in recent years protectionist pressures have escalated. This election year has brought increasing stress on the international trading system.

The Reagan administration, facing an unprecedented trade deficit of more than $100 billion this election year, has found itself on the defensive, caught between mounting demands for protection and charges that its economic policies are causing a decline in American competitiveness.

One industry after another has asked for Government help against the flood of imports. They run the gamut—tuna fish, cut flowers, televisions, wine, steel, shoes, machine tools, and automobiles.

These demands for relief have come in the form of quota legislation before Congress and cases filed with the International Trade Commission. On the presumption that the ITC would find these industries to be injured by imports, some of the petitioners even timed their filing so that the President would have to decide on a remedy—tariffs or quotas—within weeks of the election. The President must decide on a remedy for the steel industry, for example, 5 weeks before the election.

Clearly the point is to put pressure on an incumbent President from some crucial industrial States. That pressure is probably no greater than the threat of retaliation being hinted by our trading partners. The import relief being sought here in one form or another is causing high anxiety in Europe, precisely because they fear election year jitters will mean new U.S. trade barriers.

The Common Market Foreign Ministers in a meeting last April predicted that protectionist measures under consideration in Washington could affect $4.7 billion worth of European community exports to the United States. They warned that our actions could lead to a dangerous increase in trade restrictions and to a rapid erosion of the open multilateral trading system on which world prosperity depends.

The pressure for protection is likely to intensify. It's tempting to try to protect our own special interests—and we've got lots of them. Special interests are also being pursued in Japan, in France, in Mexico, everywhere. Pretty soon we could end up with a global maze of restraints and restrictions that make us all worse off.

Let me recall a historical example which still has lessons for us today.

In 1930, a Republican Senate and House passed the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, the most restrictive trade law in our history. One of the officially stated purposes was to protect American labor from unemployment allegedly caused by imports of foreign goods.

The result was, however, a total disruption of the world trading system. Within months, retaliatory laws had been passed by virtually all of America's industrial trading partners; world trade plummeted by 60 percent in 2 years; a depression gave way to the Great Depression.

In recent years we have experienced a decline in our world trade position, in sharp contrast to the predominance we enjoyed in the postwar years. To stem this decline, many politicians are calling for strong protectionist measures. They insist that we get tough, just as Representative W.C. Hawley of Oregon insisted. Hawley, by the way, a 13-term Congressman, lost his bid for reelection in 1932 because of the economic damage done by his tariff act.

The lines have been clearly drawn. The Democratic Presidential nominee, former Vice President Mondale, supports the domestic content requirements that the Senate is due to consider this year. The bill, which has already passed the House and has the strong backing of the United Auto Workers, goes well beyond the protection for the automobile industry afforded by the Japanese quotas.

It would require companies selling more than 100,000 cars a year in this county to use specific percentages of American parts and labor.

The immediate effect would be a sharp reduction in Japanese cars available and an increase in automobile industry jobs. The net effect would be retaliation by foreign trading partners wiping out more jobs in other sectors, less choice for the automobile consumer, and higher prices charged for all cars on the market.

Mr. Mondale says this legislation will show the rest of the world we mean business. President Reagan has been a steadfast opponent of the bill, and would veto it if it should ever reach his desk.

Numerous other protectionist measures are being championed by labor and even by some Members of Congress in this election year, ignoring the kind of backlash effect this could have on our exports.

As the world continues its recovery, trade will increasingly provide a growing share of jobs for American workers and profits for American companies. But those jobs will not materialize if the world's major industrial nations begin erecting new trade barriers like steel quotas and domestic content legislation to stem the freer flow of goods and services throughout the world.

The growing importance of two-way, unfettered trade to our economy is often overlooked by Americans, but the facts speak for themselves. Consider the following:

The produce of one out of every three acres cultivated in the United States is shipped abroad, providing over 1 million U.S. jobs in the agricultural sector of our economy.

One out of every six American manufacturing jobs is dependent upon exports. More telling, between 1977 and the onset of the recession in 1981, four out of every five new jobs in manufacturing in the United States were the result of American products destined for foreign markets.

In 1970, exports accounted for 4 percent of the U.S. gross national product; by 1980, that figure had doubled to 8 percent.

Despite this evidence, Congress and the administration are confronted with some tough political choices in the numerous proposals for import protection. These proposals have different constituencies; some are pushed by labor, some by industry. But, taken together, they constitute a neoprotectionist agenda with growing lists of adherents.

Ironically, the more vocal supporters of these neoprotectionist schemes have tended to be Democrats and representatives of labor. Both of these groups have long pointed with justifiable pride to their commitment to free and unfettered trade. Meanwhile, Republicans historically have tended to stand in opposition to free trade. Oddly enough, now the roles have been reversed.

In fact, remarkably little truly protectionist legislation has been enacted in the United States during President Reagan's term of office.

The pressure to give final approval to the neoprotectionist agenda will continue to mount. I think it is likely we will see an acceleration of the political polarization of trade. Each of the Democratic Presidential contenders embraced protectionism in varying degrees during the primaries and it is obvious that President Reagan is relishing doing battle on that issue.

Where does this leave us? First of all, those who support freer trade—especially Republicans—should not flinch from this pressure. We should welcome a wide-ranging debate over trade. This could be a golden opportunity to broaden the party's appeal and to win new votes from consumers, farmers and workers.

Why do I single out these three groups? First, protectionism is blatantly against the interests of the consumers. In virtually every case, import restrictions lead to both higher prices and a restricted selection of consumer goods. Second, the major portions of the farm community are well aware of the vulnerability of American agriculture to foreign retaliation if we begin erecting new trade barriers. With over 1 million U.S. jobs dependent upon exports of billions of dollars worth of agricultural commodities, farmers have been in the forefront of opposition to protectionist legislation like the automobile domestic content bill. These farmers will vote in a way that facilitates farm exports, not imperils them.

Third, protectionism will inevitably mean a net loss of American jobs which stem from trade, both imports and exports. For every job saved by protectionism, many others will be lost. Let the protectionists justify actions which destroy American jobs.

The world trading system has been under serious pressure since the global recession of 1981 and 1982. We certainly face serious problems in our trade relations with others. Our trading partners have trade barriers which are both unfair and frustrating to Americans. But we merely aggravate the problem by giving in to that frustration and using the opportunities of an election year to press for enactment of protectionist laws.

There is much that Congress can do positively to enhance the American share of world trade. We should focus on ways to help open foreign markets for U.S. goods as well as ways to assist the exporter's competitive position. This can be accomplished in ways that are consistent with our international trading obligations under GATT and which don't make consumers and workers worse off.

One such effort is the reciprocity bill, H.R. 3398—title III, S. 144—the International Trade and Investment Act. Enactment of this bill this year is vital to improve our ability to negotiate the removal of foreign trade barriers and restrictive practices, and to improve our export trade in services, high technology goods, and trade related investment. Full implementation of both its letter and its spirit can provide significantly improved access to foreign markets for U.S. goods and services.

Other pending legislation—like the reauthorization of the generalized system of preferences which would help us gain freer access to LDC markets, help developing countries earn dollars with which to buy U.S. products, and help us obtain protection of U.S. patents and copyrights—deserve our urgent attention, not the spate of protectionist bills which in my view signal the start of a dangerous trade war.

In this election year, however, we cannot afford to try to please everyone. We must choose the course which improves our world trading system while avoiding those protectionist measures which would dismantle it.

Congress can enact laws which help American firms to compete in world markets, without coddling those industries which refuse to modernize in the face of tremendous strides by their foreign competitors. I do not believe that our workers and industries must accept the use of unfair practices by foreign competitors in their efforts to penetrate U.S. markets.

But there are two ways to deal with foreign competition. One way is to keep it out. Another way is to do all we can to meet it and hopefully beat it.

Congress and this administration have so far chosen the second course—which is better for everyone, especially the consumer. If we are committed to a sustained economic recovery, we must hold fast to our commitment to free trade and not permit protectionism to stymie our efforts to improve the world trade situation for American exporters.●

TRIBUTE TO PETER HURD, NEW MEXICAN ARTIST

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise today to praise the memory of Peter Hurd, the New Mexico artist who gained national recognition for his paintings of the Southwest. He died on July 9 after fighting alzheimer's disease for the last several years.

Born in Roswell, NM, on September 22, 1904, Peter Hurd attended the New Mexico Military Institute, and had completed 2 years at West Point before leaving there to pursue his study of painting. Hurd studied under the great illustrator and painter N.C. Wyeth, and then returned to his 3-square-mile ranch outside of Roswell, where he lived and worked for most of his life. "It just happens that this part of the planet is where I feel closest to life," he once said of New Mexico.

Following a successful showing of his work in 1937, Peter Hurd's reputation began to grow, and during the Second World War, he was a correspondent for Life magazine. Among his critically acclaimed works during this period were a series he did of American bomber pilots.

Peter Hurd's depictions of the Southwest are what made him famous, and the stark eloquence of his paintings have assured him a place in the memory and culture of the United States. Looking at his portrayals of the hills around his ranch, the field hands he knew, the windmills and ranchhouses he loved, one is reminded of Picasso's assertion that painting is a form of magic which serves as a mediator between this strange and beautiful world and we humans who inhabit it. I am proud to pay tribute to this great artist and New Mexican, Peter Hurd.●

S. 757, THE RESOURCE CONSERVATION AND RECOVERY ACT AMENDMENT NO. 3416

● Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, yesterday, the Senate took up consideration of S. 757, the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act. One of the amendments that was offered by Senator HEFLIN and cosponsored by myself, addresses a very serious problem in my State—the disposal of hazardous waste at the largest hazardous waste site in the world, at Emelle, AL.

This amendment was written with the intent of assuring Alabamians of the maximum protection allowed under the law, from the risks of exposure to hazardous waste.

The amendment would require, that two or more liners and a leachate collection system above and between such liners be installed at the 2,300-acre Emelle site in Alabama.

This amendment will help clarify the purpose and intent of an amendment offered by Senator SIMPSON of Wyoming. His amendment offered during committee hearings waives the double liner requirement, if sites are determined to have an area of clay, or other impermeable strata that would prevent the migration of waste.

My good colleague, Senator SIMPSON, offered this amendment to establish a philosophical guideline and to emphasize performance standards by encouraging companies to look closely at their siting plans to determine the best area for preventing the migration of waste.

Senator SIMPSON offered this amendment with the best of intentions. He feels, as I do, that the real answer to our hazardous waste problem lies in creating laws that minimize large amounts of concentrated industrial hazardous waste.

Section 6 of S. 757 dealing with the double liner waiver has been of great concern to Alabamians for some time.

Senator HEFLIN and I along with our constituents want Senator SIMPSON to know how very much we appreciate his efforts to clarify the intent of his amendment to S. 757. I would like to include a letter Senator SIMPSON sent to the newspapers in Alabama, at my request, explaining why he offered the double liner waiver.

As many know, the Emelle site operation is under investigation by State officials. It is for these reasons that I have refrained until now from making public statements regarding Emelle.

The safe disposal of hazardous waste is a serious national issue, not just in our State but throughout the Nation. Alabamians appreciate the spirit in which this Congress has worked to help assure they receive the maximum protection against hazardous waste allowed under the law.

The letter follows:

AMENDMENT PURPOSE CLARIFIED

Recently it has been widely alleged and circulated in Alabama that I have proposed an amendment to the Solid Waste Disposal Act specifically for the sole purpose of exempting a hazardous waste disposal facility at Emelle, Ala., from requirements which would apply to all other facilities that contain hazardous waste. What drivel. That is not what my amendment was ever intended to do and it is not what my amendment would do.

These are the facts of the matter: Last summer a bill to amend the Solid Waste Disposal Act came before the Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works, on which I serve. It contained a provision requiring that all new or expanded hazardous waste disposal facilities, wherever they are found, must install and use a "double liner" with a leachate collection system between the liners. I have long been opposed to Congress mandating the use of any specific technology for the control of pollution. In my view the law should establish, or direct the EPA to establish a tough general performance standard that would protect human health and the environment, and then allow the individual facilities throughout the United States the flexibility to achieve those standards in any way that they could—as long as their method is equally effective in protecting the public health and the environment.

Accordingly, I then proposed an amendment which would allow a facility to use an alternate system for the containment of hazardous waste, other than a double liner system, if that facility could then demonstrate to EPA that the alternate system is at least as effective as the double liner system. There is nothing magic about a double liner requirement since all liners will leak. The regulations are meant to minimize leakage.

I do not know if the Waste Management Inc. facility at Emelle, or any other facility in the United States for that matter, will be able to make the demonstration that is required by my amendment when the amendment becomes law—but let me clearly inform the people of Alabama that the amendment was not conceived with Emelle or any other specific site in the United States in mind, and neither I nor my staff had any meetings with representatives of Waste Management Inc., or any discussions with them regarding the Emelle site prior to the adoption of the amendment.

I have no desire to make any state the waste dump of America. I know full well the problems associated with hazardous waste contamination because my own state has several Superfund waste sites that are in the process of being cleaned up.

The public health and environment will continue to be protected through new and more specific regulations when these amendments become law. In addition, there is another provision in the Senate bill that would require ground water monitoring around waste sites in order to provide early detection if any leakage threatens to contaminate a public water supply. This factor has been wholly ignored in accounts of my alternate technology amendment.

Should the amendment in question become law and the Emelle facility be allowed to use a different containment system it would only be evidence that they then have demonstrated that such an alternate system will provide as much or more protection to the people and the environment of Alabama as will a double liner system.

It is tough as hell to determine just how to safely handle and dispose of hazardous waste—and Congress is not aided in its task by some who enjoy "juicing up the troops" with emotional babble.

Perhaps it would be well for us all—congresspersons, "the observers," the participants, the media and the public we serve to consider again the words of Edmund Burke. They have a ring. "Those who would carry the great public schemes must be proof against the most fatiguing delays, the most mortifying disappointments, the most shocking insults and worst of all—the presumptuous judgment of the ignorant beyond their design."●

CONDEMNATION OF SOVIET TREATMENT OF DR. ANDREI SAKHAROV

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, as a member of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, I have closely followed the plight of Andrei Sakharov and his wife Yelena Bonner. Since January 1980, the couple has been living in exile in the city of Gorky, prisoners in their own country. Soviet treatment of the Sakharovs has been nothing short of criminal.

Their case underscores the Kremlin's complete disregard for basic human rights and civil liberties. As a result of Sakharov's human rights activities including his leadership in the Moscow Helsinki Monitoring Group, he and his wife have been singled out for particularly harsh reprisals by the Soviet secret police.

Shortly after their exile began, the Sakharovs' children were forced to leave the U.S.S.R. The decision to break up the family was clearly made at the highest levels of the Soviet Government. This action epitomizes the cruel nature of the Soviet regime. Earlier this year, Sakharov requested permission for his wife to travel to the West for medical treatment. Despite his membership in the Soviet Academy, Sakharov and Bonner have been denied access to medical facilties readily available to other academy members. At the same time, the Soviets have refused to allow Yelena Bonner to obtain treatment outside of the U.S.S.R.

On May 2, Sakharov began a hunger strike. To protest Soviet actions directed against he and his wife; 4 days later, the Sakharovs disappeared. No one has seen them since. In addition, the Soviet newspaper Izestia has carried a number of articles accusing Bonner of trying to flee to the West and threatened to bring up criminal charges against her for "Anti-Soviet slander" and treason.

Because of my grave concern over this matter, I recently requested permission to visit the Soviet Union in order to raise the issue of Soviet treatment of Andrei Sakharov and Yelena Bonner with representatives of the Soviet Government. The Soviet response to my request was typical—complete silence. I was not granted the visa necessary to enter that closed country.

It is time we open our eyes and confront the realities of the Soviet regime. The men behind the Kremlin walls did not get there by the ballot box. They have resorted, and continue to resort, to ruthless practices in order to gain power and keep it. Through the KGB and the estimated 1.2 million informants who work for the secret police, the Soviet leadership has been able to maintain a stranglehold over the Soviet people. Meanwhile, a sophisticated apparatus for agitation and propaganda has been developed by the Soviets. Regrettably, many have been sucked in by Soviet agitprop and disinformation. The time has come to expose the Soviets for what they really are.

Former U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Adlai Stevenson once confronted the Soviet delegate to the U.N., threatening that "unless the Soviet Union stops telling lies about the United States, we will start telling the truth about the Soviet Union." We must follow through with this threat.

We cannot, and must not, allow the Soviets to continue their reign of terror without raising our voices in condemnation. We must speak out on behalf of those who have been silenced by the Soviets. I intend on continuing to press until the truth is obtained with respect to the welfare and whereabouts of Andrei Sakharov and Yelena Bonner.

It is for these reasons that I cosponsored the recently passed resolution on behalf of the Sakharovs. But this is not enough, we must do more.●

POW/MIA AWARENESS DAY

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, 1 week ago today, America marked POW-MIA Awareness Day, a special remembrance of the courage of our missing fighting men and the special dedication of their families.

Mr. President, Hugh Taylor, editor of Kansas' Neodesha Post-Dispatch, is one American for whom July 20 held special meaning. This Senator read with great interest Mr. Taylor's eloquent and heartfelt editorial of July 19, and requests that the article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

NOTES IN THE MARGIN: FOR THE 2,500—FLY YOUR FLAG, BUT, PLEASE, NO COMMERCIALISM

Please excuse me if I ventilate a bit.

Call it a slight case of post-Vietnam Stress Syndrome, or whatever, but I become absolutely furious when I hear of an organization, individual, company, or a newspaper, attempting to profit from the misery of those who have suffered so greatly from the conflict in Southeast Asia.

To me, this is absolutely ghoulish!

I feel strongly that there is something immoral about attempting to turn a profit on something of such deep concern to so many people.

This newspaper has tried to publicize the plight of the POWs, MIAs, and the families of those men, not for profit, but because it is something I, as the editor, strongly believe in.

I am appalled that any newspaper would stoop to trying to make money from the day dedicated to heightening the awareness of the American people on this issue, I cannot believe the gall and lack of sensitivity shown by such an effort.

Because we care, and refuse to make a profit from the misery of others, the Post-Dispatch has asked local individuals and merchants listed in our commemorative ad not to pay us, but to pledge a contribution to the National Forget-Me-Not Association, the group dedicated to increasing awareness on the POW-MIA issue and trying to get answers on the state and whereabouts of our people.

Included in the ad is the address of the Forget-Me-Not Association. If you would like to join this effort, please send your tax-free contribution to the Association and show them that you care.

Perhaps I should explain why I feel so strongly about this.

In Tuesday's Post-Dispatch, we carried a story which mentioned two Naval aviators who were downed in Southeast Asia, known to have been captured, but never accounted for by either the government of the United States or the Vietnamese: Lieutenant Commander Bart Creed and Captain Harley Hall.

I knew both Bart and Harley personally, just as I knew several dozen others who were either held as prisoners of war or are still unaccounted for as missing in action.

From 1969 to 1970, I was Operations Officer of Attack Squadron 113, based at the U.S. Naval Air Station Lemoore, California. In 1970, I was transferred out of 113 as a Commander-selectee, and went to Attack Squadron 122 at Lemoore, the A-7E training squadron, as an instructor pilot.

One of the people who went into 113 when I and several others rotated out was Bart Creed. Later on, just before The Stingers, as 113 is called, went on cruise, a close friend of mine and my former Executive Officer in the squadron, Brent Streit, took over that command as skipper.

As Administrative Officer, then Operations, and finally Executive Officer of VA-122, I worked closely with 113 and the other squadrons at Lemoore, but because "Once a Stinger, Always a Stinger", I was especially attached to that group. I got to know Bart very well during that period.

When he was shot down over Laos, my wife and I were two of those who tried to help his wife, who lived near us on the air station, during those initial trying days.

Later, when the squadron returned from that fateful cruise, Brent and the others in 113 told me of the rescue attempts made by the Army helicopter pilots and covered by The Stingers when they tried to get Bart out.

He was definitely alive, though injured, and they saw him taken prisoner by either the Pathet Lao or the Vietnamese.

In the meantime, Harley Hall, whom I had known when he had the Blue Angels, the Navy's flight demonstration team, had gone through 112 to get checked out in the A-7E. I flew several hops with him and got to know him very well. He was not only a fantastic airplane driver, but a super individual.

I later learned from those who had been with Harley when he got smoked that he had been seen on the ground and was known to have been captured. At least two of the POWs released in 1973 told me personally that they had communicated with Harley at the "Hanoi Hilton", the POW compound in downtown Hanoi where our people were so dreadfully treated by the Vietnamese.

Of course, while at Lemoore during the period of 1968 to 1971, it was almost a daily occurrence to learn that someone from the base that I knew and had flown with had been shot down, killed, or taken prisoner. We had a very large community of MIA and POW wives and families right there on the air station and a braver, stronger, more upbeat group of people you have never met.

There were a few who cracked under the pressure, women and children who had breakdowns, and kids who developed emotional or drug problems because of the strain but, for the most part, they all held up very well.

One of the strongest was Marge Aldern, whose husband, Dean, an Air Wing Commander, was shot down and listed as missing in action during that time. Marge held her family of four boys together in a manner worthy of nothing but praise.

Her eldest, Tom, went on to the U.S. Naval Academy, is now a Lieutenant in the Navy, and, I'm proud to say, my son-in law.

So, if you have wondered why I have been pushing so hard on this POW-MIA Awareness Day, now you know, as Paul Harvey says, "The rest of the story".

I was personally involved and I get a little steamed now when I hear people decry our involvement in Southeast Asia or say that during that time their feelings were "not exactly pro-America."

Please help us get some answers. Fly your flag tomorrow, and put a red ribbon on the staff to show that those who have suffered, and might still be suffering, have not been forgotten.

Red ribbons may be obtained, free of charge, from the House of Flowers and Gifts. All you have to do is ask for them.

Then, I ask that you do one more thing. Write to our Congressional delegation and demand that something be done about this situation. We can get answers from the Vietnamese, but only if we put some pressure on them. This nation has the economic and diplomatic clout to make them come clean on the matter of MIAs, but we won't use it until there is enough pressure on Congress to cause them to act.

You don't have to share my indignation over attempts to commercialize National POW-MIA Awareness Day, especially from those who admit they did not back America's effort during the war in Southeast Asia, but I would ask that you think about what has been happening to those who fought there, were captured there, and are still missing there. If that riles you just a little, I will be satisfied.

"They are not forgotten."●

NEW AIRBAG TECHNOLOGY

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, Secretary of Transportation Elizabeth Dole recently announced the administration's decision to increase use of passive restraint systems in America's automobiles. This decision has received mixed reviews by a variety of parties. But the Secretary deserves our praise for moving this issue off dead center.

The feasibility and utility of airbags has been debated within the Federal Government, DOT and the Congress for a long time; perhaps too long. The arguments against airbags have focused, in part, on their cost. Secretary Dole has stated that airbags, when produced in quantity, can be purchased for $320, about half the cost of a radio in a new car. Nevertheless, cost continues to be cited as an obstacle to airbag installation by opponents.

Given this longstanding argument over cost, I was very pleased to note a recent article in the Washington Post describing the Breed Corp.'s development of a mechanical airbag. This system could cut the cost of airbags by more than half. The Breed Corp., which is located in Lincoln Park, NJ, will employ the same sophisticated technology that is used in defense weaponry. While the systems to be developed require further testing, they offer great promise for simple and reliable production of auto safety equipment at affordable prices.

Mr. President, airbags can save upwards of 9,000 lives per year. It is my hope that Secretary Dole's decision will ultimately reduce death and crippling injury to American motorists due to the increased use of seatbelts and airbags.

I ask that the article on these developments from the July 22, 1984, edition of the Washington Post be printed in the RECORD for the information of my colleagues.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 22, 1984]

BREAKING THE COST BARRIER ON AIRBAGS

(By Nell Henderson)

While car manufacturers and consumer groups continue a 15-year-old debate over automobile air bags, a New Jersey company is working on a device that could change the arithmetic of the arguments by drastically reducing the price.

Consumer safety advocates contend that air bags could save 9,000 lives a year and prevent 65,000 crippling injuries over 10 years, but auto makers have argued that motorists just won't spend hundreds of dollars for them.

Mercedes-Benz of North America, the only company now selling air bags in the United States, offers its driver's-side air bag as an $880 option and has sold more than 1,000 air-bag-equipped cars since last fall. General Motors Corp. estimates that an air-bag system protecting both the driver and front-seat passenger would cost $1,100, based on production of 100,000 units. The Department of Transportation says a driver's-side bag could cost about $320, based on production of 1 million bags.

Breed Corp., by contrast, hopes to break through the cost barrier by offering a driver's-side air-bag system for $50 and a full front-seat system for about $150.

Breed, a small defense contractor based in Lincoln Park, N.J., has conceived of an inexpensive mechanical sensor located in the center of the steering wheel that would detect the moment of impact and cause the air bag to inflate in time to protect the motorist. Its cost advantage comes from its simplicity compared with the electrical sensor systems now used with air bags.

Breed envisions a device that motorists could buy at an auto parts store and pop into a cavity that auto manufacturers would leave in the center of the steering wheels of future models. Replacing it would be easier than changing a headlight, and, once installed, it would not be seen.

Most cars now on the road could be modified to use the system, say officials of the company, which has analyzed crash data for auto companies for 15 years.

The much-debated air bag prevents a motorist from crashing into the windshield, dashboard and steering wheel by inflating with nitrogen gas within milliseconds after a front-end impact. The 28-inch-wide circular bag inflates and deflates within two seconds, so fast that some crash victims have said they did not see or feel the bag until after the crash, when they found the deflated bag on their laps.

The traditional system used by GM, Ford Motor Co., and Mercedes-Benz relies on an electronic sensor wired to a device that generates the nitrogen gas that fills the bag. The circuits must be monitored by a diagnostic system, which makes sure they are working, and supported by a back-up electrical source.

Breed will provide electronic sensors for the air bags to be installed in 5,000 Ford Tempos purchased by the General Services Administration. The systems will include five sensors, one located behind each headlight, one on the front bumper and two on the wall separating the hood from the passenger compartment.

In these sensors, magnets hold a small metal ball in place until a crash occurs at at least 12 miles per hour. The momentum of the car frees the ball to fly forward onto two wires, thus completing the electrical circuit and firing the gas generator.

Mercedes uses a different sensor and places it on the transmission tunnel between the two front seats. The Mercedes sensoring system also provides two back-up electrical sources.

The sophisticated technology ensures that the system will work, and will work when it should—discerning between the changes in speed resulting from going over a pothole or curb and those caused by a serious crash.

Breed's mechanial sensor, located in the center of the steering wheel, acts like the trigger on a shotgun. A ball weight is held in place by a lever and a spring. The meomentum of the crash carries the ball forward, overcoming the spring and moving the lever to release a firing pin, which initiates the gas inflation.

Breed estimates that the sensor would cost $5 to produce in quantities of 1 million, the gas generator would cost $15, and the air bag, cover and mounting plate would cost $8.

The circuitry and back-up power systems required for electrical sensors would not be needed for the mechanical model.

The total manufacturing cost would be $28. Breed would sell the complete package (about 9.5 inches long, 5.5 inches wide and 2.5 inches deep, weighing 4.5 pounds) to the distributor or the car manufacturer for $32. The estimated final cost to the customer is about $50.

"It changes the [cost] equation rather dramatically," said Thomas C. McGrath Jr., Breed's vice president of business development.

The mechanical sensor also is simpler and, therefore, more reliable, said Allen K. Breed, chairman of the company, who predicted that the new mechanical device will replace the electrical sensor once testing is completed.

But a long road of testing lies ahead, and auto makers are in a hurry. The Department of Transportation recently announced that 10 percent of all 1987 cars must be equipped with automatic crash protection such as air bags or automatically closing seat belts, and that all new cars must have such protection by the 1990 model year.

Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole has said she would suspend the rule if states with two-thirds of the U.S. population pass laws mandating use of seat belts.

She also said the rule will encourage auto makers to use bags or develop "new technologies" by giving cars with such systems credit for 1.5 cars toward the quota, while giving a car with passive belts credit for one car.

Consumer groups have said the Dole rule will kill air bags, because car companies will opt for passive belts, which retail for about $60.

But Breed said the ruling will favor the bags. The car manufacturers "know people reject seat belts," he said. "We're getting urgent calls from all the auto makers. They're all cranking up air-bag programs."

Unfortunately, the Breed mechanical sensor is still in "the preliminary phase and needs proving out," said David S. Breed, the company's vice president.

The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration has awarded Breed a $587,970 contract to retrofit 100 state police cars with its new air-bag package. NHTSA is still "evaluating the concept" and has set no production schedule, spokesman Bob Boaz said.

The auto manufacturers say they have not decided how they will respond to the Dole decision, but they are looking at the mechanical sensor.

"It's promising enough that we're working with Breed on it," said Tom Terry, a GM automotive safety engineer. "But it's still really early in the game, too early to talk production. It's in the research phase."

GM is wary of air bags after offering them as a $225 to $315 option on its Cadillacs, Oldsmobiles and Buicks from 1974 to 1976. Although the air bags were priced below cost, the company sold only 10,000, after estimating sales of 300,000.

One auto maker, which plans to offer air bags on some of its 1987 models, questions whether the mechanical sensor would satisfy the DOT's requirement that an air-bag system have a "readiness indicator" to guarantee that the system is working.

Volvo, like Mercedes, emphasizes that the air bag is a supplement to a lap-and-shoulder belt.

Other auto makers question the merits of air bags, contending that they are effective only in front-end crashes, are no help in a roll-over, and must be worn with a lap belt anyway. But they also tend to agree that cost is a major issue.

"It's an expensive option," said Jerald R. terHorst, a Ford spokesman. "If you ask [buyers], 'Do you want a stereo or an air bag?' what do you expect them to say?"●

THE 1984 OLYMPIC GAMES IN LOS ANGELES, CA

● Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, this week the world has gathered in Los Angeles. Pooling its talents, sharpening its drive, it reminds us all of the universality of man's need to excel. Long before the bowl of fire is ignited inside Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum, the Olympic torch has cast its special light on a country rediscovering its own sense of purpose and pride. Long after the flame is extinguished, memories will remain to illuminate the games of the 23d Olympiad. So will the example of the athletes themselves, their striving and their struggles.

Already, the Los Angeles Olympic Organizing Committee [LAOOC] has set some records of its own. For these are the games of free enterprise, games for the public's enjoyment, paid for out of private funds. As such, they embody the competitive spirit off the field as well as on. Through its own aggressive program of marketing, the LAOOC has earned over $500 million, enough to meet its budget with room to spare. Come to think of it, Uncle Sam could learn a lot from Sam the Eagle. He might even discover ways to turn a deficit into a surplus.

For now, there is no shortfall of national enthusiasm as the international community of runners and swimmers, boxers and gymnasts, and equestrians and sailors convenes in the urban neighborhoods and wide-open spaces of southern California. Before they are gone, they will leave behind perhaps $3 billion in revenue, a substantial boost to a tourism industry already the State's largest.

But in the end, these games are about determination, not dollars. They are the strain on an athlete's face and the pull on his weary muscles—the hidden reserves of energy and character that vault one competitor ahead of another—the end product of a lifelong aspiration to run faster, jump further, soar higher, and be the best, however that exacting standard is defined.

Most of all, the games are a joyous reminder that what unites us is greater than our divisions, and that politics can be relegated to the sidelines, even on a global scale. It is a lesson we need to learn and relearn constantly. For now, let us be grateful that the athletes of Los Angeles have consented to be our teachers. I join with millions of other Americans in wishing them well, and welcoming them with all the warmth that California can supply.●

THE PAPERWORK REDUCTION ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1984

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I am pleased that the Government Affairs Committee today voted to report legislation to address one of the highest priority issues within the small business community—the need for reduction of Federal paperwork. For small business firms throughout the country, the burden of these federally imposed requirements is an often unbearable one. The perception among my own constituents marks these requirements as not burdensome, but unnecessary as well. The Governmental Affairs Committee's approval of the Paperwork Reduction Act of 1984 is an important congressional response to these concerns.

The Paperwork Reduction Act of 1980 offered several mechanisms to collect information needed by the Government in the most efficient manner possible. The Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs [OIRA], was established as a clearinghouse for all paperwork and recordkeeping requirements imposed on the public. The act also featured a public protection clause which was designed to assure the public that any information requested was in fact needed.

The 1980 legislation mandated a reduction by 25 percent of the paperwork required of small businesses regulated by or trying to do business with the Federal Government. Since its enactment, 477 million hours of annual paperwork burden on the American public have been eliminated saving individuals and businesses an estimated $10 billion to $20 billion. The 25 percent goal has been met and, in fact, exceeded. However, there are still small businesses who are deterred from seeking Federal contracts because of the amount of paperwork, and certain agencies have failed to fully respond to the directive to remove redtape.

The Paperwork Reduction Act Amendments of 1984, S. 2433, will build on the accomplishments of the 1980 measure by mandating an additional 25-percent reduction over the next 5 years. Other features include: First, clarification of the public protection clause outlined in the original bill; second, Presidential appointment and Senate confirmation of the head of the OIRA, which serves to focus the role of congressional oversight in relation to that agency; third, detailed reporting of the annual OIRA budget; and, fourth, the establishment of an up-to-date information technology fund, thereby acknowledging the importance of developing and mastering emerging forms of information technology.

I offer my strong support for the Paperwork Reduction Act Amendments of 1984, and urge swift consideration and action for this important measure.●

AGRICULTURAL CREDIT FAIRNESS

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I want to express my support for Senate Concurrent Resolution 130, introduced by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. EXON], and urge my colleagues to review the resolution, and hopefully, sponsor it. I think it sends an excellent message, not only to the farmers of this Nation, but also to the administration, and officials who are involved in farm credit in this administration.

The resolution is fairly simple. It provides that the President, in cooperation with the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve Board, should take steps to ensure the availability of agricultural credit to the agricultural producers in this country. It also provides that our producers be treated no less favorably than foreign borrowers. This whole matter, Mr. President, is simply one of equity.

Our farmers, ranchers, dairy producers, and poultry producers, along with businesses that are involved in the agricultural sector of our economy, have made us the envy of the world. Productivity gains in agriculture have been able to keep the balance of trade better than it would otherwise have been because agricultural products are about the only area in which we enjoy a trade surplus.

The problem, Mr. President, as virtually everybody knows, is that more and more people are leaving the rural areas, giving up farming. Farmers, ranchers, dairymen, and poultry producers can't stay in business if what they receive for their production is below the money it took to produce the commodity.

Therefore, we've got to take steps, particularly in the area of export financing and promotion, that will increase our sales abroad. Obviously, the overvalued dollar has hurt, and that's why deficits must be brought down. This would lower interest rates, and not only help our exports, but just as importantly, lower the cost of credit to the American agricultural producer. That's why I've supported a budget freeze, a freeze on Federal spending, for each of the last 2 years. Although it hasn't been successful, I continue to hope that next year, we'll be able to adopt the budget freeze.

Additionally, I was an original cosponsor of, and strongly supported, the proposed constitutional amendment requiring a balanced Federal budget. We have to balance the budget in the State of Arkansas—I did it when I was Governor—and I can't understand why we can't pass this budget reform that will put into place the one mechanism for balancing the budget on the Federal level.

Along with reducing the deficit, and increasing our exports, Mr. President, I think the steps set out in the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 130) would be extremely helpful to our Nation's agricultural producers. People engaged in agriculture have been shown time and time again to be good credit risks. On the other hand, many foreign borrowers, particularly countries in Latin America, have been extremely poor credit risks. However, those foreign nations have received additional loans, and when interest payments were due, but couldn't be paid, a deferral period was arranged, and they were given additional time to pay.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the agricultural producers in this country should receive comparable treatment. They should come first. They are the ones who've been experiencing a real credit crisis. Although the Latin American credit problems are on the front pages of many large newspapers frequently, the day-to-day struggles of a farmer, poultry producer, dairy producer, or small business person engaged in some part of the agricultural economy, receive little attention. However, the availability of credit is critically important to our Nation's agricultural economy, and I would hope and expect that our producers should be given no less favorable treatment than some foreign country.

Mr. President, we should adopt this resolution, send a signal to the administration about the availability of agricultural credit, and more importantly, Mr. President, let the agricultural producers in this country know that the Federal Government will be responsive in the area of agricultural credit, as well as agricultural exports.●

ORDERS FOR FRIDAY

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, there will be no further votes this evening. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate recesses, it do so until 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, after the time for the two leaders under the standing order, I ask unanimous consent that there be a special order for not to exceed 15 minutes for the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR TIME FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, following the special order, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business during which statements may be made for not to exceed 5 minutes and the period not extend beyond 10:30 a.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXTENSION OF ALCOHOL AND DRUG ABUSE AND MENTAL HEALTH SERVICES BLOCK GRANT

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on S. 2303.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the bill from the Senate (S. 2303) entitled "An Act to revise and extend the Alcohol and Drug Abuse and Mental Health Services block grant", do pass with the following amendments: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

TITLE I—ALCOHOL AND DRUG ABUSE AND MENTAL HEALTH SERVICES

SEC. 101. This title may be cited as the "Alcohol Abuse, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Amendments of 1984".

SEC. 102. Section 1911 of the Public Health Service Act (42 U.S.C. 300x) is amended by striking out "and" after "1983," and by inserting before the period a comma and the following: "$532,000,000 for fiscal year 1985, $564,000,000 for fiscal year 1986, and $598,000,000 for fiscal year 1987".

SEC. 103. (a) Title XIX of the Public Health Service Act is amended by striking out section 1912 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"GRANTS

"SEC. 1912. (a) The Secretary may use not more than 1 percent of the amount appropriated under section 1911 for any fiscal year to make grants to public and nonprofit private entities for projects for the training and retraining of employees adversely affected by changes in the delivery of mental health services and for providing such employees assistance in securing employment.

"(b) No grant may be made by the Secretary under subsection (a) unless an application therefor has been submitted to, and approved by, the Secretary. Such application shall be in such form, submitted in such manner, and contain and be accompanied by such information, as the Secretary may specify. No such application may be approved unless it contains assurances that the applicant will use the funds provided only for the purposes specified in the approval application and will establish such fiscal control and fund accounting procedures as may be necessary to assure proper disbursement and accounting of Federal funds paid to the applicant under subsection (a).

"ALLOTMENTS

"SEC. 1913. (a)(1) If the amount available for allotment from appropriations under section 1911 for a fiscal year does not exceed $528,000,000, the Secretary shall allot such amount—

"(A) on the basis of a formula prescribed by the Secretary which is based equally—

"(i) on the population of each State, and

"(ii) the population of each State weighted by its relative per capita income, or

"(B) on the basis of the amount received by a State in fiscal year 1984, whichever yields a higher amount. For purposes of subparagraph (A), the term 'relative per capita income' means the quotient of the per capital income of the United States and the per capita income of the State, except that if the State is Guam, American Samoa, the Northern Marianas, the Trust Territory of the Pacific, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands, the quotient shall be considered to be one.

"(2) If the amount available for allotment from appropriations under section 1911 for a fiscal year exceeds $528,000,000, the Secretary shall allot $528,000,000 in accordance with paragraph (1) and shall allot the amount which is in excess of such amount on the basis of the formula described in paragraph (1)(A).

"(3) Notwithstanding paragraph (1), if the aggregate of the amounts to be allotted to each State pursuant to paragraph (1)(B) in any fiscal year exceeds the total of the amount appropriated under section 1911 for allotments to States, the amount to be allotted to a State shall for such fiscal year be an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount which is to be allotted to the State pursuant to such paragraph as the total of the amount appropriated under section 1911 for allotments bears to the total of the amount required to be appropriated under such section for allotments to provide each State with the allotment required by such paragraph.

"(4) To the extent that all the funds appropriated under section 1911 for a fiscal year and available for allotment in such fiscal year are not otherwise allotted to States because—

"(A) one or more States have not submitted an application or description of activities in accordance with section 1915 for the fiscal year;

"(B) one or more States have notified the Secretary that they do not intend to use the full amount of their allotment; or such excess shall be allotted among each of the remaining States in proportion to the amount otherwise allotted to such States for the fiscal year without regard to this paragraph.

"(C) some State allotments are offset or repaid under section 1916(b)(3);

"(b)(1) If the Secretary—

"(A) receives a request from the governing body of an Indian tribe or tribal organization within any State that funds under this part be provided directly by the Secretary to such tribe or organization, and

"(B) determines that the members of such tribe or tribal organization would be better served by means of grants made directly by the Secretary on this part, the Secretary shall reserve from amounts which would otherwise be allotted to such State under subsection (a) for the fiscal year the amount determined under paragraph (2).

"(2) The Secretary shall reserve for the purpose of paragraph (1) from amounts that would otherwise be allotted to such State under subsection (a) an amount equal to the amount which bears the same ratio to the State's allotment for the fiscal year involved as the total amount provided or allotted for fiscal year 1980 by the Secretary to such tribe or tribal organization under the provisions of law referred to in subsection (a)(2) bore to the total amount provided or allotted for such fiscal year by the Secretary to the State and entities (including Indian tribes and tribal organizations) in the State under such provisions of law.

"(3) The amount reserved by the Secretary on the basis of a determination under this subsection shall be granted to the Indian tribe or tribal organization serving the individuals for whom such a determination has been made.

"(4) In order for an Indian tribe or tribal organization to be eligible for a grant for a fiscal year under this subsection, it shall submit to the Secretary a plan for such fiscal year which meets such criteria as the Secretary may prescribe.

"(5) The terms "Indian tribe" and "tribal organization" have the same meaning given such terms in section 4(b) and section 4(c) of the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act.".

(b) Section 1915(c)(6) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 300x-4(c)(6)) is amended by striking out subparagraphs (B) and (C) and inserting lieu thereof the following:

"(B) The State agrees to use 75 percent of the funds allotted to it under section 1912 for fiscal years beginning after fiscal year 1984 for the mental health and alcohol drug abuse activities prescribed by section 1914(a) as prescribed by subparagraph (A).".

(c) Such section 1915(c) is amended—

(1) in paragraph (2) by striking out "fiscal years 1982, 1983, and 1984" and inserting in lieu thereof "fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987";

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(14) The State will, not later than October 1, 1984, as prescribed by the Secretary by regulation, collect data on alcoholism, alcohol abuse, drug abuse, and mental illness in the State using a uniform system prescribed in such regulation.

"(15) The chief executive officer of the State may establish a State mental health services planning council which will serve as an advocate for chronically mentally ill individuals, seriously mentally ill children, adolescents, and elderly individuals, other individuals with mental illness or emotional problems and which will monitor, review, and evaluate, not less often than annually, the allocation and adequacy of mental health services within the State. Such a council shall be made up of residents of the State and include in its membership representatives of the principal State agencies involved in mental health, higher education training facilities, and public and private entities concerned with the need, planning, operation, funding, and use of mental health and related services and activities. At least one half of the membership shall consist of individuals who are not State employees or providers of mental health services.

"(16) The State agrees to use an amount equal to at least 10 percent of the funds under its allotment which are to be used for mental health activities to establish new comprehensive community mental health programs for unserved areas or for underserved populations.";

"(17) The State agrees to use not less than 10 percent of the funds allotted to it under this part to initiate and expand alcohol and drug abuse services for women and to initiate and expand mental health services for severely disturbed children and adolescents. The services described in this paragraph are in addition to the services to be provided under paragraph (16).''; and

(3) by striking out the last sentence.

(d)(1) Section 1915 is amended by redesignating subsection (e) as subsection (g) and by inserting after subsection (d) the following new subsection:

"(e) The chief executive officer of a State may prepare and submit a comprehensive mental health plan which shall include—

"(1) an identification of the mental health service areas within the State and the agency responsible for the delivery and coordination of mental health services within the State;

"(2) an identification of the need in each mental health service area of the State for mental health and related services, particularly the need for services by chronically mentally ill individuals, seriously mentally ill children, adolescents, and elderly individuals, and other identified populations;

"(3) a description of the resources devoted to and activities to be carried out under the plan, including—

"(A) a description of mental health activities funded or supported under this Act,

"(B) a description of mental health activities funded or supported by State appropriations,

"(C) a description of mental health and related support activities funded under or supported through title XIX of the Social Security Act and other programs of Federal assistance, and

"(D) a description of mental health activities reimbursed in the State by private third party insurance coverage;

"(4) the mental health prevention and treatment objectives to be achieved under the plan and a listing of the programs and resources to be used to meet such objectives;

"(5) a strategy for the establishment and implementation for the chronically mentally ill of an organized community-based system of care which shall provide for quantitative targets to be achieved in the implementation of the plan, including numbers of chronically mentally ill persons residing in the areas to be served, services to be provided to such individuals in gaining access to essential mental health services, and medical and dental care and rehabilitation services and employment, housing, and other support services designed to enable chronically mentally ill individuals to function outside of inpatient institutions to the maximum extent of their capabilities;

"(6) targets for provision of community-based mental health services for underserved populations, with particular emphasis on the elderly, children and adolescents, and individuals residing in areas without adequate outpatient treatment facilities; and

"(7) a method for the periodic evaluation of the plan's effectiveness in meeting the objectives set forth in the plan.

"(f) The Secretary shall report annually to the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Labor and Human Resources of the Senate on the new programs initiated and services expanded in accordance with subsection (c)(17). The report shall include a detailed description of such programs and services, an assessment of the adequacy of such programs and services in meeting the alcohol and drug abuse treatment needs of women and the need for mental health services of severely disturbed children and adolescents, and such other information, including legislative and administrative recommendations, as the Secretary deems appropriate.".

(2) Section 1915(c)(2) is amended by striking out "(e)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(g)".

(3) Section 1915(c)(4)(C) is amended by inserting before the first comma the following: "or psychosocial rehabilitation services".

(e) Paragraph (2) of section 1916(b) is amended to read as follows:

"(2) Each State shall provide for one of the following:

"(A) A financial and compliance audit of the funds provided the State under section 1913. Such audits shall be performed annually and shall be conducted in accordance with standards established by the Comptroller General for the audit of governmental organizations, programs, activities, and functions.

"(B) A single financial and compliance audit of each entity administering funds provided under section 1913. An audit of such an entity shall be conducted annually and conducted in accordance with standards prescribed by the Comptroller General under subparagraph (A), except that if the entity is an entity of a government which operates on a biennial fiscal period, such audit may be made biennially.

Within 30 days after completion of an audit under subparagraph (A) or (B), a copy of the audit report shall be transmitted to the State legislature and the Secretary and shall be made available for public inspection. For purposes of subparagraphs (A) and (B), the term 'financial and compliance audit' means an audit to determine whether the financial statements of an audited entity present fairly the financial position and the results of financial operations in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles, and whether the entity has complied with laws and regulations that may have a material effect upon the financial statements.".

(f) Section 1916(a) (42 U.S.C. 300x-5(a)) is amended by striking out "and (3)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(3) to furnish the Secretary a detailed description of the programs to be supported in accordance with section 1915(c)(17), and (4)".

(2) Sections 1914, 1915, and 1916 are each amended by striking out "1913" each place it occurs and inserting in lieu thereof "1914".

(3) Sections 1913 and 1915 are each amended by striking out "1914" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "1915".

(4) Sections 1913, 1914, 1916, 1917, and 1920 of such Act are each amended by striking out "1915" each place it occurs and inserting in lieu thereof "1916".

(5) Sections 1912 and 1913 are each amended by striking out "1916" each place it occurs and inserting in lieu thereof "1917".

(6) Section 1915 is amended by striking out "1917" and inserting in lieu thereof "1918".

(7) The section of the Public Health Service Act entitled "Payments Under Allotments to States" is redesignated as section 1914 and the existing section 1914 and sections 1915 through 1920 are redesignated as sections 1915 through 1920A, respectively.

(h)(1) Section 1920A of such Act (as so redesignated) is amended to read as follows:

"ADMINISTRATION

"SEC. 1920A. The Secretary, shall through fiscal year 1987 administer this part through the Administrator of the Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Administration.".

(2) Subsections (b) and (c) of section 501 of such Act are each amended by striking out "Administration" and inserting in lieu thereof "Administrator" and subsection (e)(1) of such section is amended by striking out "administration" and inserting in lieu thereof "Administration".

SEC. 104. (a) Section 501(a) of the Public Health Service Act is amended by inserting "(1)" after "(a)" and by adding at the end the following:

"(2) There shall be in the Administration an Associate Administrator for Special Populations to identify and assess the needs of minorities and women for alcohol and drug abuse and mental health services, to assure that the research being conducted or supported under this title includes women and minorities, and to assure that research training being provided or supported under this title includes women and minorities.".

(b) Section 501(c) of the Public Health Service Act is amended to read as follows:

"(c)(1) There is established the Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Strategy Council (hereinafter in this subsection referred to as the 'Council'). The Council shall—

"(A) periodically assess the national needs for alcoholism, alcohol abuse, drug abuse, and mental health services and the extent to which those needs are being met by State, local, and private programs and programs receiving funds under this title, and

"(B) provide advice to the Secretary and the Administrator respecting activities carried out under this title.

"(2)(A) The Council shall consist of fifteen members appointed by the Secretary and such ex officio members from the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism, the National Institute on Drug Abuse, and the National Institute of Mental Health as the Secretary may designate. Of the members appointed to the Council, at least six members shall represent State and local providers of prevention and treatment services for alcoholism, alcohol abuse, drug abuse, and mental illness, at least six members shall be individuals with expertise in public education and prevention services for alcoholism, alcohol abuse, drug abuse, and mental illness, and at least three members shall be appointed from members the general public who are knowledgeable about alcoholism, alcohol abuse, drug abuse, and mental illness.

"(B) The term of office of a member appointed to the council is four years, except that of the members first appointed to the council—

"(i) five shall serve for terms of one year,

"(ii) five shall serve for terms of two years,

"(iii) five shall serve for terms of three years, as designated by the Secretary at the time of appointment. Any member appointed to fill a vacancy occurring before the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed only for the remainder of such term. A member may serve after the expiration of his term until his successor has taken office.

"(3)(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B), members of the Council shall (i) be paid not more than the daily equivalent of the annual rate of basic pay in effect for grade GS-18 of the General Schedule for each day (including travel time) during which they are engaged in the actual performance of duties vested in the Council, and (ii) while away from their homes or regular places of business and while serving in the business of the Council, be entitled to receive transportation expenses as prescribed by section 5703 of title 5, United States Code.

"(B) Members of the Council who are full-time officers or employees of the United States shall receive no additional pay, allowances, or benefits by reason of their service on the Council.

"(4) The Council may appoint such staff personnel as the Council considers appropriate.

"(5) The Secretary shall designate the chairman of the Council.

"(6) The Council shall meet at least three times each calendar year.

"(7) The Council shall report annually to the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Labor and Human Resources of the Senate on its activities during the period reported on and shall include in such report such recommendations for legislation and administrative action as it deems appropriate.".

(c) Section 501 is amended by inserting at the end the following:

"(g)(1) The Administrator may obtain (in accordance with section 3109 of title 5, United States Code, but without regard to the limitation in such section on the number of days or the period of service) the services of not more than 20 experts or consultants who have scientific or professional qualifications. Such experts and consultants shall be obtained for the Administration and for each of the research institutes under the Administration.

"(2)(A) Experts and consultants whose services are obtained under paragraph (1) shall be paid or reimbursed for their expenses associated with traveling to and from their assignment location in accordance with sections 5742, 5742a(a)(1), 5742a(a)(3), and 5726(c) of title 5, United States Code.

"(B) Expenses specified in subparagraph (A) may not be allowed in connection with the assignment of an expert or consultant whose services are obtained under paragraph (1), unless and until the expert or consultant agrees in writing to complete the entire period of his assignment of 1 year, whichever is shorter, unless separated or reassigned for reasons beyond his control that are acceptable to the Secretary. If the expert or consultant violates the agreement, the money spent by the United States for these expenses is recoverable from him as a debt of the United States. The Secretary may waive in whole or in part a right of recovery under this subparagraph.".

SEC. 105. Part A of title V of the Public Health Service Act is amended by adding at the end the following:

"DEMONSTRATIONS, DATA, AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, July 26, 1984

The House met at 10 a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

We recognize, O gracious God, that we do not live in isolation, but are together in communities for mutual support and encouragement. We are grateful for the women and men who labor in this place, who not only do their tasks, but earnestly seek to show concern to other members of our community. We remember each day those among us who are in need of our prayers and loving care. May each of us, through word and deed, be conscious of the needs of others. That together we may share in the blessedness of Your creation. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to clause 1, rule I, I demand a vote on agreeing to the Speaker's approval of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Chair's approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 355, nays 28, answered "present" 6, not voting 44, as follows:

DEFICIT REDUCTION DOWNPAYMENT STALLED IN CONFERENCE

(Mr. JONES of Oklahoma asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, in response to a number of questions from Members about the status of the budget resolution conference, I must report to my colleagues that regrettably we have made no more progress in getting the Senate conferees to the negotiating table

□ This symbol represents the time of day during the House proceedings, e.g., □ 1407 is 2:07 p.m.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

than existed before Congress recessed for Independence Day. Our calls to the Senate Members this week to try to resume the negotiations have remained unanswered.

It takes two to negotiate any kind of an agreement, and regrettably the Senate conferees still seem to be unwilling to negotiate on the final one-third of the deficit reduction downpayment; namely, the discretionary spending and, more specifically, the amount of spending for the military.

We have done a good job in reducing the deficit projection so far. It seems to me we ought to complete this job. The House conferees are ready to meet, ready to negotiate, and ready to conclude a budget resolution.

Mr. Speaker, those who decry deficits would do well to do something constructive by urging the Senate conferees to come to the negotiating table and let us complete this deficit reduction downpayment.

A NOTE OF APPRECIATION FOR SAN FRANCISCO'S HOSPITALITY DURING THE CONVENTION

(Mr. TRAXLER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Speaker, I say to my fellow Members of the House that I rise on this occasion as a delegate to the Democratic National Convention held in San Francisco this past week to extend my thanks and, I am sure, the thanks of the Michigan delegation to the folks from San Francisco, to our colleagues from San Francisco, to the mayor of San Francisco, to the board of supervisors of San Francisco, to the cable car operators, to the ferryboat operators, to the hotel personnel, and to all the wonderful people of the San Francisco area, the bay area, for the marvelous, courteous time and the kind thoughts that they extended to all the Democratic delegates at that wonderful convention.

Indeed no one can go to that city and into that area and come away unimpressed. The ambiance of that city is exceeded only by that of Detroit.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I extend to the people of the bay area our hearty and sincere thanks for the wonderful hospitality you extended to all the Democratic delegates and alternates.

THE UNFAIRNESS OF THE ADMINISTRATION'S TAX AND BUDGET PROGRAMS

(Mr. MARKEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, in his press conference on Tuesday, President Reagan claimed that there is "not one single fact or figure" to prove that his budget cuts have hurt working families and the poor in our country. It is time to set the record straight.

A study released just yesterday showed that a half million Americans—mostly children—have been pushed into poverty by Ronald Reagan's budget cuts. Reductions in other programs have caused hundreds of thousands of families to lose all medical coverage, run out of food at least once, or have their utilities shut off. Three million students have lost their school lunches, and the President's latest budget proposes reductions in food benefits for 1 million elderly people in this country.

Working families have been devastated by the President's plans. More than 1 million students have lost their higher education loans. A family of four earning $20,000 has seen their taxes rise under President Reagan; a family of four earning $100,000 has received a $3,500 annual tax cut.

And all this in return for the highest budget deficit in the history of our Nation. This is one fact that is very hard to figure.

President Reagan, it is not just one fact or figure of your unfairness, but 100 that I could produce if I stood here long enough. Your tax and budget programs have been the most unfair of any President in American history, and, I am afraid, that is the fact of the matter.

LAKE MEAD

(Mr. REID asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. REID. Mr. Speaker, by description it extends 110 miles upstream into the lower end of the Grand Canyon with a shoreline of 822 miles. Named after Dr. Elwood Mead, a former Commissioner of Reclamation, Lake Mead is one of the Nation's most popular recreation areas. Its 12-month season attracts more than 5 million visitors each year for swimming, boating, skiing, and bountiful fishing.

Lake Mead's inland sea is as useful as it is beautiful. In an essential partnership with Hoover Dam the lake helps to keep the once-destructive waters of the Colorado River not only tame but also highly productive. These benefits include: water supply; flood control; irrigation; elimination of damaging sediment deposits; navigation; recreation; fish and wildlife conservation; and low-cost hydroelectric power.

Lake Mead's storage capacity which is great enough to store more than 2 years of the Colorado's average flow is enough to cover the State of Pennsylvania with water 1 foot deep.

Though my time to describe this manmade wonder has run short my appreciation for Lake Mead has not.

DOES THE PRESIDENT UNDERSTAND SUPPLY AND DEMAND?

(Mr. DONNELLY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, earlier this week the President admitted that he really did not know why interest rates were so high. He said the only thing he could figure out was that it must be the fear that inflation would return. Surely this man who spent so much of his life on the lecture circuit touting conservative economics must understand the principles of supply and demand.

The price of money has been driven up by the demand for $180 billion a year to finance the record Reagan deficits, along with the needs of businesses for new capital and the public's borrowing in the dangerous belief that this deficit-financed boom is going to last indefinitely.

The administration's economic policies have put us in the precarious position of becoming a debtor nation, forced to borrow billions of dollars overseas to finance our public debt and economic expansion.

Unfortunately, the administration has never let the facts interfere with its rosy economic projections.

As the chairman of the Federal Reserve underlined yesterday, our deficits will not decline until the Congress and the administration act forcefully to reduce them. A continuing recovery alone will clearly not be enough to reduce the budget deficits.

PRAISE FOR THE VICE PRESIDENT

(Mr. GARCIA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, although this is an election year, and Republicans are going to be fighting Democrats, I am getting up to praise a Republican.

Last night I had the opportunity to share a dais with the Vice President of the United States, Mr. BUSH, and in an address to about 650 members of an Hispanic organization called La Raza, he came out very strongly against the discriminatory aspects of the Simpson-Mazzoli bill. I was deeply appreciative, because it appears to me that the employer sanctions provision of the bill are what we Hispanic Members of Congress have been fighting. I am taking the floor to say to the Vice President that his words were deeply appreciated. We all must continue to fight discrimination.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO ASSURE TIMELY SOCIAL SECURITY COLA

(Mr. CONABLE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced H.R. 6019, a bill which assures that Social Security beneficiaries and supplemental security income recipients this year and in future years will receive an annual cost-of-living increase, whether or not it would have triggered under existing laws.

This bill implements President Reagan's promise that current beneficiaries receive a timely COLA in January 1985, regardless of whether the Consumer Price Index records a 3-percent increase for the measuring period which ends September 30, 1984. Since that data won't be available to the Secretary of Health and Human Services until mid-October—when the rest of you will be campaigning—I suggest we resolve the issue now.

Let me explain why I believe we should eliminate the 3-percent trigger. First, when the 1983 amendments were enacted—few, except our President, expected inflation to fall drastically, and we did not foresee the possibility that—having just waited 6 months for a delayed COLA for 1983, current beneficiaries might receive no COLA for 1984 as of the beginning of 1985.

Second—and to clarify my concerns about future years—the 3-percent trigger was imposed for administrative reasons. SSA's computer systems at that time simply weren't up to the task of processing small changes in a cost-effective manner. However, I'm relieved to report, SSA's computer system is being modernized, and the adjustments are now feasible.

For these reasons, I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 6019, and to support it now. This will eliminate the uncertainty that surrounds the benefit adjustment issue, and reassure all of us—especially current beneficiaries—of the solvency reliability and fairness of the Social Security system.

PRESIDENT URGES CONGRESS TO ENACT IMPORTANT PENDING LEGISLATION

(Mr. HARTNETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Speaker, reference has been made this morning twice to the President's news conference of earlier this week. I would just like to make reference to that, too, Mr. Speaker, and remind my colleagues that in his opening remarks to the American people he said, "Congress is coming back for a brief 3-week period and it won't be long and maybe a lot can't be done."

But there were several things that he urged the Congress to do and that he felt the American people were urging the Congress to do. One was, of course, to enact the balanced budget amendment to the Constitution. Another was to pass a line-item veto so that the President could have the right to veto items on a line-item basis.

I am just here to remind us, Mr. Speaker, that the Speaker has the power to influence the committee chairmen to bring these bills before the House and give the American people an opportunity to see their elected Representatives vote on these issues.

It has been said before, Mr. Speaker, that time and tide wait for no man, and now I guess it is no man or woman..

It is the 59th minute of the 11th hour, Mr. Speaker, and I urge you to use your influence to bring to the floor of the House these items which the President requested that the Congress vote on before we start this recess on August 10.

UNDER GOD?

(Mr. BURTON of Indiana asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, in March the Supreme Court decided to permit the city of Pawtucket, RI, to include a nativity scene in its Christmas holiday display. Once again this basic American tradition is being challenged.

Recently, a Federal judge ruled that a nativity scene erected by the city of Birmingham, MI, last year was unconstitutional because it served only one set of religious beliefs and served no secular purpose. We have now entered the realm of absurdity.

Prayer has been removed from our public schools; there are now attempts to remove "One Nation Under God" from our Pledge of Allegiance; we're no longer able to teach our children creation side by side with evolution. Where will it end? How hypocritical can we be? A Congress that has a prayer before each meeting—a court system where witnesses swear on the Bible—a President who takes an oath of office "So Help Him God."

Until we wake up to the "ban God" campaign being waged, I have a solution to Birmingham's problem with the court's interpretation—prop up a stuffed Santa Claus next to Mary and Joseph. Instant constitutionality.

A GIGANTIC STEP FOR BIBLE STUDY IN OUR SCHOOLS

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House, and presumably the President of the United States in signing the bill, took a gigantic step on the question of the Bible study capabilities of our students in school, and that action by the House and the one that is going to result in the President's signing the bill came none too soon, because I learned yesterday the Circuit Court of Appeals in our area overturned a previous Federal district court decision, which Federal district court decision upheld the rights of students to have access to public institutions for Bible study.

This showed to me finally that the Federal court system is schizophrenic in this particular kind of issue, and so the fact that the House has acted in concord with the Senate and with the expected signature of the President of the United States on this legislation, we have now put this issue at rest and have relieved the courts of having to go through the convolutions that they have gone through on this vital issue.

We should congratulate ourselves and the American people for urging us to take action that we concluded yesterday.

THE STATUS OF THE SIMPSON-MAZZOLI BILL

(Mr. LUNGREN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, over the last 24 hours there has been a lot of comment on the status of the Simpson-Mazzoli bill. I have heard from Members of the Democratic side of the aisle that they think it has been buried now and we are just shoveling dirt on it. Some were evidently surprised by indications that the President does not support the House bill or finds parts of it unacceptable. I find their surprise surprising. The President has indicated from the very beginning that there were problems with the bill we passed in this body.

As the Republican floor manager of the bill, there were certain elements of the bill that we allowed without contest because we knew that we would work those out in a compromise in the conference.

To use the President's specific message yesterday as some indication that he does not support comprehensive reform, and does not wish to go forward with the conference, is frankly an attempt to fool the American people.

The President sent the original legislation up here 36 months ago. We "diddle-daddled" around this place for so long. The Speaker himself made sure that we did not deal with the question of immigration reform until very late in this session.

We complained all along last year that such a delay would place it right in the midst of the Democratic Presidential primary season and then finally bring it right into the Democratic and Republican conventions.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that has happened. It is not because of the President that this very important legislation is now in danger. Frankly, it is the politically demagogic statements made at the Democratic Convention that have placed immigration reform in jeopardy. Up to this point we have been bipartisan in this and I hope we continue to be bipartisan and get a bill that the American people very drastically need.

THE SEASON FOR DOUBLETALK

(Mr. LEVIN of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I guess this is the season for doubletalk. I was sitting here and we have just heard some.

I voted for Simpson-Mazzoli. The Republicans in the House earlier had harangued us for not taking up the bill. Now the Vice President is leading the attack on the basic premises of the bill and all kinds of excuses are being thrown up for this basic change in administration position.

It reminds me of what the President said about taxes a few days ago. He said he had no plans for a tax increase. But the chief Republican in the Senate on this matter says the President was being responsible, and that the President "did not close the door on something happening."

This is indeed the season of doubletalk and President Reagan and Vice President BUSH, with the help of some of their cohorts here in the House, are leading the parade.

PAT ON THE BACK FOR THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD

(Mr. KASICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Speaker, although monetary policy is still too restrictive in America, I believe some of us who have been critical of the Fed ought to rise today to give a pat on the back to the Federal Reserve Board for agreeing not to restrict it further.

Of course, agreeing to tighten that policy would have been a disaster for continued economic growth in America.

I frankly do not think that the Fed had much choice when you consider that despite this country's strong economic growth, inflation remains at a very low rate.

One thing is clear. If we can couple a stable monetary policy with a good fiscal policy, and we have to work on the fiscal side, we can continue to have the kind of economic growth we want for America, the kind of economic growth that over the last four or five quarters has put Americans back to work, reducing the deficit.

Let us give the Fed an ovation for not agreeing to tighten monetary policy further than it already has.

EDUCATION AMENDMENTS OF 1984

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. RUSSO]. Pursuant to House Resolution 550 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, H.R. 11.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 11) to extend through fiscal year 1989 the authorization of appropriations for certain education programs, and for other purposes, with Mr. KAZEN, Chairman pro tempore, in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. When the Committee of the Whole rose on Wednesday, July 25, 1984, titles III through VIII were open to amendment at any point.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS] had been recognized to offer an amendment.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. COATS

The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COATS: Page 91, after line 14, insert the following new section (and redesignate the succeeding sections accordingly):

VOLUNTARY SCHOOL PRAYER

SEC. 806. Part B of the General Education Provisions Act is amended by inserting after section 420 (20 U.S.C. 1228) the following new section:

"PROHIBITION AGAINST THE USE OF FEDERAL FUNDS BY PUBLIC SCHOOLS WHICH PROHIBIT VOLUNTARY PRAYER

"SEC. 420A. No funds shall be made available under any applicable program to any State or local educational agency which has a policy of denying or which effectively prevents participation in prayer in public schools by individuals on a voluntary basis. Neither the United States nor any State nor any local educational agency shall require any person to participate in prayer or influence the form or content of any prayer in such public schools."

Mr. COATS (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of the amendment that I am offering let me first explain why I have chosen to offer it to this bill and why this procedure is necessary to deal with this issue. It has been 22 years since the Supreme Court restricted prayer in public schools.

Every school prayer amendment has been bottled up in the Congress since that time. And on an issue that is so much on the minds of the American people and so overwhelmingly supported by the American people—I think the latest polls show that nearly 80 percent of the American people support this issue—it is very frustrating for many of us to explain when we go back home that we cannot consider school prayer on the floor of the House of Representatives. Why? Some of the people in the positions that decide the agenda do not want to talk about this issue so we do not have the privilege of debating it.

That is what we are here for. That is what this House of Representatives is all about. And since we cannot and have not had the opportunity to deal with a constitutional amendment on school prayer, I am offering this amendment to this education bill because it deals specifically with voluntary school prayer.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Chair announces that pursuant to clause 2, rule XXIII, he will vacate proceedings under the call when a quorum of the Committee appears.

Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

□ 1100

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. A quorum of the Committee of the Whole has not appeared.

The Chair announces that a regular quorum call will now commence.

Members who have not already responded under the noticed quorum call will have a minimum of 15 minutes to record their presence. The call will be taken by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device, and the following Members responded to their names:

□ 1110

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. 390 Members have answered to their names, a quorum is present, and the Committee will resume its business.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS], who has 3½ minutes remaining, to discuss his amendment.

Mr. COATS. I would urge the Members to look very carefully at this amendment and not just to react to the code words "school prayer."

The amendment is drafted very carefully to meet the concerns and objections that some people have about the school prayer issue. I was asking Members rather than just reacting against the title, please read the amendment carefully, because it is carefully constructed to meet the objections people have about coercion of students or the possibility of a particular type of prayer. It specifically prohibits the State, the United States or any local educational agency, which would include a teacher, principal, or superintendent, from influencing in any way the form or the content of the prayer that is offered.

What we are attempting to do here is to codify the right of a student to voluntarily, on their own initiative, as an individual, to pray during school hours and to pray in school. We are talking about a voluntary prayer; we are talking about a prayer by a student. We are talking about a prayer that in no way can be influenced in terms of the form or content by a teacher or anyone involved in the school system.

We are talking about a specific prohibition against anybody being required to participate in a particular prayer. This amendment simply denies Federal funds to an educational institution or agency that has a policy prohibiting students from voluntarily praying on their own initiative. Thus, if a student wanted to pray before his lunch, if a student wanted to pray before a math exam, as many of us probably would, they would be allowed to do that. If they wanted to pray at the beginning of the schoolday, they could do that.

You say why do we need such a thing? The student already has that right. Unfortunately, the courts have so interpreted the original Supreme Court decision on prayer in such an extreme way that many school systems throughout the country have issued specific regulations against this very thing and I have a whole litany of those, and if time would permit, I would read through that.

We need to clarify this, not to involve the Government in religion; not to put a Government-sponsored prayer into schools because this amendment will not allow that. We need this amendment to restore neutrality to the schools so that the schools do not exhibit a bias against religion as currently exists. We need this amendment so that we do not leave with the students the thought that prayer is permissible anywhere else, in any other place except during their school hours.

I would ask the Members to reflect on the fact that we opened our session today, just an hour and a half ago, with a prayer. We reference here in our chamber, "In God We Trust." I have in my pocket some coins; a quarter, a dime, and a nickel. Every one of them says "In God We Trust." Our Declaration of Independence references the Almighty. Our Pledge of Allegiance says "Under God."

Our monuments, the Jefferson Memorial and the Lincoln Memorial, reference God and the Supreme Court opens its session with "God Save the United States and this Court." We pray in this building. Can we not allow prayer in our public schools if we allow it in every other public institution?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. COATS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, opponents of school prayer often speak of the great religious diversity and freedom in our Nation, and claim that allowing prayer in school would destroy this diversity. In a pluralistic society, we must retain a balance between both principles. That is the principle of freedom against compulsion, which I think this amendment does, but also the principle of freedom to exercise a particular right, which I think prayer is and should be.

If you read carefully my amendment, we accomplish this goal of providing freedom to those who wish to exercise their religion, but we retain safeguards against embarrassing or pressuring any students to participate in any unwanted religious exercise. If we permit the wall of separation between church and state to become so absolute, so rigid, so impenetrable, as it is now, then we risk teaching our children that religion is purely a private affair that does not affect one's public life. But I just read through a litany of things that we do in this Nation where religion does affect our public life.

Religion deals with one's ultimate commitments, and if genuine, it affects all areas of life and should not be excluded from our public schools.

Second, pluralism does not mean to require that Government roots out every vestige of religion from public life. We can be a nation under God without foisting religious convictions on all people or coercing our citizens to adopt a particular religion. By allowing voluntary religious exercise or prayer in our public schools, with the safeguard of the strict prohibition against any State influence as to the form or content of the prayer, it appears to me nothing more than the free exercise of an inalienable freedom. Namely, the right of all of our citizens to the free exercise of their religion. This is a right that our Founding Fathers meant to protect, not to deny. A right that our courts should not take away from us as they have.

My sole aim is to permit all of our citizens, including our schoolchildren, the free exercise of their own religion in all aspects of their daily life.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COATS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman indicated that he had a list of schools that would not permit prayer.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS] has again expired.

(On request of Mr. JENKINS and by unanimous consent, Mr. COATS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COATS. I again yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JENKINS. The gentleman indicated that he had a litany of things, places where students could not pray and you indicated that you wanted to make sure that students could pray before they took a math test or before their noon meal.

Does the gentleman have a specific example of some school that prevents voluntary prayer in those instances?

Mr. COATS. I do, and I will give you that. The original Supreme Court decision, as you know, outlawed compulsory, State-ordered prayer, and I support that. I do not want a Governor or a school principal or a school superintendent saying this is the prayer to be used, because we want to retain our plurality and diversity.

Since that time, many, many Federal courts have carried that decision to the point that, first of all, there exists great confusion as to what schools can and cannot do. Many attorneys are now advising school boards to exclude all reference to religion and to exclude all prayers. Let me give you some examples.

One school in New Jersey outlawed the reading of the prayer from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that Dr. Ford and others gave here at the beginning of a schoolday. The Supreme Court declined review of a New Jersey State court, and I have reference to that.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COATS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JENKINS. Specifically what I am asking about is the voluntary prayer aspect. Is there a decision that precludes a student from voluntarily praying?

Mr. COATS. I have a couple here that I have reference to. A school principal in New York ordered his teachers to stop kindergarten children from voluntarily saying grace before meals on their own initiative, and the Second Court of Appeals upheld that ban. An Arizona school district's policy granting the high school student council permission to open their session with a voluntary, student-initiated prayer, unsupervised by teachers, was held in violation of the establishment clause by a Federal court, and I could go on and on.

That is the kind of interpretation that we think moves away from neutrality and into rooting out, as I said, every vestige of reference to the Almighty, and we are trying to bring that neutrality back.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am reluctant to rise in opposition to this amendment for I sympathize with the sponsor's intent, but my greatest fear is that this amendment, if it were adopted, could possibly confuse school authorities and lower courts as to congressional intent on this very delicate matter.

Yesterday, when we passed on the equal access, a measure that is identical to that which has already passed the Senate and is on the way to the President, we placed before this body a bill that was carefully crafted and that had all of the protections and guidelines to school districts on how to deal with this sensitive matter.

I am fearful that if we take this step today, by adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS] we are going to add further confusion instead of clarity on this issue. Yesterday, during floor debate, we covered a number of areas on how school districts are supposed to approach the issue of voluntary meetings among students who not only want to exercise their right to pray, but want to read the Bible or the Koran, and who want to share in verses and discuss religious matters.

This amendment is very narrow compared to the equal access bill. It refers only to the subject of prayer. It says nothing about students who want to gather for purposes of discussing their faith or about reading religious material. So I think what we are about to do, if we adopt this amendment, is to greatly narrow the scope.

The whole idea behind this issue is that students ought to be able to gather on school premises to discuss their faith if that is their desire. If we get into the issue of prayer, then I think we invite the controversy and the problems that are associated with the school prayer amendment. I know there is a great deal of anxiety, particularly on this side, that we take up that issue, but I am hopeful that we accomplished the goal yesterday by way of adoption of the equal access measure that takes care of this issue.

Second, it provides for a cutoff of funds. One of that great objections to the first debate on the equal access bill is that it provided for a cutoff of funds. This is not a desirable way to deal with the matter. A judicial-remedy provision is much more desirable, and that is what we actually made equal access more palatable than before.

Last, for those who are concerned about whether or not they are for voluntary assembly of students to discuss religious matters or pray, or whether they are going to fall on the other side, this issue should not be a litmus test. We effectively dealt with that issue yesterday by passage of the equal-access bill.

You are not going to be contradicting yourself by voting for equal access yesterday and voting against the Coats amendment today. Let me be perfectly clear about it. What we did yesterday is more than sufficient to cover voluntary prayer on school premises. This amendment would add nothing to that intent. What we passed on yesterday on the equal-access bill is sufficient in the way of guidelines and direction to the school to allow voluntary prayer. So you are going to be in good shape by opposing the Coats amendment if you voted for the equal-access amendment yesterday, and I can assure my colleagues that that is really the goal of Christian groups who have been solidly behind equal access.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BONKER. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COATS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to offer my deep respect for the gentleman and his convictions and his success yesterday on the equal access bill, which I supported. I do have a great deal of respect for the gentleman.

I want to just say, however, that as the gentleman knows, the revised equal access bill, as was presented to us yesterday, was considerably narrower than the scope of the gentleman's original offering a couple of months ago. That revision and that narrowing basically took religious activities outside the scope of the regular school hours.

A club should meet outside the school hours unless, however, they could have met during lunch hour or a free period, and I know probably the gentleman's original intention was to allow them to do that, but for the sake of compromise he excluded that.

What we are trying to do here is somewhat different and somewhat separate from that.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BONKER] has expired.

(On request of Mr. COATS and by unanimous consent, Mr. BONKER was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. COATS. If the gentleman will yield further, what we are trying to say here is that the student should not be restricted from voluntary prayer on their own initiatives during the school day; that prayer is something that should not be left to 4 o'clock in the afternoon, but if the student wanted to pray before his meal at noon, pray before an exam, pray at the beginning of the day, but that prayer happened to fall during the school hours, that we do not want to exclude such prayer.

So we are attempting to deal with a somewhat different issue, to close what I think was a loophole in the equal access bill that we passed yesterday.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman would let me respond, and I appreciated his comments, without having the benefit of fully understanding the extent of this measure, one could get into some trouble. Let me pose one hypothetical situation.

The gentleman's amendment provides that schools cannot deny, not students necessarily, but individuals an opportunity to voluntarily participate in prayer.

Let me pose a hypothetical case.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BONKER] has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BONKER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. BONKER. Say that in a classroom three students felt compelled to pray on an upcoming math test, and during the course of that class the students stood up and requested of the teacher an opportunity to pray in the classroom. I know if one has a math test coming up, that is probably when one is more prone to pray than at any time during one's life at that age.

That would actually be in the classroom, and if the teacher denied them an opportunity, that school would be in violation of this amendment and thereby that school would risk the cutoff of funds.

Let me pose another situation. What if in this classroom, since this applies only to individuals, the teacher said, "Any students here who would like to join me in a moment of prayer before we take this exam, I invite you to do so." So this is the teacher initiating the voluntary request for prayer in which two or three students—while the others are seated there—would then rise and would have an opportunity for either a silent prayer or any other kind of exercise of their faith.

That, I think, gets into a very serious thicket with respect to the Constitution, and it definitely would result in a cutoff of Federal funds.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. BONKER. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, I share the gentleman's concern about that exact scenario, and that is exactly the reason why I put the prohibition in there in the second sentence. "Neither the United States nor any State nor any local educational agency"—and a teacher as an employee of the State would fall in that category—"can influence the form or content of any prayer. Also, it says they cannot require any person to participate, so the teacher could not stop the class and say, "We are all going to meditate or pray while this other student prays."

Mr. BONKER. It is not explicit, though, and my scenario took into account the full content of the gentleman's language. What I was saying is if the school teacher would not require, and not even necessarily influence the students, it could be completely voluntary.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BONKER] has again expired.

(On request of Mr. COATS and by unanimous consent, Mr. BONKER was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. BONKER. She could voluntarily invite people to participate in the prayer without influencing the students. She could actually say, "Would you join your fellow students in a moment of prayer?"

Also, it does not say anything in here about students making that invitation. A student leader could stand up and say, "Would other students join me in a moment of prayer before we have this exam?"

Again, I think that begs a serious constitutional question and it could possibly result in the cutoff of funds to that school.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BONKER. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's yielding.

I think that we are dealing with some important distinctions here. I wanted to observe that the gentleman from Georgia asked the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS] a few minutes ago whether, if in the event of someone taking a math test, they wished to bow their heads and voluntarily say a silent prayer, there was any evidence that any school in this country would prevent that. The gentleman from Indiana gave a rather lengthy response.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BONKER] has again expired.

(On request of Mr. DORGAN, and by unanimous consent, Mr. BONKER was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. DORGAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, the gentleman from Indiana gave a rather lengthy response to that question, but I think in summary the response is: No; there is no instance that any of us know of in which a student who is confronted with a math exam and wishes to bow his or her head and say a voluntary prayer would be prevented from doing that.

The distinction today about what is allowed in the schools is a very important one for us to make, and I did not want to let that pass without acknowledging it. It is now permissible in public schools for students to bow their heads and say prayers in the manner that they are accustomed to saying their prayers, and nothing prohibits that, at least as I understand it. The gentleman from Georgia asked a question, and he did not get a direct answer. The answer, I think, is: No; there is nothing currently that prohibits that type of voluntary prayer.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BONKER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

May I direct a question to the gentleman from Indiana, the author of the amendment? I want to try to come around from a different tack.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BONKER] has once again expired.

(On request of Mr. FOWLER, and by unanimous consent, Mr. BONKER was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman continue to yield?

Mr. BONKER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Would the gentleman from Indiana agree that there is nothing in the law of this land that now prohibits silent participation in prayer within public schools? Yes or no?

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BONKER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that a New Jersey school has outlawed silent prayer, and that there have been policies in Minnesota by a school district in which a student was reprimanded for offering an individual prayer before a meal.

Mr. FOWLER. Excuse me. Mr. Chairman, I just want to get this clear.

How could any authority, State or Federal, outlaw silent prayer?

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will continue to yield, from a practical aspect, they could not. It would be practically impossible because the authority would not know whether or not the student was actually praying or meditating or whatever.

Mr. FOWLER. That is right. Let me ask the gentleman this: Is the gentleman in his amendment attempting to set aside a specific time and place within the schoolday for what he says is "participation in prayer in public schools?"

Mr. COATS. No. Mr. Chairman, absolutely not.

Mr. FOWLER. All right. Let me ask the gentleman this, then: To accomplish the objectives of the gentleman's amendment, rather than getting into the controversy as to what is individual versus group prayer, what is voluntary versus involuntary, all of which is in the courts from a number of jurisdictions, as the gentleman alluded to, would the gentleman from Indiana, the author of the amendment, agree to an amendment that kept the first words of his amendment intact, the first three lines, but then said, "* * * nothing which would effectively prevent silent participation by prayer in the public schools," as a substitute for his language?

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, I would have a problem with that, and I know that question came up in the Senate in the debate over the school prayer amendment. What we are trying to get at here is the right of an individual, including students in public schools, to exercise the right of free speech and to exercise their freedom of religion.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, allow me to interrupt, only because we are going to run out of time and we have monopolized the time.

I ask the gentleman to reconsider. I assume that what the gentleman has just told me is true, that he is not trying to set aside a specific time and he is not trying to set up a specific plan in the curriculum. We have passed the equal access bill that allows all these groups on the campus to engage in religious activity.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Again the time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BONKER] has expired.

(On request of Mr. FOWLER, and by unanimous consent, Mr. BONKER was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BONKER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, accepting the gentleman's objectives and the assurances he has just given us, it seems that the cure as well as the accomplishment of the gentleman's objective is to simply say that we will not deny the silent participation of an individual in the public schools in prayer, and that, it would seem to me, would accomplish the gentleman's purpose and also codify, incidentally, the existing law.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, if I may respond to the gentleman, and if the gentleman from Washington will yield further, let me raise a couple of problems with that.

First, in some religions students and children are taught to say a prayer that is recited vocally, before a meal, for instance. Also, how do we deal with the situation where members of the Catholic faith cross themselves before a prayer, which is part of that? Is that silent?

Mr. FOWLER. Well, yes; it is silent.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BONKER] has expired.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to the gentleman who is offering the amendment today, I believe that the gentleman from Georgia who just spoke has raised some very serious concerns.

The problem that we are facing here as a nation is to recognize the differing interests of two groups, majority religions who desire to have a religious observance in the public schools, a prayer to take place, and members of minority faiths. I agree with the gentleman that it is a shame that we do seem to be moving away from an observation of our spirituality at the schoolhouse door, and that is why I so eagerly supported the equal access amendment yesterday. But at the same time we have been working at cross-purposes with regard to those students in our public schools who are of a minority religion and who do not wish to participate in the religious observance not of their choosing.

If I may offer the experience of having become well acquainted with a number of people, especially those of the Jewish faith, who find it extremely discomforting to be faced with the observance of a Christian prayer, I think that, though it is difficult to understand, I can certainly sympathize with that feeling.

The problem with this amendment is that we are offered now, not something like the constitutional amendment that was considered in the Senate where you would have a prayer that could have been religiously neutral, but here you have a prayer that will be determined by the students, with absolutely no opportunity for guidance or control on the part of any authority other than the students. So we know good and well that the majority will be controlling this because the majority will be the Christians, and that is, I believe, going to violate the rights of those other students who do not wish to participate. In fact, I can see the situation where they would either have to leave the room or sit there and take part in a religious observance of which they would not otherwise approve.

The school would have absolutely no opportunity to influence this whatsoever under the Coats amendment. Otherwise, they would lose their funds.

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHANDLER. I would be very happy to yield.

Ms. FIEDLER. I happen to be Jewish and I was raised in a community where we happened to be the only Jewish family in the community. I supported the equal access bills on both occasions and I feel strongly that people should have the rights in that bill, in the educational institutions paid for with public funds. There are many members of the Jewish community that do not happen to share my view, but when you get down to a point where you permit oral prayer in the public school system, then you begin to get into a situation where, in my opinion, you become exclusionary. This is certainly true when you take youngsters, who happen to be a part of a different religious faith, than their classmates and there are many faiths represented in the American school systems.

Mr. CHANDLER. Of course.

Ms. FIEDLER. And you focus on their religious preference differences, then I think the law simply goes beyond the important separation which should exist.

Now, I would like to explain a little further if I may, because I think this point has not yet been made. One of the reasons why I feel strongly that there should be some option for silent prayer in school is that I do not personally believe that we should deny rights to a group of citizens simply because we fear that there will be an abuse of those rights by another group; but at the same time, I think that it is terribly important that when we pass pieces of legislation that deal with these very sensitive issues, that we do not go so far as to encourage the abuse of the rights that we are permitting.

With that thought, I would really urge my colleague, who is the author of this motion, to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from the other side of the aisle a few moments ago, because I think there are many of us who would consider that acceptable, but this simply goes too far.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. CHANDLER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Chairman, if I may, before I yield and I will gladly do so, I really want to thank the gentlewoman for making so eloquent a statement.

I believe, I would just like to say, she is so right. If we are only talking about a silent, meditative prayer here, I have absolutely no objection whatsoever, but the exclusion of so many hundreds of students, and the situation is different. When I went to the Fruitdale Elementary School, there was no such a thing as a minority student there, but in Los Angeles, as the gentlewoman points out, there certainly are and we cannot overlook their rights.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I differ with the gentleman when it comes to his opinion that those who practice minority religions will be excluded. I think that this Coats amendment is the very vehicle whereby that Jewish child or Catholic child can sit there in front of their food in the cafeteria and say a prayer, whether it is a vocal prayer or a silent prayer.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Chairman, if I may reclaim my time, the gentleman is absolutely right, but in addition to that, you can start the day with a prayer, you can start the afternoon, you can start the math class, you can do almost anything and the students can conduct the prayer in any form or content that they wish with absolutely no control from the authorities. Then the gentlewoman is right. Then you are excluding those who do not wish to participate.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will continue to yield, let me make a statement on that point.

I think that it is ridiculous to assert, especially in light of the discussion that we are having right now for a legislative background, that somehow this amendment is going to allow students to disrupt the schoolday and instead of having geography classes and math classes, we are going to have people who pray literally by the hour when they should be working. I do not think that is the purpose of this amendment and I do not think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS] would assert that is the purpose.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman does not seek any additional time.

For what purpose does the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] rise?

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I join with others who are concerned about the effect of this amendment. Yesterday I supported the Equal Access Act with the expectation that it will shortly be signed by the President. It will allow, under conditions which are specified in the act, students to voluntarily participate in religious as well as other meetings in the Nation's public schools.

This amendment, in contrast, is very narrowly drafted and, I think frankly, leaves many questions unanswered.

The gentleman from California [Mr. HUNTER] just stated that he does not believe that his amendment will allow students to disrupt a class or others in it; but his amendment does not specify what sort of prayer must be permitted.

I am a Roman Catholic. It would be possible, for example, under this amendment for any Catholic students to decide to say the rosary orally in a classroom. That could take 15 to 20 minutes and would certainly be prayer as it is understood by traditional Roman Catholics. If the school decides that that type of prayer, a prayer of that extensive character, orally spoken, was not proper under the terms of the school's guidelines, they would be forced to make a decision between religious groups, indeed between denominations within the Christian community as to what was appropriate prayer.

We then involve the students and the school authorities in a constant dialog to determine when and how oral prayers are permissible.

Now, it was stated a few minutes ago that an amendment that allows private, silent prayer is not acceptable; I infer from this that the sponsors want either organized prayer or organized and vocal prayer. I contend that that will create serious problems for school administrators.

In addition, we have many States whose constitutions restrict denominational, religious activities within our public schools. Those States will be put in a position of either losing their Federal funds or obeying the structures of their State constitutions, creating an unacceptable situation.

As the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BONKER] the author of the equal access bill has pointed out, the equal access provides for judicial involvement when there is any question about what is allowed under that act. Judicial enforcement of its provisions is thereby permitted and Federal funds are not automatically cut off when a violation of that act is alleged.

The offering of this amendment is, I think, a surprising turn of events, especially after an overwhelming majority of the House voted yesterday for the equal access bill following the action of the other body. Now, just when the President is about to sign that bill into law and when that event has been welcomed by many as providing opportunities for voluntary religious activities by student groups in the public schools this amendment is offered. I think it is not appropriate to bring forth a proposal that presents us with an impossible series of problems. If this amendment were to pass, school districts and religious denominations would have to become involved in discussion of how to implement such a law without violating various State laws, State constitutions without disrupting the orderly process of education.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I want to restate that we are not talking about organized or group prayer. The amendment specifically states that it is a right available only to individuals and it also specifically prohibits any influence of the form or content of any particular prayer.

Mr. FOLEY. Well, let me ask the gentleman a question then. Suppose that five students decide, without any school organization or teacher prompting, to stand up and begin reciting the rosary. They are individuals. They are not organized by the school. They have a right under the gentleman's amendment to participate in prayer. The prayer would be conducted orally, and would most likely disrupt the school instruction period, probably requiring the school authorities to stop the prayer in order to proceed with the school instruction period. By so doing, the school authorities then are making a judgment about what kinds of prayers are going to be permitted. Yet by the language of this amendment voluntary prayer, as the gentleman describes it, is going to be permitted in the schoolroom.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I think that the gentleman raises a legitimate point about students standing up in the middle of a classroom hour of instruction and perhaps disrupting it. We would be willing to perfect that to remove that possibility.

Let me respond further to the gentleman, from the standpoint that what we did yesterday with that equal access bill, because of the restrictions placed on it, left a gaping hole in terms of the individual's right of freedom of religious expression during the school hours.

□ 1200

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] has expired.

(On request of Mr. ROEMER and by unanimous consent Mr. FOLEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. COATS. If the gentleman would yield me 10 more seconds then I will be happy to yield back.

This gaping hole in the right of religious expression was left open yesterday because of the restrictions placed on equal access, and the student does not now have the right of religious expression on an individual basis during the school hours. And by denying the student that right we are saying that religion, religious expression is fine anywhere in this country, at any time, including on the floor of the House of Representatives, but we will not allow our students to do it during the hours of 8 to 4, or whatever the school hours are.

Mr. FOLEY. If I can regain my time, I do not think it is correct to draw an analogy between Members in the House of Representatives and students if a public school. The prayer if the House of Representatives is offered at a particular time under the House Rules. And we hold it to be Constitutional because it involves mature adults whose presence is voluntary when the prayer is given.

The fact of the matter as that a Member of Congress may not stand up even in this House, and without being recognized for the purpose of offering an oral prayer. If he were to do so, regardless of the content of his prayer, he would be ruled out of order.

The gentleman has acknowledged and admitted in the debate that there is a problem with students standing up in a classroom and beginning to pray orally thereby disrupting the class. In order to deal with that problem the school authorities would have to stop the praying students, and decide that their actions were not appropriate at that particular time when instruction was going on.

If that were to happen, school authorities would then have to decide between types of prayer, between religious confessions. However, as I am sure the gentleman knows, constitutionally the school authorities could not start to make decisions between different religious expressions in the United States.

Mr. ROEMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ROEMER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I just want to reiterate something that the gentleman from Washington has already brought to our attention in this debate.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] has again expired.

(On request of Mr. ROEMER and by unanimous consent Mr. FOLEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. ROEMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ROEMER. It has already been admitted or stated by the author of the amendment that it is an imperfect amendment, as the gentleman from Washington has caused us to focus our attention on the phrase money would be cut off from those agencies which have a policy of denying participation in prayer.

The gentleman from Washington has already shown us I think one of many examples where voluntary prayer could be disruptive to the purpose of the school: educating our youngsters. And the author of the amendment as already admitted that his amendment is imperfect on that point.

If it is imperfect on that point it is imperfect to the issue of the amendment itself. This amendment should either be defeated or withdrawn.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding and appreciate the gentleman's mentioning a moment ago that if Members of the House stood up and began to recite the rosary on the House floor the Presiding Officer of the House could at that point gavel them down.

I would suggest as a former teacher that that is the same as is true in a classroom. In that classroom if someone stands up and attempts to disrupt the classroom, at that point I as presiding officer in that classroom have the ability to tell them that they cannot proceed further. And I am sure that under this amendment that would certainly be within my jurisdiction to do so.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] has again expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. FOLEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. FOLEY. Exactly. That is what I think would happen. I am sure the gentleman, as a former teacher, is quite right. The teachers would not stand by and have the class disrupted. But when they act, at that point the school district has a lawsuit. There is a demand that the school stop interfering with the right of voluntary prayer which is exercised by the student.

There is nothing in this amendment that gives the school authorities any right to do anything that denies or restricts voluntary prayer. That is what the amendment is all about and because it does not state, as the equal access bill states, that the school authorities have the right to maintain discipline and to maintain order in the schoolroom and to see that the functions of the school are carried out, it is perfectly possible that students of various religious confessions might stand up, interrupt the class, and we would have a very serious problem with that school meeting the terms of this bill.

Now, as far as silent prayer is concerned, I do not know of a school district in the United States that has interrupted the right of a student to pray silently. And I do not think there is any case where an individual, private, voluntary prayer of any student in the United States that has been stopped or halted.

The fact of the matter is that what people usually are trying to do is reestablish organized prayer in our public schools. But organized prayer in public schools has been declared to be unconstitutional under the U.S. Supreme Court decision. This proposal is not a constitutional amendment.

We allowed yesterday students to voluntarily participate in religious and other school activities by passing the equal access bill. That bill had very broad support in this House and is going to be signed into law.

But to bring before the House this language imperfectly drafted as it is, creates serious problems for the administration of the school systems. And to create a problem that does not really exist as far as I know, as far as any student in the United States is concerned in terms of being denied an opportunity for individual prayer, brings about a very, very difficult impasse between the rights of individual students and the responsibilities of the school district and the parents of those students.

I would hope that this amendment would not be accepted.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] has again expired.

(On request of Mr. WALKER and by unanimous consent Mr. FOLEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ACKERMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Let me say that the gentleman from Washington is absolutely right in what he is calling to our attention. This bill happens to be very, very poorly drafted, despite what we heard previously on the floor.

Let me say some of the words and some of the phrases we understand. We know what voluntarily means. We know what individual means. We know what influence the contents means. We think we might know what prayer means. It is the expression of a hope or wish or desire and the invoking of the name of the Supreme Being.

But let me give you a scenario. Let me give you a scenario.

The Bloomington High School in the middle of a math test, some kid is very, very frustrated, and he stands up and he says, "God damn the math teacher; I hope he burns in hell."

Is that not a prayer? If that math teacher says, "Johnny, sit down," and interrupts him, all of Indiana is going to lose its Federal funding.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would say to the gentleman first of all that is not a prayer in any book I ever saw.

The point I would make with the gentleman is I think he is absolutely wrong in his interpretation of the amendment. It seems to me the gentleman is wrong in his interpretation of the amendment because the amendment says that the school authorities are not permitted to require any person to participate in prayer.

If in fact a teacher permitted such an exercise as the gentleman outlined to take place in a classroom, he would be forcing other persons within that classroom to participate in the prayer, thereby being in violation of the very language of this amendment.

I would say to the gentleman I believe he has misinterpreted the amendment completely. It seems to be clear in the amendment that that is exactly the kind of prohibition that the amendment seeks to address and makes certain school authorities, including teachers, are not permitted to have people participating in prayer unwillingly.

Mr. FOLEY. I will answer the gentleman with this: He has created now a real conundrum. The school authorities cannot interfere with the right of a student to voluntarily pray.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] has again expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. FOLEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. FOLEY. If the student voluntarily prays without any direction or instruction or enticement from the teacher, just does it voluntarily, but disrupts the class, then under the gentleman from Pennsylvania's interpretation the rest of the students are being involved in involuntary prayer.

Mr. WALKER. That is right.

Mr. FOLEY. And they must not be protected by the teacher who stops the student.

Mr. WALKER. That is right.

Mr. FOLEY. I do not think teachers in our schools should be put in the situation of having to be constitutional lawyers to the degree that they must decide when it is necessary for them to allow prayer and when it is necessary for them to stop prayer. Nor do I think that in order to not interfere with prayer, the teacher should have to judge whether a student or students were engaging in direct prayer or indirect prayer; or prayer by attribution or prayer by deliberation.

It is wrong for us to create this kind of a religious controversy in our schools especially after we have passed yesterday's bill. I just want to say that I, along with many Members, believe that students and people in our country are coming back to a sense of spiritual commitment.

For most of us I think this is seen as an enormously good step for our country. We are pleased and we welcome this direction. But we should not forget that our country was founded by people who believed so deeply in God and who believed so deeply in the right of their religious tradition and heritage that they fled from other countries to come here to enjoy liberty and freedom of religious expression, and that when our Constitution was founded, one of its first purposes was to guarantee religious freedom in this country.

Now we ought to think for a moment when we consider this amendment whether by its enactment we would permit the intrusion of the same kind of religious controversies, difficulties, and disruptions that so divided Europe and many countries and from which our ancestors fled to find a haven allowing the freedom of religious expression in the United States.

We are putting our school districts into an impossible situation if we pass this amendment. It is poorly drafted and offers no clear guidelines for school administrators and teachers.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FOLEY was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. FOLEY. It risks embroiling our country in dispute between religious denominations that is hostile to the great religious concerns of the vast majority of our people. I understand the good intentions of this amendment but it is not a proper amendment.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

It is the gentleman who, it seems to me, is adding complexity to it. The amendment is fairly simple; it says an individual should be permitted to pray in public schools so long as he does not interfere with other individuals. That is the only purpose behind the amendment.

The gentleman is adding the complexity to it. There is no complexity to it; the amendment is entirely clear.

Mr. FOLEY. There is no need for such an amendment. The situation the gentleman described is not prohibited by law on the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MILLER of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

First of all, the amendment does not say that. Second of all, I think we see immediately the problems that are raised when the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggested that the gentleman from New York's prayer was not in order because it was no prayer that he read in a book.

I will tell you there are prayers that people say everyday that are not in books. We have people who stand before this body and write out prayers for this body everyday that are not in books. So already we start to see one teacher can stand up and say, "That prayer is not in the book that I read."

So we are asking our educational institutions to take on responsibilities that are unacceptable.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word, and I rise in favor of the amendment.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. HUNTER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman for yielding briefly.

I just reply to the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] that it may have been an exact use of words to say in the book. It is just my position that blasphemy is not a prayer. Besides, what the gentleman said is a violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman.

Let me say I think the gentleman from Washington has built a nightmare situation around very simple, very direct language, that is unfounded and unjustified by the language.

You know, what we are really talking about here is trying to undo the chilling effect that has occurred because of the debate over prayer in school over the last several decades in our Nation's school systems.

The facts are, and one of the gentlemen from the other side of the argument said that teachers are not constitutional lawyers. Exactly. Teachers are not constitutional lawyers and most educators, including the teachers and the administrators, do not really know what the law as with regard to prayer in school. They do not know what the Constitution means with regard to prayer in school.

And I think this is true of everybody who has townhall meetings in this House and goes back to their districts and talks with administrators; there are 101 opinions in every school district as to exactly what children can do in their schools.

Some people talk about the separation between church and state; they say well, that means you cannot have Christmas programs that depict a nativity scene. Others say well, the separation between church and state means a little girl cannot recite the rosary on the bus on the way to school. That has occurred.

I think one interesting thing, in this debate in this body and the other body over the last several months, is that a number of people have gotten up and in reponse to the debate over whether there should be a constitutional amendment to allow prayer in school, they have said, "You already have the right to voluntarily pray in school." They say, "Anybody can say a prayer in school out loud if they want to and that is not a violation of the Constitution."

Now I would ask one of the opponents of the amendment, is it against the Constitution of the United States for a little girl in kindergarten to say a vocal prayer before she eats her meal at lunchtime, is that against the Constitution, is that prohibited by the Constitution? Could anybody answer that question?

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. I yield to the gentleman from New York to answer that question.

Mr. ACKERMAN. I do not know if I could answer that question.

Mr. HUNTER. I take back my time.

Mr. ACKERMAN. I can answer it by asking another question.

Mr. HUNTER. I will be happy to yield at a later time.

The point I am making is nobody rose up out of this House of Representatives to tell me whether it is against the Constitution.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. FOLEY. I can say absolutely that there is no constitutional prohibition against such a student's offering a prayer before she eats her meal.

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman for his statement. The gentleman from Washington says there is not any prohibition against a little girl giving an oral prayer out loud before she has her meal.

Now the point is that if you asked administrators across the country, school administrators or school officials that same question, you are going to have a number of varying opinions. I know I have had varying opinions and there have been occasions cited by the gentleman who is the author of the amendment, Mr. COATS, where in fact that was held to be somehow a violation of the so-called separation between church and state.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COATS. I thank the gentleman.

Just to further clarify the gentleman's point, the very scenario the gentleman raised is one of the reasons we are offering this amendment, because the recitation of the prayer before a meal, "God is great, God is good and we thank him for our food, amen," and "Thank you for the world so sweet, thank you for the food we eat, thank you for the birds that sing, thank you God for everything" was ruled by the Federal court in the case, Stein versus Oshinsky, was overruled, Judge Friendly said that—

> After all that the states have been told about keeping the 'wall between church and state . . . high and impregnable,' . . . it would be rather bitter irony to chastise New York for having built the wall too high or too strong.

So the court upheld the New York prohibition against the child saying that prayer. So it is not just a scenario.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. FOLEY. That is an entirely different situation, I will say to the gentleman [Mr. COATS]. He is citing a case which involved organized prayer.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. HUNTER] has expired.

(On request of Mr. ROEMER and by unanimous consent, Mr. HUNTER was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. HUNTER. I will be happy to give the gentleman [Mr. FOLEY] plenty of time to debate with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS], but I want to complete my point and then I will go on.

The point I am making is that the gentleman stood up and said that is not against the Constitution. I think you would have debate on that point by a great many school administrators who have been confused by the several decades of debate over prayer in school.

We have right now a chilling effect in this country. We do have, and I think it has been pointed out on both sides of the aisle, we do have cases where school administrators and officials have illustrated that they do not understand what they can allow. They are confused.

And all that this amendment would do is allow those children who want to give that voluntary constitutional prayer, the right to go ahead and give it.

And I would submit if there is any problem, the gentleman says, "Well, I have a problem because they might be able to disrupt classes." If that is a problem, let us go ahead and amend the amendment and make it so the children would not disrupt classes.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman who secured my time for me.

Mr. ROEMER. I thank the gentleman from California. I am glad to hear that he admits publicly there are problems with this amendment. It goes far beyond the scenario that you paint, which is a little girl before a little meal saying a little prayer.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. HUNTER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. HUNTER. I thank the gentleman [Mr. ROEMER] for his statement. But I think the horror stories that have been compounded by various opponents of this amendment to the effect there is going to be tremendous disruption of classroom, could be taken care of.

□ 1220

Although I think that it is clear that this would not allow people to disrupt the course of schools. But I think that could be taken care of very easily.

If that is the case, I think we ought to move on. We ought to amend the amendment and prohibit any disruption and go ahead and pass this thing.

But I think the gentleman from Washington has made my point. People do not know what is allowed in classrooms today.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. FOLEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Let me say that if the purpose of the amendment and of the gentleman's support for it is to clarify the situation for school administrators and teachers, then I think its language should be reconsidered. The fact that the author of the amendment himself, the gentleman in the well, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania all acknowledge that it raises potential concerns which would have to be resolved in some way, indicates that the amendment in its present form would only serve to further confuse and confound the situation.

Mr. HUNTER. I understand the gentleman's point.

I would say simply I do not see a problem with it, but I think if that is the gentleman's problem that that can be easily taken care of.

The point that we need to clear up this situation and take care of this chilling effect that has occurred over the last several decades is a good point. We should move forward with it. In fact, there are many administrators around this country right now who do not believe that children should be allowed to say an independent prayer before a meal or while they are on their way to the classroom or while they are on a bus. There is confusion.

This amendment clears up that confusion. It does not cause any nightmares.

I would urge a "yes" vote on the Coats amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, the dialog that just ensued is precisely correct. The gentleman from Washington State correctly addressed the question: Is silent prayer unconstitutional? By saying, no, there is nothing in the Constitution, nor is there anything anywhere in Federal law which outlaws silent, private prayer.

The gentleman in the well at that time made an equally accurate point and that is that there is great confusion in this Nation among teachers and administrators about that point. He is correct.

Why is there confusion? Because we have had for two decades a parade of politicians and TV preachers saying to Americans, "Your children deserve the right to pray in school." However those people have neglected to say to the American people, for political purposes only, "However, your children do have the right now to pray silently."

These people have neglected to explain to parents the Government simply does not have the right to tell these children which prayer they shall say and when they shall say it.

Yes; children have the right to pray in school. It is the Government, constitutionally, that does not have the right to tell them when and where they may pray. The Supreme Court has determined that. Voluntary prayer, fully uncoerced is now permissible. Nothing in Federal law or the Constitution prohibits that.

The gentleman from Indiana said he will not accept an amendment to cover only silent prayer.

Now, I personally believe such an amendment might be troubling, but he says he will not accept that type of an amendment.

Thus, the gentleman's amendment, as written, requires an unusual dichotomy. If States or localities decide to break the Constitution by requiring, coercing mandatory prayer the Federal Government must allow them to do. States and localities deciding to uphold the Constitution could so only under the threat of withheld Federal funds.

With all due respect to the gentleman from Indiana, his amendment is atrocious.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. I am pleased to yield to my colleague whose amendment is atrocious.

Mr. COATS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

That characterization, obviously, I do not share.

But let me, once again, focus the gentleman's attention on what the amendment says. What I want people to do is not focus on the code words "school prayer." The amendment says if a school system "has a policy" that "effectively prevents" individual students from participating in prayer on a voluntary basis, then they will not receive Federal funds. A "policy" of preventing prayer.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Reclaiming my time, it is now unconstitutional for a State or locality to write a prayer and require students to say it, even though the caveat is there that the prayer can be voluntary. The children who do not want to pray do not have to. That is unconstitutional.

The gentleman says States may require that. And then he requires the Congress and the Executive to use the mailed fist of withholding Federal funds to require that constitutional action.

Mr. COATS. If the gentleman would yield further, the amendment says nothing of the sort. The amendment absolutely, specifically prohibits the local agencies or the State or the United States from requiring that.

So it is not unconstitutional. I agree with the gentleman. I do not want anybody composing a prayer. I do not want anybody telling a student how to pray. No organized prayer is allowed under this amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Reclaiming my time, would the gentleman agree to a rewording of his amendment that made it clear we are only affecting voluntary, individual, student silent prayer?

Mr. COATS. Well, I agree with everything the gentleman says, except the word silent.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Would the gentleman accept an amendment to accomplish that?

Mr. COATS. My amendment says that, except for the word "silent."

And what we are trying to preserve here is the right of the student who wants to recite a vocal prayer before their meal at lunchtime or to themselves during the schoolday. We are trying to preserve their right of saying that vocally.

But everything else that the gentleman has offered is already in the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Other than silent prayer. I would say to my friend, we would have State prescribed prayer——

Mr. COATS. Absolutely not.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Or student prescribed prayer, both of which, done in an organized way, are unconstitutional.

Mr. COATS. Absolutely not, because the amendment specifically prohibits that. The amendment says: "Neither the United States nor any State nor any local educational agency shall require a person to participate in prayer or influence the form or content * * *"

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. But the amendment does not deny or even recognize the constitutional denial for the State to write the prayer and require it being said.

Mr. COATS. I disagree with the gentleman.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GUNDERSON TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. COATS

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GUNDERSON to the amendment offered by Mr. COATS:

In section 420A of the General Education Provisions Act (as proposed to be added by the amendment of the Amendment of the gentleman from Indiana) strike out the first sentence and insert in lieu thereof the following: "No State or local educational agency shall deny individuals in public schools the opportunity to participate in moments of silent prayer.".

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I think many of us are sitting here this morning and now this afternoon in a little bit of agony because we want to find a way in which we can say that there ought to be some type of opportunity for prayer in our schools, and yet, we have some problems with the original amendment as drafted.

The amendment that I have introduced will accomplish two thing. The first thing, and in my opinion, the most important thing it does, is it eliminates the funding penalty under the original amendment.

I cannot believe that any one of us would want to jeopardize one of our local schools having all of their State or Federal aid cut off because somebody in the Department of Education has determined that some teacher in that local school denied an opportunity for prayer. That is a judgmental thing, and I do not think we want to go that far.

Yesterday, in the equal access bill, we provided the judicial remedies. That is what we are trying to provide in this particular amendment.

The second problem: I would like to have had an organized minute of silence that students could use however they would like. The problem is that if you have an organized or a scheduled minute of silence at the beginning of the day or immediately preceding the lunch hour, then you get the State and the school back in the business of "organizing" time for prayer. And a number of people have counseled me that it simply is not the constitutional way to go on this type of thing.

So what we are trying to do here is change the first sentence of the amendment, allowing moments of silent prayer, but not any organized recited prayer by anyone, and, most important, we will not be cutting off the funds of any local school by virtue of some judgment of some bureaucrat someplace in some State or Federal agency for education.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUNDERSON. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. I really want to commend the gentleman for taking this initiative. I think he has carefully crafted an amendment that a majority, perhaps an overwhelming majority, of this House can support.

As one who would like to see a constitutional remedy to this but knowing that we do not have a constitutional remedy, I think this is the only practical, administratively sound way to give the option and provide the same equality that we achieved in the Equal Access Act. It is consistent with what we did yesterday in equal access. It impinges on no one's liberty, and yet it protects the individual's right to a moment of silence.

I just want to commend the gentleman for his legislative artistry.

Mr. GUNDERSON. I appreciate the gentlewoman's remarks.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUNDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I commend the gentleman for offering an amendment I believe is worthy of our support and is consistent with what this body did on the equal access bill yesterday.

I know the gentleman would have preferred to have in his language the opportunity to participate in organized moments of silent prayer, but he was understanding of the complications that that might pose constitutionally and agreed to remove "organized" so that we do not have the school authorities involved directly or indirectly in scheduling or putting notices on the bulletin board, or whatever.

So I think this is entirely compatible with what we did yesterday, and I can fully support the gentleman's amendment and urge all of my colleagues to do likewise.

Mr. GUNDERSON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUNDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GOODLING. I, too, want to support the gentleman's addition to this amendment, because I see some real problems. In the original amendment it says:

No funds shall be made available under any applicable program to any State or local educational agency which has a policy of denying or which effectively prevents participation in prayer in public schools by individuals on a voluntary basis.

The problem is, from my perspective as a former school administrator, I am not sure when the teacher would have the right to terminate any voluntary prayer that someone wants to offer. I do not understand where they would have any control over when the students pray, how long they pray, how many times they pray. In fact, I think you could have a real difficult time teaching a class. If I were unprepared, I think I would get all of my colleagues to pray so that as a matter of fact we could not go ahead with instruction.

So I think the gentleman has a solution to the problem.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUNDERSON] has expired.

(On request of Mr. GOODLING and by unanimous consent, Mr. GUNDERSON was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield again to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GOODLING. I realize that many of my constituents may not understand what it is I am saying because, of course, many constituent letters would indicate that they support prayer in school at any cost.

But as I said, the way this amendment is written, I do not understand how the teacher or the administrator could really have any kind of control when the prayer took place out loud, how long, how often, and I think it could become a real problem. I know that is not the intent of the author, but I am merely saying the way it is drafted I think a teacher could be in real trouble if they said, "You sit down and be quiet." I then think there probably would be a legal case because someone could argue, "The Congress of the United States as a matter of fact said I have this right."

So I think we have problems with the original amendment. Whether what the gentleman's offering does what they want it to do or not, I think it is much better and the direction we should be going here in the Congress.

Mr. GUNDERSON. I appreciate the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUNDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. PERKINS. I thank my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUNDERSON], for yielding.

I can certainly support the amendment which says that:

No State or local educational agency shall deny individuals in public schools the opportunity to participate in moments of silent prayer.

This is a very worthy substitute for the original Coats amendment. In my judgment, the Coats amendment could easily have been declared unconstitutional, and it was a back-door approach, really, to a constitutional amendment.

The committee really needs to consider this entire issue more broadly than what the gentleman from Wisconsin is presently offering. And I think the gentleman from Wisconsin has offered a solution to our entire dilemma here this morning, and I wish to compliment my distinguished colleague.

Mr. GUNDERSON. I appreciate the support of the chairman and his kind remarks.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUNDERSON] has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. GUNDERSON was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUNDERSON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ACKERMAN. I thank my colleague for yielding.

Let me congratulate the gentleman for bringing this to a level where it certainly becomes a little bit more acceptable to a lot more people.

I was wondering if it would be acceptable to the gentleman to make one slight change so that it would say "No State or local educational agency shall deny" instead of "individuals," "individual students"?

And the reason that I would suggest that is to remove the possibility of a classroom teacher standing up and saying, "And now, boys and girls, I am going to clasp my hands, bow my head, and engage in a moment of silent prayer."

Mr. GUNDERSON. I suspect that if the teacher did that, knowing my own history in school, it would not be very silent, because there would be a lot of talking going on among the students.

Mr. ACKERMAN. As a practical matter, I agree that all the students might not be silent. But many would think the teacher is leading them in prayer.

Mr. GUNDERSON. I have no problem. I think we are after the same intent.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the word "individuals" be changed to "individual students."

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. GUNDERSON. All right, let us leave it the way it was.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Objection is heard.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS] reserved a point of order on the amendment. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order at this point?

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of a point of order.

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I think what we are engaged in is certainly intended by those participating to be a solution to an intellectual problem and is entered into, hopefully, in good faith; but it is very silly. It is very silly to say in law that no State or educational agency shall deny individuals in public schools the opportunity to participate in moments of silent prayer. That is ridiculous. That is true now. This means nothing, absolutely nothing. The only thing that it can mean is that, inferentially, words of prayer are not included within the first amendment right of freedom of speech. Inferentially, that is all it means. And that is wrong. It is wrong for this House to take such a stance. It is silly. It is ignorant.

It is impossible for us as legislators to establish a policy that says that any individual cannot participate in moments of silent prayer or the obverse of that.

The gentleman from Indiana offered an amendment which does make sense to me. It makes as much sense as saying that no Federal funds would be available for highway projects to States unless they have a policy requiring 21 as the age for alcoholic beverage purchase and consumption.

The House just voted on that recently. It makes as much sense as the Congress saying that no Federal funds will be available for highway projects unless the States have a policy, that is a law, that sets a 55-mile-an-hour speed limit. This simply says that if a school or a State has a policy that is a law, that does not allow people to exercise their first amendment rights once they enter a school building, then they do not get Federal funds. That is all.

It has been mentioned here earlier that there is a lot of confusion throughout our schools all over this country as to just what is allowed and what is allowable by way of religious activity or expression in our schools. There is a lot of confusion right here in the House of Representatives about that. It has been evidenced here in this debate. There is not very much clear understanding of just how far the courts have gone in their decisions that flow from the 1963 New York decision that first established the point, quite correctly, that the State cannot prescribe a prayer to be recited in schools. Quite properly so.

We have gone from that point to quite a different stance of the courts in which some decisions at lower court levels but at appellate court levels as well have indicated to school administrators and teachers all over this country, my gosh, you do not know what you can do and what you cannot do so you have got to back away from everything with a religious tone to it whatsoever. That is where we really stand in the schools today; uncertainty reigns.

To add to that uncertainty, an expression in law by the Congress such as this proposed as an amendment to the amendment that is pending, that is certainly not going to clear up anything. That is going to cause people to be even more certain that what the lawmakers of this land mean is that anything that is not silent by way of words of prayer, is outlawed in the schools. Do you want that? Some do, I know; I do not. I do not agree with that at all.

The first amendment right of freedom of speech extends to words of prayer; no question about that in my mind. It is part of the values sought by generations of immigrants who came to this country, and who helped to found and establish this country as it is today, they sought religious freedom as the gentleman from Washington has pointed out earlier, a very important part of our heritage.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KINDNESS] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. KINDNESS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. KINDNESS. If we are to enact anything today, I would strongly urge that we not enact what is proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin by way of reference to silent prayer. Certainly, let us not add to the confusion, and that is all that can do. Let us reject that.

If the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS] is not taken as it is, then I think we are better off to have nothing than to have something that says silent prayer is OK, because it is OK now. That infers that any words of prayer spoken aloud are wrong. Let us not do that to our generations of children now and in years ahead.

I would urge the defeat of the amendment to the amendment, and the passage or adoption of the amendment by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS].

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, I do object to the Gunderson amendment; it tells you what you may think. Gee, they will let you think about prayer in school. That is a real advance along the way to enhance our constitutional rights. It is just a little whisper of a step over from what you may think to probably what you ought to think and then to what you must think. This is all flash and no cash, to use the phraseology of a prominent, recent Presidential candidate.

I would hope that this would be dismissed out of hand. What we are talking about is the Constitution of the United States in all its glory. One of those little, obscure amendments called the first amendment, says "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

Now, you may not have heard that free exercise clause an awful lot, but it is in there. It had a meaning to our Founding Fathers when they dreamed it up in Philadelphia. The first thing the first Congress did was run out and hire a chaplain. Then they had George Washington issue a Thanksgiving proclamation which recognized the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. Oh, and Jefferson could not wait to appropriate money for priests and churches to civilize the Indians. A very practical reason; they had Indians out there in the borderland, and they wanted them to have the civilizing effects of religion, so the taxpayers paid for that.

This wall of separation that was erected from a phrase in a letter years later has been strengthened and built up and reinforced by the courts over the years, but if you want to talk about what the whole Constitution says, it says free speech for everybody that is in this country, citizen or not, and you ought to be able to exercise free speech, short of a clear and present danger, such as yelling "fire" in a crowded theater.

Now, you can call your teacher a four-letter word, and the ACLU will defend you. My God, that is self-expression. But you say "Our Father who art in heaven," and you have broken the law. You have torn up, you have shredded the Constitution. Nonsense; nonsense. Kids ought to have the right to the free exercise of their religion which includes free speech, whenever and wherever they want it.

God knows, we open every meeting of this august Chamber with a prayer, and we need it. Let me tell you, prayer in school could be like chicken soup; it might not help, but it would not hurt. Believe me.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. HYDE. Sure, I yield to my dear friend and constitutional scholar, DAN GLICKMAN.

Mr. GLICKMAN. The gentleman would acknowledge that not only are Members not compelled to be here during the prayer every morning, very few actually listen to the prayer.

Mr. HYDE. Nobody would be compelled to have to participate in prayer, if you would read this amendment at all.

Mr. GLICKMAN. I disagree with the gentleman's conclusion.

Mr. HYDE. Just like sex education, just like sex ed where the kid's parents do not want them learning about human plumbing from Ms. Jones, who may or may not be that good on the subject. They ask that their child be excused. Now, I admit you feel a little strange having to go out in the hall while the other kids are watching those colored slides, but nevertheless, that does not bother us. But when it comes to prayer somehow it is a terrible thing to exclude yourself.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HYDE. Let me finish my statement and then the gentleman and I will have an extended colloquy.

All right; go ahead. I do not want to stifle the gentleman's right to self-expression even though we are not in school.

Mr. GLICKMAN. I would just say that I was one of those kids growing up that went out of the room; that was excused when we used to have——

Mr. HYDE. Did not stunt you a bit, did it?

Mr. GLICKMAN. Let us put it like this, Mr. HYDE: It was not a very pleasant experience in my life. I am just saying to you that I voted for equal access yesterday because I believe that there is some constitutional right to use the school buildings for a lot of purposes, but the issue of prayer is a very significant issue. It should not be demeaned by comparing it to sex education, and I do not think that it belongs in the schools.

Mr. HYDE. Let me reclaim my time and tell the gentleman I am not comparing prayer to sex education; I am comparing the act of having the child leave the room during prayer and during sex education, which those who advocate sex education in the schools do not worry about the kids feeling a little strange, but in prayer it suddenly becomes a matter of extreme sensitivity. The gentleman understands the distinction, I am sure.

Now, what else did the gentleman want to say?

Mr. GLICKMAN. No; I made my point, Mr. HYDE.

Mr. HYDE. Well, you attempted to make your point.

□ 1250

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise to speak against the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I did not speak yesterday on the equal access bill. I voted against it. When I was in the Florida Legislature, I voted to allow local school boards the option of providing, if they so wished as local, elected officials, a moment of silent prayer in the schools, individually, not organized, which is the right of every American, I believe, child or adult.

But I think we have lost, somewhere along the line, what religious freedom means in this country as it is espoused by our heritage and by the Constitution of the United States. Religious freedom does not mean the exercise of religion in groups that are not religiously homogeneous.

Religious freedom does not mean that any child or any adult at any time may do anything they wish in terms of religion because it is protected when they are in other contexts that are also protected under the law, like schools.

Religious freedom means the exercise of your religion, free to choose that religion, and to establish what you wish to establish as a place and a time for religion.

The meaning of religious freedom in this country means the right to pursue the God that you choose in the religious institution that you choose, without fear of the Government saying you cannot do so.

The meaning of religious freedom in this country means that religious institutions can set up private religious schools and teach all the religion they want, both the teaching and the exercise of that religion.

That is what religious freedom means. The constitutional guarantee of free speech also means that religion is protected, in my estimation, and I believe we can in fact allow and do allow, and almost everyone has acknowledged in this body in the last 1½ hours of debate, that religious freedom is protected. There is no law in this country and no school that I know of, or that anyone has yet pointed out, that has said you cannot sit in your chair at 8 a.m. and, before the class starts, or during any period of time, close your eyes and say a prayer to yourself if you so desire. No one has said that. That is the law of the land.

If some of those who would espouse religious freedom would read St. Matthew in the New Testment, they would find that Jesus said those who would pray in public are not doing justice to prayer, to paraphrase; that those who pray in public are only doing so to impress their neighbor, and that people should pray in the closet if they really, truly, wish to communicate with their God. They should lock themselves in private. That is what it said in Matthew as to what Jesus said about prayer.

I am a Jew. I do not subscribe to Jesus as my Supreme Being; rather, his father. Does that make me any different? Does that, unfortunately, make me subject to the comment made by my colleague, for whom I have great respect, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BONKER] who in this well just about a half-hour ago said that if you voted yesterday for equal access you passed a litmus test and today you do not have to vote for this amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana?

I did not know there was any such litmus test in this country; nor to be a Member of Congress was there a litmus test. I resent the implication. Although I do not believe that he meant it in that context, the implication is there and I resent that.

If my children wanted, as I wanted for them, to have a religious teaching and prayer experience, they went to private religious instruction, in my home and in the place where the Constitution of the United States says they are entitled to go, to a recognized religious institution which is protected in its ability to maintain itself as a private religious institution and not be subject to Government rule, or the denial of their right to pursue their education and their religious practices and their religious freedom.

The Constitution does not say that schools are supposed to teach or allow the practice of religion. Neither does it say that you can prevent someone from praying, whether they open their eyes or close their eyes, whether they say it to themselves or they think it.

All of this exercise in trying to mandate and trying to tell local people, the community, the individual, the school board, the State educational association, the State school systems, that they must not do something is not the proper function of Congress as it relates to the practice of religion. It is not and will never be so long as the constitutional guarantee is there of the freedom of religion, which we should work to protect with our lives, if necessary, and I will do that.

But I will never be convinced—never be convinced, and I urge you to think of this—that Congress saying that something is or is not so in terms of religion will make it that way.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Florida. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LUNGREN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman's heartfelt feelings. I just want to ask him this question.

Does the gentleman support tuition tax credits or something like that to assist people in sending their children to religious-based schools?

Mr. SMITH of Florida. I do not.

Mr. LUNGREN. The question I have for the gentleman, then, is: Since many people are unable to do that for financial reasons, and that is one of the purposes of tuition tax credit, does not the gentleman understand that many people have to send their children to public school because of the compulsory nature of the law, and many people who perhaps would rather have them go to a religious school have the very firm belief that unless you have the acknowledgement of religion as part of the overall educational experience, you are in fact not giving those individuals a total educational experience and, in fact, you are giving them a misguided or an uneven educational experience?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMITH] has expired.

(On request of Mr. LUNGREN and by unanimous consent, Mr. SMITH of Florida was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. SMITH of Florida. If the gentleman will allow me to reclaim my time, the gentleman raises a very interesting point that I think has little or nothing to do with what I am talking about, but the reality is that if there are those kinds of cases where people cannot afford to send their children for religious instruction, I believe those religious institutions have an obligation, not the United States of America, to provide for that religious instruction.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Florida. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MILLER of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would also acknowledge that, as a Catholic, after school twice a week we went to a house near the school where all the Catholic children went and we had catechism. There was no fee. People go to Hebrew school and people have Bible readings in their homes.

This whole idea that this cannot be a religous nation without having religion in the school is just a fallacy. The question really is: Where are the parents, where is the family, for the purpose of bringing about this religious education?

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Chairman, if I may reclaim my time, let me finish by saying something that has disturbed me since I have been in this Congress because I have heard it repeated over and over again.

Ladies and gentlemen, this is not a Christian nation. This is a democracy. The United States of America is a democracy. It embodies the values of the Judeo-Christian ethic, as has been repeated on this floor by Democrat and Republican alike for many, many, many years, and rightfully so. But it is not a theocracy.

Religious freedom means the ability to pray and to practice your religion on your own, as you wish; but it does not mean that every single sense of your life as mandated by the Government must be pervaded by religion. If I want my children to pray in the morning, I will stay up with them in the morning and pray before they leave for school. If I want my children to pray on the schoolbus and there is no prohibition against that, they may do that.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMITH] has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SMITH of Florida was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. SMITH of Florida. I would be happy to yield to the chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. PERKINS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close within 15 minutes, at 1:15.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I am not interested in prolonging this debate. I know there is other business the House should conduct, and we are not trying to obstruct anything. However, there are some Members here on the floor who have serious statements to make on this question.

I think the 15-minute time limitation is a bit short to allow them to do that.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I would then amend my unanimous-consent request to 1:30.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MILLER of California. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Objection is heard.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Chairman, let me close by saying that there is a very, very, very religious, emotional question presented by this amendment and by the whole debate. I have never and will never demean the sincerity of all those who wish to allow for some form of prayer in school.

□ 1300

I believe that we in this country already have that right, but those who would allow for or mandate or attempt to promote the organized type of prayer, that prayer which will involve all the students—and that is what the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana says——

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Florida. I will not yield. The gentleman has had a tremendous amount of time, and I have a limited amount of time to finish my presentation.

I think the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] eloquently stated that problem. That is something that is not germane to the central issue. Shall we have the capability to allow our children to have a moment of silent prayer in our schools if they so choose? They have it, and there is no reason to do anything else about it by this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMITH] has expired.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the Gunderson amendment.

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS] encouraging voluntary school prayer in our Nation's public schools. Voluntary school prayer is not a partisan issue. In the Sixth Congressional District of Ohio, 88 percent of the taxpayers responding to my annual questionnaire answered "Yes" to the question, "Do you agree that voluntary school prayer should be permitted in public schools?" Furthermore, fully 81 percent of the American people favor voluntary prayer in our schools. There is no question that our Nation's citizens want elected representatives to uphold the traditional values of faith, of work, and of family.

We must heed the will of the people of this Nation. Inaction by Congress has permitted the U.S. Supreme Court, in the absence of legislation, to act against the majority opinion on this matter. The Supreme Court even decided to deny schoolteachers the right to post the Ten Commandments, even though the Ten Commandments were chiseled into the marble above the U.S. Supreme Court bench when the Supreme Court building was built in 1935.

How much longer can we sit idly by and allow gross distortions of the original Supreme Court decision to occur in our schools? How long can we allow situations like the one in Minnesota, where a fourth grade student was reprimanded by her supervisor for bowing her head to pray before her meal. And in Cincinnati, where a principal issued a statement that it is illegal to even mention God in the public schools?

Voluntary prayer strikes that delicate balance of the first amendment. Government does not have the right to impose a particular religious view. Government does have the duty, however, to preserve an environment in which children and adults can exercise their religious rights.

I urge my colleagues to support the amendment.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMITH] made a very eloquent statement, but I am not sure exactly what he was referring to. If he asserts that we have the right to voluntarily pray in school openly, that is simply not true.

It is true that we are allowed to be quiet in school, but I would state that to pass the amendment, as suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin, to permit silent prayer is to say nothing. After all, if you are silent, how can the teacher tell what you are thinking of, and how can the teacher tell what is happening?

Let me suggest, first of all, that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS] is very simple and very straightforward. It says that individual students should not be prevented from praying. It does not say anything about group prayer, and it does not permit the oppression of minorities. It talks about individual students.

A number of people, starting out with Justice Hugo Black in 1962, have completely distorted history, and it was repeated on the floor today. The Founding Fathers clearly never intended a totally secular society. Whether you read the Northwest Ordinance, the writings of Thomas Jefferson, with the exception of one letter taken out of context in 1813, Jefferson's rules for the University of Virginia which specifically provide for religious training, the bills Jefferson signed to pay for missionaries to the Indians, or a variety of other instances, historically it is clear that the Founding Fathers assumed that there will be prayer in virtually all public places. If you oppose prayer, do so on intellectual grounds, but do not misstate or distort history.

It is amazing to me to hear the concerns and the distortions attacking this voluntary individual prayer amendment. Liberals who are used to imposing virtually everything at every level of American life suddenly rise in shock at the thought of Congress reaching too far. We are told that individual students praying voluntarily would oppress minorities. We are told that voluntary individual prayer is oppressive. We are told in effect, let us oppress the majority to avoid making anyone uncomfortable. But it is the secular, antireligious state which is oppressive.

However, the most amazing thing to me is this fear of disruption. We had four or five Members get up today and actually say this. One Member said that Catholic students might take 15 to 20 minutes to say their rosary.

I just want to pose this question, because I would like to know what district that is a great fear in. In every district I go into, citizens worry about their children becoming drug addicts, citizens worry about child abuse and child pornography, citizens worry about teenage drunk driving, and citizens worry about violence in the schools, but I have yet to be in a district in America where a school principal or a parent has walked up to me and said, "Do you know how disruptive those students are going to be praying? Do you know how frightened we are that we won't be able to teach because they are going to be deeply involved in prayer?" I have not had a single teacher, worried about being mugged in the classroom, worried about what happens in the bathrooms, worried about what happens to students at recess, or worried about the kids on Friday night, walk up to me and say, "Do you know, if they start praying, they might just tear up this school, they get so fervent in their prayers?"

I would suggest that there is a level of distortion of reality in America. It is as though we were living in 1922 and Sinclair Lewis was writing "Elmer Gantry" and we were terribly worried about Billy Sunday. We are living in 1984, we have a massive epidemic of cocaine, we have major city school systems with armed guards in every corridor, we have kids killed driving home on Friday night, and we have teenage pregnancies as an epidemic, and yet Members get up on this floor with all seriousness and suggest that the major danger to America is active praying disrupting the classroom.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. In a moment, I will yield.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, let me speak to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUNDERSON]. I have two objections to permitting only silent prayer. First, by definition, you cannot stop silent prayer unless you have thought control. Since I know the gentleman does not believe we live in a country with thought control, it is not relevant to permit silent prayer.

But, second, we have the argument of JOHN MCCAIN, speaking at the very end of the all-night prayer vigil, the special orders on prayer organized by DUNCAN HUNTER of California. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MCCAIN] stood here and said, "In the North Vietnamese Communist prison camp we could pray silently, but we were beaten up if we prayed publicly."

It seems to me that our schools should probably be freer than the North Vietnamese prisoner-of-war camps.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. GINGRICH was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GINGRICH. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, did the gentleman mean to refer to my remarks when he said that someone took the floor and said the major danger to America was disruption by prayer?

Mr. GINGRICH. If you are the gentleman who said that——

Mr. FOLEY. I can assure the gentleman from Georgia that I said no such thing; nor can I recall anyone who did. However, because the gentleman is creating the mistaken impression that Members of this body stood here today and said that the major danger to America was disruption by prayer, I would refer him to the clerk to reassure him in this regard.

Does the gentleman find any such statements?

Mr. GINGRICH. If I offended the gentleman by saying the major danger——

Mr. FOLEY. The gentleman did not offend me, but I think he offended his own reputation for accuracy and fair debate.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me ask the gentleman from Washington, then, did the gentleman from Washington not stand here and express a serious concern that Catholic students might take 15 to 20 minutes?

Mr. FOLEY. I used that as but one example of the fact that although the amendment's supporters indicate that it is necessary to clarify for teachers what the constitutional situation is in the amendment subject to any particular period classroom with respect to prayer, it does not subject students to any particular period or guidelines for oral prayer. The author of the amendment himself, in response to that, agreed that serious problems had been raised and that, as a consequence he might consider some change in the amendment.

While my colleague from Georgia may choose to mock those concerns, I believe the gentleman from Indiana indicated that he felt they were worthy of consideration and concern.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I do not believe that is an accurate reflection of what I said.

Mr. FOLEY. Did the gentleman not say that some concerns had been raised that he thought ought to be considered?

Mr. COATS. I acknowledged that the gentleman had raised a point that perhaps ought to be considered

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, I will reclaim my time for 1 minute.

Mr. FOLEY. My point is that if the author of the amendment agrees that there are, indeed, concerns here which ought to be considered, the gentleman in the well is acting inappropriately to mock them.

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, let me reclaim my time.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GINGRICH] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. GINGRICH was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, let me simply say to the very distinguished majority whip that with his reputation as a serious legislator, when he rises and suggests as a serious problem—and I do not think he was being frivolous—the one effect of this amendment would be the Catholic students—and I am not Catholic, so I asked several of my friends and they said, "Yes, it is conceivable that if one were doing a rosary slowly and worked at it, one might get to 15 or 20 minutes;" and I assume the gentleman was raising it seriously—my point is, and I will make it directly to the gentleman, that in my district, if I were to go back home and get up and say, "A Member of Congress objected to DAN COATS' amendment on these grounds and raises a serious problem that we would have students across my district that might take up 15 to 20 minutes praying," they would think I was out of my mind.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, that may be true. I cannot speak for the gentleman's constituents or for his state of mind. I would simply suggest to him that the amendment does raise the question of when oral voluntary prayer might be spoken.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] gave his opinion that a teacher would be authorized to stop a vocal prayer being conducted voluntarily by a single student or a group of students if it disrupted the classroom, because it would then involve the other students in the classroom in involuntarily participation in the prayer.

If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER], who is a former teacher and a serious student of constitutional and legal matters, as the gentleman in the well is, thinks the teacher in that case would be required to interrupt in order to prevent the involuntary participation of other students in that prayer, I do not think this situtation is so farfetched as the gentleman from Georgia might imagine.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me yield, if I may, to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Chairman, all this talk reminds me of the story of the teacher who addressed a group of students on their knees in the back of the room and she said, "What are you kids doing?"

One kid said, "We're shooting craps, teacher."

She said, "Thank God, I thought you were praying."

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Chairman, on that note, I yield back my time.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I renew my unanimous-consent request that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto close at 1:30 p.m.

Mr. WALKER. Well, Mr. Chairman, I did not yield for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman refuses to yield.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, what I have heard on the floor today thus far is an awful lot of confusion and an awful lot of convoluted reasoning in the course of this debate. In the course of the debate, we have heard blasphemy referred to as the coequal of prayer. We have heard silence now referred to as the equivalent of free speech, and most recently we have heard people suggest that something in the Coats amendment leads to organized prayer in the public schools.

I would suggest that all three of those things are so absolutely wrong that it is almost criminal.

Let us deal with this question of silence that is in the amendment before us. Is silence really the equivalent of free speech in our society? Do we really think that a moment of silence is the equivalent of somebody actually making a statement, if only to themselves?

Do we really think that if a group of students went out into the hallway intent upon protest, that they would be satisfied if the school authorities said, "Fine, you stand there in silence and we will know what you are thinking."

I would submit that the ACLU would be in court protecting those students in their right to free speech immediately, if we suggested that method of protest in our society, if we told the people out here on the steps of the Capitol Building that, sure, you can come here, but we are not going to let you say anything, because in silence we will know what you are thinking. We all know that is ridiculous. It is stupid.

I would suggest that silence with regard to prayer in schools is a violation of free speech that we ought not to countenance in this House and we ought not to countenance anywhere in society.

The idea that the Coats amendment somehow is an amendment leading to organized prayer in the public schools is again absurd, ridiculous. It has absolutely no basis in fact. It is confused and convoluted, because the amendment language says specifically that it relates to only individuals, it relates to a purely voluntary exercise. It says that the policy of the school authorities cannot be to limit that kind of expression by individuals on a voluntary basis.

It also goes on further to say that school authorities cannot permit such an exercise to interfere in any way with the rights of other students. That is what the second sentence in the amendment is all about. That is the reason why I said to the gentleman from Washington that a schoolteacher would have the right at the point that someone stood up in a classroom and began to utter a vocal prayer that impinged upon other students in the classroom, that the teacher as an authority of the school district would have a duty under this amendment to stop that particular exercise, because it goes beyond the bounds of the amendment.

Read the amendment, my friends. The amendment says very specifically that what we are dealing with here is individuals exercising their rights.

Now, that is what we were told in the course of the debate in the other body was already the law of this land. This is codifying what we understood them to say was already the law of the land. We had understood that individuals already, whether it be silent or vocal, have the right to pray in schools, as long as they do not do it in a way that interferes with anybody else. We understood that that was what the law of the land was.

We have heard on the floor today that there are people in this body who really do not think that that is the law of the land, that they would stop school authorities from exercising the law of the land in that way. That is a terrible indictment. That is a terrible indictment.

I would hope that we are going to approve the Coats amendment. I would hope that we are going to codify the idea that school authorities cannot stop an individual who feels compelled to pray during the school day from being able to do so.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman has made an excellent point, which is really the thrust of the amendment, and that is that on this floor we have many Members who do not know what the Constitution does in the way of limiting prayer and throughout America we have tens of thousands of educators who are confused on the point, and that is the reason we have these anecdotes about situations where people have obviously gone overboard and do not understand the first amendment.

The Coats amendment would set that straight. It would do what the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] has conceded is constitutional and that is to allow the individual to recite a vocal prayer.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. WALKER was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, just one more point and then I will close. It has been referred to by many people on the floor today that they know of no situation in the country where silent prayer has ever been ruled out of order by the courts. That is wrong.

I have here an article before me from CQ in which it says that in Alabama the silent prayer in Alabama was ruled out of order by the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

So I would say that is factually untrue also, that we have had a lot of questions raised on the constitutionality.

(Mr. MILLER of California proceeded to read.)

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman will suspend. The gentleman from California will suspend. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to raise the point——

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I have not yielded to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman has not yielded.

The gentleman's words when he spoke in the well without getting the permission of the Member who had the floor will not appear in the RECORD.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania may proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman very much.

The point the gentleman makes is well taken, but if I am not mistaken, that Alabama case deals with organized silent prayer, not individual silent prayer. There is no school, let alone district, no school I have even heard of in the United States that ever indicated that children could not pray individually and silently.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

(At the request of Mr. MILLER of California, and by unanimous consent, Mr. WALKER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Florida.

The gentleman is correct. That does deal with a moment of silence in an organized way.

We have heard a lot of references on the floor today, though, that silent prayer has never been outlawed. I was simply pointing out that that is not the case, that in fact the circuit court of appeals has outlawed even silent prayer. We have even outlawed the thought process at the present time.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. WALKER. I will yield to the gentleman in just a moment.

I must say that the gentleman reading from the Holy Bible in the course of the discussion here I think is somewhat inappropriate. It was far more appropriate in the course of political debate; it was far more appropriate than the so-called prayer uttered earlier by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER of California. I think the point is this: That suggesting that this is an absolute right and that in fact to try to prescribe it, whether it is audible, whether it is oral, whether it is loud, whether it is soft, whether it is silent, is a point of real contention, because it is not an absolute right, as the gentleman suggests.

We just saw the rules of the House work against that right. The gentleman raised the point earlier about a teacher——

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MARTIN of New York. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I was wondering as to whose request for additional time is this?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has requested 1 additional minute.

Mr. MARTIN of New York. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 1 additional minute.

□ 1320

Mr. WALKER. I continue to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MILLER of California. That is the problem I think that is raised. It is not a question of whether a silent prayer is better than an oral prayer or when it can be heard. That is not the issue. The issue is to protect that right. And we all know that individuals from time to time pray to themselves with the same sincerity as somebody who prays out loud.

Mr. WALKER. If the gentleman will let me reclaim my time, there is no doubt that some people praying silently do so in sincerity; some people praying aloud do so in sincerity. I think both types should be allowed in the public schools within a reasonable boundary.

The gentleman well knows that no rights in our society are absolute.

Shouting fire in a crowded theater is not an absolute right of any individual.

The question that this gentleman raises is whether or not we are stripping school students of their right to pray period. And many people who on this floor today have talked sound suspiciously like they are willing to accept a pattern which strips students of their right to pray period within the schools.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] has again expired.

Mr. WALKER. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] be given 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Does the gentleman desire the time?

Mr. WALKER. Sure, I will take it.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I reserve the right to object only to say that from this point on, after this, I will object. I believe 5 minutes—everybody can say what they have to say in 5 minutes. Everything that is being said has been said 100 times. We have not had anything new since HENRY HYDE I think was in the well. So I will object starting from this point on.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] will be recognized for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. Will my friend from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HARRISON. My friend from Pennsylvania has raised a point that I would like him to pursue for just a minute. He said, if I heard him correctly, that the teacher would not only have the right but the duty to stop the voluntary oral prayer if it disrupted the activities of the school.

Mr. WALKER. If it impinged upon the other students in the classroom.

Mr. HARRISON. Impinged upon the other students. And he just said now that that right to voluntary oral prayer would have to be conducted reasonably, and the question I put to him is whether or not he is not now creating in each teacher an unfettered discretion to determine what type of prayer and when and where is reasonable; and does that not put the Government, through its agent, the teacher, right back in the business of proscribing and limiting and defining prayer?

Mr. WALKER. The gentleman is once again I think using reasoning that I would say would be somewhat confused, because the point I am making is that the teacher is the agent of the State in the classroom. The teacher does have a duty under this amendment to assure that no person is required to participate if a prayer.

If someone is, if the context of a classroom setting, saying a prayer out loud that is heard by other students, that is requiring those other students to participate in that prayer. That is my point, and it seems to me that this is very, very clear, that that would not be permitted.

What we are trying to do here is to assure that a student who is in the lunchroom, who wants to bow his head and say a prayer before eating the meal out loud has the right to do so without the school having a policy that says that that is not allowed.

There are schools in this country that have a policy that to say that that is not allowed.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the gentleman that if that is what this amendment said, if it talked about prayer before lunch in the lunchroom, I might be inclined to support it. But that is not what this amendment says.

Mr. WALKER. That is simply one example, and we have had an awful lot of convoluted examples from the other side of the aisle. There are other types.

I would say to the gentleman if someone wants to bow their head and say a silent prayer, or even say a prayer out loud, that does not involve the rest of the classroom before that famous math test we have heard so much about during all of this debate, he ought to be able to do so.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I have sat in the Chamber for the entire debate on this particular issue because I think it is a meaningful issue that all of us should listen to and participate in. But I think that this particular debate has pointed out the real difficulties that we have in attempting to define in language those provisions to permit voluntary prayer in public schools that would satisfy all of the various religions and all of the various groups that make up this great Nation.

There is such great confusion in the debate and in the legislative history of this amendment that no one really knows at this point what the amendment does or does not do.

We hear from the author of the amendment that it simply permits voluntary prayer period; and then we hear from the other proponents that say that if a person, an individual student commences to recite the rosary on a voluntary basis that the teacher then has the power to decide whether or not that student can or cannot recite the rosary. That is the difficulty that we get into.

The gentleman raised a perfectly legitimate point because we transfer then to the teacher the authority to decide whether or not that student can participate in a voluntary prayer. That is probably not the intent of the author of the amendment but it points out the difficulty that we have today in trying to find language that will permit voluntary prayer and at the same time not infringe upon the constitutional provisions.

Second of all, there has been a proponent of the legislation to say that since we do not now have tuition tax credits that it is the responsibility of this Congress and the responsibility of this Government to try to move religion into public schools simply because we have not provided for tuition tax credits.

I say to this Chamber that that is an extremely dangerous route to travel if that is the intent of this amendment. We had better then be very, very careful as we travel that road because we are going to open up something that will be very difficult to shut without harming a great number of people in this country.

So while I have some concerns about the provisions of the substitute that is being offered, whether or not it is needed or not, nevertheless I think it is a step in the direction that we as Americans, all Americans can support.

I would hope that this body, at this particular time, would support the substitute by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUNDERSON] because it appears to be so worded that it is not going to infringe upon any constitutional provision that has been expressed by any Member of this body.

Ms. FIEDLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. At this time I yield to the gentlewoman from California.

Ms. FIEDLER. I would just like to make one point that I do not think has been made before. We have heard a discussion of how this particular original amendment might be implemented, the issues of voluntary and the silent versus the oral prayer.

I think one of the important points that we all have to remember is that participation and attendance in public schools is not voluntary; it is mandatory under the law. So when you require students to attend school and then you permit on a voluntary basis the oral recitation of a prayer you are automatically imposing upon a situation that is not by choice for the student in the classroom.

The only way that you could really resolve that problem is either to infringe upon the rights of the student who is giving the oral prayer or infringing upon the right of the student who is required by law to sit in the classroom.

I think it is that kind of dilemma that by permitting voluntary oral prayer in the school that walks us beyond the point that exists with silent prayer.

Mr. JENKINS. I thank the gentlewoman for her comments.

Mr. ROEMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I will yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ROEMER. As I understand the gentleman, he is supporting the Gunderson substitute; am I correct in that?

Mr. JENKINS. That is correct.

Mr. ROEMER. And if the Gunderson substitute somehow fails, then he would oppose the amendment as written by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS]; am I correct?

Mr. JENKINS. That is correct. I would oppose that based upon the legislative history that has been made in this body today.

Mr. ROEMER. I agree with the gentleman and I thank him.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, the previous gentleman in the well referred to a comment I made a while ago with respect to tuition tax credits. I just wanted to perhaps explain a little further on that.

The point I was making was that for the vast bulk of the American people who have deeply held religious beliefs, many of whom may wish to send their children to a totally religious environment in which they get their schooling, it is not possible. The point I was trying to make is that some have tried to make that more possible to them by tuition tax credits.

The other point is that there is a compulsion in this country with respect to sending your children, below a certain age, to school. You violate the law, they violate the law unless they do that. Therefore, those children are required to be in a situation for 8 hours, perhaps the greatest influence they have in their lives during that period of time.

And many people believe, I among them, that if you tell those children during that most impressionable age that society is saying that in the totality of their experience, the most important experience they have, is something in which they cannot even dare to utter an acknowledgment of the God that they believe in, that that influences them greatly.

We have made a decision across this land in most communities that sex education is important because the consequences of sexual activity may in many different ways impinge on society. Therefore we have said, irrespective of the fact that they might get that education from their families and irrespective of the fact that the families have the primary obligation in that regard, that we think it is so important that our schools should give them education about sex.

And we have said in many ways that that ought not to have any moral consequences. But we recognize the sensitivity of the issue so we allow students to remove themselves from the room during that period of time. We say that is not too offensive a thing for those children to have to go through because of the greater good of society that they have this educational experience with respect to sexual activity made available to them.

My question is: How does it make sense to say that our educational institutions, which have almost all of our students, provide the opportunity for an education with respect to sexual activity because that is important in society, but at the same time say that something so important to the vast majority of the American people, the Founding Fathers; that is, an acknowledgment of a supreme being, is not even allowed to be uttered vocally.

That is the point we are making. If there is any impression on those young people with respect to the former, certainly there is with respect to the refusal to allow an acknowledgment of a supreme being.

I happen to be a Roman Catholic. I can recall we had school prayer when I first went to school and I can recall the "Our Father" was said with the Protestant ending. Incidentally, we in the Catholic Church now have the Protestant ending, some Protestants no longer have it and that kind of confuses me.

But I can recall that was prayer somewhat different to my experience.

I would hope we would have a greater sensitivity to that problem, and under this amendment we would because it would not require a particular prayer to be obligated on the students by a particular teacher. In fact, I would even go beyond this amendment, to permit students on a rotating basis to say prayers that reflect their particular experience, much as we do here.

And that would give them the idea that there is a whole panoply of religious experiences and dedication to religious principles in this country. That is a good thing; I would think it not a bad thing.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNGREN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JENKINS. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I want to say to the gentleman that, as a Protestant, I believe that there is a need and almost requirement for parents to instill religious training on their children. And I have participated in that and firmly believe it.

But what the gentleman was attempting to say, it appeared to me, was that because people cannot afford to go to a parochial school or a religious school, then we have to bring religious training to the school.

Mr. LUNGREN. I take my time back.

The point I am saying to the gentleman is that since they do not have that ability, they are compelled by the State to send their children to a public school in an environment in which even the utterance of the acknowledgment of the existence of God is not allowed. That has a profound effect on those individuals. We ought to recognize that.

Now we are not trying to undo what the Supreme Court did in their constitutional decision. What we are trying to say is that the interpretations of many individual school districts is overreaching; it has gone beyond what the Supreme Court said. To the extent there is still allowed to be an acknowledgment of an existence of a Supreme Being in the classroom, we ought to give that information to those school districts and allow those students the opportunity.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment, all amendments thereto and all substitutes, close at 2 p.m.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. COATS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding, and I am not sure, I just want to check, I think a perfecting amendment is going to be offered, and I just want to check to see if that is the case. If that is the case, I would have to object to that unanimous-consent request.

Mr. PERKINS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the Coats amendment, all substitutes and all amendments thereto, be concluded at 2 p.m.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOODLING. I want to make sure the motion was talking only about this portion of this bill.

Mr. PERKINS. This does not include the Goodling amendment, Mr. Chairman. This does not include the Goodling amendment, the funding of the school programs.

Mr. WALKER. I want to get a record vote.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. This motion referred to the Coats amendment and all amendments thereto.

Mr. WALKER. That is right, and I want a record vote on the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Those in favor of taking this by recorded vote.

Mr. WALKER. Pending that, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. DURBIN. Is it my understanding there was intervening business between the vote which was taken orally, the parliamentary inquiry made by the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The intervening business was a parliamentary inquiry that was related to the motion, and no independent business has been taken up.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRIES

Mr. DURBIN. As a further parliamentary inquiry of the Chair, does not this parliamentary inquiry and interruption preclude the gentleman from Pennsylvania's right to ask for a recorded vote?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. No; it is related to the status of the vote, and of the motion.

Mr. PARRIS. I have a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman will state has parliameftary ifquiry.

Mr. PARRIS. Would the Chairman outline to us how the time would be allocated in the 20 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. There is a motion before the Chair at this particular time.

The Chair will announce the allocation after the vote has been taken, depending on the outcome of that motion.

Mr. PARRIS. Would the motion, being couched as a 2 o'clock termination, would the time for this vote come out of the time for the debate?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair must insist on the orderly procedure. The pending business before the Committee is whether or not there shall be a recorded vote.

Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] state his request again?

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was refused.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair will proceed to divide the time.

Since there are so many Members seeking recognition, the Chair at this time will divide the time equally between the chairman, Mr. PERKINS, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. COATS, 10 minutes each, and they will yield time as they see fit.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROEMER].

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Gunderson amendment and in opposition to the Coats amendment as written.

I would like to read from the Holy Bible, St. Matthew, chapter 6, verse 5:

And when thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are: for they love to pray standing in the synagogues, and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward.

But thou, when thou prayest, 'enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father, which seeth in secret, shall reward thee openly.

Be not a hypocrite.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PARRIS].

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I have listened carefully to all of this debate this afternoon, one which I found intellectually stimulating and one which has been conducted in accordance with the highest traditions of this House. It is our constitutional duty to deal with these important problems which persist in this Nation, and which arise from time to time and to establish broad statements of public policy by which this Nation is governed and controlled.

However, Mr. Chairman, I submit that there has been one fundamental characteristic of this debate which I find disturbing. Last weekend I attended a luncheon at which Mr. Naisbitt, the author of the best seller book entitled "Megatrends" spoke. He suggested that MIT has recently decided to substitute lawyers for mice in future laboratory experiments.

I found that extremely interesting because I am a lawyer and I have listened to a number of other lawyers in the debate here today. There are a large number of attorneys who are Members of this House.

But the important point, Mr. Chairman, is the reason Mr. Naisbitt indicated for the MIT decision is that lawyers are less messy, there are more of them who are more readily available, and you are less likely to develop an emotional attachment to any one of them.

The problem here, Mr. Chairman, is we are not 435 Members of the Supreme Court. We are Members of the Nation's legislature. We have nine ladies and gentlemen who serve in the capacity of Supreme Court judges and sit in a building just across the street from this Capitol. Under our Constitution it is their duty and obligation to take this amendment, which I hope we will adopt, and tell us how it applies in our society and whether it is consistent with constitutional constraints or whether it violates fundamental constitutional freedoms of free speech enjoyed by any of our citizens or whether it does undue damage to the concept of separation of church and state. That is their obligation under our governmental system, not ours, and the development of a series of hypothetical scenarios by my lawyer colleagues in this debate has not served us particularly well.

I would hope this Congress would adopt this amendment to permit school prayer as a broad statement of fundamental principle and leave its application and interpretation to our Supreme Court, where it properly belongs.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BONKER].

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Gunderson amendment. I think it is a practical and necessary alternative to that amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Coats].

I do not think we ought to unnecessarily confuse the public, the school authorities, courts, the students, and others by moving in the direction of the Coats amendment.

I think what we did yesterday by way of passing the equal access bill is a far more effective approach. It deals, I think, in an enlightened way with the 1962 Court decision. It gives the school districts clear guidelines on how to deal with this very delicate matter in the future. It also contains a number of necessary protections so that we do not cross that line between what is prescribed, what is mandated, what is instructed by school authorities in the classroom and that which is voluntary and student initiated.

Let us do our task here in a constitutional, a proper, and a practical way. I think the bill that we passed yesterday on equal access is the way to go. It is a much broader approach and yet it has clarifying guidelines for school districts to follow.

That measure is on the way to the President's desk. If we adopt the Gunderson amendment, I think we state something that is already practical and obvious and in law. It is certainly much more preferable than that which has been offered by our colleague, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS].

I urge adoption of the Gunderson alternative.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HUNTER].

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. HUNTER AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. COATS

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a substitute for the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUNTER as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. COATS: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted, insert the following:

VOLUNTARY SCHOOL PRAYER

SEC. 806. Part B of the General Education Provisions Act is amended by inserting after section 420 (20 U.S.C. 1228) the following new section:

"PROHIBITION AGAINST THE USE OF FEDERAL FUNDS BY PUBLIC SCHOOLS WHICH PROHIBIT VOLUNTARY PRAYER

"SEC. 420A. No funds shall be made available under any applicable program to any state or local educational agency which has a policy of denying or which effectively prevents participation in prayer in public schools by individuals on a voluntary basis, except that such agencies may limit spoken prayer during instructional periods or at any other time when vocal speech is limited. Neither the United States nor any state or local educational agency shall require any person to participate in prayer or influence the form or content of any prayer in such public schools."

Mr. HUNTER (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the substitute amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Chairman, the reason I wanted the particular words to be read was so that there would be no misunderstanding as to what the amendment says.

The amendment addresses the problems that were raised by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY], and, I think the problem raised by the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] in his impromptu speech, to wit: Some students might actually get up in the classroom and disrupt classes and say, "We want to take our 15 to 20 minutes to pray instead of taking that math test."

This very simply lays those problems to rest in that the prayer will not be authorized where it might disrupt school activities.

So I would offer the amendment. I think that it meets the thrust of the objections of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY] that we heard him expound on several minutes ago and also the questions that were raised by the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER] and a number of other gentlemen.

I think the situation has been taken care of.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think the Clerk read "institutional."

Should that have been "instructional periods."

Mr. HUNTER. Instructional periods. Yes; that should be instructional periods, not institutional.

I thank the gentleman for clarifying that point.

I think the problem has been taken care of and I think we should go ahead and pass this substitute to the Coats amendment.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUNTER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ACKERMAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman's amendment does say that such agencies "may limit" spoken prayer; is that accurate?

Mr. HUNTER. Yes.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Well, to me that means that if you are the teacher you may limit my prayer and you may not limit your prayer and that you have the right to pick and choose which prayers you limit.

Mr. HUNTER. I reclaim my time, I think we have gone over the fact that the teacher is in charge of the classroom and has been vested with certain trusts and responsibility to educate the children, to see that the curriculum is observed, and I think that the gentleman is overstating the problem. Obviously, the teacher is in charge of the classroom. You are not going to see teachers who allow the curriculum of a school to be taken over and preempted by a religious program.

I think that question has been answered in the debate that preceded this colloquy.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ACKERMAN].

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the sponsor engage me in a colloquy?

Mr. HUNTER. Absolutely.

Mr. ACKERMAN. You say that the teacher is in charge. That means the teacher has the right to make a determination as to which prayer might be in order and which prayer might be disruptive?

Mr. HUNTER. No; absolutely not.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Let me rephrase my question so that the gentleman can answer it.

If a student stood up and was reciting a prayer that the teacher thought was disruptive, would that teacher have an obligation to stop that student?

Mr. HUNTER. Obviously if the teacher wants to keep his job he has an obligation to stop the student.

□ 1350

The teachers are hired by the school districts. They are vested with a certain trust to operate the school, to see that the curriculum is observed.

The notion that somehow the teacher is going to preempt the math class with a religious service is just not I think a valid argument.

Mr. ACKERMAN. So that would mean that a prayer would be in order and proper and appropriate only if the teacher deemed that it was proper and appropriate?

Mr. HUNTER. No; that means, very simply, that the teacher is going to be able to say, "We are not going to allow prayer during the curriculum; we are going to allow you to pray, if you want to pray, during the lunch time when we do not have curriculum, we are going to allow you to pray at other times when you do not have curriculum."

Mr. ACKERMAN. What if the teacher thought the prayer was disruptive?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ACKERMAN] has expired.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARTNETT].

Mr. HARTNETT. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, we can hypothesize, we can perfect, we can substitute, we can try to make 435 constitutional judgments on this issue, but the fact of the matter is, Mr. Chairman, we have a vote before this House now whether or not we are for or against school prayer. That is the issue. Either you want to permit our young people in this country to be able to utter some type of praise or honor or recognition of an Almighty Creator or you do not. You can tell me about all of these hypothetical situations that are going to come up and what all is going to happen, but the American people have an institution called the U.S. Supreme Court to protect them against unconstitutional laws.

The fact of the matter, my colleagues, is that you are either for prayer in public schools or you are against it, and that is how you should vote.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Colorado [Mrs. SCHROEDER].

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, the real issue here—and let us not forget it—is whether or not religion belongs in the public schools. I think that many parents feel as I do that that religious instruction is their own personal prerogative.

But to put a little humor in this, let us remember the words of that wonderful comedian Mark Russell. Mark Russell said the perfect generic Lord's prayer for all schools if the Congress mandates it would be:

Our Father or Mother, who art either in heaven, nirvana, Mecca, or Salt Lake City, hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come, thy will be done, providing thy will is that America is always the big winner over the foreign heathen. Give us this day our daily white bread, black bread, Italian bread, Jewish rye, English muffins, or tacos, and a quarter-pounder with cheese and a large fries to go. And lead us not into temptation, or into school buses that take us to neighborhoods where the kids are different. For thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory, especially for people who still use words like "thine."

The generic prayer shows how meaningless personally such a prayer would be.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentlewoman from Colorado [Mrs. SCHROEDER] has expired.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KINDNESS].

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Chairman, I am not so sure that there really is a place for humor in the discussion before us today. But it has brought one thing into focus. It is a personal experience for me that I would like to share with you. This debate has brought into focus the fact that there are a lot of people who do not understand the religious views and positions of others.

For example, a lot of people do not understand that, as with some Christians, as is my belief, it is a part of my obligation to witness my Christianity. And to ask me to be silent is to impose upon my rights under the Constitution.

Think upon that, friends.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GLICKMAN].

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, there is one issue here: Does organized religion belong in the public schools?

And regardless of how you look at the specific amendment, that is the issue.

I believe that the founders of this country intended the answer to be no. That does not mean that religion should not be a part of everybody's life, but should it be part of the public schools in an organized fashion? The answer is no.

I respect the gentleman from Ohio about his religion. But when you come to the public schools, we make a social contract where everybody pays taxpayers' dollars, Buddhists, Jews, Catholics, Christians, and as part of making that social contract there are certain things that do not happen in the public schools. They happen in homes, they happen in churches, but not in the public schools. What does not happen, what should not happen in public schools, is organized religion and prayer.

If you adopt the Coats and the Hunter amendment, that is what you are asking for.

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GREGG].

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS] has been trying to do here today on the issue of school prayer. I think it is totally inappropriate that some Members have decided to take and mock the basic religious statement of faith of one of the largest sects of religion in our country and have decided that this issue or by this issue they wish to ban the opportunity of members in the school systems to participate in their faith.

It is totally wrong that we as a Congress who look up each day at "In God We Trust" should deny our children the right to say in God they trust when they are in school.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBIN].

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, for more than 15 years, Illinois has had a law providing for a moment of silent reflection. There are no reported court challenges of that law. I have seen it applied. Some find it objectionable. I think it is fair.

However, by the Coats amendment, by the Hunter substitute, what we effectively will do is to say that Illinois can no longer follow this practice.

By not affirmatively allowing prayer and only allowing silent reflection, this effectively denies or at least effectively prevents group prayer, vocal prayer and organized prayer. Those who are standing for prayer today are going to be eliminating the right of the State of Illinois to continue a practice they have had for 15 years of a moment of silent reflection. Honestly, is that what you want to accomplish?

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Again I want to focus on exactly what my amendment says. There have been allegations of organized prayer, of teacher-led prayer, of student coercion. That is not the case, and anybody who will take the time to read my amendment will realize that that is not the case.

The central issue before us is whether we will allow an individual student, on his or her own initiative to voluntarily pray in public schools.

Now, the Federal courts and school boards and principals and attorneys across this country have denied students this right. Whether they interpret the Supreme Court decision rightly or wrongly really is irrelevant at this point because the fact is that students have been denied the right to pray.

In Minnesota, a fourth grade student was reprimanded by her supervisor for bowing her head in prayer before her meal.

In Cincinnati, a principal issued a statement that it is illegal to even mention God's name in public schools.

This is what we are attempting to correct. And in doing so, we will guarantee Christians and Jews and anybody from any other faith, the right to the freedom of expression of their own religion. We are specifically prohibiting coercing anybody from participating in prayer. We are specifically prohibiting anybody involved with the State, including the teacher, the principal or anybody else, from influencing in any way the form or the content of the prayer.

We allow prayer in every other public institution in this country except our public schools. We allow reference of God in every public institution in this country except our public schools. We pray in this House of Representatives. The Supreme Court references the name of God before each session that it undertakes. Every one of the coins in our pockets has "In God We Trust" on it. Our songs, "America the Beautiful," "God Bless America," "The Star Spangled Banner," in one of the verses, every one of those references the Almighty. We do that everywhere in this country, but we deny our children the right to reference that in public school. We say to them that God is everywhere except in school during school hours.

I would urge Members to look at this amendment, to look carefully at the wording, to look at the protections for the minorities, to look at the right that it gives to allow religious expression and freedom in our public schools. It simply says that if a school has a policy, that denies individual students the right to voluntarily pray, then they will not receive Federal funds. That is the essence of the amendment.

The question we will vote on is: Are you for prayer in public schools on a voluntary basis by individual students, or are you opposed?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS] has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, the issue is not whether we are in favor of prayer. We all are. The issue is whether we are in favor of this amendment. And this amendment is what its words say, and its words say that such agencies may limit spoken prayer during instructional periods or at any other time when vocal speech is limited.

□ 1400

If they may, that means they may not. And that means it is up to the agency, whether it is the school board or the teacher in the classroom, to decide what prayer is going to be limited and what prayer is not. That puts Government into prayer; where government does not belong.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHUMER].

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, I think this debate has been a fascinating debate, and I would simply like to reiterate a point. That is, very simply, that when this country was founded, our forefathers believed rigorously in the separation of the church and state. They thought any mixing of the two could vitiate the future of this republic.

The church and religion should be on one place; government, including its schools, should be in another. The two could and should, in their view, coexist and coexist they have very well for 200 years. Why, in anyone's name, is there such drive and such force to mix the two today? It is not going to make people any more God fearing to have a prayer said in school.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield my 1 remaining minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCURDY].

Mr. MCCURDY. I thank the chairman for yielding the minute.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Gunderson amendment. I think that it is a very thoughtful amendment; one that provides the greatest amount of freedom and is fair. After the enactment yesterday of the equal access bill, I think we have gone a long way in satisfying many of the concerns of the American public.

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in opposition to the amendment with a strong sense of disappointment that this amendment would be offered in the light of the action of the House yesterday in approving the so-called equal access language in the mathematics and science teachers bill. Those who opposed the equal access language did so in the strong belief that the Congress should not modify the current balance that exists between the right to freedom of religion and speech guaranteed by the Constitution and the mandate in our Constitution that there should be separation between church and state. They believed that permitting religious groups to meet on school property would disturb this delicate balance. Now in less than 24 hours this amendment will prove their fears were correct.

The effect of the amendment is to require that schools permit prayer—it is just that simple. This would clearly disturb the balance and, as many courts have held, violate the Constitution. There are those who argue that each school district would have a choice. That is a Hobson's choice—the choice between obeying the constitutional mandate to keep church and state separate and losing vital Federal aid to assist in the education of our children. We must remember that education is the primary goal of our schools. Let us not, through the adoption of this amendment, cripple our educational institutions.

By the adoption of the equal access language in the bill yesterday we reached a tolerable accommodation between these important constitutional principles. Let us not through the adoption of this amendment disturb this compromise in a way that many, including possibly the courts, would find intolerable.

All of my colleagues who know me well know that I am a strong believer in the importance of our constitutionally mandated separation of church and state. Let us keep both education and prayer in their rightful places and defeat this amendment.●

● Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment. This amendment is straightforward both in its wording, and intentions. We're not talking about forcing organized school prayer, and we're not talking about dictating what prayers may be used, and we're not even saying that schools have to adopt policies that reserve time for a moment of silence.

All we're trying to do with this amendment is to prevent schools from prohibiting prayer by those who choose to pray. That's not in conflict with our Constitution, and it's not in conflict with the separation of church and state. But, it is in agreement with freedom of individual speech and religious expression. If the state is truly to remain separate from our religious institutions, then the state must neither advocate, nor prohibit prayer. This amendment would help move us toward that end.●

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, the long and comprehensive debate on school prayer has been a good one. As always, the issue has proved to be more complicated than it appears at first sight.

The flaw in the Coats amendment, which was also present in the Walker amendment, is that the enforcement is by cutting off all Federal school aids to the local school district. Enforcement should, of course, be done through the courts as was agreed to by consensus on the equal access bill.

The questions of organized versus voluntary prayer, of oral versus silent prayer, of defining voluntary, and of the interference of school officials were all involved. Like a majority of this House, I thought the silent prayer alternative to be superior particularly because it did not use the funds cut off as its enforcement tool.

This bill is not likely to be passed anyway. It is my judgment that our country will have to rely on the equal access law over the next few years. I hope it will do the job.●

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRIES

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, we have a fairly complex parliamentary procedure. I wonder if the Chair would explain to the Members the various motions as they would occur.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The first vote will be on the Gunderson amendment to the amendment of Mr. COATS. If no further amendments are offered to the Coats amendment, then the vote will occur on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HUNTER] if no amendments are offered to his substitute amendment.

Mr. BONKER. As amended?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. As amended or not.

Mr. BONKER. Possibly by Gunderson, if that amendment is adopted?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Or possibly by another Member.

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIREAN pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, I was confused by that explanation; could the Chair go over it once again?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Yes, certainly.

The first vote will be on the Gunderson amendment to the Coats amendment. If no other amendments are offered, then the next vote will be on the Hunter amendment, which is a substitute for the Coats amendment. Any amendment to the Hunter substitute would have to be offered before the vote on the Hunter substitute. Then after the Hunter substitute is voted on, the Coats amendment will be voted on.

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, what further amendments would be in order to the Hunter amendment?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Any amendment that any Member wishes to offer. Any germane amendment.

Mr. SCHUMER. Would there be any debate on those amendments?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. No debate will be permitted on them.

Mr. SCHUMER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUNDERSON] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WALKER TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. COATS AS AMENDED

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALKER to the amendment offered by Mr. COATS, as amended: At the end of the amendment, add the following:

"Notwithstanding the preceding two sentences, no funds shall be made available under any applicable program to any State or local educational agency which has a policy of denying or which effectively prevent participation in prayer in public schools by individuals on a voluntary basis, except that such agencies may limit spoken prayer during instructional periods or at any other time when vocal speech is limited, Provided, That neither the United States nor any State or local educational agency shall require any person to participate in prayer or influence the form or content of any prayer in such public schools."

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, is it possible at this time to offer an amendment to the Hunter substitute?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Only to the Hunter substitute amendment, yes.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS], as amended.

The question was taken; and and the Chairman pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote and, pending that, I make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair will count; 108 Members are present, a quorum.

The pending business is the demand of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER] for a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 194, noes 215, not voting 24, as follows:

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, it is very evident that we have a lot of confusion on the floor and my inquiry is to the vote that will come next, on which amendment or what amendment?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The vote will be on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HUNTER].

Mr. PERKINS. On the Hunter amendment?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Unless there is another amendment offered before the question is put thereon.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GUNDERSON TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. HUNTER AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. COATS, AS AMENDED

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered as a substitute for the amendment, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GUNDERSON to the amendment offered by Mr. HUNTER as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. COATS, as amended: In section 420A of the General Education Provisions Act (as proposed to be added by the amendment of the amendment of the gentleman from California strike out the first sentence and insert in lieu thereof the following: "No State or local educational agency shall deny individuals in public schools the opportunity to participate in moments of silent prayer.".

The question was taken; and the Chairman pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

So the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. KOGOVSEK

Mr. KOGOVSEK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KOGOVSEK:

Page 95, after line 18, insert the following new section (and redesignate the succeeding sections accordingly):

STUDENT FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1982

SEC. 810. The Student Financial Assistance Technical Amendments Act of 1982 is amended—

(1) in section 3(a), by striking out "and 1984-1985" and inserting in lieu thereof ", 1984-1985, and 1985-1986";

(2) in section 3(b), by striking out "year 1984-1985" and inserting in lieu thereof "years 1984-1985, and 1985-1986";

(3) by striking out "and 1985-1986" each place it appears in sections 4, 5(a), 5(b)(1), 5(c), and 6 and inserting in lieu thereof ", 1985-1986, and 1986-1987";

Mr. KOGOVSEK (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. KOGOVSEK. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is simple and, I believe, noncontroversial. It provides legislative authority to continue the current Pell grant family contributions schedule for the 1986-87 academic year; maintains the current regulatory definition for "independent student" through the 1986-87 academic year; and retains the current cost of attendance criteria for the 1985-86 school year.

These changes are intended to continue similar provisions contained in the Student Financial Assistance Technical Amendments of 1982 (Public Law 97-301) and the Student Loan Consolidation and Technical Amendments Act of 1983 (Public Law 98-79). Adoption of this amendment is essential if we are to preserve an orderly student aid delivery system. Congress had taken the unprecedented step of statutorily establishing Pell grant eligibility because of repeated delays in publishing the family contributions schedule—which is the regulatory mechanism for determining student eligibility—the annual needs test of the family's income and assets and their ability to pay the cost of sending a son or daughter to college. Without this amendment, needy low- and middle-income students may be delayed in their efforts to obtain Federal student assistance or denied the opportunity to attend college altogether.

The family contribution schedule not only establishes the basis for Pell grant eligibility, but it also contains information which is essential to structuring the common data elements which are used to develop the millions of application forms which are used by Pell grant applicants (4.9 million in 1983-84) to apply for student aid. A cooperative effort—between the Congress, the Department of Education, and the financial aid servicing agencies—is necessary in order to keep the system running smoothly and to facilitate the delivery of student financial assistance to eligible applicants.

The system requires forms approval by the Department no later than June 1 preceding the academic year before the student actually begins his or her studies. This 18-month leadtime allows the forms to be prepared, distributed, completed, processed, and the funds distributed to the institution or the affected student. Prior to enactment of the provisions contained in the amendment (by the 97th Congress), repeated delays in departmental approval of the necessary forms and promulgation of the family contributions schedule caused inordinate delays in the application and award process. Continuation of these provisions will ensure that needy low- and middle-income students receive a Pell grant on time.

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOGOVSEK. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COLEMAN. of Missouri. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the gentleman's amendment.

Enactment of this amendment will provide much-needed stability and predictability to our Federal student aid programs for the next 2 academic years. Under this amendment, the technical changes to the Higher Education Act which were both enacted by the Congress in 1982 and 1983 and signed by the President would be extended for an additional year. There are no policy changes contained in this amendment. The specific provisions of the Higher Education Act which would be addressed under the amendment are related to the calculation of student's eligibility for Pell grants, guaranteed student loans, and other Federal student aid programs.

The first provision in the amendment would require that the cost of attendance criteria used for calculating eligibility and the amount of Pell grant assistance awarded during the current academic year would also be used for the 1985–86 and 1986–87 academic years. The cost of attendance criteria currently in use was developed to reduce the cost of the Pell Grant Program in 1981 and supersedes provisions included in the Education Amendments of 1980.

The second provision in the amendment requires that different family contribution schedules continue to be used for the Pell Grant Program and the campus-based programs, which include supplemental grants, direct loans, and college work-study. This continued separation of the family contribution schedules is necessary because the higher education community has been unable to agree upon a single need analysis which is suitable for all our Federal aid programs.

The third provision would require that the current family contribution schedule for the Pell Grant Program, once updated to reflect an increase for inflation, would be used for the 1986–87 academic year. A similar provision is included with regard to the family contribution schedule for the Guaranteed Student Loan Program.

Finally, the amendment extends the use of the current definition of independent student to include the 1986–87 academic year. The higher education community, while agreeing that the current definition is unsatisfactory, has been unable to agree on a new definition.

Mr. Chairman, as I noted earlier, all of these amendments simply extend existing policies which now govern our Federal student aid programs. It is necessary to enact amendments extending these provisions for our Federal student aid programs for the 1986–87 academic year as the Department of Education has already begun the process of designing application forms for the 1986–87 academic year. In addition, by adopting this amendment we will be sending a clear signal to millions of students and their families across the country that Congress supports stability and predictability in these programs.

I urge an "aye" vote on the amendment.

Mr. KOGOVSEK. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Missouri for his contribution and his cooperation on this amendment. The spirit of bipartisanism, which has characterized the work of the Committee on Education and Labor, continues to enhance our mutual efforts and reflect well on my friend and colleague from Missouri.

Mr. Chairman, I would conclude by indicating that this amendment enjoys the support of the higher education community and should be well received in the other body, if adopted.

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Chairman, this technical amendment is needed to assure that Federal aid can be delivered to students on a timely basis prior to reauthorization of the Higher Education Act in the next Congress.

To be effective in providing access and choice for students, the programs under title IV of the Higher Education Act must allow students and their families leadtime to make plans for college attendance. Federal dollars are of little help unless students can secure the proper application forms and find out about their eligibility in advance.

This amendment will continue operating procedures in effect since 1982 that assure stability in the student aid delivery system. According to the master calendar recommended by the National Commission on Student Financial Assistance, the development of the common student aid application form by the Department of Education, the higher education community, and the Congress must begin this fall for academic year 1986–87. Without this technical amendment, work on the 1986–87 common application form cannot begin because it will be impossible to assume the continuation of current policies on a number of important issues, including the extension of separate systems of need analysis for Pell grants and for campus-based programs, the independent student definition, and the Pell grant family contribution schedule updated for inflation.

Consistent with the provisions of the Student Financial Assistance and Technical Amendments Act and the Student Loan Consolidation and Technical Amendments Act of 1983, the amendment I propose would achieve five objectives:

Define the steps to be used by the Secretary of Education in annually updating and publishing the family contribution schedule for the Pell Grant Program.

Require the Secretary to annually approve those need analysis systems that schools may use in awarding campus-based program funds.

Extend and define the elements and allowances that may be used in calculating the cost of attendance for the Pell Grant Program.

Continue the existing criteria that are currently in use in determining whether a student is dependent or independent for purposes of determining eligibility for title IV programs.

Define the steps to be used by the Secretary in annually updating and publishing the family contribution schedule for the Guaranteed Student Loan Program.

Mr. Chairman, bipartisan majorities of Congress have long supported the national effort, through title IV, to extend opportunities for higher education to all who can benefit from it. Progress toward this goal will only be achieved to the degree that aid is delivered to needy students in a timely and efficient manner. For the necessary work on student aid forms to precede on schedule this fall, and to allow students, families, and colleges to plan ahead, I urge adoption of this technical amendment to the Higher Education Act.●

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KOGOVSEK].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WILLIAMS OF MONTANA

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana: Page 93, line 8, after "council" insert the following: "who are appointed on or after the date of enactment of this subsection and".

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, the provision that I am attempting to amend is that provision of this bill which is designed to protect members of the national advisory councils and commissions from being fired by a President without cause.

The amendment that I am introducing would specify that this provision in the current act would apply to those council and commission members who are appointed after the date of enactment of this legislation.

Now let me be clear. This amendment will be seen correctly as a partisan amendment. Let me tell my colleagues why I offer it.

When Ronald Reagan became President, he did something that has never been done before. He fired all of the Presidentially appointed members of the four national advisory councils under the provisions of this act. Those councils include Continuing Education, Vocational Education, Adult Education, and the National Council of Educational Programs. This was a radical as well as an unprecedented action.

Under normal circumstances, approximately one-third of the advisory council members' terms expire every year.

A new President can replace one-third of the members during his first year in office, one-third during his second year, and so on.

In other words, every President is protected with the opportunity to gradually replace the members of each advisory council. This gradual change makes it possible for members from different administrations to learn from each other's point of view and to learn about the history and previous activities of the council from people who were members during the previous administration. Since these advisory councils have always tended to be nonpartisan, it is not unusual for members to serve several terms under one or more administrations. However, in contrast to every previous President of the United States, Mr. Reagan fired all previously appointed advisory council members and replaced them with 57 new appointees, nearly all of them having Republican credentials and having been either campaign workers or members or staff in conservative groups. In so doing, President Reagan politicized the advisory councils more than ever before, prevented the important continuity from one administration to another, and almost guaranteed that a council would represent only one political point of view.

Under the provisions of H.R. 11, future members of the National Advisory Councils on Women Educational Programs and other councils will have to be selected on the basis of their expertise in educational equity. Unfortunately, it is difficult to apply this provision retroactively, since current members could argue that they are now experts, regardless of their actual competence or interest in the discipline. Therefore, my amendment is designed to protect only those advisory council members who are appointed after this act goes into effect. It would not protect previous appointees who were selected as a part of the President Reagan's effort to purge the advisory councils and reshape them in his own image.

Again I want to emphasize that I am not criticizing all of President Reagan's appointees. I would certainly urge that if a new President is elected in November he not replace all advisory council members in the unfair and inappropriate way that President Reagan did. However, I believe that if a new President is elected this year, he should have the opportunity to balance the unprecedented and unfortunate action that President Reagan has taken in his wholesale firing of members of important national advisory councils.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GOODLING. I want to make sure I understand what the gentleman is saying. If I understand the gentleman correctly, he is saying that, for instance, if Mr. Mondale is elected in November, in January he could replace all of those people who are now on advisory councils by naming a new group. If, let us say, 4 years later Mrs. Dole or Vice President BUSH were elected President, she or he could not then fire or eliminate those that he appointed. In other words, they are stuck with all of those from that point on? Am I right in that understanding?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. The gentleman is essentially correct. If the gentleman will let me just perfect his understanding of it——

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. I will tell my friend that if this amendment passes, all members of councils and commissions who are appointed after H.R. 11 is signed into law would be protected and only allowed to be fired for good cause. All members appointed previous to that time would be handled the way we have always handled it in the Federal Government, and that is to allow the President to name his own members. However, the point is that President Reagan is the only one who ever fired all of them and named his own people.

Mr. GOODLING. But suppose Walter Mondale does exactly the same when he would take office, and then 4 years later, as I said, Elizabeth Dole or GEORGE BUSH is going to take office, and the President is not able, apparently, to choose advisory council members. It does not quite sound fair.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. For good cause the President following the next President could replace any member of the advisory council that they wished. There is nothing to indicate in all of history that whoever the next President is will cause a wholesale firing of all of the members of all of the advisory councils. That was only done by this President.

So there is nothing to indicate that that will be done again. However, the gentleman is correct, my amendment would allow it. That is current law. My amendment would allow that. But after the next President makes that choice, we would then apply the current status of this bill, and that is that good cause only could be used for firing advisory council and commission members.

Mr. GOODLING. If the gentleman will yield further, I thought I understood what the gentleman was saying.

But to make sure that I do not get into trouble, I want to say Elizabeth Dole or GEORGE BUSH or JACK KEMP—and I cannot think of who else I might say.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Well, there are a number. Walter Mondale, Mario Cuomo, GERALDINE FERRARO. There are a number of other names.

Mr. GOODLING. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

I apologize for being caught a bit off guard on this. I was not aware that the amendment was coming up. But I must tell you that I thought we had reached an agreement with Mr. SIMON and others in committee when dealing with this issue. We debated it at length at that time, and it was our understanding that with all present advisory council members it would be in effect and that they would stay on and we would move from that point forth.

Let me just read, if I can, from the transcript of the proceedings of the hearing, where I said the following:

"It seems to me that if it is good in the future, that it is good now. In other words, the Reagan appointees ought not be allowed to be removed from office by whoever succeeds Mr. Reagan without cause, either."

At which time Mr. SIMON said:

"I agree. I would like to get into the record and we can maybe have report language that you and I could——"

Then I went on to say:

"You need more than report language. You need the amendment."

So we had agreed on this in committee between Mr. SIMON and myself, and I am a little surprised that we have this amendment in front of us. I guess I would beseech my friend from Montana if he would consider withdrawing the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. If the gentleman will yield, the amendment that Mr. SIMON offered was my amendment offered in my unavoidable absence. And the language that is before us is not the amendment which I would have agreed on had I been offering it, but rather the gentleman requested of Mr. SIMON to agree to amended language which we currently have in the bill, and unfortunately the committee did so.

The situation now is this: After an unprecedented total and complete firing of every member of the advisory council by President Reagan, we have now locked in those people whose credentials primarily are political and say under this act they cannot be fired except for good cause.

I do not know if two wrongs make a right, but I do think we have to get back to nonpartisanship on these councils.

Mr. GUNDERSON. I agree totally with the gentleman. But that is my concern. If it is wrong—and that is a judgmental question as to whether it is wrong for Reagan to make the decisions he did. But I do not think it is right to say that whoever is elected on November 6 has the right to come in and remove everybody without good cause but then after that we are going to impose a new criteria which says only removal under good cause will be allowed. It just seems to me we ought to establish the proper policy for removal of council members from this day forward, and that is what I thought the gentleman from Illinois and I had agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana) there were—ayes 19, noes 21.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote, and pending that, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair will count; 44 Members are present, not a quorum.

Pursuant to the provisions of clause 2, rule XXIII, the Chair announces that he will reduce to a minimum of 5 minutes the period of time within which a vote by electronic device, if ordered, will be taken on the pending question following the quorum call. Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

The following Members responded to their names:

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore; 396 Members have answered to their names, a quorum is present, and the Committee will resume its business.

The pending business is the demand of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS] for a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, may I request the yeas and nays on that last vote?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. A recorded vote had been requested and refused.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. May I ask for the yeas and nays?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Not at this time.

The Chair will tell the gentleman from Montana that that would not be permitted in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, a further parliamentary inquiry; may I ask for a division?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. There has already been one.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. I understand that. My question is, May I ask for another?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. I thank the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there any further amendments?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GOODLING

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOODLING: Add at the end of the bill the following new title:

TITLE IX—ADDITIONAL LIMITATIONS ON APPROPRIATIONS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1985

AUTHORIZATION AMOUNTS

SEC. 901. (a) Notwithstanding any provision of this Act (including any amendment made by this Act), or any provision of law amended by this Act, no funds are authorized to be appropriated in excess of the limitations imposed upon appropriations by the provisions of subsection (b) of this section.

(b) The total amount of appropriations for fiscal year 1985 shall not exceed—

(1) $103,500,000 to carry out the Adult Education Act (20 U.S.C. 1201 et seq.);

(2) $144,000,000 to carry out the Bilingual Education Act (20 U.S.C. 3221 et seq.);

(3) $605,500,000 to carry out the Act of September 30, 1950 (Public Law 874, Eighty-first Congress) and the Act of September 23, 1950 (Public Law 815, Eighty-first Congress);

(4) $6,000,000 to carry out the Women's Educational Equity Act of 1978 (20 U.S.C. 3341 et seq.);

(5) $71,200,000 to carry out the Indian Education Act (20 U.S.C. 3385 et seq.);

(6) no funds to carry out the Asbestos School Hazard Detection and Control Act of 1980 (20 U.S.C. 3601 et seq.) if funds are appropriated for such fiscal year to carry out the Asbestos School Hazard Abatement Act of 1984;

(7) $32,000,000 to carry out the Emergency Immigrant Education Act of 1984 (as created by title VII of this Act);

(8) $9,000,000 to carry out section 406 of the General Education Provisions Act (20 U.S.C. 1221-1); and

(9) $3,000,000 to carry out sections 1524 and 1525 of the Education Amendments of 1978.

Mr. GOODLING (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist on his 5 minutes?

Mr. GOODLING. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I insist on my 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor. He would have to yield for that purpose.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, if I may make a parliamentary inquiry, has the amendment been read?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The amendment has been read, and a request to dispense with further reading has been approved.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, can I offer a substitute at that point?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Not unless the gentleman's 5 minutes are up or unless he yields for that purpose.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman does not yield his time.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GOODLING] is recognized for 5 minutes in support of his amendment.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, it is amazing that for 6 months I have been trying to say that unless we have some fiscal responsibility in this bill, we cannot expect to have bipartisan support and now all of a sudden there seems to be a surprise that I would ask for a recorded vote to bring H.R. 11 not below present expenditures, only down to what the Democrat budget, which I voted for and which was approved in the House; it would still be a $33 million increase over current spending. All I am asking is that we bring this bill, H.R. 11, down to the budget figure as was presented by the Democrat majority and which was adopted in the House and which I supported.

When the bill came to the floor, we were 300 percent above that budget—300 percent.

After the Kildee amendment, we got down to 41 percent above that budget.

My amendment would bring H.R. 11 into line with the House-passed budget.

Let me again say, I would call my amendment the Mondale-Goodling amendment. I take the liberty of using his name, even though he is not here. I say that simply because he said at the San Francisco convention and we say on both sides of the aisle 100 times a day that we have to do something about the deficit. We have to be fiscally responsible. He said that: "We must cut spending and pay as we go. That is my message to the Congress. If you don't hold the line, I will. That is what the veto is for."

President Reagan could not have said it any better and that is all I am saying today.

The Democrat budget says that we should spend for these areas that we are discussing today in H.R. 11, $33.6 million more—more than we spent in 1984. All I am asking you to do is stick to the budget which you presented as the majority to this House and I in turn voted for. I do not see how we can be fiscally responsible if we do anything less than that.

Let me tell you what this does. It gives a $3.5 million increase in adult education.

It gives a $4.6 million increase in bilingual education.

It gives a $20.5 million increase in impact aid.

It gives a $0.2 million increase in WEEA.

It gives a $2.4 million increase in Indian education.

It gives a $2 million increase in immigrant education.

It gives a $0.3 million increase in NCES and it gives you a $0.1 million increase for the Virgin Islands and territories; a $33.6 million increase over the spending of last year or the year 1984.

Again, I am not asking to cut money from education programs. I am asking this House to stick strictly to the budget that it passed. To do anything less, as I indicated, would certainly be fiscally irresponsible.

So I would hope that my amendment would prevail, because the amendment that will be offered will take us considerably over the Democrat budget. It will take us $33.6 over the Democrat-presented budget which was adopted by the House of Representatives.

How can we face the public if a couple months after we pass a budget in this House we turn right around and spend 26 percent more than we asked us to vote for as a budget.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODLING. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. Mr. Chairman, I would just like for the gentleman, if he would, to restate, because it got lost in all those numbers, the amount of dollars that would be spent over the House-passed budget resolution; referred to by the gentleman as the Democrat budget resolution.

□ 1550

Mr. GOODLING. The House-passed budget of $974.2 million, as you cost it out for these purposes, when H.R. 11 came to the floor it was $2,699 million. We cut $1 billion with the Kildee amendment. So you are now talking about an increase over the budget by 41.1 percent.

The compromise is an increase, the compromise that will be offered, I understand, is an increase of 26.2 percent over the Democrat-passed budget in the House of Representatives.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GOODLING] has expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. GOODLING was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODLING. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to clarify and make sure you repeat what you already said, because I think everyone in this House needs to understand.

Would the gentleman clarify that there is not a budget cut anywhere in your amendment. Your amendment does not cut any services. In fact, it increases. Do you increase every single item without exception? Do you increase every single authorization?

Mr. GOODLING. Without exception, to the tune of $33.6 million. There is an increase by staying with the Democrat budget, passed by the House, there is an increase of $33.6 million for these areas. Nobody gets cut. Everybody gets an increase.

It is a budget that they offered and we accepted in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BARTLETT. So this is not a budget cut at all; this is a restoration of the budget that was adopted by the majority of this House. Some of us thought that was too high but a majority, most on the other side of the aisle, voted for it; is that correct?

Mr. GOODLING. That is correct.

Mr. BARTLETT. The precise figures are not a dollar's difference?

Mr. GOODLING. Not a dollar's difference.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODLING. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MACK. I believe we see here a classic example of the Democrats getting caught in some of their rhetoric expressed the past several weeks. One comment we see is that Mondale, in his address, indicated that: "To Congress my message is we must cut spending and pay as you go. If you don't hold the line, I will. That's what the veto is for."

Then on the other hand we see that part of the Democrat platform indicates: "We called for the immediate restoration of cuts in funding of education programs by the Reagan administration." So what we really see here is an attempt on the one hand in the platform to indicate what the plan is for the future, which is really more spending, spending, spending, which clearly has to be, I guess from their viewpoint, paid for by increased taxes; but on the other hand Mr. Mondale wants to let the people of this country know he is going to be tough and reduce spending. The question is when and where?

I am really interested in seeing how the other side is going to respond when we get a vote on this.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. GOODLING. As I have indicated, there is an increase here for every category. We are not cutting anything.

I also indicated that I hear every day from both sides of the aisle how we have to be fiscally responsible. All I am trying to do is make sure that we can stick with the budget that we passed, which was presented to us by the Democrat majority. And I was one of the Members on this side of the aisle who voted for that particular budget.

Mr. FRENZEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODLING. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I did want an explanation. The amendment you presented to us simply tries to hold this authorization bill to the increases that all of the people who voted for the House budget resolution agreed to?

Mr. GOODLING. That is exactly what I am trying to do.

Mr. FRENZEL. And what is the substitute? A little more than that, I suppose.

Mr. GOODLING. The substitute will be 26.2 percent above the Democrat-offered budget which was adopted in the House of Representatives.

Mr. FRENZEL. If the gentleman will yield further, each time that I have attempted to hold authorizations or appropriations to the level agreed to by this House in its budget, I have been voted down. Our Members will probably find it outrageous that the gentleman would try to hold the House to its budget resolution. Certainly it is some kind of dirty pool.

I hate to associate myself with the gentleman for fear his amendment will suffer the same fate as mine have. But I congratulate you for trying to hold the House to a resolution which was too expensive in the first place.

Mr. GOODLING. I thank the gentleman. Let me again say we work in the Education and Labor Committee in a bipartisan effort. I have tried very hard to do that and have said for the last 6 months that we have a serious problem with this bill, that many Members want to vote for some increased funding for education. But if we do not have a vote for this increased amount that I am talking about of over $30 million, then Members who support education in the context of fiscal responsibility do not have an opportunity to vote for education. The only opportunity they then have is to try to be totally fiscally responsible by voting "no" in order to try and save this Nation because everybody tells us that if we do not do something about the deficit we are in deep, deep trouble.

I am not asking us to do anything drastic. I am only asking us to stick within the budget that was adopted by the Congress, by this House of Representatives as it was presented by the majority party. I happen to be one who supported it.

So, again, I would hope that we would vote to support my reasonable amendment.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FORD OF MICHIGAN AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GOODLING

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a substitute for the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FORD of Michigan as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. GOODLING: Add at the end of the bill the following new title:

TITLE IX—ADDITIONAL LIMITATIONS ON APPROPRIATIONS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1985

AUTHORIZATION AMOUNTS

SEC. 901. (a) Notwithstanding any provision of this Act (including any amendment made by this Act), or any provision of law amended by this Act, no funds are authorized to be appropriated in excess of the limitations imposed upon appropriations by the provisions of subsection (b) of this section.

(b) The total amount of appropriations for fiscal year 1985 shall not exceed—

(1) $140,000,000 to carry out the Adult Education Act (20 U.S.C. 1201 et seq.);

(2) $176,000,000 to carry out the Bilingual Education Act (20 U.S.C. 3221 et seq.);

(3) $780,000,000 to carry out the Act of September 30, 1950 (Public Law 874, Eighty-first Congress) and the Act of September 23, 1950 (Public Law 815, Eighty-first Congress);

(4) $28,000,000 to carry out the Women's Educational Equity Act of 1978 (20 U.S.C. 3341 et seq.);

(5) $70,000,000 to carry out the Emergency Immigrant Education Act of 1984 (as created by title VII of this Act);

(6) $8,000,000 to carry out section 405(k) of the General Education Provisions Act (20 U.S.C. 1221e);

(7) $12,000,000 to carry out section 406 of the General Education Provisions Act (20 U.S.C. 1221-1);

(8) $5,000,000 to carry out sections 1524 and 1525 of the Education Amendments of 1978; and

(9) such sums as may be necessary to carry out the Asbestos School Hazard Detection and Control Act of 1980 (20 U.S.C. 3601 et seq.).

Mr. FORD of Michigan (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the fine performance we have just had, and I am particularly grateful as a staunch and loyal supporter of the nominee of my party to see how closely my colleagues on the other side have been paying attention to his words of wisdom. If you will keep doing that between now and November I know you are going to look into your hearts and your minds and do the right thing, and we will have a new President next year to work with.

But I think we have had enough fun kidding about Presidential candidates. I am afraid that what got lost in this, however, is a misconception about how you relate an authorization bill to the budget.

The budget resolution passed by the House had about $16 billion allocated to the function of education. The Republican Senate passed version had a billion more allocated to education than we did. That resolution is not back from the conference yet and if we are to adopt the Goodling amendment the result would be that we could not take advantage of the Senate figures as reduced to compromise with the House figures on the amount of appropriations that those figures would contemplate.

Second, keep this in mind: We are not appropriating $1 here. We are authorizing the appropriating committees of the House and Senate to appropriate. Not very many times, except in entitlement programs, have I seen either the House or the Senate committee appropriate every dime that this or any other committee has had in an authorization bill.

There are people who started their career with something called Gramm-Latta where we legislated, authorized, and appropriated all in one fell swoop, and somehow got the impression that is what we are doing all of the time around here. Now we are back to the old-fashioned system of having the authorizing committees authorize programs.

As I said, there is about $16 billion in the House passed budget and in all fairness, although it has been referred to as a Democratic budget, I think that those courageous, progressive Republicans who voted for it should have full credit for it.

Mr. GOODLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GOODLING. I was one of those that voted for it. But what I am objecting to is your use of the term "Democratic Congress," you are Democrats, you are not democratic, which is being shown today, because we agreed that I would offer this amendment and I would get a vote on it before you offered the compromise. We agreed in committee that as a matter of fact that the committee would accept the Simon-Gunderson compromise on advisory councils. That agreement has been breeched.

So I just do not want you to say "democratic" because the word is "Democrat and Republican."

□ 1600

Mr. FORD of Michigan. I thank the gentleman for his view of that subject, but I would observe to you that in the finest of bipartisan spirit I am asking you to give, BILL, and come with your Republican-dominated Senate unless you want to repudiate that other body.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Sure. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have listened to the gentleman's substitute and his explanation and I do have a question: I think the gentleman ought to explain to the House what is the rationale for these figures? As I see it, it is a 26.2-percent increase total; 26.2 percent increase over the budget that this House adopted.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. No, it is not. I refuse to have you continuously misstate it. We are only dealing in this bill with a little over $1 billion of a $16 billion item.

The budget resolution does not tell us where to spend the $16 billion; it says we have got $16 billion. Our committee is recommending that we increase impact aid to make up for some of the loss they have had in recent years; that we increase adult education; and this is only a little piece of it.

You cannot take $1 billion and say that you are warping a $16 billion budget or you are going over $16, we still got $15 billion to go.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FORD of Michigan was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. FORD of Michigan. What the gentleman is referring to, when you talk about overbudget, is the pieces that are in a document put together by the budget office to figure a gross number. That was not adopted in the House.

We do not have a specific dictate about programs A, B, C, and D to allocate that money and the House is now being asked by the presently pending Goodling amendment for which I want a substitute, to freeze us by what he calls an increase.

It means you can do nothing for impact aid to help them get back part of what they lost; you can do nothing for the new emphasis that both the administration and the Congress is putting on adult education. You cannot do those things.

And while it is fair to say that he contemplates a 3.5-percent across-the-board increase, the fact that having said that, what you said is that we contemplate no more than a 3.5-percent increase in any one of the component parts of the entire education budget.

If this House acts to authorize $3 billion, it will not change that number, by doing that in this bill, because the magic number is comparing the final appropriations in gross for all of the education funds, with the figure that finally comes back from conference between the House and the Senate in the budget resolution.

So it is all right to compare assumptions, but do not tell the people across the country you are comparing real numbers; you are only comparing staff assumptions if the staff assumes you did the same thing with every program that you did last year and what we are trying here to do is something different than we did last year.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Sure; I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am not trying to tell the people across the country anything. I am asking the gentleman to tell the people in this House if we did not adopt this budget resolution on April 5, 1984.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. I just answered the gentleman's question by telling him that he is trying to create the impression that this action of authorization somehow busts the budget. It does not, I can assure the gentleman.

And when I have more than 5 minutes, I will be pleased to try to explain the budget process to him in a way that would make it clear that passing this authorization bill has no immediate impact on the budget allocations.

That happens when you finally go to the Appropriations Committees of the two Houses and see how much they are willing to spend. Authorizations do not spend a nickel. They sound good; go home and tell everybody you voted for the authorization. "Look what I did for education." We want to see what the vote is when it comes to spending; this is not the spending bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then why is the gentleman offering his amendment? If the authorization levels do not mean anything, why would not we increase it by 126 percent or 1,026 percent or 126 million percent if they are meaningless?

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Because it would be subject to the same kind of strained construction that the gentleman is putting on the increases already in there. If I could take a moment, the gentleman asked what the rationale was; very simple. We took the same figures that the gentleman is drawing his assumptions from; looked at the Senate figures, figured out where we would have to be to get some kind of recognition of the compromise that will come back from the budget conference. It comes out by splitting the gross dollars, not individual programs, 50 percent or half-and-half between what was in the bill when it came to the floor and what was in the House-passed budget resolution, which is lower than the Senate-passed resolution.

So that this substitute becomes a cut from the proposal that is in the bill of 50 percent of any increase by the gentleman's form of calculation.

What the gentleman from Pennsylvania wants is a cut of 96.5 percent. I want to cut 50 percent; he wants to cut 96.5 percent. How do you like those numbers?

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. GUNDERSON. I would like to go back to one of the gentleman's earlier statements. He said we do not want to operate under the assumptions that the staff has made which we will continue all programs.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. No; if I might, we all operate with the assumptions but we ought to recognize what they are; they are staff assumptions that the "Congress is going to do the following."

When you are legislating out here you are turning everybody's assumptions into reality and this becomes a law and the staff assumption are a handy way to get an idea where you are going, but they do not control what we do by working the will of the House.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] has expired.

(On request of Mr. GUNDERSON and by unanimous consent, Mr. FORD of Michigan was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GUNDERSON. The gentleman will admit that what we are doing here today then is we are making some changes in those assumptions.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. We are allocating resources on the basis of our idea where the priorities ought to be.

Mr. GUNDERSON. OK; but if we are doing that, then you have to make a similar assumption that we are making cuts in some other programs.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Not necessarily; we do not know how much of this money is going to be appropriated. The Appropriations Committee might fully fund other education programs and underfund these in terms of the authorization. They are the final arbiters of how you match the budget.

When you want to make the budget argument is when the appropriations bill comes back here and you have real numbers to look at. Nobody knows. I have seen us go through periods where less than 50 percent of our authorization is ever appropriated in 1 year and that is Republican and Democratic administrations alike.

Mr. GUNDERSON. To go back to the question the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTLETT] asked earlier, if authorization levels do not matter.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Authorization levels do matter because the Appropriations Committee has to consider them a ceiling.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I have been disappointed many times in my life in the 10 years I have been here, but I have never been as disappointed as I am today. I have just seen what bipartisanship means; bipartisanship apparently means that it is only bipartisan if, as a matter of fact, 2 days later after an agreement or 2 weeks later after agreement or something of that nature, it suits the other side.

If it does not, then of course it is not bipartisan support.

The other side knows very well that they are presenting a substitute that I was going to present if, as a matter of fact, after I had a vote which they knew I was going to call for, if that would happen to be defeated. At least the Members would have had an opportunity to vote on this issue.

The gentleman just said that my cut would be a 96-percent cut. I do not know; 96-percent cut of what? Mine would be a 3.5-percent increase, as a matter of fact, or $33.6 million above the current level of spending.

As I indicated before, they came with a program, which we tried to talk about in a bipartisan manner for a long time, that would be 300 percent above the budget. I suggested that we go with the budget, because that is going to give the education community an increase.

But the disappointing thing comes when in committee we have an apparent agreement and then that agreement evaporates when we reach a complex stage in the amendment process.

That is very disappointing because we had worked very closely together.

But for many days the other side has been well aware of the fact that I would offer the amendment to bring the expenditures for H.R. 11, the authorization, down to the budget as it was passed here in the House of Representatives.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODLING. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I am saddened with the juxtaposition of the gentleman's words with the fact that I have just made my presentation because I feel perfectly confident that every accommodation that the gentleman has made for me and I have made for the gentleman in consideration of this legislation has been lived up to by both sides.

I wonder if the gentleman would make it clear that while he might be upset with understandings other Members had with other Members that this is not a reflection on the gentleman from Michigan in terms of my willingness to keep what we had come to as agreements?

PERFECTING AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GOODLING TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FORD OF MICHIGAN AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GOODLING

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] as a substitute for my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Perfecting amendment offered by Mr. GOODLING to the amendment offered by Mr. FORD of Michigan as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. GOODLING: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted insert the following:

TITLE IX—ADDITIONAL LIMITATIONS ON APPROPRIATIONS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1985

AUTHORIZATION AMOUNTS

SEC. 901. (a) Notwithstanding any provision of this Act (including any amendment made by this Act), or any provision of law amended by this Act, no funds are authorized to be appropriated in excess of the limitations imposed upon appropriations by the provisions of subsection (b) of this section.

(b) The total amount of appropriations for fiscal year 1985 shall not exceed—

(1) $103,500,000 to carry out the Adult Education Act (20 U.S.C. 1201 et seq.);

(2) $144,000,000 to carry out the Bilingual Education Act (20 U.S.C. 3221 et seq.);

(3) $605,500,000 to carry out the Act of September 30, 1950 (Public Law 874, Eighty-first Congress) and the Act of September 23, 1950 (Public Law 815, Eighty-first Congress);

(4) $6,000,000 to carry out the Women's Educational Equity Act of 1978 (20 U.S.C. 3341 et seq.);

(5) $71,200,000 to carry out the Indian Education Act (20 U.S.C. 3385 et seq.);

(6) no funds to carry out the Asbestos School Hazard Detection and Control Act of 1980 (20 U.S.C. 3601 et seq.) if funds are appropriated for such fiscal year to carry out the Asbestos School Hazard Abatement Act of 1984;

(7) $32,000,000 to carry out the Emergency Immigrant Education Act of 1984 (as created by title VII of this Act);

(8) $9,000,000 to carry out section 406 of the General Education Provisions Act (20 U.S.C. 1221-1); and

(9) $3,000,000 to carry out sections 1524 and 1525 of the Education Amendments of 1978.

Mr. GOODLING (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, I am now asking that we have a vote that will give the Members of the House of Representatives an opportunity to vote for a $33.6 million increase in the spending for the programs in H.R. 11 and which is in line with the budget that the majority in this House presented to us.

I would ask for a vote at this time.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I am especially proud of my colleague from Pennsylvania for offering his amendment to the substitute as a way to give this House the opportunity to cast a vote today to impose and actually authorize the budget figures that this House authorized and put into the budget some time ago.

I would take some care to address those Members of the House who on April 5, 1984, in fact voted for the budget that is being presented. I would note that the Goodling amendment does no more and no less than to give this House a chance to vote for the budget for these educational items that was adopted on April 5, 1984.

Mr. Chairman, I was one of those who believed that even that budgeted amount was too much, was more than the country could afford, even though these are terribly benevolent programs, it was more than the country could afford.

But I was outvoted by a vote of 250 to 168. And, in fact, the House adopted the budget figures that the gentleman is offering as authorization figures.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I have a parliamentary inquiry to make at this point.

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the perfecting amendment was not read, I am wondering if it happens to be an amendment in the third degree.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair would advise the gentleman that this amendment was offered as an amendment to the substitute and not referred as a substitute which would be in the third degree.

Mr. PERKINS. Drafted to the substitute that is being offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD]?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair would advise the gentleman that that is correct.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the perfecting amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GOODLING] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GOODLING].

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the Chair noticed that no Member on this side has spoken on the amendment yet.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair would advise the gentleman that no one has asked for recognition.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I am seeking recognition.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in support of the substitute.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that this situation has developed. I think everybody knows that the imprint of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GOODLING] is on every page of H.R. 11.

True enough that I thought we had worked out an agreement. The first time that I can remember there was any disagreement was an hour or so ago he mentioned the fact that he would like to have a vote first and then come back to the agreed figure here which is an amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD].

But I told the gentleman we Democrats do not want to appear to be the big spenders anywhere along the line. We are just as cooperative as we can be.

But I do want to state that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has worked hard and diligently to keep a lower figure all the way through these committee hearings and during all the markups and I see no necessity here today why any of us should not abide by what I felt that we had mutually agreed to.

On adult education in fiscal year 1984 we appropriated $100 million. For fiscal 1985, the first budget resolution, as passed by the House, has $103.5 million in here. In H.R. 11, we only went up to $106 million and serving about 25 percent of the needs of the Nation on adult education.

Now on bilingual, for fiscal year 1984, we appropriated $139.4 million. In the budget resolution for fiscal year 1985, we have $144 million. In H.R. 11, $144 million. And we are serving about 35 to 40 percent of the bilingual youngsters throughout the country.

And we go on and on. We are not throwing away any money here.

Last year the appropriations for all of these programs in H.R. 11, and there are 11 of them, was $940 million. In H.R. 11 we have authorized $1.6 billion for the programs.

Let me state that the Members will hear me discuss that $1.6 billion in a minute, but that is well within the Senate budget resolution.

These are authorization figures. There is no money being appropriated here. And I feel that we have all been reasonable. H.R. 11, even though we authorized $1.6 billion for the programs, if I understand Mr. GOODLING now, he wants to reduce the figure to $976 million. That is about $35 million more than was appropriated in fiscal year 1984 for all of the programs.

I think we all know that since we are starving so many youngsters for assistance throughout the country we need these funds. Another big item here is impact aid, the biggest item. Last year we appropriated $585. And in our first budget resolution it was $605.5. But in our H.R. 11, we put $953 million in it. And that is the biggest item that we have here.

Now, Mr. FORD wants to reduce H.R. 11's authorization amounts to $1.32 billion. That is the difference between $940.6 million that was appropriated last year.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PERKINS] has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. PERKINS was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. PERKINS. And Mr. FORD's substitute, as I stated, wants to reduce the $1.6 billion to $1.32 billion. By doing that, we are going halfway between the amounts in our original bill of $1.6 billion and the Goodling amendment. The Ford amounts will mean that we will still shortchange education by over $300 million that they would need just to keep even with inflation which has occurred since 1980.

I might point out that we thought we had Mr. GOODLING's agreement to this compromise because we were going halfway.

Now, let me say one other thing. We have to go to the higher figures in the Ford substitute. We have to go to the higher figures in the Ford substitute in order to give us the flexibility to appropriate the higher amounts for education which have been permitted by the Senate budget resolution. The Republican Senate gave education about $1 billion more for education than the House budget resolution. The Republican Senate, $1 billion more.

And if we adopt the Goodling amendment, we will not be able to secure the appropriations for education that the Republicans in the Senate want us to have. And I would hope that my good friend and distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. GOODLING] could go along with what I thought was a compromise that had already been worked out and agreed to.

And let me say again that he has done so much work, under difficult circumstances at times, did his best to cut back most every program that is mentioned here today. And I feel that it would be in the interest of all of the membership of the entire House of Representatives to stick by the Ford substitute. We wanted to be able to take advantage of the Senate figures. That is the reason why I am calling upon all of our friends of education on both sides of the aisle and all the Members to vote for the Ford substitute.

Now, no one can feel badly, especially Mr. GOODLING, as hard as he has worked. He has more than done his part, and I think every Member on the Republican side should appreciate his good work. But there is no reason in the world to give anybody a preferential vote and then come back to a substitute that we have agreed to. I would like to see us adopt the Ford substitute and everybody live by the agreement, or what I thought was the agreement. It is much better for education, it is much better for impact aid people, bilingual people, adult education, and these immigrant education children, and it would just be my hope that we do not let anything take us off of the track here and that we support the Ford substitute, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the perfecting amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GOODLING] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GOODLING].

The question was taken; and the Chairman pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote, and pending that, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 2, rule XXIII, the Chair announces that he will reduce to a minimum of 5 minutes the time within which a vote by electronic device, if ordered, will be taken on the pending question following the quorum call. Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

The following Members responded to their names:

Messrs. SABO, LIPINSKI, and WISE changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

So the perfecting amendment to the amendment offered as a substitute for the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GOODLING].

The question was taken; and the Chairman pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

So the amendment offered as a substitute for the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Chairman, I support this legislation. I thank the chairman and members of the committee for their cooperation with me on items included in this legislation. This, Mr. Chairman, is an investment in the future of our country. I know that we have large sums of money involved, but there is no question of the need, nor the effectiveness of the programs contained in this legislation, not that they cannot be improved on down the line, this should be an ongoing process. There are areas of great need, and this legislation address them. I speak for example of title VII—Emergency Immigrant Education Assistance of which I was the original author several years ago and I commend my colleagues who have supported me on this issue. I pay special tribute, next to the members of the Education and Labor Committee to my dear friend and colleague, the majority leader, Jim Wright for his invaluable aid in behalf of this legislation and his tireless effort throughout the time we have worked on it. I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that the educators and school administrators who will deal with this legislation will, as they have all assured me, to the best of their ability to do so, exercise extreme care and diligence to see that any funds appropriated will be wisely used for the full intent and purpose of the legislation. I would also like, Mr. Chairman, to commend the Secretary of Education for his effort to carry out the intent of Congress in this endeavor.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, I was on my feet at the time the Chair announced the vote, and I ask for a recorded vote. I was on my feet at the time that the vote was taken.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair is sorry. Half of the Members in the Chamber are on their feet. It is now too late. The Chair is sorry that the Chair did not hear the gentleman ask for recognation.

The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GOODLING], as amended by the Ford substitute.

The question was taken; and the Chairman pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. A recorded vote has been demanded. All those in favor of taking this vote by a recorded vote will rise and remain standing until counted. The gentleman is asking for a recorded vote on the Goodling amendment as amended by the Ford substitute.

Mr. LEVITAS. On the Ford amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. No; that is past. The vote now is on the Goodling amendment, as amended by the Ford substitute amendment.

Mr. LEVITAS. That is correct, Mr. Chairman, and I ask for a recorded vote on the Ford amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. All those wishing to take this vote by a recorded vote will rise and remain standing until counted.

A recorded vote was ordered.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman, would the Chair explain what we are voting on or whose amendment we are voting on?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. We are voting on the Goodling amendment, as substituted for by the Ford substitute.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 397, noes 0, not voting 36, as follows:

So the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WILLIAMS OF MONTANA

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana: Page 93, line 8, after "council" insert the following: "who are appointed after January 21, 1985 and"

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, this is another attempt at an amendment which I offered earlier but which was not passed because of a confusion in securing a recorded vote.

Very briefly, and I do not think this will take long—we can vote it up or down very quickly, hopefully by division—very quickly. This bill uses unique, unprecedented language which denies the next President of the United States the right to appoint his own members to all of the education councils which are included under this bill. That is several councils, including the Vocational Education Council and the important Council on Women's Education Equity.

Under this bill as it is now written the next President of the United States, be it President Reagan or Vice President Mondale, would not be allowed to appoint his own members to this council.

My amendment would allow, if adopted, would allow the next President to have his own choice of people to sit on these councils and I ask for an affirmative "yes" vote.

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The gentleman from Montana is absolutely correct; this is an amendment that we dealt with earlier this afternoon and we defeated. That was only the first time today that we defeated this amendment.

This same amendment, this same issue was considered in the full Education and Labor Committee. And I must tell you that not one but a number of Members of that side of the aisle have come over to me this afternoon and said, "I think it is a cheap shot, what is going on here this afternoon with regards to this amendment."

Let me tell you what is going on this afternoon. When this whole issue was considered in the full Education and Labor Committee Congressman SIMON, the gentleman from Illinois, offered the very amendment which is now before us and he and I got into a colloquy. I said that it seemed to me that we ought to be changing the date of this thing because, really, what the whole intent of this section is trying to accomplish is to say that no member of any educational advisory committee from this day forward, the intent of the section is trying to say that no member of any advisory commission can be removed without good cause after a certain date. I think that is a good policy. No member of an advisory commission appointed by any President ought to be removed without good cause.

What the gentleman from Montana is trying to do is he is trying to say wait a minute, really what we want to do here is we want to let whoever is elected November 6 to make wholesale new appointments on January 21. But then, after that, it can only be done with good cause.

When we considered this issue in the full Education and Labor Committee the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SIMON] and I went into a colloquy on this question. The gentleman from Illinois agreed with me that what is good for the future is good now. And it was agreed upon by everybody in the committee.

As a matter of fact, it was the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PERKINS], who brought up the specific language which is now in this bill and was adopted. Now, for some reason the gentleman from Montana has suggested that we ought to go back on that bipartisan agreement that was achieved in the full committee on this issue.

Mr. WEAVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUNDERSON. I am happy to yield.

Mr. WEAVER. I asked you to yield and I appreciate your yielding to ask a question. It is my understanding, but I do not know for sure, that President Reagan, when he first came into office, fired everybody and did exactly what this amendment does.

Mr. GUNDERSON. That is not true at all.

Mr. WEAVER. It is not? It is not?

Mr. GUNDERSON. It is not true.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUNDERSON. I am happy to yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. When President Reagan assumed office he took the unprecedented action for the first time in the history of any President in the history of the United States of firing every single member of every council and on every commission that comes under this act. He fired them.

Mr. GUNDERSON. That is not true. That is not true at all. I would reclaim my time, because the gentleman knows that is not true.

You may have disputes over one particular commission. But what our job here is not to be a body that governs by people. We are supposed to govern by laws, and what we are trying to put into this reauthorization is that people are only removed, whether it be Reagan, Mondale, Ferraro, or somebody else, only removed by good cause. That is what we have in this bill.

If it is good for January 21 it is good for July 26, 1983.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

I just would like to ask the author of the amendment what was the legislation in 1976 and 1980 as such?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUCKABY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Is the gentleman asking what is the current law?

Mr. HUCKABY. No; I am asking what are the prior precedents? When President Carter came in what was he allowed to appoint? Could he appoint entire new boards? When President Reagan came in was he allowed to appoint entire new boards?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Yes; I would say to the gentleman yes. The current law, which this bill seeks to amend, allows the President to appoint his own people en mass if he wishes to these councils and commissions.

□ 1720

This bill would change that, saying that a President cannot so get rid of people except under a showing of good cause. The problem is that President Reagan came in and for the first time in history, fired everyone. And the people, by the way, that he appointed are people who have political credentials but not education credentials.

Mr. HUCKABY. I thank the gentleman.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ERLENBORN AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WILLIAMS OF MONTANA

Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a substitute for the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ERLENBORN as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana: Page 93, line 4, strike out lines 4 through 13.

Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Chairman, I think the debate that we have had today and the confusion points up the fact that we probably ought not change the law in this area at all. The practice and the law in the past has been that when a President wins an election, he then has the mandate to put his policies into effect.

That means changes, that means Cabinet officers change; the ones that were in could go out, sub-Cabinet officers change; the ones that are in go out, new ones come in and the President has in place the team to put in effect the policies of that administration.

What the bill is trying to do, and all of this debate about when its effective date should be established; what the bill is trying to do is to say that Presidents will be stuck with advisory committees that reflect past administrations, rather than the administration that has just won the mandate of the people.

This amendment would strike this section from the bill, leave the law as it is today, and I hope that you would adopt the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ERLENBORN. I would be happy to yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. The gentleman's amendment achieves the same thing that we are attempting to achieve through our amendment, and that is to allow the next President to appoint his own people.

The thing that the gentleman's amendment does not do is continue the language that says from that date forward, any President in the future should have to show good cause before they come in on a "Bloody Tuesday" and wipe everyone away.

However, for the expedience of time, I would be willing to accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. ERLENBORN. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ERLENBORN] as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The amendment offered as a substitute for the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. WILLIAMS], as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, I rise as a member of the Education and Labor Committee to join with my colleagues here in expressing my support for the pending legislation, H.R. 11.

Adoption of this bill is necessary if we are to reauthorize some of our most important education programs through 1989. These programs include bilingual education, adult education, impact aid, emergency refugee education aid, and the Women's Educational Equity Act.

Yesterday, this House took a bold step in approving legislation that will provide $425 million in new funds to improve math and science instruction in our Nation's schools and colleges of education. That, however, must be viewed as a first step.

This bill, H.R. 11, is the second step. We cannot provide support to math and science training and education programs without also recognizing the need to continue our support of other—equally as important—education programs that are contained in this bill. To do so would be to mortgage the needs of the present for those of the future. I, for one, do not believe that we can accept such a tradeoff of educational priorities and as such, believe H.R. 11 responds to a host of needs that must be addressed in this Congress.

Specifically, this bill provides $1.36 billion for 11 education programs in fiscal year 1985 which increases to a total of $3.04 billion in fiscal year 1989. Of these programs, the bilingual education programs under title VII of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act have been revised significantly and are contained in title II of H.R. 11.

Under amendments adopted in full committee to the bilingual education program, H.R. 11 permits Federal funds to be used to support methods of instruction that do not involve instruction in the student's native language. I am pleased that this provision has been added for I believe that it will permit the necessary flexibility in these programs to assure that the goal of these programs is retained: that students learn English as quickly as possible.

The need for this program has been well-documented through a number of hearings which our committee has conducted prior to consideration of this bill. Although the number of children estimated to need these services ranges between 934,000 and 3.6 million, by all accounts, this population can be expected to expand. According to the National Center for Education Statistics, the number of limited English-speaking students age 5 to 14 will increase by 400,000 in this decade and by another 600,000 in the 1990's. Clearly, in light of these projections, we are compelled to act swiftly to assure the educational futures of these children.

Sixty percent of the funds in this program are provided to local school districts to conduct seven types of bilingual programs. Of this 60 percent, 75 percent is reserved for traditional dual language instruction and 4 percent of the total appropriation of the program is provided for alternative methods of instruction, such as English as a second language [ESL] or structured immersion. In addition to these approaches, H.R. 11 also permits Federal funding of the following types of programs: developmental, academic excellence, family literacy, special population, and instructional materials.

While I am pleased that we have provided for increased flexibility in this program, I believe, quite frankly, this flexibility does not go far enough. I remain deeply concerned over continued rigidity in instructional methods when there have been clear alternatives to traditional instructional methods that have proven to be equally as effective. I believe that we are denying a number of worthwhile programs adequate funding by limiting the amount of alternatives under this bill and I intend to monitor the implementation of these programs in anticipation of expanding flexibility further during the next reauthorization of this program.

My concern over this particular issue stems from my involvement in the 1978 reauthorization of the Bilingual Education Program. During hearings on that legislation, it was revealed that there were major deficiencies in the instruction of English to students under this program. Most noted was the fact that many of the bilingual teachers were not proficient in English. As a result, I authored an amendment which required that all bilingual teachers demonstrate proficiency in English which has addressed some of the problems with this program.

I continue to remain supportive of this program for it has provided important instruction in English to hundreds of thousands of students, who require this assistance in order to enter the mainstream of society.

H.R. 11 also extends Adult Education Programs for 2 years which is a necessary program to assist adults in acquiring basic skills, obtain a high school diploma and receive job training. Under this legislation, we have provided for a 2-year, instead of a 5-year reauthorization, in order to more closely examine alternative programs which best meet the needs of adults.

Such sums are provided for adult education, although I would hope that the current $100 million in funding for fiscal year 1984 would be increased to at least the $122.6 million level of funding in 1980 so that the 2 million adults served by this program could be significantly increased. For the $42 per adult that this program provides, we have offered hope to those adults who otherwise would be closed off from job opportunity and full participation in the workforce without the basic skills that they are provided through the Adult Education Program.

This bill, in title III, extends funding for category B payments under impact aid, which provides funds to schools for children who work or work on Federal property. Under current law, this category expires at the end of this year and it is critical that we extend this program in this legislation. I strongly support this extension for the B payments are vital to my own city of New York which has a significant number of families in federally subsidized housing projects.

The following programs are also extended under H.R. 11: WEEA, Indian Education Programs, the Asbestos School Hazard Detection and Control Act, the Emergency Immigrant Education Program, the National Assessment of Educational Progress, the National Center for Education Statistics, general assistance for the Virgin Islands, and the Territorial Teacher Training Program. All of these programs are important and as such, are extended through fiscal year 1989.

I commend this bill to the attention of my colleagues and urge that they join with us in support of this vital piece of legislation.●

● Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to lend my full support for the passage of H.R. 11, which extends the authorization for 11 important education programs. These programs address areas of special educational need across the United States and I believe we all benefit from providing extra educational assistance to groups who are in a disadvantageous position.

H.R. 11 contains two programs that I find especially important if we are to maintain our country's tradition of educational opportunity and progress. The Women's Educational Equity Act [WEEA] is one of these crucial programs. WEEA is prominent because it is the only Federal grant program that addresses sex equity at every level of education. The Federal Government has a commitment to educational equity for women and girls and the WEEA is an essential part of maintaining that commitment.

The adult education provision is another important program if we are going to win the fight against adult illiteracy. The adult education provision in H.R. 11 attempts to cut current unacceptable levels of adult illiteracy, by providing grants to fund programs which help adults to acquire basic skills, obtain high school diplomas, and receive job training.

The rest of the bill addresses crucial areas of educational need that range from bilingual education to impact aid. I conclude my statement today by saying our country must be committed to providing the next generation of Americans an equal chance at a quality education. A quality education gives our young people a chance to move forward and work toward the goals of peace and prosperity that we all hope for. We must make passage of H.R. 11 a high priority in continuing our educational commitment.●

● Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the bilingual education provisions of H.R. 11, the Education Amendments of 1984. I commend my colleagues on the Education and Labor Committee and especially my distinguished friend from Michigan, Mr. KILDEE, for the wisdom and vision he and they have demonstrated in bringing this legislation to the floor.

As a member of the Education and Labor Committee, I participated in the hearings that preceded the Bilingual Education Act of 1968. During the course of our hearings, it became clear that the record of English language programs for children with limited English proficiency were sadly lacking; those English language programs were an utter failure in addressing dropout rates, which were higher than 80 percent for these children. The frustrating problems encountered by children with limited English proficiency were poignantly illustrated in the moving testimony of our thoughtful colleague, Mr. ROYBAL. He recalled that, as a young boy going to the first grade:

> I spoke nothing but Spanish. I remember how difficult it was to understand my instructor. I was trying to learn arithmetic at the same time that I was trying to learn English and consequently I fell behind until such time as I was able to better understand the English language . . . the absurd thing about the whole situation was that during my first years of school I was prohibited from speaking Spanish on the playground . . .

Based on testimony such as this, Congress recognized the need for an alternative which could overcome the limitations of the traditional all-English approach. Such an alternative was provided for in the Bilingual Education Act of 1968.

The purpose of bilingual education is to enable the student to achieve proficiency in English. The concept of using a child's native language for instruction while English is learned as a second language is based on the need for continued learning as the child makes the transition from his or her native language and culture to English and an American lifestyle.

Although progress has been made through the use of bilingual education programs, less than 10 percent of the estimated 3.6 million targeted children are receiving the bilingual education services they need. While there is clearly a need for continued Federal assistance to help these children succeed in mastering the English language, it is also clear that improvements in bilingual education are essential if these programs are to reflect the latest and most innovative techniques available.

In addition to recognizing that the primary purpose of bilingual education is to teach students English, the legislation revises current law to expand significantly the scope and flexibility of the Bilingual Education Act by:

Allowing the use of Federal funds for alternative instruction, such as English as a second language or structured immersion, which does not involve instruction in the child's native language;

Specifying that 4 percent of the current level of funding plus 50 percent of new funding will be reserved for alternative instruction, up to 10 percent of the total appropriation;

Specifying that research will be done into alternative methods to teach children English, as well as improvements in the structure of traditional bilingual education programs;

Encouraging States and local school districts to develop and implement appropriate instructional programs for students with limited English proficiency; and

Allowing the Secretary of Education to give funding priority to school districts which find it impracticable to implement traditional bilingual education or which already have such programs and want to try new approaches.

I firmly believe this legislation represents a sensible and realistic effort to expand and improve the effectiveness of bilingual education programs. For this reason, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting these needed provisions and to oppose any weakening amendments.●

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 11, the Education Amendments of 1984. The bill reauthorizes 11 education programs that are vital to the Nation's commitment to promoting equity and improving quality in education. H.R. 11 extends 10 programs, including bilingual education, import aid, immigrant education, women's educational equity, asbestos school hazard detection and control, and Indian education. The Adult Education Program would be authorized through fiscal year 1987 and the remaining programs would be reauthorized through fiscal year 1989.

I believe that these education programs could be jeopardized if reauthorization is delayed until 1985. Thus, I firmly urge my colleagues to favorably support H.R. 11.

Mr. Chairman, I would also like to express particular support for the bilingual education program. H.R. 11 authorizes such sums as may be necessary for the bilingual education program for fiscal years 1985 through 1989 and permits Federal funds to be used to support methods that do not involve instruction in the child's native tongue. Mr. Chairman, I believe my colleagues in the Congressional Hispanic Caucus said it best in the letter to the Members:

> Bilingual education is integral to the national priority to provide equal access to education for all. Hispanic students suffer one of the highest dropout rates in the country. This unacceptable situation can be eased by programs which encourage the education and retention of limited-English-proficient children. According to a 1982 study conducted by the National Opinion Research Center, bilingual education programs reduced school dropout rates by fifty percent for Hispanic students. The proven effectiveness of bilingual education in improving retention and competition rates for Hispanic students is a good illustration of the program's capacity to ensure equal access to education.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly urge my colleagues to vote for H.R. 11, the Education Amendments of 1984.●

● Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support H.R. 11, legislation before the House to reauthorize several Federal education programs. This bill delineates the very important role of the Federal Government in education by earmarking funds to school districts throughout the country with special populations of school-age children and adults.

In the district I represent, schoolchildren whose families live or work on U.S. military installations will directly benefit by the impact aid reauthorization included in this legislation. Almost $200,000 in revenues annually unavailable to local schools in California's 38th Congressional District will be used to compensate these students if this bill is passed.

Others, including women, immigrants, and children in urban and rural areas, will benefit by the alternative teaching methods and career opportunities made possible by H.R. 11. Through the interest of the House in developing educational programs which directly benefit our Nation's children, this bipartisan compromise has been made possible.

H.R. 11 strengthens our national education policy by allowing prayer in school. An amendment offered requires that schools receiving Federal assistance must not prohibit students from participating in moments of silence dedicated to private prayer, meditation, or contemplation. Through this amendment, we reaffirm our respect for religious tradition and individual faith important to the moral fibre of our Nation. I urge my colleagues to further enrich the lives of our children by supporting the school private prayer amendment.

Other aspects of this legislation will greatly enhance the ability of our children to meet the challenges of tomorrow. Many of us have firsthand experience essential to crafting improvements in our Federal education programs. We have known the disappointments of an inadequate education system, and we are now taking the initiative toward excellence. This bill brings a better balance in education for our young people, especially for those with limited language proficiency.

Many of our Nation's people have grown up in families and neighborhoods where English was not the predominant language. Their relatives and friends were totally immersed in a society where only English was taught and spoken. As a result, too many have become frustrated and lost in classrooms and workplaces where they were not understood and left behind as underachievers.

Since passage of the 1968 Bilingual Education Act, we have seen that when students are offered an academic curriculum in their native language, they can succeed. In fact, academic achievement in their native language has proven to enhance their ability to speak, read, and understand English. Students in a bilingual setting quickly excel in concept development and reading comprehension. Before long, children who once possessed a low self-image, become proud achievers.

H.R. 11 is a compromise forged out among leaders with very different views on teaching methods. It accepts the best of each of these methods by encouraging alternative instruction, traditional structured immersion, and research so important to the further development of academic skills.

I urge all of our House colleagues to support H.R. 11 on behalf of the many eager students who so desperately need our help.●

● Mr. SUNDQUIST. Mr. Chairman, reluctantly, I rise in opposition to H.R. 11, even though I strongly support the provisions contained in the bill pertaining to asbestos school detection and control as well as impact aid. I think it is outrageous, however, that we are being faced with one vote on a complicated and comprehensive piece of legislation such as this.

I am further upset that we are passing a bill where none of the provisions contained in it, except impact aid, need authorization at this particular time.

My concerns also stem from the level of funding within the bill. In a time when the budget deficit is a focal point of our concern in this body, we come here today to authorize programs that not only have already been authorized, but increase the level by 26 percent or $300 million in the first year over the House's budget resolution.

Although I am a strong supporter of continuing education improvement in this country, and in this my first term, I have a record indicative of that, I refuse to be forced to vote in favor of a bill, in one vote, that contains six major programs. Each program deserves to be considered, debated, and amended separately on its merits and faults and voted on accordingly. For this reason I urge my colleagues to oppose this bill.●

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, there is some concern that the 11 programs reauthorized under this bill should have been considered separately. And I know that there is disagreement over some of the funding levels and the fact that H.R. 11 repeals some of the caps imposed under the 1981 Reconciliation Act. Nonetheless, these important programs—Women's Educational Equity, Bilingual Education, Adult Education, Impact Aid, Indian Education, Asbestos Removal, and others—need to be reauthorized: That is the bottom line. We must get down to business to achieve this important goal.

Mr. Chairman, title IV of this bill reauthorizes the Women's Educational Equity Act Program. WEEA supports national, statewide, and other projects designed to promote equality of education for women through guidance and counseling activities, preservice and in-service teacher training, and educational courses for underemployed and unemployed women. Over its 10-year history, this program has helped to improve opportunities for thousands and thousands of women in this country, and it has become an important cornerstone in our fight to provide an equal chance to all Americans.

I am also pleased to see that the committee has taken steps to improve the integrity of the WEEA Office within the Department, and to increase that Office's reporting activities to the Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I am also pleased to be able to support the provisions of title II of H.R. 11, the Bilingual Education Act. This portion of the bill is the proud product of many hours of careful work and compromise on the part of the Committee on Education and Labor.

H.R. 11 completely rewrites the existing Bilingual Education Act, while recognizing that the primary purpose of bilingual programs is to teach students English.

For the first time, under this legislation, a wide range of instructional approaches will be eligible for funding, including English as a second language [ESL] and structured immersion. While the bill provides for grants for the traditional transitional bilingual education programs where a child is instructed both in English and his native language, it includes new regulations mandating that these programs be designed so that children can meet graduation requirements.

Additionally, H.R. 11 provides for grants for family literacy programs, bilingual preschool, and special education programs. These new approaches, fashioned in a bipartisan manner, will continue to insure a strong, innovative, and effective bilingual education program.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, these programs must be reauthorized this year. Although I have some concern with the funding levels in some sections of this legislation, I believe that Congress must work to ensure a smooth continuation of these programs.●

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there any further amendments?

If not, the question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

□ 1726

Accordingly the Committee rose, and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. FOWLER] having assumed the chair, Mr. KAZEN, Chairman pro tempore of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 11) to extend through fiscal year 1989 the authorization of appropriations for certain education programs, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 550, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute adopted by the Committee of the Whole? If not, the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

MOTION TO RECOMMIT OFFERED BY MR. ERLENBORN

Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. ERLENBORN. I am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ERLENBORN moves to recommit the bill, H.R. 11, to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to recommit.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 307, nays 85, not voting 41, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Jones of Tennessee for, with Mr. Taylor against.

Mrs. Boxer for, with Mr. Rudd against.

Mr. RALPH M. HALL changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

Mr. ZSCHAU changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

So the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. FLIPPO]. Pursuant to the provisions of House Resolution 550, the Committee on Education and Labor is discharged from further consideration of the Senate bill (S. 2496) to amend the Adult Education Act in order to simplify requirements for States and other recipients participating in Federal adult education programs, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. PERKINS

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PERKINS moves to strike out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill, S. 2496, and to insert in lieu thereof the text of the bill, H.R. 11, as passed, as follows:

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Education Amendments of 1984".

TITLE I—ADULT EDUCATION ACT AMENDMENTS

GENERAL EXTENSION OF AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 101. (a) Section 311(b) of the Adult Education Act (20 U.S.C. 1208a(b)) is amended by striking out "October 1, 1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "October 1, 1986".

(b) Section 313(b) of such Act is amended by striking out "October 1, 1984" and inserting in lieu thereof "October 1, 1986".

(c) Section 315(a) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 315. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary for each of the fiscal years 1985 and 1986 to carry out the provisions of this title.".

(d) Section 318(f) of such Act is amended by striking out "four" and inserting in lieu thereof "seven".

TITLE II—REVISION OF THE BILINGUAL EDUCATION ACT

SEC. 201. The Bilingual Education Act (20 U.S.C. 3221 et seq.) is amended to read as follows:

"TITLE VII—BILINGUAL EDUCATION PROGRAMS

"SHORT TITLE

"SEC. 701. This title may be cited as the 'Bilingual Education Act'.

"POLICY; APPROPRIATIONS

"SEC. 702. (a) Recognizing—

"(1) that there are large and growing numbers of children of limited English proficiency;

"(2) that many of such children have a cultural heritage which differs from that of English proficient persons;

"(3) that the Federal Government has a special and continuing obligation to assist in providing equal educational opportunity to limited English proficient children;

"(4) that the Federal Government has a special and continuing obligation to assist language minority students to acquire the English language proficiency that will enable them to become full and productive members of society;

"(5) that a primary means by which a child learns is through the use of such child's native language and cultural heritage;

"(6) that, therefore, large numbers of children of limited English proficiency have educational needs which can be met by the use of bilingual educational methods and techniques;

"(7) that in some school districts, establishment of bilingual education programs may be administratively impractical due to the presence of small numbers of students of a particular native language or because personnel who are qualified to provide bilingual instructional services are unavailable;

"(8) that States and local school districts should be encouraged to determine appropriate curricula for limited English proficient students within their jurisdictions and to develop and implement appropriate instructional programs;

"(9) that children of limited English proficiency have a high dropout rate and low median years of education;

"(10) that the segregation of many groups of limited English proficient students remains a serious problem;

"(11) that both limited English proficient children and children whose primary language is English can benefit from bilingual education programs, and that such programs help develop our national linguistic resources;

"(12) that research, evaluation, and data collection capabilities in the field of bilingual education need to be strengthened so as to better identify and promote those programs and instructional practices which result in effective education;

"(13) that parent and community participation in bilingual education programs contributes to program effectiveness;

"(14) that because of limited English proficiency, many adults are not able to participate fully in national life, and that limited English proficient parents are often not able to participate effectively in their children's education, the Congress declares it to be the policy of the United States, in order to establish equal educational opportunity for all children and to promote educational excellence (A) to encourage the establishment and operation, where appropriate, of educational programs using bilingual educational practices, techniques, and methods, (B) to encourage the establishment of special alternative instructional programs for students of limited English proficiency in school districts where the establishment of bilingual education programs is not practicable or for other appropriate reasons, and (C) for those purposes, to provide financial assistance to local educational agencies, and, for certain related purposes, to State educational agencies, institutions of higher education, and community organizations. The programs assisted under this title include programs in elementary and secondary schools as well as related preschool and adult programs which are designed to meet the educational needs of individuals of limited English proficiency, with particular attention to children having the greatest need for such programs. Such programs shall be designed to enable students to achieve full competence in English. Such programs may additionally provide for the development of student competence in a second language.

"(b)(1) For the purposes of carrying out the provisions of this title, there are authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1985 and each of the four succeeding years such sums as may be necessary.

"(2) There are further authorized to be appropriated to carry out the provisions of section 732, such sums as may be necessary for fiscal year 1985 and each of the four succeeding fiscal years.

"(3) From the sums appropriated under paragraph (1) for any fiscal year which do not exceed $140,000,000, the Secretary shall reserve 4 percent for special alternative instructional programs and related activities authorized under this Act. From the sums appropriated under paragraph (1) for any fiscal year in excess of $140,000,000, the Secretary shall reserve 50 percent for special alternative instructional programs and related activities authorized under this Act, except that the amount of funds reserved for special alternative instructional programs and related activities pursuant to this paragraph shall not exceed 10 percent of the funds appropriated under paragraph (1).

"(4) From the sums appropriated under paragraph (1) for any fiscal year, the Secretary shall reserve at least 60 percent for the programs carried out under part A of this Act; and of this amount, at least 75 percent shall be reserved for the programs of transitional bilingual education carried out under section 721(a)(1).

"(5) From the sums appropriated under paragraph (1) for any fiscal year, the Secretary shall reserve at least 25 percent for training activities carried out under part C.

"(6) The Secretary shall reserve from the amount not reserved pursuant to paragraphs (4) and (5) of this subsection such amount as may be necessary, but not in excess of 1 percent thereof, for the purposes of section 752.

"DEFINITIONS; REGULATIONS

"SEC. 703. (a) The following definitions shall apply to the terms used in this title:

"(1) The term 'limited English proficiency' when used with reference to individuals means—

"(A) individuals who were not born in the United States or whose native language is a language other than English,

"(B) individuals who come from environments where a language other than English is dominant, as further defined by the Secretary by regulation, and

"(C) individuals who are American Indian and Alaskan Natives and who come from environments where a language other than English has had a significant impact on their level of English language proficiency, subject to such regulations as the Secretary determines to be necessary; and who, by reason thereof, have sufficient difficulty speaking, reading, writing, or understanding the English language to deny such individuals the opportunity to learn successfully in classrooms where the language of instruction is English or to participate fully in our society.

"(2) The term 'native language', when used with reference to an individual of limited English proficiency, means the language normally used by such individuals, or in the case of a child, the language normally used by the parents of the child.

"(3) The term 'low-income' when used with respect to a family means an annual income for such a family which does not exceed the poverty level determined pursuant to section 111(c)(2) of title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

"(4)(A) The term 'program of transitional bilingual education' means a program of instruction, designed for children of limited English proficiency in elementary or secondary schools, which provides, with respect to the years of study to which such program is applicable, structured English language instruction, and to the extent necessary to allow a child to achieve competence in the English language, instruction in the child's native language. Such instruction shall incorporate the cultural heritage of such children and of other children in American society. Such instruction shall, to the extent necessary, be in all courses or subjects of study which will allow a child to meet grade-promotion and graduation standards.

"(B) In order to prevent the segregation of children on the basis of national origin in programs of transitional bilingual education, and in order to broaden the understanding of children about languages and cultural heritages other than their own, a program of transitional bilingual education may include the participation of children whose language is English, but in no event shall the percentage of such children exceed 40 percent. The program may provide for centralization of teacher training and curriculum development, but it shall serve such children in the schools which they normally attend.

"(C) In such courses or subjects of study as art, music, and physical education, a program of transitional bilingual education shall make provision for the participation of children of limited English proficiency in regular classes.

"(D) Children enrolled in a program of transitional bilingual education shall, if graded classes are used, be placed, to the extent practicable, in classes with children of approximately the same age and level of educational attainment. If children of significantly varying ages or levels of educational attainment are placed in the same class, the program of transitional bilingual education shall seek to insure that each child is provided with instruction which is appropriate for his level of educational attainment.

"(5)(A) The term 'program of developmental bilingual education' means a full-time program of instruction in elementary and secondary schools which provides, with respect to the years of study to which such program is applicable, structured English-language instruction and instruction in a second language. Such programs shall be designed to help children achieve competence in English and a second language while mastering subject matter skills. Such instruction shall, to the extent necessary, be in all courses or subjects of study which will allow a child to meet grade-promotion and graduation standards.

"(B) Where possible, classes in programs of developmental bilingual education shall be comprised of approximately equal numbers of students whose native language is English and limited English proficient students whose native language is the second language of instruction and study in the program.

"(6) The term 'special alternative instructional programs' mean programs of instruction designed for children of limited English proficiency in elementary and secondary schools. Such programs are not transitional or developmental bilingual education programs, but have specially designed curricula and are appropriate for the particular linguistic and instructional needs of the children enrolled. Such programs shall provide, with respect to the years of study to which such program is applicable, structured English language instruction and special instructional services which will allow a child to achieve competence in the English language and to meet grade-promotion and graduation standards.

"(7) The term 'family English literacy program' means a program of instruction designed to help limited English proficient adults and out-of-school youth achieve competence in the English language. Such programs of instruction may be conducted exclusively in English or in English and the student's native language. Where appropriate, such programs may include instruction on how parents and family members can facilitate the educational achievement of limited English proficient children. To the extent feasible, preference for participation in such programs shall be accorded to the parents and immediate family members of children enrolled in programs assisted under this title.

"(8) The term 'programs of academic excellence' means programs of transitional bilingual education, developmental bilingual education, or special alternative instruction which have an established record of providing effective, academically excellent instruction and which are designed to serve as models of exemplary bilingual education programs and to facilitate the dissemination of effective bilingual educational practices.

"(9) The term 'Office' means the Office of Bilingual Education and Minority Language Affairs.

"(10) The term 'Director' means the Director of the Office of Bilingual Education and Minority Languages Affairs.

"(11) The term 'Council' means the National Advisory and Coordinating Council on Bilingual Education.

"(12) The term 'Secretary' means the Secretary of Education.

"(13) The term 'other programs for persons of limited English proficiency' when used in this title means any programs within the Department of Education directly involving bilingual education activities serving persons of limited English proficiency, such as the programs carried out in coordination with the provisions of this title pursuant to subpart 3 of part B of the Vocational Education Act of 1963, and section 306(a)(11) of the Adult Education Act, and programs and projects serving areas with high concentrations of persons of limited English proficiency pursuant to section 6(b)(4) of the Library Services and Construction Act.

"(b) In prescribing regulations under this title, the Secretary shall, through the National Advisory and Coordinating Council on Bilingual Education, consult with State and local educational agencies, organizations representing persons of limited English proficiency, and organizations representing teachers and other personnel involved in bilingual education.

"(c) Parents of children participating in programs assisted under this title shall be informed of the instructional goals of the program and the progress of their children in such program.

"PART A—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR BILINGUAL EDUCATION PROGRAMS

"BILINGUAL EDUCATION PROGRAMS

"SEC. 721. (a) Funds available for grants under this part shall be used for the establishment, operation, and improvement of—

"(1) programs of transitional bilingual education;

"(2) programs of developmental bilingual education;

"(3) special alternative instructional programs for students of limited English proficiency;

"(4) programs of academic excellence;

"(5) family English literacy programs;

"(6) bilingual preschool, special education, and gifted and talented programs preparatory or supplementary to programs such as those assisted under this Act; and

"(7) programs to develop instructional materials in languages for which such materials are commercially unavailable.

"(b)(1)(A) A grant may be made under subsection (a) (1), (2), (3), or (4) of this section only upon application therefore by one or more local educational agencies or by institutions of higher education, including junior or community colleges, applying jointly with one or more local educational agencies.

"(B) A grant may be made under subsection (a) (5) or (6) only upon application therefore by one or more local educational agencies; institutions of higher education, including junior or community colleges; and private nonprofit organizations, applying separately or jointly.

"(c)(1) Any application for a grant authorized under subsection (a) of this section shall be made to the Secretary at such time, and in such manner, as the Secretary deems appropriate.

"(2) Applications for grants authorized under subsections (a)(1), (a)(2), and (a)(3) of this section, shall contain information regarding—

"(A) the number of children enrolled in programs conducted by the local educational agency;

"(B) the number of children residing in the area served by the local educational agency who are enrolled in private schools;

"(C)(i) the number of children enrolled in public and private schools in the area served by the local educational agency who are limited in their English proficiency; (ii) the method used by the applicant to make this determination; and (iii) evidence of the educational condition of the limited English proficient students, such as reading, mathematics, and subject matter test scores, and, where available, data on grade retention rates, rates of referral to or placement in special education programs, and student dropout rates;

"(D) the number of limited English proficient children who are enrolled in instructional programs specifically designed to meet their educational needs, as well as descriptions of such programs;

"(E) the number of limited English proficient children enrolled in public or private schools in the area served by the local educational agency who need or could benefit from education programs such as those assisted under this title;

"(F) the number of children who are to receive instruction through the proposed program and the extent of their educational needs;

"(G) a statement of the applicant's ability to serve children of limited English proficiency, including an assessment of the qualifications of personnel who will participate in the proposed project and of the need for further training of such personnel;

"(H) the resources needed to develop and operate or improve the proposed program;

"(I) the activities which would be undertaken under the grant and how these activities will improve the educational attainment of students and expand the capacity of the applicant to operate programs such as those assisted under this Act when Federal assistance under this section is no longer available; and

"(J) the specific educational goals of the proposed program and how achievement of these goals will be measured.

"(3) Applications for grants authorized under subsection (a)(3) of this section from applicants who desire to obtain priority in the awarding of such grants may contain information regarding (A) the administrative impracticability of establishing a bilingual education program due to the presence of small number of students of a particular native language, (B) the unavailability of personnel qualified to provide bilingual instructional services, or (C) the applicant's current or past efforts to establish a bilingual education program.

"(4) Applications for grants authorized under subsection (a)(4) shall contain information regarding—

"(A) the number of children served by the existing bilingual education program and evidence of their educational condition prior to enrollment in the program;

"(B) a description of the existing program as well as the educational background and linguistic competencies of program personnel;

"(C) the extent to which the program has promoted student academic achievement as indicated by objective evidence, such as improvements in language, mathematics, and subject matter test scores; grade retention rates; rates of referral to or placement in special education programs; student dropout rates; and, where appropriate, postsecondary education and employment experiences of students;

"(D) the extent of parent involvement in and satisfaction with the existing bilingual education program; and

"(E) how the activities carried out under the grant would utilize and promote programs of academic excellence which employ bilingual educational practices, techniques, and methods.

"(5) Applications for grants authorized under subsection (a)(5) shall contain information regarding—

"(A) the number of limited English proficient parents and out-of-school family members of limited English proficient students who would be served by the English literacy program;

"(B) the activities which would be undertaken under the grant and how these activities will promote English literacy and enable parents and family members to assist in the education of limited English proficient children;

"(C) the extent to which the persons to be served by the program have been involved in its development;

"(D) applicant's prior experience and performance in providing educational programs to limited English proficient adults and out-of-school youth;

"(E) with respect to applications by a local educational agency, the extent to which limited English proficient students enrolled in the educational agency are served by programs specifically designed to meet their needs; and

"(F) with respect to other applicants, a description of how the applicant will coordinate its program with a local education agency to ensure that the program will help limited English proficient family members promote the academic progress of limited English proficient children.

"(d)(1)(A) Grants made pursuant to subsections (a)(1), (a)(2), and (a)(3) of this section shall be for three years.

"(B) During the first six months of grants made pursuant to subsections (a)(1), (a)(2), and (a)(3) of this section, an applicant shall engage exclusively in preservice activities. Such activities may include program design, materials development, staff recruitment and training, development of evaluation mechanisms and procedures, and the operation of programs to involve parents in the educational program and to enable parents and family members to assist in the education of limited English proficient children. This subparagraph may be waived by the Secretary if he determines that an applicant is prepared to successfully operate the proposed instructional program.

"(C) Upon reapplication, grants authorized under subsections (a)(1), (a)(2), and (a)(3) of this section shall be renewed for two additional years unless the Secretary determines that—"(i) the applicant's program does not comply with the requirements set out in this title;

"(ii) the applicant's program has not made substantial progress in achieving the specific educational goals set out in the original application; or

"(iii) there is no longer a need for the applicant's program.

"(D) Parents or legal guardians of students identified for enrollment in bilingual education programs shall be informed of (i) the reasons for the selection of their child as in need of bilingual education, (ii) what alernative educational programs are available, and (iii) the nature of the bilingual education program and of the instructional alternatives. Parents shall also be informed that they have the option of declining enrollment of their children in such programs and shall be given an opportunity to do so if they so choose.

"(2) Grants made pursuant to subsections (a)(4) and (a)(5) shall be for three years.

"(3) Grants made pursuant to subsections (a)(6) and (a)(7) shall be for a period of one to three years.

"(e) An application for a grant authorized under subsections (a)(1), (a)(2), and (a)(3) of this section shall—

"(1) be developed in consultation with an advisory council, of which a majority shall be parents and other representatives of the children to be served in such programs, in accordance with criteria prescribed by the Secretary;

"(2) be accompanied by documentation of such consultation and by the comments which the Council makes on the application;

"(3) contain assurances that, after the application has been approved, the applicant will provide for the continuing consultation with, and participation by, the committee of parents, teachers, and other interested individuals which shall be selected by and predominantly composed of parents of children participating in the program, and in the case of programs carried out in secondary schools, representatives of the secondary students to be served; and

"(4) include evidence that the State educational agency has been notified of the application and has been given the opportunity to offer recommendations thereon to the applicant and to the Secretary.

"(f) An application for a grant under subsections (a)(1), (a)(2), and (a)(3) of this section may be approved only if the Secretary determines—

"(1) that the program will use qualified personnel, including only those personnel who are proficient in the language or languages used for instruction;

"(2) that in designing the program for which application is made, the needs of the children in nonprofit private elementary and secondary schools have been taken into account through consultation with appropriate private school officials; and consistent with the number of such children enrolled in such schools in the area to be served whose educational needs are of the type and whose language and grade levels are of a similar type which the program is intended to address, after consultation with appropriate private school officials, provision has been made for the participation of such children on a basis comparable to that provided for public school children;

"(3) that the program will be evaluated in accordance with a plan that meets the requirements of section 733 of this title;

"(4) that Federal funds made available for the project or activity will be used so as to supplement the level of State and local funds that, in the absence of those Federal funds, would have been expended for special programs for children of limited English proficiency and in no case to supplant such State and local funds, except that nothing in this clause shall—

"(A) preclude a local education agency from using funds under this title for activities carried out under an order of a court of the United States or of any State respecting services to be provided such children, or to carry out a plan approved by the Secretary as adequate under title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 with respect to services to be provided such children, or

"(B) authorize any priority or preference to be assigned by the Secretary to the funding of the activities under this title;

"(5) that the assistance provided under the application will contribute toward building the capacity of the applicant to provide a program, similar to that proposed for assistance, on a regular basis which will be of sufficient size, scope, and quality to promise significant improvement in the education of children of limited English proficiency, and that the applicant will have the resources and commitment to continue the program when assistance under this title is reduced or no longer available;

"(6) that the applicant will provide or secure training for personnel participating, or preparing to participate, in the program and that, to the extent possible, college or university credit will be awarded for such training; and

"(7) that the provision of assistance proposed in the application is consistent with criteria established by the Secretary, after consultation with the State educational agency, for the purpose of achieving an equitable distribution of assistance under this part within the State in which the applicant is located, taking into consideration—

"(A) the geographic distribution of children of limited English proficiency,

"(B) the relative need of persons in different geographic areas within the State for the kinds of services and activities authorized under this title,

"(C) and with respect to grants to carry out programs described in subsections (a)(1), (a)(2), and (a)(3) of this section, the relative ability of particular local educational agencies within the State to provide such services and activities, and

"(D) with respect to such grants, the relative numbers of persons from low-income families sought to be benefited by such programs.

"(g) An application for a grant under subsection (a)(3) of this section may receive priority based upon the information provided by the applicant pursuant to clause (A), (B), or (C) of subsection (c)(3) of this section.

"(h) In the consideration of applications from local educational agencies to carry out programs authorized under this section, the Secretary shall give priority to applications from local educational agencies which are located in various geographical regions of the Nation and which propose to assist children of limited English proficiency who have historically been underserved by programs of bilingual education, taking into consideration the relative numbers of such children in the schools of such local educational agencies and the relative need for such programs. In approving such applications, the Secretary shall, to the extent feasible, allocate funds appropriated in proportion to the geographical distribution of children of limited English proficiency throughout the Nation, with due regard for the relative ability of particular local educational agencies to carry out such programs and the relative numbers of persons from low-income families sought to be benefited by such programs.

"(i) Programs authorized under this title in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico may, notwithstanding any other provision of this title, include programs of instruction, teacher training, curriculum development, research, evaluation and testing designed to improve the English proficiency of children, and may also make provision for serving the needs of students of limited proficiency in Spanish.

"(j) If the Secretary determines that an applicant for assistance under this title is unable or unwilling to provide for the participation in the program for which assistance is sought of children of limited English proficiency enrolled in nonprofit, nonpublic schools, as required by subsection (f)(2) of this section, the Secretary shall—

"(1) withhold approval of such application until the applicant demonstrates that it is in compliance with those requirements; or

"(2) reduce the amount of the grant to such applicant by the amount which is required for the Secretary to arrange (such as through a contract with a nonprofit, nonsectarian agency, organization, or institution) to assess the needs of the children in the area to be served for programs of the type authorized in this title and to carry out such programs for the children.

"INDIAN CHILDREN IN SCHOOLS

"SEC. 722. (a) For the purpose of carrying out programs under this title for individuals served by elementary, secondary, or postsecondary schools operated predominantly for Indian or Alaskan Native children, an Indian tribe or a tribally sanctioned educational authority may be considered to be a local educational agency as such term is used in this title, subject to the following qualifications:

"(1) The term 'Indian tribe' means any Indian tribe, band, nation, or other organized group or community, including any Alaska Native village or regional or village corporation as defined in or established pursuant to the Alaskan Native Claims Settlement Act (85 Stat. 688) which is recognized for the special programs and services provided by the United States to Indians because of their status as Indians.

"(2) The term 'tribally sanctioned educational authority' means any department or division of education operating within the administrative structure of the duly constituted governing body of an Indian tribe, as well as any nonprofit institution or organization which is chartered by the governing body of an Indian tribe to operate any such school or otherwise to oversee delivery of educational services to members of that tribe and which is approved by the Secretary for the purposes of this section.

"(b) From the sums appropriated pursuant to section 702(b), the Secretary is authorized to make payments to the applicants to carry out programs of bilingual education for Indian children on reservations served by elementary and secondary schools operated or funded by the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

"(c) The Assistant Secretary of the Interior for the Bureau of Indian Affairs shall submit to the Congress, the President, and the Secretary by September 30 of each year an annual report which provides—

"(1) an assessment of the needs of the Indian children with respect to the purposes of this title in schools operated or funded by the Department of the Interior, including those tribes and local educational agencies receiving assistance under the Johnson-O'Malley Act (25 U.S.C. 452 et seq.); and

"(2) an assessment of the extent to which such needs are being met by funds provided to such schools for educational purposes through the Secretary of the Interior.

"PART B—DATA COLLECTION, EVALUATION, AND RESEARCH

"USE OF FUNDS

"SEC. 731. Funds available under this part shall be used for (1) collecting data on the number of limited English proficient persons and the educational services available to such persons, (2) evaluating the operation and effectiveness of programs assisted under this title, (3) conducting research to improve the effectiveness of bilingual education programs, and (4) collecting, analyzing, and disseminating data and information on bilingual education.

"GRANTS FOR STATE PROGRAMS

"SEC. 732. (a) Upon an application from a State educational agency, the Secretary shall make provision for the submission and approval of a State program for the collection, aggregation, analysis, and publication of data and information on the State's population of limited English proficient persons and the educational services provided or available to such persons.

"(b) State programs under this part shall provide for the annual submission of a report to the Secretary containing data and information on such matters as the Secretary shall, by regulation, determine necessary and proper to achieve the purposes of this title, including the matters specified in section 721(c)(2). Such reports shall be in such form and shall be submitted on such date as the Secretary shall specify by regulation. State programs shall provide for the dissemination of information regarding these matters to the public, and particularly to persons of limited English proficiency.

"(c) State programs authorized under this section may also provide for—

"(1) the planning and development of educational programs such as those assisted under this title;

"(2) the review and evaluation of programs of bilingual education, including bilingual education programs that are not funded under this title;

"(3) the provision, coordination, or supervision of technical and other forms of nonfinancial assistance to local educational agencies, community organizations, and private elementary and secondary schools that serve limited English proficient persons;

"(4) the development and administration of instruments and procedures for the assessment of the educational needs and competencies of persons of limited English proficiency;

"(5) the training of State and local educational agency staff to carry out the purposes of this title; and

"(6) other activities and services designed to build the capacity of State and local educational agencies to serve the educational needs of persons of limited English proficiency.

"(d) Except as provided in the second sentence of this subparagraph, the Secretary shall pay from the amounts appropriated for the purposes of this section pursuant to section 702(b)(2) for each fiscal year to each State educational agency which has a State program submitted and approved under subsection (a) of this section such sums as may be necessary for the proper and efficient conduct of such State program. The amount paid by the Secretary to any State educational agency under the preceding sentence for any fiscal year shall not be less than $50,000 nor greater than 5 percent of the aggregate of the amounts paid under section 721 for programs within such State in the fiscal year preceding the fiscal year to which this limitation applies.

"(e) Funds made available under this section for any fiscal year shall be used by the State educational agency to supplement and, to the extent practical, to increase the level of funds that would, in the absence of such funds, be made available by the State for the purposes described in this section, and in no case to supplant such funds.

"PROGRAM EVALUATION REQUIREMENTS

"SEC. 733. (a) The Secretary shall issue, within six months of the date of enactment of this section, regulations which set forth a comprehensive design for evaluating the programs assisted under part A of this title. Such regulations shall be developed by the Director in consultation with the National Advisory and Coordinating Council on Bilingual Education. Such regulations shall provide for the collection of information and data including—

"(1) the educational background, needs, and competencies of the limited English proficient persons served by the program;

"(2) the specific educational activities undertaken pursuant to the program; the pedagogical materials, methods, and techniques utilized in the program; and with respect to classroom activities, the relative amount of instructional time spent with students on specified tasks;

"(3) the educational and professional qualifications, including language competencies, of the staff responsible for planning and operating the program; and

"(4) the extent of educational progress achieved through the program measured, as appropriate, by (A) tests of academic achievement in English language arts, and where appropriate, second language arts; (B) tests of academic achievement in subject matter areas; and (C) changes in the rate of student grade-retention, dropout, absenteeism, referral to or placement in special education classes, placement in programs for the gifted and talented, and enrollment in postsecondary education institutions.

"EVALUATION ASSISTANCE CENTERS

"SEC. 734. The Secretary shall establish through competitive grants to institutions of higher education at least two evaluation assistance centers which shall provide, upon the request of State or local educational agencies, technical assistance regarding methods and techniques for identifying the educational needs and competencies of limited English proficient persons and assessing the educational progress achieved through programs such as those assisted under this title. Grants made pursuant to this section shall be for a period of three years.

"RESEARCH

"SEC. 735. (a) The Secretary shall, through competitive contracts under this section, provide financial assistance for research and development proposals submitted by institutions of higher education, private for-profit and nonprofit organizations, State and local educational agencies, and individuals.

"(b) Research activities authorized to be assisted under this section shall include—

"(1) studies to determine and evaluate effective models for bilingual education programs;

"(2) studies which examine the process by which individuals acquire a second language and master the subject matter skills required for grade-promotion and graduation, and which identify effective methods for teaching English and subject matter skills within the context of a bilingual education program or special alternative instructional program to students who have language proficiencies other than English;

"(3) longitudinal studies to measure the effect of this title on the education of students who have language proficiencies other than English, and the effect of this title on the capacity of local educational agencies to operate bilingual programs following the termination of assistance under this title;

"(4) studies to determine effective and reliable methods for identifying students who are entitled to services under this title and for determining when their English language proficiency is sufficiently well developed to permit them to derive optimal benefits from an all-English instructional program;

"(5) the operation of a clearinghouse which shall collect, analyze, and disseminate information about bilingual education and related programs;

"(6) studies to determine effective methods of teaching English to adults who have language proficiencies other than English;

"(7) studies to determine and evaluate effective methods of instruction for bilingual programs, taking into account language and cultural differences among students; and

"(8) studies to determine effective approaches to preservice and inservice training for teachers, taking into account the language and cultural differences of their students.

"(c) In carrying out his responsibilities under this section, the Secretary may delegate his authority to the Director, and in any event, shall consult with the Director, the National Advisory and Coordinating Council on Bilingual Education, representatives of State and local educational agencies, and appropriate groups and organizations involved in bilingual education.

"(d) The Secretary shall publish and disseminate all requests for proposals in research and development assisted under this title.

"COORDINATION OF RESEARCH

"SEC. 736. Notwithstanding section 405(b)(1) of the General Education Provisions Act, the Director of the National Institute of Education shall consult with the Director and the National Advisory and Coordinating Council on Bilingual Education to insure that research activities undertaken pursuant to section 405(b)(2)(C) of the General Education Provisions Act complement and do not duplicate the activities conducted pursuant to this part.

"EDUCATION STATISTICS

"Sec. 737. (a) Notwithstanding section 406 of the General Education Provisions Act, the National Center for Education Statistics shall collect and publish as part of its annual report on the condition of education data for States, Puerto Rico, and the Trust Territories with respect to the population of limited English proficient persons, the special educational services and programs available to limited English proficient persons, and the availability of educational personnel qualified to provide special educational services and programs to limited English proficient persons.

"(b) In carrying out its responsibilities under this section, the National Center for Education Statistics shall utilize, to the extent feasible, data submitted to the Department of Education by State and local educational agencies and institutions of higher education pursuant to the provisions of this title.

"PART C—TRAINING AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

"USE OF FUNDS

"SEC. 741. (a) Funds available under this part shall be used for—

"(1) the establishment, operation, and improvement of training programs for educational personnel preparing to participate in, or personnel participating in, the conduct of programs of bilingual education or special alternative instructional programs for limited English proficient students, which shall emphasize opportunities for career development, advancement, and lateral mobility, and may provide training to teachers, administrators, counselors, paraprofessionals, teacher aides, and parents;

"(2) the training of persons to teach and counsel such persons;

"(3) the encouragement of reform, innovation, and improvement in applicable education curricula in graduate education, in the structure of the academic profession, and in recruitment and retention of higher education and graduate school faculties, as related to bilingual education;

"(4) the operation of short-term training institutes designed to improve the skills of participants in programs of bilingual education or special alternative instructional programs for limited English proficient students; which may include summer programs designed to improve the instructional competence of educational personnel in the languages used in the program; and

"(5) the provision of inservice training and technical assistance to parents and educational personnel participating in, or preparing to participate in, bilingual education programs or special alternative instructional programs for limited English proficient students.

"(b)(1) A grant or contract may be made under subsection (a) (1), (2), or (3) of this section upon application of an institution of higher education.

"(2) A grant or contract may be made under subsection (a)(4) of this section upon application of (A) institutions of higher education (including junior colleges and community colleges) and private for-profit or nonprofit organizations which apply, after consultation with, or jointly with, one or more local educational agencies or a State educational agency; (B) local educational agencies; or (C) a State educational agency.

"(3) A grant or contract may be made under subsection (a)(5) of this section upon application of (A) institutions of higher education (including junior colleges and community colleges), (B) private for-profit or nonprofit organizations, or (C) a State educational agency.

"(c) An application for a grant or contract for preservice or inservice training activities described in subsection (a)(1) of this section shall be considered an application for a program of bilingual education for the purposes of section 721(e) of this title.

"(d) In making a grant or contract for preservice training programs described in subsection (a)(1) of this section, the Secretary shall give preference to programs which contain coursework in—

"(1) teaching English as a second language;

"(2) use of a non-English language for instructional purposes;

"(3) linguistics; and

"(4) evaluation and assessment;

and involving parents in the educational process. Preservice training programs shall be designed to ensure that participants become proficient in English and a second language of instruction.

"MULTIFUNCTIONAL RESOURCE CENTERS

"SEC. 742. (a) Pursuant to subsection (a)(5) of section 741, the Secretary shall establish through competitive grants or contracts at least 16 multifunctional resource centers (hereafter in this section referred to as 'centers'). Grants and contracts shall be awarded with consideration given to the geographic and linguistic distribution of children of limited English proficiency.

"(b) In addition to providing technical assistance and training to persons participating in or preparing to participate in bilingual education programs or special alternative instructional programs for limited English proficient students, each center shall be responsible for gathering and providing information to other centers on a particular area of bilingual education, including (but not limited to) bilingual special education, bilingual education for gifted and talented limited English proficient students, bilingual vocational education, bilingual adult education, bilingual education program administration, literacy, education technology in bilingual programs, mathematics and science education in bilingual programs, counseling limited English proficient students, and career education programs for limited English proficient students.

"FELLOWSHIPS

"SEC. 743. (a) Pursuant to subsection (a)(2) of section 741, the Secretary is authorized to award fellowships for advanced study of bilingual education or special alternative instructional programs for limited English proficient students in such areas as teacher training, program administration, research and evaluation, and curriculum development. For the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, not less than 500 fellowships leading to a graduate degree shall be awarded under the preceding sentence. Such fellowships shall be awarded, to the extent feasible, in proportion to the needs of various groups of individuals with limited English proficiency. In awarding fellowships, the Secretary shall give preference to individuals intending to study bilingual education or special alternative instructional programs for limited English proficient students in the following specialized areas: vocational education, adult education, gifted and talented education, special education, education technology, literacy, and mathematics and science education. The Secretary shall include information on the operation of the fellowship program in the report required under section 751(c) of this title.

"(b) The Secretary shall undertake an ongoing longitudinal study of the impact of recipients of such fellowships on the field of bilingual education and alternative instructional programs for students of limited English proficiency and shall, through the clearinghouse established pursuant to section 735(b)(5) of this title, disseminate research undertaken by recipients of such fellowships.

"(c) Any person receiving a fellowship under this section shall agree either to repay such assistance or to work for a period equivalent to the period of time during which such person received assistance, and such work shall be in an activity related to programs and activities such as those authorized under this Act. The Secretary may waive this requirement in extraordinary circumstances.

"PRIORITY

"SEC. 744. In making grants or contracts under this part, the Secretary shall give priority to eligible applicants with demonstrated competence and experience in programs and activities such as those authorized under this Act.

"STIPENDS

"SEC. 745. The Secretary shall include in the terms of any arrangement described in this part for the payment, to persons participating in training programs so described, of such stipends (including allowances for subsistence and other expenses for such persons and their dependents) as he may determine to be consistent with prevailing practices under comparable federally supported programs.

"PART D—ADMINISTRATION

"OFFICE OF BILINGUAL EDUCATION AND MINORITY LANGUAGES AFFAIRS

"SEC. 751. (a) There shall be, in the Department of Education, an Office of Bilingual Education and Minority Languages Affairs (hereafter in this section referred to as the 'Office') through which the Secretary shall carry out his functions relating to bilingual education.

"(b)(1) The Office shall be headed by a Director of Bilingual Education and Minority Languages Affairs, appointed by the Secretary, to whom the Secretary shall delegate all of his delegable functions relating to bilingual education. The Director shall also be assigned responsibility for coordinating the bilingual education aspects of other programs administered by the Secretary.

"(2) The Office shall be organized as the Director determines to be appropriate in order to enable him to carry out his functions and responsibilities effectively, except that there shall be a division, within the Office, which is exclusively responsible for the collection, aggregation, analysis, and publication of data and information on the operation and effectiveness of programs assisted under this title.

"(c) The Secretary, in consultation with the Council, shall prepare and, not later than February 1 of 1986, 1988, and 1990, shall submit to the Congress and the President a report on the condition of bilingual education in the nation and the administration and operation of this title and of other programs for persons of limited English proficiency. Such report shall include—

"(1) a national assessment of the educational needs of children and other persons with limited English proficiency and of the extent to which such needs are being met from Federal, State, and local efforts;

"(2) a plan, including cost estimates, to be carried out during the five-year period beginning on such date, for extending programs of bilingual education and bilingual vocational and adult education programs to all such preschool and elementary school children and other persons of limited English proficiency, including a phased plan for the training of the necessary teachers and other educational personnel necessary for such purpose;

"(3) a report on and evaluation of the activities carried out under this title during the preceding two fiscal years and the extent to which each of such activities achieves the policy set forth in section 702(a);

"(4) a statement of the activities intended to be carried out during the succeeding period, including an estimate of the cost of such activities;

"(5)(A) an assessment of the number of teachers and other educational personnel needed to carry out programs of bilingual education under this title and those carried out under other programs for persons of limited English proficiency;

"(B) a statement describing the activities carried out thereunder designed to prepare teachers and other educational personnel for such programs; and

"(C) the number of other educational personnel needed to carry out programs of bilingual education in the States; and

"(6) an estimate of the number of fellowships in the field of training teachers for bilingual education which will be necessary for the two succeeding fiscal years.

"(d) In order to maximize Federal efforts aimed at serving the educational needs of children of limited English proficiency, the Secretary shall coordinate and closely cooperate with other programs administered by the Department of Education, including such areas as teacher training, program content, research, and curriculum. The Secretary's report under subsection (c) shall include demonstration that such coordination has taken place.

"(e) The Secretary shall ensure that the Office of Bilingual Education and Minority Languages Affairs is staffed with sufficent personnel trained, or with experience in, bilingual education to discharge effectively the provisions of this title.

"NATIONAL ADVISORY AND COORDINATING COUNCIL ON BILINGUAL EDUCATION

"SEC. 752. (a) Subject to part D of the General Education Provisions Act, there shall be a National Advisory and Coordinating Council on Bilingual Education composed of twenty members appointed by the Secretary, one of whom he shall designate as Chairman. Members of the Council shall be persons experienced in dealing with the educational problems of children and other persons who are of limited English proficiency. Five members of the Council shall be State directors of bilingual education programs, at least three of whom shall represent States with large populations of limited English proficient students. Two members of the Council shall be experienced in research on bilingual education or evaluation of bilingual education programs. One member of the Council shall be experienced in research on methods of alternative instruction for language minority students or evaluation of alternative methods of instruction for such students. One member of the council shall be a classroom teacher of demonstrated teaching abilities using bilingual methods and techniques. One member of the Council shall be a classroom teacher of demonstrated teaching abilities using alternative instructional methods and techniques. One member of the Council shall be experienced in the training of teachers for programs of bilingual education. One member of the Council shall be experienced in the training of teachers for programs of alternative instruction. Two members of the Council shall be parents of students whose language is other than English, and one member of the Council shall be an officer of a professional organization representing bilingual education personnel. The members of the Council shall be appointed in such a way as to be generally representative of the significant segments of the population of persons of limited English proficiency and the geographic areas in which they reside. Subject to section 448(b) of the General Education Provisions Act, the Council shall continue to exist until October 1, 1989.

"(b) The Council shall meet at the call of the Chairman, but, notwithstanding the provisions of section 446(a) of the General Education Provisions Act, not less often than four times in each year.

"(c) The Council shall advise the Secretary in the preparation of general regulations and with respect to policy matters arising in the administration and operation of this title, including the development of criteria for approval of applications and plans under this title, and the administration and operation of other programs for persons of limited English proficiency. The Council shall prepare and, not later than March 31 of each year, submit a report to the Congress and the President on the condition of bilingual education in the Nation and on the administration and operation of this title, including those items specified in section 751(c), and the administration and operation of other programs for persons of limited English proficiency.

"(d) The Secretary shall procure temporary and intermittent services of such personnel as are necessary for the conduct of the functions of the Council, in accordance with section 445 of the General Education Provisions Act, and shall make available to the Council such staff, information, and other assistance as it may require to carry out its activities effectively.".

priated $50,000,000 for fiscal year 1985 and each of the four succeeding fiscal years.".

TITLE V—AMENDMENTS TO TITLE XI OF THE EDUCATION AMENDMENTS OF 1978

SHORT TITLE; REFERENCE

SEC. 501. (a) This title may be cited as the "Indian Education Amendments of 1984".

(b) Except as otherwise expressly provided, whenever in this title an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or repeal of, a section or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a section or other provision of title XI of the Education Amendments of 1978 (25 U.S.C. 2001 et seq.).

STANDARDS

SEC. 502. (a) Section 1121(b)(2) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Such standards shall include a requirement, developed in coordination with Indian tribes, the affected local school boards, the Indian Health Service of the Department of Health and Human Services, the State health departments, and the Federal Center for Disease Control, on immunization for childhood diseases, including provisions for in-school immunization, where necessary.".

(b) The first sentence of section 1121(d) is amended by striking out everything after "ill-conceived" and inserting in lieu thereof a period and the following: "The tribal governing body or designated school board shall thereafter submit to the Secretary a proposal for alternative standards that takes into account the specific needs of the tribe's children.".

(c) Section 1121(e) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(1)" after "(e)";

(2) by striking out the second sentence thereof; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(2) Within two years of the initial contract for the provision of educational services under Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act each such school shall (A) be in compliance with the standards prescribed under subsection (a), or (B) have obtained accreditation, or be a candidate for accreditation, with one of the accrediting agencies recognized by the Secretary of Education or the State in which it is found.

"(3) Within one year of the date of enactment of this paragraph, the Bureau shall, through contract with a national Indian organization, establish uniform fiscal control and fund accounting procedures for all contract schools which yield data results comparable to those used by Bureau schools.".

(d) Section 1121(f) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Failure to implement or meet such standards shall not serve as the basis for taking any personnel action against any individual if (1) the failure is related to inadequate resources (as determined under sections 1128 and 1129 of this title), and (2) the Secretary has not submitted the information required by this subsection and has not requested sufficient funds to cover the cost (as determined under such sections) of meeting such standards at the school concerned.".

(e) Section 1121 is further amended by redesignating subsection (g) as subsection (h) and by inserting after subsection (f) the following new subsection:

"(g)(1) Except as specifically required by statute, no school operated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs on January 1, 1984, may be closed or the program curtailed unless done according to the requirements of this subsection, except that in those cases where the tribal governing body, or the local school board concerned (if so designated by the tribal governing body), requests closure or consolidation, these provisions shall not apply.

"(2) The Secretary shall, by regulation, promulgate standards and procedures for the closing or consolidation of Bureau schools in accordance with the requirements of this subsection.

"(3) Such standards and procedures shall require that, whenever closure or consolidation of a school is under consideration or review by any division of the Bureau or the Department of the Interior, the affected tribe, tribal governing body, designated local school board, and parents will be notified as soon as such consideration or review begins and kept fully and currently informed with respect to such consideration or review. Copies of any such notices and information shall be transmitted promptly to the Congress and published in the Federal Register.

"(4) Prior to ordering any such school closing or consolidation, the Secretary shall insure that a study is made of each Indian child's educational and (where applicable) social needs and that adequate alternative services are guaranteed. Such a study shall include a description of the consultation conducted between the potential service provider, current service provider, parents, tribal representative of the tribe involved, and the Director of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, Office of Indian Education Programs with regard to such child.

"(5) Prior to taking any action to close or consolidate any such school, the Secretary shall make a full report to Congress describing the plans made (including schedules and plans for follow-up studies on the students affected), and the study and consultations undertaken pursuant to paragraph (4) of this subsection. No action may be taken in furtherance of any such proposed school closing or consolidation (including any action which would prejudice the personnel or programs of such school) until the end of the academic year following the academic year in which such report is made.".

SCHOOL BOUNDARIES

SEC. 503. Section 1124 is amended to read as follows:

"SCHOOL BOUNDARIES

"SEC. 1124. (a) The Secretary shall, in accordance with this section, establish separate geographical attendance areas for each Bureau school.

"(b) No attendance area shall be established with respect to any such school unless the tribal governing body or the local school board concerned (if so designated by the tribal governing body) has been given one year from the date of enactment of the Indian Education Amendments of 1984 to propose such boundaries. Such proposed boundaries shall be accepted unless the Secretary finds, after consultation with such body or board, that such boundaries do not reflect the needs of the Indian students to be served or do not provide adequate stability to all of the programs affected.

"(c) In any case where there is only one Bureau operated program located on an Indian reservation, the attendance areafor the program shall be the boundaries of the reservation served, and those students residing near the reservation shall also receive services from such program.

"(d) In any case where more than one school operated by the Secretary is located on an Indian reservation, the attendance areas established under this section—

"(1) in the case of nonresidential programs, shall not overlap and shall, together, cover the entirety of such reservation;

"(2) shall be established after due consideration of relevant transportation costs;

"(3) shall, to the greatest extent possible, permit a student to continue his or her education at a single school; and

"(4) with respect to dormitory programs, may be established to cover a nonexclusive area, as required by reason of such factors as social or educational need or isolation, or both.

"(e) In establishing school attendance areas under this section, the Secretary shall, in the following order—

"(1) determine attendance areas for Bureau operated programs with respect to the entire geographic area where potential students reside, considering the factors in subsection (a) and the specific educational needs of the students to be served, taking into account the wishes of the tribal governing body and local school boards concerned;

"(2) coordinate such attendance areas with those determined by schools funded under contract with the Bureau;

"(3) preserve current or historical service patterns, to the greatest extent possible; and

"(4) coordinate such school attendance areas with the school attendance areas of public schools in the vicinity, but such public school attendance areas shall not be regarded as exclusive where historical service patterns and current social, educational, or geographic (including transportation) factors show that Indian students will benefit by Bureau programs, taking into account the wishes of the tribal governing body and local school boards concerned.

"(f) In no case shall the Secretary regard a public school attendance area as being exclusive if the Secretary determines, on the basis of past practices or reasonable evidence concerning future practices, that a local school district is unable or unwilling to provide full and equal service (as provided to all of its students for all activities) throughout the year or to provide programs that meet students' particular needs.

"(g) With respect to multitribal boarding schools located off reservation, the Secretary shall establish nonexclusive major attendance areas. The Secretary may also establish by regulation supplemental attendance criteria based on special programs or services which exceed the basic academic programs. The Secretary shall provide procedures for recognizing and respecting parental choice concerning the special educational or social needs for students residing outside such areas, to the extent consistent with the best interest of the student. In those instances where a tribe requests attendance for a student residing outside the major attendance areas, the Secretary shall honor such request.".

BUREAU OF INDIAN AFFAIRS EDUCATION FUNCTIONS

SEC. 504. (a) Section 1126(a) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The Director of the Office (whether permanent or acting) shall report directly and solely to the Assistant Secretary for Indian Affairs".

(b) Section 1126(b) is amended by striking the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "All contract functions relating to education (including those pursuant to the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act) shall be supervised and directed by the Director of the Office.".

(c) Section 1126(b) is further amended by striking out "Nothing" in the last sentence and inserting in lieu thereof: "Subject to the provisions in subsection (c), nothing".

(d) Section 1126(c) is amended by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (1), and by striking out paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(2) provide all services and support functions for education programs—

"(A) with respect to procurement actions of $25,000 or less; and

"(B) with respect to personnel matters involving staffing actions and functions, and

"(3) provide technical and coordinating assistance in areas such as procurement, contracting, budgeting, personnel, and curriculum.".

(e) Section 1126 is further amended by redesignating subsection (d) as subsection (e) and by inserting after subsection (c) the following new subsection:

"(d)(1) The Director of the Office shall be responsible for—

"(A) planning for school facilities to be constructed under the system required by section 1125(c); and

"(B) establishing a system for prioritizing projects and developing an annual plan for the improvement and repair of education facilities, which together shall form the basis for the distribution of appropriated funds.

"(2) The Director of the Office shall establish a program, including the distribution of appropriated funds, for the operation and maintenance of education facilities. Such program shall include, but not be limited to—

"(A) a method of computing the amount necessary for each education facility;

"(B) similar treatment of all Bureau and contract schools; and

"(C) the allocation of appropriated funds from the Director of the Office directly to the agency superintendents for education, or to the area education program administrators in the case of multitribal boarding schools located off reservation.

The agency superintendents for education, or the area education program administrator in the case of multitribal boarding schools located off reservation, shall make arrangements for the maintenance of education facilities with the local supervisors of the Bureau maintenance personnel who are under the authority of the agency superintendent or area directors, respectively. The local supervisors of Bureau maintenance personnel shall take appropriate action to implement the decisions made in this regard by the agency superintendents for education and by the area education program administrators, except that no funds from this program may be expended or transferred by an agency superintendent for education or by an area education program administrator unless he is assured that the necessary maintenance has been, or will be, provided in a reasonable manner. Subject to the requirements of subsection (b) of this section, nothing in this Act shall be construed to require the provision of separate operations and maintenance personnel for the Office.

"(3) The Director of the Office shall have control over all Bureau education facilities, including local Bureau housing constructed for the purpose of housing Bureau personnel at the school site.

"(4) The requirements of this subsection shall be implemented within 270 days following the date of enactment of the Indian Education Amendments of 1984.".

ALLOTMENT FORMULA

SEC. 505. (a) Section 1128(a)(2) is amended—

(1) by striking out subparagraph (D);

(2) by redesignating subparagraph (E) as subparagraph (D); and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraphs:

"(E) special transportation and other costs of isolated and small schools;

"(F) the costs of boarding arrangements, where determined necessary by a tribal governing body or designated local school board;

"(G) costs associated with greater lengths of service by educational personnel;

"(H) special programs for gifted and talented students; and

"(I) costs associated with operating education and recreational programs on a 12-month basis.".

(b) Section 1128(c) is amended by inserting "(1)" after "(c)", redesignating paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) as subparagraphs (A), (B), and (C), respectively, and by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(2) All Bureau and contract schools receiving funds under this section shall receive an equal amount as an allowance for local school board training and activities including, notwithstanding any other provision of law, meeting expenses and the cost of membership in or support of organizations engaged in activities on behalf of Indian education.

"(3) The Secretary shall, subject to appropriations, provide to all contract schools an amount for administrative and indirect costs which is at least equal to the amount which would be expended by the Secretary if such school were directly operated by the Secretary. The Secretary shall take such actions as are necessary to provide contract schools with the full amount as determined by this paragraph without reducing funds available under subsection (a) of this section.".

(c) Section 1128 is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) The Director of the Office shall establish a separate fund from which monetary awards and quality step increases for employees shall be paid. Such payments shall not affect school allotments under this section.".

UNIFORM DIRECT FUNDING

SEC. 506. (a) Section 1129(a) is amended—

(1) by striking out "section 1128," and all that follows in the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "section 1128.";

(2) by inserting "(1)" after "(a)" and adding at the end thereof the following:

"(2)(A) For the purpose of affording adequate notice of funding available pursuant to the allotments made by this section, amounts appropriated in an appropriation Act for any fiscal year shall become available for obligation by the affected schools on July 1 of the fiscal year in which they are appropriated without further action by the Secretary, and shall remain available for obligation through the succeeding fiscal year. In order to effect a transition to the forward funding method of distribution described in the preceding sentence, there are authorized to be appropriated, in an appropriation Act or Acts for the same fiscal year, two separate appropriations for such allotments, the first of which shall not be subject to the preceding sentence.

"(B) The Secretary shall, on the basis of the amount appropriated in accordance with this paragraph—

"(i) publish, on July 1 preceding the fiscal year for which the funds are appropriated, allotments to each affected school made under this section of 85 percent of such appropriation; and

"(ii) publish, no later than September 30 of such preceding fiscal year, the allotments to be made under this section of the remaining 15 percent of such appropriation, adjusted to reflect actual student attendance.

"(3) Notwithstanding any law or regulation governing procurement by Federal agencies, the supervisor of each school receiving funds under this section shall, subject to school board approval, have the authority to expend no more than 10 percent of the funds allotted by this section to procure supplies and equipment, with or without competitive bidding.".

(b) Section 1129(c) is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: "The Secretary shall institute a program for funding tribal divisions of education and the development of tribal codes of education.".

APPEALS FROM ACTIONS OF SCHOOL BOARDS

SEC. 507. (a) Section 1129(b) is amended by striking out the last sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The supervisor of the school may appeal any such action of the local school board to the superintendent for education of the Bureau agency by filing a written statement describing the action and the reasons the supervisor believes such action should be overturned. A copy of such statement shall be submitted to the local school board and such board shall be afforded an opportunity to respond, in writing, to such appeal. After reviewing such written appeal and response, the superintendent may, for good cause, overturn the action of the local school board. The superintendent shall transmit the determination of such appeal in the form of a written opinion to such board and to such supervisor identifying the reasons for overturning such action.".

(b) Section 1131(d) is amended by striking out paragraphs (2) and (3) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(2)(A) The supervisor of a school may appeal to the appropriate agency superintendent for education any determination by the local school board for the school that an individual be employed, or not be employed, in an education position in the school (other than that of supervisor) by filing a written statement describing the determination and the reasons the supervisor believes such determination should be overturned. A copy of such statement shall be submitted to the local school board and such board shall be afforded an opportunity to respond, in writing, to such appeal. After reviewing such written appeal and response, the superintendent may, for good cause, overturn the determination of the local school board. The superintendent shall transmit the determination of such appeal in the form of a written opinion to such board and to such supervisor identifying the reasons for overturning such determination.

"(B) The superintendent for education of an agency office of the Bureau may appeal to the Director of the Office any determination by the local school board for the school that an individual be employed, or not be employed, as the supervisor of a school by filing a written statement describing the determination and the reasons the supervisor believes such determination should be overturned. A copy of such statement shall be submitted to the local school board and such board shall be afforded an opportunity to respond, in writing, to such appeal. After reviewing such written appeal and response, the Director may, for good cause, overturn the determination of the local school board. The Director shall transmit the determination of such appeal in the form of a written opinion to such board and to such superintendent identifying the reasons for overturning such determination.

"(3) The superintendent for education of an agency office of the Bureau may appeal to the Director of the Office any determination by the agency school board that an individual be employed, or not be employed, in an education position in such agency office by filing a written statement describing the determination and the reasons the supervisor believes such determination should be overturned. A copy of such statement shall be submitted to the agency school board and such board shall be afforded an opportunity to respond, in writing, to such appeal. After reviewing such written appeal and response, the Director may, for good cause, overturn the determination of the agency school board. The Director shall transmit the determination of such appeal in the form of a written opinion to such board and to such superintendent identifying the reasons for overturning such determination.".

(1) by striking out "the Bureau," and inserting in lieu thereof "the Office,";

(2) by striking out "this Act" and inserting in lieu thereof "the Indian Education Amendments of 1984"; and

(3) by striking out "to all agency and area offices of the Bureau and".

AUDITS

SEC. 509. Section 1136 is amended by inserting "(a)" after "SEC. 1136." and by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) The Inspector General of the Department of the Interior shall establish a system to ensure that financial and compliance audits are conducted of the Bureau, the Office, and each Bureau school at least once in every three years. Audits of Bureau schools shall be based upon the extent to which such school has complied with its local financial plan under section 1129.".

REGULATIONS

SEC. 510. Section 1138 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Such regulations shall contain, immediately following each substantive provision of such regulations, citations to the particular section or sections of statutory law or other legal authority upon which such provision is based.".

VOLUNTARY SERVICES

SEC. 511. Title XI of the Education Amendments of 1978 is further amended by adding after section 1139 the following new section:

"VOLUNTARY SERVICES

"SEC. 1140. Notwithstanding section 1342 of title 31, United States Code, an officer or employee of the Bureau or the Office may, subject to the approval of the local school board concerned, accept voluntary services on behalf of Bureau and contract schools. Nothing in this title shall be construed to require Federal employees to work without compensation or to allow the use of volunteer services to displace or replace Federal employees.".

EMPLOYEE BENEFITS

SEC. 512. Title XI of the Education Amendments of 1978 is further amended by adding after section 1140 the following new sections:

"PRORATION OF PAY

"SEC. 1141. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary, at the election of the employee, shall prorate the salary of an employee employed in an education position for the academic school-year over the entire twelve month period. Each educator employed for the academic school-year shall annually elect to be paid on a twelve month basis or for those months while school is in session. No educator shall suffer a loss of pay or benefits because of such election.

"(b) During the course of such year the employee may change election once.

"(c) That portion of the employee's pay which would be paid between academic school years may be paid in lump sum at the election of the employee.

"(d) For the purposes of this section the terms 'educator' and 'education position' have the meaning contained in section 1131(n)(1) and (n)(2) of this title. This section applies to those individuals employed under the provisions of section 1131 of this title or title 5, United States Code.

"EXTRACURRICULAR ACTIVITIES

"SEC. 1142. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary shall provide a stipend in lieu of overtime premium pay or compensatory time off. Any employee of the Bureau who performs additional activities to provide services to students or otherwise support the school's academic and social programs may elect to be compensated for all such work on the basis of the stipend. Such stipend shall be paid as a supplement to the employee's base pay.

"(b) The amount of such stipends shall be determined at the area level.

"(c) If an employee elects not to be compensated through the stipend established by this section, the appropriate provisions of title 5, United States Code, shall apply.

"(d) This section applies to all Bureau employees, whether employed under section 1131 of this title or title 5, United States Code.

"HOUSING

"SEC. 1143. (a) The Secretary shall continue to apply rental rates for employee housing in accordance with all applicable laws and regulations. Proceeds from rental receipts shall be used for the improvement and repair of employee quarters.

"(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the agency superintendent for education, or for boarding schools located off-reservation the area education program administrator, shall have the authority to waive up to 90 percent of the rental rate for educators on school-wide basis to aid the school in recruiting and retaining educators. Decisions on rent waivers will be made after consultation with the appropriate level school board and the employees. Such superintendent's or administrator's decision (as the case may be) on the need for this assistance in recruitment and retention is final and not reviewable.

"(c) During periods when schools are not in session and educators have been placed in non-pay status, all rents paid by those educators shall be waived.

"(d) For the purposes of this section the term 'educator' has the meaning contained in section 1131(n)(1) of this title. This section applies to those individuals employed under both the provisions of section 1131 of this title and title 5, United States Code.".

EXTENSIONS OF AUTHORIZATION OF OTHER INDIAN EDUCATION PROGRAMS

SEC. 513. (a)(1) Section 302(b) of the Indian Elementary and Secondary School Assistance Act (20 U.S.C. 241aa(b)) is amended by striking out "entitled to" and inserting in lieu thereof "eligible to receive".

(2) Section 303(a)(1) of such Act is amended by striking out "For the purpose of computing the amount to which a local educational agency is entitled under this title for any fiscal year ending prior to October 1, 1983," and inserting in lieu thereof "For any fiscal year ending prior to October 1, 1989,".

(3) Section 303(a)(2)(A) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(2)(A) From the sums appropriated under section 307(a) for any fiscal year, the Secretary shall allocate to each local educational agency which has an application approved under this title an amount which bears the same ratio to such sums as the product of (i) the number of eligible Indian children (as determined under paragraph (1)), multiplied by (ii) the average per pupil expenditure per agency (as determined under subparagraph (c)), bears to the sum of such products for all such local educational agencies.".

(4) Section 303(a)(2)(B) of such Act is amended by striking out "entitled to receive" and inserting in lieu thereof "eligible to receive".

(5) Section 303 of such Act is further amended—

"in accordance with the provisions of this title to schools which—

"(A) are located on or near reservations; and

"(B)(i) are not local educational agencies; or

"(ii) have not been local educational agencies for more than three years.

"(2) The requirements of clause (A) of paragraph (1) shall not apply to any school serving Indian children in California or Oklahoma.".

(6) Section 305(b)(2)(B)(ii) of such Act is amended by inserting "written" before "approval of a committee".

(7) Section 307 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS; ADJUSTMENTS

"SEC. 307. (a) For the purpose of making payments under this title, there are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary for each of the fiscal years ending prior to October 1, 1989.

"(b) The Secretary may reallocate, in such manner as will best assist in advancing the purposes of this title, any amount which the Secretary determines, based upon estimates made by local educational agencies, will not be needed by any such agency to carry out its approved project.".

(8) Such Act is further amended by striking out "Commissioner" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "Secretary".

(b)(1) Sections 422(c), 423(a), and 442(a) of the Indian Education Act (20 U.S.C. 3385a(c), 3385b(a), 1221g(a)) are each amended by striking out "October 1, 1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "October 1, 1989".

(2) Section 423(a) of such Act is amended—

(A) by striking out "not to exceed two hundred" in the first sentence;

(B) by inserting "psychology," after "medicine," in the second sentence; and

(C) by striking out the last sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The Commissioner may, if a fellowship is vacated prior to the end of the period for which it was awarded, award an additional fellowship for the remainder of such period.".

(c) Section 1005(g) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 3385(g)) is amended by striking out "October 1, 1983" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "October 1, 1989".

(d) Section 316(e) of the Adult Education Act (20 U.S.C. 1211a(e)) is amended by striking out "October 1, 1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "October 1, 1989".

TITLE VI—AMENDMENTS TO THE ASBESTOS SCHOOL HAZARD DETECTION AND CONTROL ACT OF 1980

GENERAL EXTENSION OF AUTHORIZATION

(b) Section 12(a)(1)(A) of such Act is amended by striking out "the succeeding fiscal year" and inserting in lieu thereof "each of the succeeding fiscal years ending prior to October 1, 1989".

(c) Section 12(a)(1)(B) of such Act is amended by striking out "the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982" and inserting in lieu thereof "each of the fiscal years ending prior to October 1, 1989".

(d) Section 12(a)(2) of such Act is amended by striking out "September 30, 1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "the end of the fiscal year following the fiscal year for which appropriated".

(e)(1) Section 6(b)(1) of such Act is amended by striking out "except as otherwise provided under paragraph (5)".

(2) Section 6(c)(1) of such Act is amended by striking out ", within the two-year period beginning on the effective date of this Act".

TITLE VII—EMERGENCY IMMIGRANT EDUCATION ASSISTANCE

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 701. This title may be cited as the "Emergency Immigrant Education Act of 1984".

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 702. As used in this title—

(1) The term "immigrant children" means children who were not born in any State and who have been attending schools in any one or more States for less than three complete academic years.

(2) The terms "elementary school", "local educational agency", "secondary school", "State", and "State educational agency" have the meanings given such terms under section 198(a) of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

(3) The term "elementary or secondary nonpublic schools" means schools which comply with the applicable compulsory attendance laws of the State and which are exempt from taxation under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

(4) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Education.

AUTHORIZATIONS AND ALLOCATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 703. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1985 and each of the four succeeding fiscal years such sums as may be necessary to make payments to which State educational agencies are entitled under this title and payments for administration under section 704.

(b)(1) If the sums appropriated for any fiscal year to make payments to States under this title are not sufficient to pay in full the sum of the amounts which State educational agencies are entitled to receive under this title for such year, the allocations to State educational agencies shall be ratably reduced to the extent necessary to bring the aggregate of such allocations within the limits of the amounts so appropriated.

(2) In the event that funds become available for making payments under this title for any period after allocations have been made under paragraph (1) of this subsection for such period, the amounts reduced under such paragraph shall be increased on the same basis as they were reduced.

STATE ADMINISTRATIVE COSTS

SEC. 704. The Secretary is authorized to pay to each State educational agency amounts equal to the amounts expended by it for the proper and efficient administration of its functions under this title, except that the total of such payments for any period shall not exceed 1.5 per centum of the amounts which that State educational agency is entitled to receive for that period under this title.

WITHHOLDING

SEC. 705. Whenever the Secretary, after reasonable notice and opportunity for a hearing to any State educational agency, finds that there is a failure to meet the requirements of any provision of this title, the Secretary shall notify that agency that further payments will not be made to the agency under this title, or in the discretion of the Secretary, that the State educational agency shall not make further payments under this title to specified local educational agencies whose actions cause or are involved in such failure until the Secretary is satisfied that there is no longer any such failure to comply. Until the Secretary is so satisfied, no further payments shall be made to the State educational agency under this title, or payments by the State educational agency under this title shall be limited to local educational agencies whose actions did not cause or were not involved in the failure, as the case may be.

STATE ENTITLEMENTS

SEC. 706. (a) The Secretary shall, in accordance with the provisions of this section, make payments to State educational agencies for each of the fiscal years 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988, and 1989 for the purpose set forth in section 707.

(b)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (3) and in subsections (c) and (d) of this section, the amount of the grant to which a State educational agency is entitled under this title shall be equal to the product of (A) the number of immigrant children enrolled during such fiscal year in elementary and secondary public schools under the jurisdiction of each local educational agency described under paragraph (2) within that State, and in any elementary or secondary nonpublic school within the district served by each such local educational agency, multiplied by (B) $500.

(2) The local educational agencies referred to in paragraph (1) are those local educational agencies in which the sum of the number of immigrant children who are enrolled in elementary or secondary public schools under the jurisdiction of such agencies, and in elementary or secondary nonpublic schools within the districts served by such agencies, during the fiscal year for which the payments are to be made under this title, is equal to—

(A) at least five hundred; or

(B) at least 3 per centum of the total number of students enrolled in such public or nonpublic schools during such fiscal year; whichever number is less.

(3)(A) The amount of the grant of any State educational agency for any fiscal year as determined under paragraph (1) shall be reduced by the amounts made available for such fiscal year under any other Federal law for expenditure within the State for the same purpose as those for which funds are available under this title, but such reduction shall be made only to the extent that (i) such amounts are made available for such purpose specifically because of the refugee, parolee, asylee, or other immigrant status of the individuals served by such funds, and (ii) such amounts are made available to provide assistance to individuals eligible for services under this title.

(B) No reduction of a grant under this title shall be made under subparagraph (A) for any fiscal year if a reduction is made, pursuant to a comparable provision in any such other Federal law, in the amount made available for expenditure in the State for such fiscal year under such other Federal law, based on the amount assumed to be available under this title.

(c)(1) Determinations by the Secretary under this section for any period with respect to the number of immigrant children shall be made on the basis of data or estimates provided to the Secretary by each State educational agency in accordance with criteria established by the Secretary, unless the Secretary determines, after notice and opportunity for a hearing to the affected State educational agency, that such data or estimates are clearly erroneous.

(2) No such determination with respect to the number of immigrant children shall operate because of an underestimate or overestimate to deprive any State educational agency of its entitlement to any payment (or the amount thereof) under this section to which such agency would be entitled had such determination been made on the basis of accurate data.

(d) Whenever the Secretary determines that any amount of a payment made to a State under this title for a fiscal year will not be used by such State for carrying out the purpose for which the payment was made, the Secretary shall make such amount available for carrying out such purpose to one or more other States to the extent the Secretary determines that such other States will be able to use such additional amount for carrying out such purpose. Any amount made available to a State from an appropriation for a fiscal year in accordance with the preceding sentence shall, for purposes of this title, be regarded as part of such State's payment (as determined under subsection (b)) for such year, but shall remain available until the end of the succeeding fiscal year.

USES OF FUNDS

SEC. 707. (a) Payments made under this title to any State may be used in accordance with applications approved under section 708 for supplementary educational services and costs, as described under subsection (b) of this section, for immigrant children enrolled in the elementary and secondary public schools under the jurisdiction of the local educational agencies of the State described in section 706(b)(2) and in elementary and secondary nonpublic schools of that

State within the districts served by such agencies.

(b) Financial assistance provided under this title shall be available to meet the costs of providing immigrant children supplementary educational services, including but not limited to—

(1) supplementary educational services necessary to enable those children to achieve a satisfactory level of performance, including—

(A) English language instruction;

(B) other bilingual educational services; and

(C) special materials and supplies;

(2) additional basic instructional services which are directly attributable to the presence in the school district of immigrant children, including the costs of providing additional classroom supplies, overhead costs, costs of construction, acquisition or rental of space, costs of transportation, or such other costs as are directly attributable to such additional basic instructional services; and

(3) essential inservice training for personnel who will be providing instruction described in either paragraph (1) or (2) of this subsection.

APPLICATIONS

SEC. 708. (a) No State educational agency shall be entitled to any payment under this title for any period unless that agency submits an application to the Secretary at such time, in such manner, and containing or accompanied by such information, as the Secretary may reasonably require. Each such application shall—

(1) provide that the educational programs, services, and activities for which payments under this title are made will be administered by or under the supervision of the agency;

(2) provide assurances that payments under this title will be used for purposes set forth in section 707;

(3) provide assurances that such payments will be distributed among local educational agencies within that State on the basis of the number of children counted with respect to such local educational agency under section 706(b)(1), adjusted to reflect any reductions imposed pursuant to section 706(b)(3) which are attributable to such local educational agency;

(4) provide assurances that the State educational agency will not finally disapprove in whole or in part any application for funds received under this title without first affording the local educational agency submitting an application for such funds reasonable notice and opportunity for a hearing;

(5) provide for making such reports as the Secretary may reasonably require to perform the functions under this title; and

(6) provide assurances—

(B) that the control of funds provided under this title and the title to any materials, equipment, and property repaired, remodeled, or constructed with those funds shall be in a public agency for the uses and purposes provided in this title, and a public agency shall administer such funds and property; and

(C) that the provision of services pursuant to this paragraph shall be provided by employees of a public agency or through contract by such public agency with a person, association, agency, or corporation who or which, in the provision of such services, is independent of such elementary or secondary nonpublic school and of any religious organization; and such employment or contract shall be under the control and supervision of such public agency, and the funds provided under this paragraph shall not be commingled with State or local funds.

(b) The Secretary shall approve an application which meets the requirements of subsection (a). The Secretary shall not finally disapprove an application of a State educational agency except after reasonable notice and opportunity for a hearing on the record to such agency.

PAYMENTS

SEC. 709. (a) Except as provided in section 703(b), the Secretary shall pay to each State educational agency having an application approved under section 708 the amount which that State is entitled to receive under this title.

(b) If by reason of any provision of law a local educational agency is prohibited from providing educational services for children enrolled in elementary and secondary nonpublic schools, as required by section 708(a)(6), or if the Secretary determines that a local educational agency has substantially failed or is unwilling to provide for the participation on an equitable basis of children enrolled in such schools, the Secretary may waive such requirement and shall arrange for the provision of services to such children through arrangements which shall be subject to the requirements of this title. Such waivers shall be subject to consultation, withholding, notice, and judicial review requirements in accordance with section 557(b) (3) and (4) of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981.

TITLE VIII—GENERAL ADMINISTRATION AND ORGANIZATION

AMENDMENTS TO THE DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION ORGANIZATION ACT

SEC. 801. (a) Section 204 of the Department of Education Organization Act (20 U.S.C. 3418) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "There shall be within the Office of Elementary and Secondary Education and directly under the supervision of the Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Education, an Office of Migrant Education, which shall be responsible for the administration of programs established by subpart 1 of part B of title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 and by subpart 5 of part A of title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965.".

(b) Section 204 of the Department of Education Organization Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "There shall be within the Office of Elementary and Secondary Education and directly under the supervision of the Assistant Secretary for Elementary and Secondary Education, an Office of Equity Training and Technical Assistance, which shall be responsible for the administration of programs established by sections 403, 404, 405, and 406 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.".

(c) Section 209 of the Department of Education Organization Act (20 U.S.C. 3419) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "There shall be within the Office of Educational Research and Improvement and directly under the supervision of the Assistant Secretary for Educational Research and Improvement, an Office of Women's Educational Equity, which shall be responsible for the administration of programs established by part C of title IX of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.".

(d) For the purposes of section 413(a) of the Department of Education Organization Act (20 U.S.C. 3473), the Office of Migrant Education, the Office of Equity Training and Technical Assistance, and the Office of Women's Educational Equity shall be considered to be organizational entities established by such Act and shall not be subject to the reorganizational authority of the Secretary of Education under that section or any other provision of law.

EXTENSION OF AUTHORIZATIONS UNDER THE GENERAL EDUCATION PROVISIONS ACT

SEC. 802. (a) Section 405(k)(7) of the General Education Provisions Act (20 U.S.C. 1221e(k)(7)) is amended by striking out "$10,500,000 for each fiscal year ending prior to October 1, 1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "$11,000,000 for fiscal year 1985, and $10,800,000 for each succeeding fiscal year ending prior to October 1, 1989".

(b) Section 406(g) of such Act (20 U.S.C. 1221-1(g)) is amended by striking out "October 1, 1983" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "October 1, 1989".

VOLUNTARY SILENT PRAYER

SEC. 806. Part B of the General Education Provisions Act is amended by inserting after section 420 (20 U.S.C. 1228) the following new section:

"VOLUNTARY SILENT PRAYER

"SEC. 420A. No State or local educational agency shall deny individuals in public schools the opportunity to participate in moments of silent prayer. Neither the United States nor any State or local educational agency shall require any person to participate in prayer or influence the form or content of any prayer in such public schools."

CONFLICT-OF-INTEREST

SEC. 807. (a) Section 435(b) of the General Education Provisions Act (20 U.S.C. 1232d(b)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (6);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (7) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and"; and

(3) by inserting after such paragraph the following new paragraph:

"(8) that none of the funds expended under any applicable program will be used to acquire equipment (including computer software) in any instance in which such acquisition results in a direct financial benefit to any organization representing the interests of the purchasing entity or its employees or any affiliate of such an organization.".

(b) Section 436(b) of the General Education Provisions Act (20 U.S.C. 1232e(b)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (7);

(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (8) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and"; and

(3) by inserting after such paragraph the following new paragraph:

"(9) that none of the funds expended under any applicable program will be used to acquire equipment (including computer software) in any instance in which such acquisition results in a direct financial benefit to any organization representing the interests of the purchasing entity or its employees or any affiliate of such an organization.".

COMPLIANCE PROCEDURES

SEC. 808. (a)(1) Subsection (a) of section 452 of the General Education Provisions Act (20 U.S.C. 1234a) is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new sentence: "If no fraud is involved, the Secretary may seek recovery of funds paid to a State or local educational agency in those final audit determinations pending on or made after the date of enactment of this sentence only if the disputed expenditures do not comply substantially with the law.".

(2) Subsection (b) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(b)(1) A State or a local educational agency that has received written notice of a final audit determination and that desires to have such determination reviewed by the Board shall submit to the Board an application for review not later than thirty days after receipt of notification of the final audit determination. The application for review shall be in the form and contain the information specified by the Board.

"(2) The Board shall return to the Secretary for such action as he deems appropriate (A) any final audit determination which, in the judgment of the Board, contains insufficient detail to identify with particularity those expenditures which are not allowable, and (B) any such audit determination for which the Secretary has not established a prima facie case by introduction of evidence in support of the final audit determination. Failure by a State or local educational agency to maintain adequate records pertaining to expenditures that the agency is required to maintain, or failure by a State or local education agency to allow the Secretary access to such records, shall constitute a prima facie case.

"(3) Unless the Board returns a final audit determination to the Secretary pursuant to clause (A) or (B) of paragraph (2), the burden of going forward shall be upon the State or local educational agency. The ultimate burden of proof to sustain the case by a preponderance of the evidence shall be upon the Secretary.

"(4) In all final audit determinations pending before the Board on, or brought before the Board after, the date of enactment of this paragraph, discovery shall be available to all parties in accordance with the procedures provided under Rules 26, 28 through 34, and 36 of the Rules of Civil Procedure of the United States district courts. The period for the conduct of discovery shall not exceed six months (commencing on the date on which a panel of Board members is designated to conduct the review), except that such period may be extended for an additional three months if the Board, in its discretion, determines that exceptional circumstances warrant such an extension. At the request of any party, the Board may establish a specific schedule for the conduct of discovery (subject to the limitations contained in the preceding sentence).".

(3) Subsection (f) of such section is amended by redesignating paragraph (2) as paragraph (3) and by inserting after paragraph (1) the following new paragraph:

"(2) Whenever a disputed expenditure of a subgrantee is considered under paragraph (1), the subgrantee shall be a party to any such action of the Secretary.".

(4) In any final audit determination pending before the Secretary of Education or the Education Appeals Board on or made after the date of enactment of this Act pursuant to section 452 of the General Education Provisions Act (20 U.S.C. 1234b), the provisions of sections 122(a)(1) and 132 of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 (20 U.S.C. 2732(a)(1), 2752) shall be considered to apply with respect to expenditures made before October 1, 1978, in the same manner that such provisions apply to expenditures made on or after that date, without regard to the provisions of subsections (b)(2), (e), and (f) of section 131 of such Act (20 U.S.C. 2751) requiring that certain determinations be made in advance.

(b) Section 453 of such Act (20 U.S.C. 1234b) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e)(1) With respect to chapter 1 of the Education Consolidation and Improvement Act of 1981 (20 U.S.C. 3801 et seq.), the Secretary may suspend the initiation or continuation of his withholding action under this section during any period there is in effect a compliance agreement with the State or local educational agency under this subsection. Such an agreement shall be deemed to be in effect for the period specified therein, except that if the State or local educational agency fails to comply with the terms agreed to, such an agreement shall no longer be in effect and such withholding under this section shall be resumed. In implementing this section, the Secretary shall take into account any partial compliance by such agency under such agreement.

"(2) For the purpose of this subsection, the term 'compliance agreement', means an agreement which—

"(A) sets forth the terms and conditions to which the State or local educational agency has agreed in order to comply with the requirements of the applicable statute and regulations promulgated thereunder;

"(B) addresses all the matters that formed the basis for the initiation of the withholding action by the Secretary; and

"(C) may consist of a series of agreements that in the aggregate dispose of all such matters.

"(3) In any case in which a State or local educational agency desires to enter into a compliance agreement, but alleges that full compliance with the requirements of the applicable statute or regulations promulgated thereunder is genuinely not feasible until a later date, the Secretary shall hold a hearing at which that agency shall have the burden of demonstrating that immediate compliance is not feasible. The Secretary shall provide an opportunity for parents, their representatives, and other interested parties to participate in that hearing. If the Secretary determines, on the basis of all the evidence presented, that immediate compliance is genuinely not feasible, the Secretary shall make written findings to that effect before entering into such a compliance agreement with that State or local educational agency.

"(4) A compliance agreement under this subsection shall not be exempt from disclosure under any provision of section 552 of title 5, United States Code. Within fifteen days after the execution of any compliance agreement under this subsection, the Secretary shall send a copy thereof to each organization or person who filed a complaint with respect to any failure to comply which is covered by that agreement.".

(c) Section 456(a) of such Act (20 U.S.C. 1234e(a)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "program, he may consider" and inserting in lieu thereof "program and if no fraud is involved, he shall consider";

(2) by striking out "may arrange" and inserting in lieu thereof "shall arrange"; and

(3) by striking out "not to exceed 75 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "at least 75 percent".

(d) Such Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"STATE COMPLIANCE AGREEMENTS

"SEC. 457. (a) In addition to other enforcement methods that may be available to States, a State educational agency may enter into a compliance agreement with a local educational agency if the State finds that the local educational agency has violated assurances contained in such agency's application or the requirements of the applicable statute or regulation under which a grant was accepted from the Secretary. Such an agreement shall be deemed to be in effect for the period specified therein.

"(b) For purposes of this section, the term 'compliance agreement' means an agreement which—

"(1) sets forth the terms and conditions to which the local educational agency has agreed in order to comply with the assurances contained in such agency's application or the requirements of the applicable statute or regulation promulgated thereunder, and with the applicable rules, regulations, procedures, guidelines, criteria or other requirements adopted by the State educational agency; and

"(2) may consist of a series of agreements that in the aggregate dispose of all such matters.

"(c) Within fifteen days after the execution of any compliance agreement, the State educational agency shall send a copy thereof to each organization or person who filed a complaint with respect to any failure to comply which is covered by that agreement.".

STUDENT FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1982

"(4) April 1, 1986, for the period of instruction from July 1, 1986, through June 30, 1987,".

EFFECTIVE DATE AMENDMENT

SEC. 810. Section 25(b) of Public Law 98-211 (97 Stat. 1419) is amended by striking out "June 30, 1983" and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1984".

EDUCATION AMENDMENTS OF 1978: ASSISTANCE TO TERRITORIES

SEC. 811. Sections 1524 and 1525 of the Education Amendments of 1978 are each amended by striking out "1979" and inserting in lieu thereof "1985".

CONTRACT AUTHORITY

SEC. 812. Any authority to make payments or to enter into contracts under this Act shall be available only to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in advance in appropriation Acts.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 813. This Act and the amendments made by this Act shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act or October 1, 1984, whichever occurs later.

TITLE IX—ADDITIONAL LIMITATIONS ON APPROPRIATIONS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1985

AUTHORIZATION AMOUNTS

SEC. 901. (a) Notwithstanding any provision of this Act (including any amendment made by this Act), or any provision of law amended by this Act, no funds are authorized to be appropriated in excess of the limitations imposed upon appropriations by the provisions of subsection (b) of this section.

(b) The total amount of appropriations for fiscal year 1985 shall not exceed—

(1) $140,000,000 to carry out the Adult Education Act (20 U.S.C. 1201 et seq.);

(2) $176,000,000 to carry out the Bilingual Education Act (20 U.S.C. 3221 et seq.);

(3) $780,000,000 to carry out the Act of September 30, 1950 (Public Law 874, Eighty-first Congress) and the Act of September 23, 1950 (Public Law 815, Eighty-first Congress);

(4) $28,000,000 to carry out the Women's Educational Equity Act of 1978 (20 U.S.C. 3341 et seq.);

(5) $70,000,000 to carry out the Emergency Immigrant Education Act of 1984 (as created by title VII of this Act);

(6) $8,000,000 to carry out section 405(k) of the General Education Provisions Act (20 U.S.C. 1221e);

(7) $12,000,000 to carry out section 406 of the General Education Provisions Act (20 U.S.C. 1221-1);

(8) $5,000,000 to carry out sections 1524 and 1525 of the Education Amendments of 1978; and

(9) such sums as may be necessary to carry out the Asbestos School Hazard Detection and Control Act of 1980 (20 U.S.C. 3601 et seq.).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PERKINS].

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the Senate bill was amended so as to read: "An act to extend through fiscal year 1989 the authorization of appropriations for certain education programs, and for other purposes."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H.R. 11) was laid on the table.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON S. 2496

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to House Resolution 550, I move that the House insist on its amendment to the Senate bill, S. 2496, and request a conference with the Senate thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PERKINS].

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Chair appoints the following conferees: Messrs. PERKINS, FORD of Michigan, ANDREWS of North Carolina, MILLER of California, CORRADA, KILDEE, WILLIAMS of Montana, HAWKINS, BIAGGI, BOUCHER, and ACKERMAN, Mrs. BURTON of California, Messrs. HAYES, ERLENBORN, GOODLING, and PACKARD, Mrs. ROUKEMA, and Messrs. GUNDERSON, BARTLETT, NIELSON of Utah, CHANDLER, and TAUKE.

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING THE CLERK TO MAKE CORRECTIONS IN ENGROSSMENT OF HOUSE AMENDMENT TO S. 2496

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, in the engrossment of the House amendment to the bill, S. 2496, the Clerk be authorized to correct section numbers, punctuation, and cross references and to make such other technical and conforming changes as may be necessary to reflect the actions of the House in amending the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS TO HAVE UNTIL MIDNIGHT FRIDAY, JULY 27, 1984, TO FILE PRIVILEGED REPORT ON SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS BILL, 1984

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations may have until midnight tomorrow, Friday, July 27, to file a privileged report on a bill making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not intend to object but I have been asked by the leadership on this side to ask the chairman of the committee whether he has any idea when we are going to take up the supplemental in the House?

Mr. WHITTEN. If the gentleman will yield, insofar as I am concerned, I expect to file a report and promptly make a request of the Rules Committee for such rule as may seem appropriate. At that time it would be up to the leadership. I would hope that we would get it up not later than Wednesday, right after we have HHS.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection, and I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

REPORT ON H.R. 6028, DEPARTMENTS OF LABOR, HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES, AND EDUCATION, AND RELATED AGENCIES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1985

Mr. NATCHER, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 98-911) on the bill (H.R. 6028) making appropriations for the Departments of Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education, and related agencies for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, which was referred to the Union Calendar and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONTE reserved all points of order on the bill.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I was delayed in returning to Washington today. Had I been present, I would have voted "aye" on rollcalls 319, 320, and 321.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION WAIVING CERTAIN POINTS OF ORDER AGAINST CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 5921, DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION AND RELATED AGENCIES APPROPRIATIONS, 1985

Mr. FROST, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 98-912) on the resolution (H. Res. 556) waiving certain points of order against consideration of the bill (H.R. 5921) making appropriations for the Department of Transportation and related agencies for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, and for other purposes, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION WAIVING CERTAIN POINTS OF ORDER AGAINST CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 5973, DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR AND RELATED AGENCIES APPROPRIATIONS, 1985

Mr. FROST, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 98-913) on the resolution (H. Res. 557) waiving certain points of order against consideration of the bill (H.R. 5973) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior and related agencies for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, and for other purposes, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

TRADE REMEDIES REFORM ACT OF 1984

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 504 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 504

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4784) to reform the remedies available to United States producers regarding unfair competition, and for other purposes, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means, the bill shall be considered as having been read for amendment under the five-minute rule. No amendment to the bill shall be in order except amendments recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means, which shall not be subject to amendment. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. FROST] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LATTA], for purposes of debate only, pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 504 is a modified closed rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Act of 1984.

Since H.R. 4784 is a complicated and intricate trade bill, the Committee on Rules granted the request of the Committee on Ways and Means and reported a modified closed rule which permits only committee amendments which are not subject to amendment. While there may be opposition to parts of the bill, or to the bill itself, it was the judgment of the Committee on Rules that to open the Trade Act of 1930 to amendment from the floor would be unwise.

This bill is the result of nearly a year and a half of effort on the part of the Subcommittee on Trade and the full Ways and Means Committee, and its provisions represent a delicately crafted compromise between a number of competing trade interests and viewpoints. The Committee on Rules, therefore, has reported this modified closed rule and recommends to the full House that this should be the procedure under which this trade bill is considered.

The rule also provides for 2 hours of general debate to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means and that the bill shall be considered as having been read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. Further, the rule provides for one motion to recommit.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4784 addresses a critical problem facing our Nation today: that of unfair trade practices by our foreign trading partners. The bill reflects the view of many American industries and many American workers that our current laws are inadequate to provide protection against a whole new array of subsidies and dumping practices by foreign governments and exporters. The bill is primarily designed to address four foreign trading practices that impact adversely on American industry and American workers through a significant expansion of the scope of the countervailing and antidumping tariff laws.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4784 is a complicated bill, but it is one that is worthy of consideration by the full House. I urge my colleagues to adopt this rule in order that the House may have an opportunity to adopt or reject the proposals of the Committee on Ways and Means on this most critical issue.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the statement just made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. FROST], and I find nothing wrong with it.

Mr. Speaker, under this rule there will be 2 hours of general debate on the Trade Remedies Reform Act. No amendments can be offered, expect amendments recommended by the Ways and Means Committee, which will not be subject to amendment.

Mr. Speaker, the bill made in order by this rule modifies the remedies available to U.S. producers regarding unfair import competition.

H.R. 4784 clarifies and expands the scope of the law to cover newer forms of unfair trade practices, such as foreign industrial targeting, upstream subsidies, natural resource subsidies, and downstream dumping.

The bill provides several definitions and guidelines to govern the agencies responsible for administering these laws on such issues as threat of injury, cumulation of imports, and coverage of likely sales or leases.

H.R. 4784 limits present discretion to terminate or suspend investigations on the basis of settlement agreements.

The bill mandates several significant procedural changes to reduce the burdens on the agencies administering these laws.

It establishes a centralized Trade Remedy Assistance Office in the International Trade Commission to assist industries in understanding and utilizing the many trade remedies available under U.S. law. It also mandates greater assistance to qualifying small business in preparing and filing trade remedy petitions.

It creates a Targeting Subsidy Monitoring Program in the International Trade Commission so that the Government will engage in a comprehensive and coordinated effort of monitoring and analyzing the industrial policies of our trading partners that may involve export targeting.

Mr. Speaker, at the time of the Rules Committee meeting the Office of Management and Budget provided a statement of administration policy strongly opposing this bill unless it is amended to delete certain specified provisions. The administration is concerned that these provisions violate the General Agreement of Tariffs and Trade and will be difficult or impossible to administer.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL].

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of a modified clause rule for H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act. Although I am vigorously opposed to several provisions in this bill, and intend to oppose the bill, I do not believe it would be wise to open this legislation up for amendment on the floor.

Legislating in the trade policy area always requires careful management because of strong political pressures to protect certain industries from foreign competition. This is especially true as we approach adjournment and the start of the official election season.

Therefore, I support the rule but urge my colleagues to join me in opposing H.R. 4784.

Although I endorsed the original intent, and am an original cosponsor, of this legislation to simplify the trade laws and to make them more effective in aiding workers and firms injured by unfair foreign trade practices, I must oppose the bill because of provisions relating to targeting, natural resource subsidies, and downstream dumping. All three of these sections directly violate our international trading agreements and threaten the benefits the United States gains from an open international trading system.

I believe the consequences of enacting this bill would be severe, impacting U.S. exporters directly and harming the important role of the United States as a leader in organizations such as the General Agreements on Tariffs and Trade [GATT].

I do not believe that U.S. exporters are willing to live by the precedents in international trade law that this bill would establish. The section on targeting, although it has now been removed at the request of the AFL-CIO, for example, would have created a definition so broad that it covers legitimate forms of government behavior, including many programs of the U.S. Government. Under the language of H.R. 4784, as it passed the committee, the purpose or design of government activity is overlooked and the effect of the program becomes the test of its legality as a subsidy. Proponents of this bill were trying to address foreign government practices aimed at making substantial inroads into specific sectors of the U.S. economy. However, the language of this legislation, if adopted by our trading partners, would allow them to apply countervailing duties on U.S. exports of semiconductors, computers, satellites, and many other products.

The provision on natural resource subsidies directly repudiates the principle of comparative advantage which is a basic concept underlying the recognized economic benefits of free trade. The provision is directly contrary to the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade which recognizes that a country should be able to manage the pricing of its resources, and conduct domestic programs, in order to encourage the social and economic development of its population. Instead, this bill would require that such resources be sold on the world market at a price established by less competitive producers, even though the low-price resource is available to any producer, foreign or domestic, in the home market.

The provision on downstream dumping directly violates the avowed intentions of the proponents of this bill to make simplifying, and GATT legal improvements to our trade remedy laws. Current law defines a dumped product as a product sold at less than fair value, whether or not its low cost can be attributed to a below-cost component. A dumping case is an allegation of one firm against the pricing practices of another firm. How the downstream dumping section of this bill would be administered is difficult to see. A third firm supplying components would not be liable for dumping duties and therefore would have no incentive to supply the most basic information on its business practices. The effect would be to force the Commerce Department to conduct highly uncertain, complicated investigations and make determinations based on little substantive economic information.

I intend to describe all of my concerns in greater detail during debate on this bill. I hope this House will look closely at the implications for all sectors of the U.S. economy—including exports, farm products, and high-technology products. Again I support the rule before you today but I urge my collegues to begin working with me to defeat H.R. 4784.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 504 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 4784.

□ 1755

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 4784) to reform the remedies available to U.S. producers regarding unfair import competition, and for other purposes, with Mr. BOUCHER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GIBBONS] will be recognized for 1 hour and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] will be recognized for 1 hour.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GIBBONS].

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984, as amended by the Committee on Ways and Means, contains extensive amendments of our countervailing duty and antidumping laws. These laws provide the terms and procedures for imposing offsetting duties as the fundamental remedy for American industries and workers against injurious and unfair import competition due to foreign subsidies and dumping practices. The antidumping and countervailing duty laws are vital to the maintenance of fair trade, because they provide the only real deterrence and remedies against these predatory and highly injurious trade practices. H.R. 4784 seeks to address the most serious and common complaints by the private sector about the scope and operation of these laws. The bill also improves their administration in order to make relief less time consuming and expensive, and thereby more readily available, particularly to small business.

More specifically, H.R. 4784, as amended by the committee, makes the following major changes in the application of the countervailing duty and antidumping laws:

First, it expands and clarifies the scope of these laws to cover newer forms of unfair trade practices such as subsidized or dumped inputs incorporated into final products—so-called upstream subsidies and downstream dumping—and natural resource subsidies.

Second, it limits discretion to suspend or terminate investigations on the basis of settlement agreements by requiring consideration of various public-interest factors and by eliminating forms of settlements that have not been effective.

Third, it provides guidelines to administering agencies in determining injury to domestic industries and to cover likely import sales and leases.

Fourth, the bill makes several procedural improvements, such as elimination of interlocutory judicial review, to reduce the legal costs and time necessary to obtain relief. At the same time, the bill preserves the basic principles of due process and transparency in the administration of these statutes.

Finally, the bill establishes a Trade Remedy Assistance Office in the International Trade Commission to assist businesses, and particularly small businesses, in utilizing the various trade remedy laws, and creates a continual monitoring program in the Commission on Foreign Targeting Practices.

The Committee on Ways and Means has given thorough, careful, and time-consuming consideration to the many proposals it received through hearings and administration and private sector comments for changes in the trade remedy laws.

While H.R. 4784 does not do everything that perhaps some would like to do, and it is not a panacea for all of our trade problems, it does help us keep the playing field level, it does help us make sure that if someone is wrongfully injured there is a remedy available to them, and the remedy will be one that is not so long delayed that it is no longer useful and too expensive to seek.

I want to say in conclusion that we have a very tough situation on our hands as far as trade is concerned. We are now running an annualized deficit in foreign trade of about $130 billion a year. Never in the history of this country has it been so great. I do not want to try to fool anyone. This bill will not cure that problem. That problem is primarily a problem that is caused by the fiscal policies that we have followed for years, the overvalued dollar that is a result of the high interest rates that we have, causing American products to face a lot of tough competition out there, even when the competition is fair.

This bill attempts to get at the unfair practices, the kind of unfair practices that have been outlawed under the GATT ever since the GATT came into being in the 1940's, and that were reaffirmed under the GATT by many of the signatories in the late 1970's. This bill, in my opinion, is within the letter and the spirit of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

I believe in an open, fair, competitive trading system, but subsidized and dumped trade is not fair trade. It is not free trade. It is, by definition, counter to all of that. American producers, American labor, have long complained that they have not had adequate remedies for these practices. This bill merely attempts to give them their day before the administrative agencies and if necessary in the courts to seek and get the remedy that they are entitled to and that they have long been promised, that is, to be free of injurious subsidies and to be free of dumped goods, unfairly dumped goods into that market. This bill provides nothing more and nothing less.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 6 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to H.R. 4784, the so-called Trade Remedies Reform Act. After witnessing with approval some surprising reversals of positions, which resulted in the Ways and Means Committee withdrawing the provisions on targeting, I believe the bill remains highly protectionist, and inconsistent with our international obligations under the GATT.

The simplifications provided in the bill, supposedly an important goal when this process began, have been more than offset by additional complicated definitions, administrative procedures, and studies that erode rather than improve the effectiveness of our trade laws.

When the Trade Subcommittee first began the process of receiving testimony on proposals to reform the countervailing duty and antidumping laws, the goal was to alleviate complexities and expense associated with achieving relief from unfair trading practices. The subcommittee believes that U.S. companies are confronting newer and more ingenious forms of dumping and subsidization at the same time the trade laws are becoming more difficult to use.

I agree with the subcommittee's belief, and tried to work for reasonably effective solutions, consistent with our international obligations. In the interest of achieving consensus solutions, I cosponsored the original bill. However, as the bill began to acquire more and more protectionist adornments, I was finally obliged to vote against it.

Unfortunately, the committee's objective of aiding our healthy industries as they try to compete fairly in the international market has become entangled in protectionist solutions which will only create new hardships and expenses for U.S. companies having the most success selling abroad.

Even with the targeting provision struck, the bill remains seriously flawed.

The natural resources provision represents a serious departure from longstanding U.S. and international practice regarding the definitions of subsidies. The provision defines a natural resource subsidy as the difference between the domestic price and the export price or, secondarily, the fair market value if the export price is distorted. This provision was designed to attempt to offset the comparative advantage certain countries have in natural gas, petroleum, and other natural resources and is inconsistent with the GATT.

The section is nothing more or less than a unilateral definition of subsidy which is clearly contrary to accepted—including our acceptance—international definitions. Congressman MOORE devised an acceptable substitute but the subcommittee rejected it in favor of the more protectionist language.

Although some industries feel that this provision will force supplying countries such as Mexico and Saudi Arabia to sell gas in their home markets at the world price, I believe this is unrealistic given the level of development and debt situation of these countries. In any case, the comparative advantage held by these countries in certain products goes beyond the natural resource input. It would make as much sense to declare arbitrarily that the difference between the wage rates in Mexico and the United States, or the difference in production costs between our two countries, are Government subsidies.

If we follow the logic of the subcommittee's provision to its inevitable conclusion, the European Community could declare as a subsidy the comparative advantage we have in fabric and fibers, and almost any country could declare as a subsidy our comparative advantage in agriculture. There is no justification for the assumption that the world price, or the export price, is the fair price. As a matter of fact, there is usually a range of prices for most commodities at most times.

Agriculture, of course, will be the big loser should the natural resource provision be enacted. Not only are agricultural producers the likely groups to be retaliated against when we restrict imports or circumvent the GATT, but also farmers would be hurt because of their heavy dependence on imported fertilizer. Imposition of extra duties on essential fertilizer imports would increase prices to U.S. farmers and adversely impact farm income. We hope farm income is beginning to recover and we should surely do nothing to threaten that recovery. Furthermore, American farm exports are expected to reach $38 billion this year and make up about 20 percent of all U.S. exports. Retaliation against farm products is not rhetoric. It is a real threat.

The motion to recommit would protect farm interests by relying on a determination of the GATT-sanctioned fair market value. A natural resources subsidy would be determined by the fair market value of such resource in the producing country, even though the subsidy might be generally available.

Meaningful trade reform also has been compromised by the section if this bill which tries to define and measure "downstream dumping" as an illegal practice. This section is probably the most flagrant illustration that the proponents of H.R. 4784 have failed to adhere to their initial pledge to uphold the letter and spirit of the GATT. Ariticle VI of the GATT defines dumping in specific terms as sales at less than "normal" or fair market value of a like product.

The product is dumped if sold at less than fair value, regardless of the price of the component; likewise, a product is not dumped if it is sold at or above the fair market value, whether or not its components are low cost. Under existing law, if an unfairly traded component is resulting in the end product being dumped, our antidumping duties apply. Indeed they have been applied for this reason in the past. I can see no purpose in the downstream dumping provision other than to create an administrative burden. It clearly violates the GATT, and the motion to recommit would strike it.

The defenders of this section failed to explain during committee consideration how the Commerce Department can possibly administer this provision. The Department says it cannot. As I said during debate on the rule, a dumping case involves an allegation of one firm against the pricing practices of another firm which is exporting to the United States. A third firm supplying components would not be liable for dumping duties and therefore would be under no compunction to supply even the most basic information on its business practices. We would be forcing the folks at the Office of Import Administration to proceed with the calculation of a dumping duty based on little or no economic information. I do not see how such an abstract determination adds certainty and fairness to our trade statutes.

Another provision that creates severe administrative burdens is section 104. This section requires the Commerce Department and the International Trade Commission to monitor imports from several different countries where injury to the domestic industry from dumping practices of one country has been established within the previous 2 years. The administrative burden could be tremendous for two already hard-pressed agencies as requests come in to monitor imports associated with the more than 90 outstanding dumping orders covering about 80 separate products.

Neither the GATT nor U.S. trade law provides a presumption of guilt on the part of one country because another country is dumping. In addition to the trade-chilling effect of this provision—one that could be easily used against our own exports—a web of bureaucratic activity will be created with little economic benefit. And the monitoring mandate is infinite in duration.

The motion to recommit will change this section to place the responsibility for any necessary monitoring with one agency—the Commerce Department which administers the dumping laws. However, there would have to be a determination that the evidence warrants monitoring in a particular instance. Frivolous complaints can be set aside and, only where a possible problem can be fairly identified, would monitoring be required.

I cannot close my discussion without pointing out that studies abound in this bill. The targeting provision will be replaced by four separate studies on foreign targeting practices—one each by the Departments of Commerce and Labor, the Trade Representative, and the Comptroller General. The ITC recently completed a comprehensive study on such targeting practices. As I said earlier, the bill already provides for a targeting monitoring program.

More tremendously burdensome studies will do nothing, I believe, toward solving thorny trade problems or toward identifying problems where they may not exist. Existing law allows us to countervail against Government-coordinated efforts to gain an unfair share of our market. Aggressive enforcement of our law where real problems exist is what we must continue to do—not call for more studies. The motion to recommit sticks with the one targeting monitoring program.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support the motion to recommit in order to remove the above problems with this bill and preserve the committee's initial objective to improve the countervailing duty and antidumping laws. There are needed simplifications and cost-saving measures in H.R. 4784 that should not be lost. But to enact these changes along with provisions that protect some industries at the cost of others and create tremendous administrative burdens would do more harm than good.

Our resources should be focused on simplifying the CVD and dumping laws and enforcing them fairly and surely.

I know this bill will be passed overwhelmingly. Every Member has a producer, or union, which feels aggrieved because of real or imagined unfair trade. Protectionism is strong in the United States. It is easier to vote for protection than to make the hard choices needed to reduce deficits and lower interest rates.

I make my lonely appeal knowing full well that protectionism is still waxing and that my appeal will not be needed.

Nevertheless, the appeal must be made. Protectionism is ultimately a long walk down a one-way street. This country took that walk in the early 1930's. I hope we will not begin such a stroll again today.

The administration vigorously opposes this bill. I include in the RECORD a letter from Secretary Baldrige and Ambassador Brock and Secretary Block of the Department of Agriculture have the same feeling.

The letters follow:

SECRETARY OF COMMERCE,
Washington, DC, May 15, 1984.

Hon. BILL FRENZEL,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR BILL: We are writing to express the Administration's opposition to H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984, as presently written.

Although H.R. 4784 contains a number of constructive changes in our antidumping and countervailing duty laws, its three major provisions make the bill unacceptable to the Administration. These provisions (1) define the so-called "targeting practices" of foreign governments as subsidies, (2) radically alter the definition of subsidies as to natural resources, and (3) expand the scope of the antidumping law to include downstream dumping. These provisions are contrary to the international obligations of the United States, represent dangerous international precedents, and pose direct or indirect threats to American exporters.

If the United States violates its international obligations, other nations would have a right to retaliate against U.S. trade under the rules of the GATT and its Codes. We should not subject American exporters to this risk. The United States should not enact rules prohibiting certain foreign practices unless we are prepared to have our own exports subject to the same rules under foreign mirror legislation. A detailed analysis of our opposition to these provisions is enclosed.

Although the Administration welcomes efforts to simplify the administration of our unfair trade laws to improve access to injured firms and workers, we cannot support any bill containing the three above provisions.

Sincerely,

MALCOLM BALDRIGE,
Secretary of Commerce.
WILLIAM E. BROCK,
United States Trade Representative.

Mr. FRENZEL. Even with the removal of the targeting provision, which is a huge improvement, I urge my colleagues to vote "no" on H.R. 4784 and "yes" on the motion to recommit. When I offer a motion to recommit for myself and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONABLE], I will attempt to correct those features of the bill which seem to me to be contrary to our international obligations and our own best interests and I will seek to preserve those parts of the bill which I believe are helpful to our trading policies.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, DC, May 21, 1984.

Hon. BILL FRENZEL,
House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FRENZEL: The Department strongly opposes H.R. 4784, which is to be considered shortly by the House of Representatives. H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984, contains three provisions which could cause great harm to American agriculture. This bill should not be enacted. The danger from enactment lies in the precedent such a law would set for interpretation of international trade agreements in ways that can be used against U.S. exports, as well as in the risk of immediate foreign retaliation where U.S. actions clearly violate these international agreements.

The first provision which we oppose attempts to deal with foreign industrial targeting practices by treating them as subsidies subject to U.S. countervailing duty legislation. Not only is the countervailing statute a poor one to use from a practical, administrative standpoint, but the extension of U.S. countervailing duty law to such practices could lead foreign governments to take similar action against our products. Other nations could, for instance, question the cooperative market development programs of the Foreign Agricultural Service and countervail against the products involved.

The second objectionable provision would extend U.S. countervailing duty law to cover foreign programs regulating the domestic sale of natural resources in a way that reduces their domestic sale price. Such programs are not now considered to be countervailable subsidies, because the natural resources are generally available to all domestic users, not just those who produce goods for export. If other governments adopted such a law, U.S. agricultural products benefitting from government irrigation or electrification programs, among others, could become subject to foreign countervailing charges.

The third harmful provision would extend U.S. antidumping duties to situations where the alleged dumping involves not the foreign exporter but rather the exporter's suppliers. Implementation of such a provision by the United States would put the United States in violation of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and the Antidumping code and lead to retaliation against U.S. exports.

The United States depends on exports to market the produce of nearly one of every three acres of cropland. These agricultural exports make a net contribution of approximately $20 billion to the United States balance of trade. Enactment of H.R. 4784 could cause irreparable harm to U.S. farmers. I urge you to oppose this bill.

Sincerely,

JOHN R. BLOCK,
Secretary.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. JENKINS], a member of our committee and subcommittee.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to engage the chairman of the Trade Subcommittee in a brief colloquy. I understand that section 110 of the bill which deals with interlocutory appeals may still contain language which refers to determinations by the Commission based on the size of the dumping margin or net subsidy. In the Ways and Means Committee we voted to delete a provision which would have given the Commission authority to base its decision on the dumping margin or subsidy level. Therefore, I would assume that this language in section 110 should have been deleted. Can the gentleman assure me that this language does not authorize such determinations by the Commission and that at some future point the necessary conforming changes will be made?

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. GIBBONS. The gentleman is correct. Regrettably, we should have deleted this reference in section 110. Let me assure you that this language deals only with the time periods for filing appeals with the Court of International Trade and in no way does it confer authority on the Commission to base determinations on the subsidy level or dumping margin. I also want to assure you we will work with the Senate to modify the language and correct the problem, but since it is a very minor technical change, I do not see any need for us to deal with it at this time.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I thank my subcommittee chairman very much for that response.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984. I commend my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee for their diligent efforts to bring this bill to the floor in such a timely manner. During 7 full days of extensive hearings and several more markup sessions, the committee was deluged with requests and suggestions for modification of present law by Members of Congress, executive branch officials, trade associations, labor unions, retail and consumer groups, individual companies, legal practitioners, academicians, and others.

An important concept underlying the committee's actions with respect to the reform of our trade remedy laws is that the international marketplace has changed rapidly and dramatically in recent years. Industries in the United States must rely extensively on the ability of our trade laws to ensure that free and fair opportunities exist for trade within our marketplace. The strength of our economy also depends upon the rules of trade and how they are enforced.

Most would agree that Congress must address the unfair challenges our domestic industries face in the international marketplace by fine-tuning present law. Our trade laws must adapt to the reality of trade problems which exist in the international business environment and the time for us to act is now.

I would like to point out several significant features contained in this bill. H.R. 4784 includes important provisions which require the Commerce Department and the International Trade Commission to take an activist role against persistent dumping of the same product by producers in different countries.

Section 104 of the bill is designed for the domestic producer who has brought a successful antidumping petition within a prior 2-year period and is plagued by a shift of the injurious dumping practices to producers in other countries. The provision strengthens present law which permits the Commerce Department to self-initiate investigations in cases where persistent dumping can be shown. If Commerce decides not to act following an allegation of persistent dumping, it would be required, along with the ITC, to monitor imports of the product for at least 1 year. This provision shifts some of the burden on the U.S. Government to initiate cases on behalf of producers encumbered by the necessity to file multiple trade petitions.

In section 105, the scope of the antidumping and countervailing duty statutes is broadened to include the more subtle unfair trade practices employed by our trading partners. The list of practices defined as subsidies is expanded to include the sophisticated techniques which governments now utilize such as export targeting, natural resource subsidies, and upstream subsidies.

The legislation also contains relief for the U.S. producers who are adversely impacted by the phenomenon known as downstream dumping. Foreign producers who buy dumped components for use in the production of goods destined for the U.S. market will not be allowed to pass on the unfair cost advantage to our market.

Finally, I would like to point out that this bill provides for the establishment of a Trade Remedy Assistance Office within the ITC to advise industries. Smaller firms without adequate revenues to gather data and bring cases to fight unfair trade practices will gain greater access to the remedies available by law.

The countervailing duty and antidumping laws are most frequently used by domestic industries harmed by unfair trade practices. It is therefore fitting that this bill addresses the necessary revisions to these provisions in the law. I know that the Trade Subcommittee intends to tackle the adequacy and operation of our other trade remedy laws at their earliest opportunity.

In conclusion, I believe that H.R. 4784 represents a thoughtful, pragmatic approach to U.S. trade policy and is completely consistent with our obligations under the GATT. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this bill.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984, before us today makes major changes in current trade regulations concerning procedures and definitions for imposing countervailing duties and antidumping duties in the Trade Agreement Act of 1979. The bill will streamline and clarify our basic unfair trade laws to address the growing problem of dumped and subsidized imports. H.R. 4784 addresses new unfair trade practices, reduces costs and delays, and improves administrative procedures.

Extensive hearings were first held by the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Trade in 1981 and 1982 in order to give all sides an opportunity to testify on improvements needed in current trade laws. The distinguished chairman of the subcommittee on Trade, SAM GIBBONS, worked diligently for many months to incorporate those ideas and suggestions into the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984. When the bill was first drafted, members of the Trade Subcommittee worked through many long sessions revising Mr. GIBBONS' original bill to remove some of the more objectionable provisions. Numerous revisions were made on the subcommittee level and in the full Ways and Means Committee on H.R. 4784.

In particular, I worked closely with AFTAC which is a coalition of 18 trade associations and 2 labor unions representing the fiber/textile/apparel complex of the United States in Trade Subcommittee and full committee to resolve their objections to the bill. The AFTAC coalition is representative of an industry with facilities in 50 States, with employment totaling 2.4 million and sales accounting for $105 billion. At a time when our trade deficit is reaching new record levels every month, we need relief more than ever to provide effective relief against foreign dumping and subsidies.

The bill, as passed by the Ways and Means Committee, is supported by AFTAC and I urge Members to vote for this important legislation on the floor.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCHULZE], a member of the Subcommittee on Trade.

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Chairman, as a cosponsor of the Trade Remedies Reform Act, I would like to emphasize my support for this legislation. I am pleased to have been a participant in the effort to bring this measure to a final vote. In particular, I commend my colleagues on the trade subcommittee for their cooperative spirit in developing a bill which addresses complex and rather subtle trade problems.

Without reiterating the specific provisions of this bill, I would like to underscore why this new legislation is vital to our Nation's domestic firms and workers.

We are all painfully aware of the record trade deficits which threaten American jobs and industries, last year for example, imports of foreign goods exceeded U.S. exports by $60 billion. This year the trade imbalance is estimated to reach over $120 billion, more than double the previous year's record shortfall. Since 1970, the United States has run a trade deficit in every year but two. In effect, America's trade sector has become embattled in a bitter fight with foreign imports, and many American industries and their employees are being sacrificed as innocent victims to a juggernaut of unfair imports.

Of course the causes of our Nation's widening trade gap are both numerous and complex.

One can point to the inflated value of the U.S. dollar abroad, or the demand for imports created by our strong economic recovery as reasons for the trade deficits. But these explanations provide only a partial answer. The fact is that our distressing trade picture is due in large part to unfairly traded imports. The extensive hearings held by the Trade Subcommittee on Trade Law Reforms clearly demonstrated the increasing scope and subtlety of foreign trade practices. New types of unfair practices such as upstream subsidies and downstream dumping are being employed in order to circumvent U.S. trade laws. These illegal trade practices have allowed foreign competitors to avoid prosecution under current trade laws with devastating success.

But even where our trade laws were clearly applicable, and enforced, foreign competitors still found ways to flout them.

A glaring, but far from isolated, example is the Brazilian Government's failure to fulfill its agreement to collect offsetting export taxes on subsidized Brazilian steel after the U.S. Commerce Department agreed to suspend its countervailing duty investigation.

Several American steel companies had filed countervailing duty petitions alleging that Brazilian steel imports were being subsidized by their Government, and were causing injury to American companies and loss of American jobs. The final determination of Commerce was that the subsidy was on the order of 10 percent.

Exporters of Brazilian steel were therefore enjoying an unfair price advantage over their unsubsidized U.S. competitors.

However, Commerce chose not to impose a countervailing duty to compensate for the unfair subsidy. Instead it agreed to allow the Brazilian Government to offset the subsidy by imposing an export tax on the steel as it left Brazil for the United States.

Such an arrangement is open to serious question when one realizes that the very entity which owns and subsidizes the steel company is the same one that was supposed to collect the tax. In fact, Commerce determined that the tax had never been collected. The Brazilians continued to ship steel to the United States and American firms and workers continued to be injured.

We can no longer allow American interests to suffer from such unfair trade practices. We must begin to address the full range of these trade problems with legislation which provides prompt and effective recourse for injured parties. And I believe the trade remedies reform bill before us today is an essential first step in that direction.

This measure is not a panacea for all our trade concerns, but it provides for necessary changes in our trade statutes. It reflects our commitment to begin the process of comprehensive trade law reform. We desperately need the new safeguards against unfair trade which this bill will provide, but we cannot remain content with these reforms alone. Congress must continue to respond to creative but illegal efforts to capture the American market with unfair trade practices. And we must be prepared to guard against subsidies and dumping from both market and nonmarket economies.

Today the United States is the world's largest market, and the most open and developed economy. We import and export more than any other nation, with two-way trade in 1983 totaling over $450 billion.

We are firmly wed to a policy of free trade and we have benefited from this unrestricted exchange of goods. But we must ensure that the free trade we support is not mistaken for acceptance of unfair trade. The trade remedies measure that we have drafted does precisely that and merits our support.

Again, I commend my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee for undertaking the difficult task of amending our trade laws. I now sincerely hope that we can all join in approving this legislation. By enacting H.R. 4784 we will be voting for an essential downpayment on America's trade deficit and establishing the groundwork for a future of balanced trade.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. KAPTUR].

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Chairman, I commend the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI, and the chairman of the Trade Subcommittee, Mr. GIBBONS, for their superb work on the Trade Remedies Reform Act, H.R. 4784.

One of the sections of the bill which I am most pleased with is the section which establishes a Trade Remedy Assistance Office in the International Trade Commission. The purpose of the office is to provide information to the public and to businesses concerning the remedies and benefits available under U.S. trade laws and the procedures and dates for filing petitions and applications under these laws. This section also includes a requirement that each agency with responsibility for administering trade laws provide technical assistance to small businesses to enable them to prepare and file petitions and applications required by the trade laws.

In my own district in northwest Ohio, I have heard from many small businesses about the nearly insurmountable problems experienced by them in trying to file and litigate cases. In some instances, the legal fees and other startup costs have deterred them from taking action. In other instances, widespread lack of information among small business groups as to the many types of trade remedies available under the law and the particular law under which a given complaint might best be pursued has deterred them from taking action. Finally, I have heard from small business after small business about the importance of developing a central office somewhere in the Government to disseminate and explain basic information about the various trade remedies available under our laws.

From talking with my constituents in the small business community, I have come to see that the establishment of a Trade Remedy Assistance Office is essential in order to minimize uncertainties about the types of remedies that should be pursued in particular situations. Although many large firms and industries are quite familiar with the complex maze of laws and procedures available to them, it is clear to me that a number of smaller companies have been frustrated by these complexities.

I commend Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI and Chairman GIBBONS for seeing the necessity of helping small businesses through the maze of trade remedy laws. The provisions in H.R. 4784 have been artfully crafted to aid American business.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PEASE], a member of the committee and a member of the subcommittee.

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of this bill, and in doing so I would like to begin by extending my praise and congratulations to the chairman of the Trade Subcommittee, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GIBBONS]. He has worked hard and long on this legislation. I think it is fair to say that it would never have come to the floor had it not been for his leadership and for his dedication to the proposition that American firms deserve to be relieved of competition that is unfair in terms of dumping and subsidies from other countries.

It is almost commonplace for us to talk about fair trade and free trade. Whenever anybody talks about free trade, they say, "Well, we are really for free trade, but we think it also ought to be fair trade."

Oftentimes fair trade is used as a code word for protectionism and the argument is raised, shall we have free trade unbridled with no restrictions on goods coming into the United States, or should we have a series of tariffs and import quotas and duties to protect America and its companies?

Well, what we are talking about today is not that argument. This is not an argument between those who would erect barriers and those who would eliminate barriers. What we are talking about today is something on which both sides, those who seek unbridled free trade and those who favor protectionist measures, should be able to agree on and that is that all companies and countries with which we trade should play by the rules of the game and that there should not be unfair and illegal dumping of foreign products into the American market and that there should not be unfair and illegal subsidies given to companies in other countries which compete with American firms.

This bill deals with upstream and downstream subsidies. It deals with dumping in a way that says to American companies sure, you have to compete with foreign competitors and you are going to have to be sharp enough to do that, but we will try to protect you from unfair competition from those foreign companies. I think that that is fair enough.

Another thing that we ought to be able to agree on is that if U.S. law is going to help American companies, it should help them soon enough so that they get the help before they go out of business. Time and time again for a small company which is attacked by dumping from overseas or by subsidized merchandise from overseas, the owners say if we are going to get any help, we have to get it soon enough so that we do not go out of business. This bill streamlines the procedures for dealing or bringing complaints of dumping or subsidies.

Additionally, this bill is especially helpful to small business because it provides for assistance to those firms in getting help in filing antidumping or antisubsidy complaints with the ITC and the Commerce Department. That is very important because the legal fees for bringing a complaint like this can often run to $200,000 or $400,000, which the average small company simply cannot afford. That is a very important part of this bill.

Again, I get back to the question of fair trade versus free trade. Is this protectionism? I say this bill is not protectionism. What we are doing is looking out for our own interests as Americans and what we are doing is not standing by while other nations take advantage of us in the international trade area.

I say to you that real protectionism will arise in this Nation and in this Congress if we do not take steps like this bill today to convince American companies, to convince American workers and the American public that they do enjoy the benefit of fair trade as well as free trade.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman.

Mr. PEASE. If we in the U.S. Congress, elected to represent the interests of American companies and American workers, cannot relieve American firms and American workers from unfair and illegal dumping and subsidies, then we do not deserve to belong in this Chamber.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly urge passage of this legislation.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL], the chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to acknowledge the fine work my distinguished colleague, the chairman of the Trade Subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee, has done in bringing H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984, to the House floor. The bill is timely, balanced and reasonable. I would also like to engage my good friend in a colloquy concerning the legislation.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I would be happy to do so. I would first like to thank my colleague, the chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, for the cooperation he and his committee have shown in working with us to improve the bill and bring it to the floor.

Mr. DINGELL. I thank the gentleman for his kind comments. Section 105(a)(1)(B) of the bill, as amended by the committee amendment, deals with natural resource subsidies. These are defined to exist when a natural resource is provided or sold by a government regulated or controlled entity for use in production of merchandise for export at a domestic price which is, by reason of such regulation or control:

I. Lower than the export price or fair market value in the exporting country and

II. Not freely available to U.S. producers for purchase of that product for export to the United States.

First am I correct that electricity is not a natural resource; rather it is a product which is manufactured from various natural resources such as water, oil, coal, gas, and uranium?

Mr. GIBBONS. That is correct.

Mr. DINGELL. Second, am I correct that such U.S. practices as the pricing of natural gas at different levels categories under the Natural Gas Policy Act or the pricing of electricity from the Tennessee Valley Authority or the Bonneville Power Authority would not meet the definition of a subsidy because the products in question—natural gas and electricity in these examples—are available to any new purchaser who comes into the market, whether foreign or domestic, on exactly the same terms?

Mr. GIBBONS. That is correct. Of course very little if any gas or electricity is exported from the United States. Nevertheless a subsidy could exist if a foreign customer coming into the market could not purchase these commodities on the same terms as a U.S. customer entering the market at the same time. The fact that some U.S. purchasers may have cheaper rates based on contracts signed in the past does not constitute a subsidy under the meaning of the bill if no discrimination, and hence no commercial unfairness, is involved. Foreign firms could have purchased these commodities on similar terms had they been in the market at that time. While foreign firms could not get similar terms now—neither could domestic U.S. firms. At any given moment in time, both domestic and foreign firms can purchase the commodities in question on similar terms. This nondiscrimination between domestic and foreign firms in the purchase of natural resources does not exist in fact—and often not in name—in some other countries. It is discrimination which is commercially unfair and it is discriminatory practices to which the bill is directed.

I should also point out that Government regulation, per se, does not constitute a subsidy. All governments are entitled to regulate their resource distribution; it is only when governments discriminate and thereby distort natural comparative advantage that we look for a subsidy.

Mr. DINGELL. I thank the gentleman for his assurances and urge support of the bill.

□ 1830

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute.

With respect to the foregoing colloquy, it is fair to say the gentleman from Michigan points out one of the problems which I and other Members have repeatedly raised with this bill.

In this House we can tell people what we think the bill means. We cannot tell our trading partners what they think the bill means when they begin to structure their mirror legislation. They will do what is in their best interests just as we have done what is in our best interests.

It is obvious that electricity is subsidized in the United States, particularly in the seaway area and in the Pacific Northwest. Products like timber and aluminum with a high electricity cost component will be attractive targets for other countries retaliation. And those who vote for this bill can expect, in my judgment, that our trading partners are going to enact mirror legislation which is going to punish American exports. Those exports may be from my district or from Michigan, or anywhere. And if you vote for the bill, that is what you can expect.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOORE], a distinguished member of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I especially appreciate Chairman GIBBS extending me that opportunity. Let me state at the outset that I am an ardent supporter of free, but fair trade.

Currently, there are some governments which are, through regulation, setting an artificially low price for a natural resource, such as natural gas, used as a raw material in the production of an exported chemical. That preferential rate is available to manufacturers within their own country, but not to purchasers outside the producing country, and as a result, these foreign manufacturers are granted an unfair competitive advantage when they later export the finished product to the United States at, in effect, a subsidized price because of their access to artificially inexpensive natural gas. That is unfair trade.

What a government does within its own borders to enhance internal economic development is not our concern. But the international trading system is disrupted when subsidies conferred by artificially low prices are exported to other markets in the form of products. When U.S. industries and workers are injured by unfair practices, this Congress has the right and the duty to act.

The major problem facing our petrochemical producers is that certain foreign governments use the policy of two-tier natural resource pricing. These governments make resources like natural gas and oil available to their own industrial users at an artificial, below-market price. At the same time, these governments export energy resources to other users only at a much higher price. This policy does two things: it protects a government's home market from competition and it clearly subsidizes exports of resource intensive products like petrochemicals.

The natural resources provision is a compromise. During the Ways and Means Committee consideration, I offered language to provide that a fair market test only be used in determining the benchmark price. The language I offered would have set criteria requiring the Commerce Department to change its policy of the general availability test to a more comprehensive test by taking into account the world price, the generally available price, cost of production, market depression, and dual pricing. It did not include the export price as a benchmark as the bill presently does. This fair market value only test will be offered in the motion to recommit. I support the language presently embodied in H.R. 4784, however, even though using the export price as the benchmark price may not be as GATT defensible as the use of a pure fair market value test.

This natural resource provision currently included in the bill requires the following: First, it must be shown that a natural resource is sold by a Government-controlled entity to an industrial user at a price set below either the export price or the fair market value by Government control or regulation. Second, the access to the natural resource's low domestic price is denied to competing producers for export by Government regulation and, third, the cost of the resource at its fair market value constitutes a significant portion of the production cost of the product in question.

The petrochemical industry in Louisiana provides a good example which can be examined to measure the current effect of foreign subsidization on U.S. markets and to look at what the future impact may be without legislation to correct the problem.

Today, more than 45,000 people in Louisiana are members of the manufacturing work force of the petrochemical industry and 900,000 nationally, in the manufacturing of commodity and specialty chemicals. This represents sales of all types of chemicals totaling more than $170 billion.

As was shown in the U.S. International Trade Commission's April 1983 report, developing nations such as Saudi Arabia, Indonesia, Kuwait, Canada, Mexico, Soviet Union, and the People's Republic of China will be placing an increasing importance on the development and growth of their petrochemical industries and will be devoting government resources to this expansion. Because of this rapid development, many questions arise, but the most obvious result is a reduced U.S. share of the total export market and in some cases the United States may even become a net importer of certain petrochemicals.

In 1980, for example, the United States claimed 45 percent of net exports for ethylene. According to the International Trade Commission, the United States will be a net importer of ethylene by 1990. In every major chemical, ethylene, ammonia, and methanol, the U.S. percentage of world capacity will decline as developing nations gain control. The United States will no longer enjoy the leader status in this area. Not only will we no longer be leaders, but we will be faced with the impact of a reduction in the $170 billion the chemical industry contributes to our economy and a reduction in the number of jobs that nearly 1 million people are dependent upon.

If the United States is going to remain competitive in the petrochemical market, the unfair advantage of foreign subsidization must be offset with a reasonable countervailing duty which reflects the real subsidization. There is a delicate balance that must be achieved in determining the level of subsidization. Clearly, inaction does not solve the problem or help achieve the goal of countervailing duty laws. It is for this reason that I support efforts to fairly determine the level of subsidization of natural resources by foreign governments.

If we do not move to correct this example of unfair trade, I fear subsequent congressional action will end free trade. Free trade must be fair to survive politically.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CRANE], a member of the Subcommittee on Trade.

Mr. PHILIP M. CRANE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to H.R. 4784. Despite our initial intent, the Committee on Ways and Means has reported a protectionist piece of legislation which will threaten the ability of the United States to maintain a leadership role in furthering the cause of free trade. This bill would invite retaliation on the part of our trading partners because it directly violates international trading agreements. H.R. 4784 stretches and adapts internationally accepted definitions to specific import problems particular U.S. industries are facing. In considering this legislation we must keep in mind that other countries will not hestitate to adopt similarly contrived definitions of subsidy and dumping against our exports. The disruptive effect this would have on our trading relationships is enough to outweigh all the other beneficial changes in the bill.

The upstream subsidy section is an attempt to write into law a unilateral action against primarily Mexican products made with natural gas supplied by the Government to domestic operations at a price which covers the cost of production, but is lower than the U.S. price or the world price. Several U.S. industries disagree with the Mexican practice of exporting natural gas to export markets at the higher prevailing world price. Internationally agreed practice, however, has been not to treat the comparative advantage of a country as a subsidy if it is generally available to all local producers, whether they be exporters or producers for the home market, and whether they are nationals or foreign investors. This practice rests on the assumption that all sovereign governments ought to be able to allocate resources in a way they believe most beneficial to the long-term economic and social development of their country. While this policy does not address every inequity, it has been adhered to because opening up all generally available subsidies to countervailing duties would be unworkable. Such a practice on our part would give us little recourse when duties were applied to U.S. exports produced with generally available subsidies in this country. Even if our trading partners stick strictly to the natural resource limitation in the bill, U.S. exports of agricultural and textile products would still be vulnerable.

The second dangerous provision would extend existing dumping laws to cover foreign products whose components were supplied at an alleged dumped price. Besides being in violation of the General Agreements on Tariffs and Trade, this provision would be impossible for the Commerce Department to administer in any fair or defensible way. A dumping duty can be applied under current law when a product is shown to be sold in the United States at a price that is less than the fair market value in the home market. This is measured on an individual firm-by-firm basis. In trying to extend dumping duties to cover component parts, the authors of this section have been forced to measure dumping of a component part using an aggregate price in the home market as the benchmark. This would have the effect of penalizing suppliers of components who were efficient enough to supply their product at a price lower than the local industry average. Also the bill uses a dumping definition that has not been accepted internationally. Producers selling goods in their home market at below cost of production, for example, is not considered dumping.

The proponents of the bill have failed to explain during any of our committee meetings how this provision would be administered. The fact is it would require numerous simultaneous dumping investigations on many products, multiplying workloads at the Commerce Department with no hope of ever fairly resolving the problem at hand. A purchaser of components may have no idea he is buying dumped products. In order to defend himself against a dumping charge he and the Commerce Department would have to rely on information the component supplier would have no incentive to provide.

Mr. Chairman, our international trading system cannot long survive if the United States resorts to such contrived interpretations of internationally agreed standards in order to please isolated groups. In my view, it is our responsibility to resist requests for further import restrictions. The best defense the United States has against unfairly traded imports is to uphold internationally agreed precepts of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. This is the only way we will discourage our trading partners from erecting more import barriers that harm our successful export sectors. There is little justification for compromising the future of U.S. industries that are most involved in world markets in order to shield other industries having difficulty facing competition from abroad. H.R. 4784, I believe, would be one more step in that direction. I urge my colleagues to defeat the bill and to vote yes on the motion to recommit.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RUSSO] a member of our committee and of our subcommittee.

Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4784 and urge its speedy adoption by the House. I will not go into too much detail about the many important provisions of the bill. They have been fully explained by the committee. Let me just say that when taken together they represent a significant improvement over current law in dealing with the problems of dumping and subsidies in international trade.

I want to quickly mention four good reasons for supporting this bill. First, it addresses many new types of trade distorting practices such as upstream subsidies and downstream dumping. These are growing commercial problems that the administration has not dealt adequately with, and failure to expand the scope of these laws could render them obsolete. Second, the bill provides necessary assistance to small business groups, who are often locked out of the process because of the costs and complexities of these statutory procedures. Such assistance is vital if we are to protect the small businessman in Ohio or the family potato farmer in Maine from dumped and subsidized imports. Third, the bill provides more effective monitoring of persistent dumping problems, so that the Government will assume a greater burden in providing an early warning system. And, fourth, the new definitions and procedures in the bill will assist all parties—domestic and importer—by making these laws clearer and less costly to administer.

In the Committee on Ways and Means, I worked closely with other members to improve the settlement provisions of the bill. These improvements were strongly supported by industries such as steel and textiles who are very concerned about having a rational policy for settling antidumping and countervailing duty cases. The committee amendment preserves the authority of the Secretary of Commerce to enter into quota arrangements if they are in the overall public interest and provides the most expeditious procedure for allowing the Secretary to take such a step. I feel that this is an important tool in our arsenal to deal with the problems of unfair trade, and I am extremely grateful to Chairman GIBBONS for his support in this matter.

This bill is crucial to American industries who are trying to cope with a devastating trade deficit and with the growing problem of foreign government subsidies and other predatory practices.

Once again, I urge my colleagues to vote favorably on H.R. 4784.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COATS].

Mr. COATS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss one particular aspect of our antidumping and countervailing duty laws. And if I may have the attention of the gentleman from Florida, the chairman of the Trade Subcommittee, I would like to ask a question concerning the legislation before us today.

My concern is aided by the now-famous case involving the documented dumping of Japanese color televisions in our markets in the late 1960's and 1970's. This case is of particular concern because it contributed to widespread hardship in the domestic television industry, including the closing of a Corning glassworks plant in Bluffton, IN.

As the chairman of the subcommittee will recall, the Treasury Department began an investigation of Japanese color television imports in 1968, based on a complaint by the Electrical Industrial Association. Three years later, in 1971, Treasury concluded that Japanese color TV's were, in fact, being dumped in U.S. markets.

Through the early and mid-1970's, however, the Government made little progress in assessing antidumping duties. In 1977, Treasury recognized that it faced a mounting backlog of imports and sought to develop a shortcut method of calculating and assessing duties. Through the commodity tax method the Department estimated that $400 million in duties were due on Japanese TV imports through March 1977. But as soon as the Government tried to collect these duties the importers protested and the Treasury Department was forced to reevaluate its methodology.

In 1979, the Congress approved several important trade law reforms. First, Congress passed the Trade Agreements Act of 1979 which contained extensive procedural safeguards for domestic industries, including rights to participate in the assessment phase of antidumping proceedings and to obtain judicial review of assessment determinations. The Congress also registered its frustration with Treasury's handling of antidumping matters by transferring jurisdiction to the Department of Commerce.

In early 1980, the Department of Commerce used a revised methodology to calculate a total estimated liability on Japanese TV imports through March 1979 of almost $139 million. However, facing a 9-year backlog of imports and believing that attempts to collect $139 million would result in substantial delay, the previous administration entered into settlement negotiations with 22 major television importers. These negotiations resulted in an agreement with importers to pay $66 million in duties and $11 million in penalties.

Unfortunately, the domestic television industry was never involved—or even consulted—in these negotiations. Representatives of the industry have said that their first knowledge of the compromise came on the day in April 1980 that the agreement was made public. Their surprise and concern is understandable, given the fact that the Trade Act of 1979, which gave domestic industries the right to participate in antidumping proceedings, had become effective on January 1, 1980.

When challenged, the Department of Commerce cited as authority for its action section 617 of the Tariff Act of 1930, a provision which had never before been used to compromise antidumping duties. The domestic television industry sought to overturn the settlement agreement in the courts but their fight ended last year when the Supreme Court declined to review the case.

I realize that we cannot do anything today about what happened in 1980 under a previous administration. I am however, concerned with future antidumping cases in which the Government might seek to use its authority under section 617. I believe this authority is completely inconsistent with the reforms approved by the Congress in 1979. Under the Trade Act of 1979, domestic industries have the right to participate in antidumping proceedings. But if the Government attempts to compromise the settlement as they did in the television case, the domestic industry and its workers appear to have no rights at all. This does not seem to me to be what the Congress intended in 1979.

As the chairman of the subcommittee is aware, I introduced legislation last year to prohibit the use of section 617 for settlement of antidumping and countervailing duty cases. Let me emphasize that it was not my intent to prohibit the Government from seeking settlements or compromises. To the contrary, it is clear that in certain cases it would be in the best interest of all parties to seek a compromise settlement. Instead, my goal was to restore the integrity of the procedural reforms adopted in 1979 and to assure that the interests of one industry are not compromised—without question—by pressure from another domestic industry or another foreign country.

If I could inquire of the gentleman from Florida, the chairman of the Trade Subcommittee, did the subcommittee consider this matter and, if so, are there any provisions in the legislation before us that would limit the use of section 617 of the Tariff Act of 1930?

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COATS. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, yes, the amendments proposed in your bill were considered during the committee's deliberations on H.R. 4784. However, Members felt that the Government should retain the right to settle claims under section 617 of the Tariff Act of 1930 if satisfactory resolution of a case is not otherwise possible, just as it has the right to do in other civil actions. Section 617 does enable the Government to obtain some recovery in unusual circumstances in which there is a high risk that there may be no recovery of compensation because of legal uncertainties about the case or because of importer insolvency. The Commerce Department expects the authority would be used only in rare and exceptional circumstances in the future as a way to promote enforcement.

There has been no case comparable to the TV settlement since 1979. Furthermore, amendments in the Trade Agreements Act of 1979 and in the trade remedies bill make it highly unlikely that a similar situation would arise again in the future. As you know, the TV case continued for several years before the Government finally settled it. Under the 1979 act, however, the time limits for investigations were shortened considerably. That act also transferred administration of the countervailing duty and antidumping laws from the Treasury Department to the Department of Commerce. A provision in the trade remedies bill would eliminate interlocutory judicial review, which has resulted in lengthy procedural delays in resolving cases. At the same time, interested parties would retain their rights to judicial review of all determinations at the end of investigations.

With respect to consultations, amendments in the 1979 act ensure that all interested parties are informed, consulted, and have the opportunity to submit information throughout investigations and in the assessment of duties. The Commerce Department is also required by the 1979 act to notify petitioners and other interested parties and provide them an opportunity to comment before it accepts any form of settlement under the antidumping or countervailing duty laws that would result in suspension or termination of investigations.

The gentleman can be assured that the Subcommittee on Trade maintains continual oversight of the operation of these laws, including possible settlements of individual cases.

And I may say in conclusion that it was that TV case itself that spurred much of the 1979 act and the transfer of these functions from one agency to another, because I do not know of anyone in Congress who was satisfied with the way that case was handled.

I appreciate the gentleman inquiring about it.

Mr. COATS. I thank the chairman.

I thank him for his attention to this important issue and for his deliberation and concern, for his continued attention to this matter in the future.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] a member of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, for over a year and a half now I have been warning that the future of the U.S. petrochemical industry is jeopardized by a new and subtle form of subsidy being provided by some of the energy-rich countries to their growing petrochemical firms. Now, the House of Representatives has an opportunity to modernize our trade laws to deal with this type of subsidy—called two-tier pricing—and give U.S. firms a fair opportunity to compete in the United States and international marketplace.

After a decade of growth and prosperity, the U.S. petrochemical industry has suffered the ravages of the recent recession and intensified competition from foreign firms. The industry faces a painful period of adjustment. Many feel that this industry is beginning a long period of decline. There is a worldwide excess in production capacity for many petrochemicals, exports and domestic sales are only now rebounding from the recession, and the overvalued dollar is hurting all U.S. companies facing foreign competition. The adjustments which these circumstances are necessitating will occur no matter what Congress does on this trade remedies legislation.

There is, however, no way that even the most efficient U.S. petrochemical firms can compete if foreign governments are permitted blatantly to subsidize their own new firms. We may not have much control over some of the problems facing this industry but at least we can take action with respect to these subsidies.

Indeed, how we respond to these subsidies may well have a major bearing on the extent to which bulk petrochemicals will continue to be produced in this country. Our action here will affect thousands and thousands of jobs in many regions of the country, including my home State of Louisiana.

The key inputs in the production of petrochemicals, of course, are petroleum and natural gas. When a foreign government supplies these production inputs to their own petrochemicals plants at a fraction of the world market price, the petrochemicals can be produced at a fraction of the cost of production for U.S. producers, which must pay the world market price for these production inputs. Indeed, this discount price for petroleum and natural gas permits foreign petrochemical producers to cut their production costs to one-fifth or even one-tenth those of our petrochemical producers. Obviously, this gives these foreign producers an insuperable competitive advantage in world and U.S. markets.

No discrimination would be involved in this situation and no unfair competitive advantage would be conferred by this subsidy if these foreign governments would sell oil and natural gas to U.S. producers at the same discount price. But, of course, some of these countries won't do this. The discount price is only available to their own producers, and the petroleum and natural gas is sold to U.S. producers only at the higher world market price. This is playing both ends against the middle and we shouldn't stand for it.

It is obvious to me that this two-tier pricing system confers a valuable subsidy. Think for a minute about this. If the foreign petrochemical producers had to buy oil and natural gas from any supplier other than their own government, they'd have to pay world price. The only reason these foreign producers can obtain oil and natural gas at a discount price is because their own government is willing to subsidize the price. There is no difference between this two-tier pricing system and direct government subsidies to help the petrochemical firms buy petroleum and natural gas.

Furthermore, the governments which are conferring this subsidy are quite honest about what they are doing. In the case of Mexico, the Government admits—explicitly—that the purpose of the two-tier pricing scheme is to foster exports.

The U.S. Commerce Department is oblivious to the problem. In two cases involving petrochemical imports, it has argued that no subsidy is involved because the two-tier pricing system applies to all the petrochemical firms in the country, not just to one particular petrochemical firm. This rationale is absurd. When a foreign government makes a subsidy available to more than one firm, it doesn't mean that the subsidy ceases to be a subsidy. It just means that the subsidy is widely available, which means that the practice is even more outrageous. The Department's interpretation of the countervailing duty law is strained and, according to the recent Bethlehem Steel case before the International Court of Trade, probably contrary to law.

While it is obvious we are dealing with a subsidy here, it is more difficult to determine precisely what remedy should be available to U.S. producers who are adversely affected by the subsidy. The approach taken in H.R. 4784 may not be perfect, but after working on this issue for so long, I think it's the best we can come up with. I hope we can refine the language as we proceed through the legislative process.

What we have to be sure of with this language is that we do not adversely affect U.S. trade relations with countries that do not engage in two-tier pricing. H.R. 4784 already contains language intended to make this clear but it may be possible to improve on it. I am open to discussions on this question.

The economic stakes in this effort to deal with two-tier pricing are immense. There are some who see the U.S. petrochemical industry as the next auto or steel industry. Others see it as inevitable that most petrochemicals will be produced in the energy-rich countries, with U.S. producers able only to preserve a niche in specialty petrochemicals. But think about what this would mean. In Louisiana alone we have invested $35 billion in petrochemical plants and these plants employ more than 30,000 people. Indirectly the petrochemical industry in Louisiana accounts for employment of 75,000 more people. All told petrochemicals account for one in four jobs in Louisiana.

In addition, if the production of basic, bulk petrochemicals does shift overseas due to such practices as two-tier pricing, does anyone believe that production of specialty petrochemicals will not eventually shift there as well? When U.S. petrochemical facilities close, oil and natural gas suppliers will lose one of their largest customers—raising the prices for oil and natural gas to all remaining customers. Finally, when petrochemicals like fertilizer are produced abroad, we will be open to the same interruptions in supply and the same price manipulations as we have suffered with oil imports. This will jeopardize the interests of both farmers and consumers.

The challenge facing the U.S. petrochemical industry is different from that faced by many industries that come before this Congress. Fortunately the impact of petrochemical imports is only beginning to be felt and the industry is not yet on its knees begging for help. Foreign petrochemicals facilities are just beginning to be built. Initially the energy-rich countries have targeted ammonia, carbon black and a few other bulk petrochemicals, which is why so much of this debate has focused on these commodities. But, in time, as new plants are built one by one, other petrochemical producers will awaken to the impact of two-tier pricing.

In this legislation we have a rare chances to take action before the damage is done. We have a chance here to ensure that the U.S. petrochemical industry will have a fair opportunity to compete—and to adjust. By providing an adequate remedy for two-tier pricing at this time, the Congress can avoid some of the inevitable calls for Government assistance that will be heard if the industry loses its competitive edge. Given a fair chance to compete, we can welcome international competition. It will bring benefits to both producers and consumers in this country.

Finally, let me emphasize that this legislation is not protectionist. What the bill does is approach the problem of two-tier pricing within the context of GATT. It simply provides U.S. petrochemical producers the opportunity to prove—on the merits—that foreign governments are engaged in unfair subsidy practices. If our producers cannot prove their case, no countervailing duty will be imposed. This is the process that was set up and sanctioned by the GATT. Indeed, our entire international trading system would be in jeopardy if our country—the strongest supporter of free trade—permitted other countries to evade the GATT subsidy standards. Our country has the responsibility both to defend and to enforce GATT. It is both our right to do so and our duty to do so.

If the Commerce Department finds that an illegal subsidy is involved, it should take action. Certainly in taking action some of our trading partners may be affected. But it would be counterproductive for our country to close its eyes to illegal subsidies solely to avoid offending our trading partners. This would only sacrifice one class of U.S. producers for the benefit of another. If we are fully within our rights to take action to offset the unfair advantage conferred by a subsidy, there can be no legitmate basis for any retaliation against any U.S. exporter.

The international debt crisis does complicate all of these questions. But, in my view, tolerating the trade abuses of the debtor countries is not an appropriate response to the pressure that these countries feel to increase exports. This approach would place the principal burden of adjustment on those U.S. companies that are in competition with the debtor country, an unfair and indefensible result. This would jeopardize the $35 billion Louisiana petrochemical industry. Rather, what we need to do is take drastic action to put our economic house in order, bringing down the interest rates that are making debt repayment impossible for many of these countries. In addition, we must continue to provide strong support to the International Monetary Fund and multilateral development agencies that are trying to help during the painful readjustment period.

In short, I do not view the natural resource provision as a protectionist measure. It arises from the GATT itself, permitting U.S. producers to defend themselves against illegal subsidies. Our country has just as much right to avail itself of its remedies under GATT-sanctioned procedures as any other country. That is what this provision is all about.

Some opponents of this bill, including the administration, have raised fears of retaliation against our grain and other farm exports if this bill becomes law. I come from a district that has both heavy petrochemical production and farming interests, so in considering this legislation it has been particularly important to me to balance these two interests. In my view the fears raised about retaliation against our farm exports are unwarranted and unjustified. We must always be sensitive to real threats of retaliation, but we should be careful to evaluate whether these threats, in fact, are real or just feigned.

China recently threatened to cancel grain purchases over a textile quota revision dispute. That revision of textile quotas was not the result of a specific finding that textiles from China were being dumped or subsidized. That dispute was resolved satisfactorily with no losses to our farmers and without sacrificing U.S. textile manufacturers. There have been cases recently where imports from China were found to be dumped—an unfair trade practice, as is subsidization—and there have been no threats at all.

It is our legal right to offset subsidies. That right is recognized by most countries. This bill does not set quotas or block imports. It is not like a section 201 case where no unfair trade practice is involved. Any retaliation to a legal subsidy finding by the United States would be unjustified and illegal under international trading rules.

Even unjustified retaliation is not much of a threat. We are the residual grain supplier to world markets for all intents and purposes. Other countries do not retain surpluses from year to year. If one country switched to another supplier besides the United States, alternative markets for our grain would necessarily be forced open as shipments were diverted from other markets.

U.S. farmers know well the effect of subsidies by other countries on grain and food. We cannot submit to subsidies on fertilizer imports which farmers buy and have any hope of eliminating subsidies by other countries that reduce our farmers ability to sell grain abroad. That sets us on the path of having to subsidize both our farm exports and our own fertilizer business to maintain the farm economy. That is not the way America should go. We have started to draw the line on agricultural subsidies by other countries. We must also draw the line on subsidized fertilizer imports.

Otherwise we subject our farmers to shortages and higher prices for fertilizer essential to their crops, or we are forced to resort to subsidies ourselves. These subsidized importers increased their ammonia prices by 50 percent in 1984 to capitalize on the increased demand of U.S. farmers and the reduced production capacity of the U.S. fertilizer industry. In the short and long run both, we are not going to help our farmers by sheepishly submitting to unfair trade practices. We must stop them.

In conclusion, after many months working on this legislation I have concluded that it presents a balanced, fair, and appropriate response to a very real threat faced by the U.S. petrochemical industry. Trade legislation always is exceedingly complicated and I have talked with many who are concerned about this legislation. I have listened to their comments, evaluated them and taken their concerns into account. This legislation may not be perfect. But I think it is well crafted, does not exceed the boundaries of GATT, and will give our U.S. petrochemical industry a chance to compete—on fair terms—with any petrochemical producer in the world. I urge my colleagues to adopt this bill.

PETROCHEMICAL TRADE LEGISLATION: CHRONOLOGY

October 28, 1982: Anhydrous ammonia producers petition Commerce Department for countervailing duty to offset subsidy to Mexican ammonia producers.

November 3, 1982: Carbon black producers petition Commerce Department for countervailing duty to offset subsidy to Mexican carbon black producers.

January 21, 1983: Gillis Long writes to the Chairman of the International Trade Commission in support of petition by anhydrous ammonia producers for investigation under section 337 of Mexican ammonia imports.

February 24, 1983: I.T.C. denies petition for section 337 investigation.

March 28, 1983: Commerce Department issues preliminary determination in anhydrous ammonia case, holding that the two-tier pricing system in Mexico does not confer a subsidy.

April 4, 1983: Commerce Department issues preliminary determination in carbon black case, same ruling.

May 16, 1983: Gillis Long writes to Commerce Department asking for explanation on ruling that two-tier pricing system does not confer a subsidy.

June 10, 1983: Commerce Department issues final determination in anhydrous ammonia case, reaffirming preliminary determination.

June 11, 1983: Gillis Long announces that he is drafting legislation to reverse the Commerce Department's ruling on two-tier pricing.

June 16, 1983: Commerce Department issues final determination in carbon black case, reaffirming preliminary determination.

June 28, 1983: Commerce Department answers Gillis Long letter on two-tier pricing, explaining basis for ruling.

August 4, 1983: Gillis Long introduces H.R. 3801, amending the countervailing duty law to provide remedy for two-tier pricing subsidies.

October 20, 1983: Ways and Means Trade Subcommittee holds hearing on two-tier pricing of energy inputs and on H.R. 3801. Congressman Long submits statement.

February 8, 1984: H.R. 4784 introduced by Congressman Sam Gibbons containing provision on two-tier pricing.

February 29, 1984: Trade Subcommittee reports H.R. 4784 with two-tier pricing provision intact.

April 3, 1984: During mark-up in full Ways and Means Committee motion to strike two-tier pricing provision rejected by vote of 26-2.

April 10, 1984: Ways and Means Committee reports H.R. 4784 by vote on 17-3.

May 17, 1984: House Rules Committee holds hearing on H.R. 4784 and reports H. Res. 504.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, June 21, 1984.

Mr. ROBERT E. COLE,
Vice President, Kaiser Aluminum,
Washington, DC.

DEAR BOB: I very much appreciate your letter of June 12 regarding the Trade Remedies legislation. As you know, I have been working on the question of natural resource subsidies for over a year now. The subject is exceedingly complicated and I can understand your concern.

Your statement submitted to the October 20, 1983, hearing on the natural resource provision raises some astute questions about the issue, but it is my understanding that the issues you raise largely are dealt with adequately in the legislation that finally emerged from the Subcommittee on Trade and the full Ways and Means Committee. In October none of us knew the precise form the legislation would take.

You mention, for example, that in some countries the price of a natural resource input is substantially—and legitimately—below the world or U.S. price because the country has no alternative uses for the resource, thus, depressing its price. You cite flared natural gas as an example. This is an excellent point and in the legislation the "availability or lack of access to export markets" explicitly is mentioned as a factor to be considered in determining the nature and extent of any alleged subsidy (page 27, line 13-14). In implementing the legislation, therefore, it will not be surprising if the Commerce Department finds in certain cases that no subsidy exists despite the fact that the input price is substantially below world or U.S. prices for the same commodity.

In terms of your various comments about electricity generation, it has never been my understanding that electricity generation is covered by the natural resource provision. Although the term "natural resource" is not defined in the legislation, it seems clear to me that electricity is not a natural resource, but, rather, is created by mechanical means. I for one would be happy to stipulate that electricity generation is not covered by the provision. In any event, as with the pricing of natural gas inputs, discussed above, it is quite clear that no subsidies need be involved just because electricity generated in one manner is priced below that of electricity generated in one manner is priced below that of electricity generated in another. Each price may well be a market price despite wide differentials.

Specifically with regard to electricity produced by hydropower, it does not appear that the natural resource subsidy provision would apply. Water is a natural resource, but it is not being priced at less than fair market value to produce electricity. The charges are for the electricity. There is no government charge for the water. It is not "sold" in that sense. To the extent hydroelectric power cannot be exported to the United States or any other market, it is the same as Middle Eastern gas. However, if it is made freely available for use by all producers in that country, that demand would be setting the price. In that event, no subsidy is involved, even if there are price differentials. The subsidy occurs where the government intervenes to prevent equivalent market access and market forces to set prices. It is under those circumstances that a country is exercising its comparative advantage.

There is a related issue on irrigation projects in which water is sold. As best as we can determine, the contract prices reflected fair market value at the time the contracts were negotiated on both federal and state projects. Market values change over time due to shifts in supply and demand, but any user is entitled to the benefit of a contract negotiated at arm's length between a willing buyer and seller (the basic definition of fair market value). In addition, irrigation water is provided to a specific industry and, thus, presumably would be covered by current law. Yet, I am not aware of any cases charging that this is a countervailable subsidy.

The bill also is quite careful not to rely solely on U.S. prices as the benchmark in determining whether or not a subsidy is involved. Indeed, the Department must look at world prices, market clearing or average U.S. prices, comparative advantage and availability of export markets in making this determination. None of these separate factors is dispositive. In addition, it is "market clearing" prices, generally available to U.S. producers, not just prices generally available to U.S. producers, to which the bill turns. It is intended that current market clearing prices be considered. Market clearing would factor out "artificially high prices". Incremental pricing initially appeared to raise gas prices to some industrial users in favor of residential customers. Incidentially, most current analyses now indicate that current prices to industrial uses are at market clearing levels.

Trade legislation, whenever it is enacted, will have some impact on existing investment and trade relationships. In this case, we are addressing the natural resource pricing issue before it has had much impact on U.S. industries. This is quite unusual; normally, Congress only responds when a U.S. industry is on its knees and seeking direct protection. In terms of petrochemical production, for example, the energy-rich countries are just beginning to develop their plans and build their facilities. That is why it is so important to act now to define the terms-of-the-game so that we can avoid the dislocation that inevitably comes when a legislative response comes much later in the business/trade cycle.

What the natural resource subsidy provision tries to do is draw the line between those countries whose governments are overtly manipulating the price of energy to their own industries to the exclusion of competitors, and those that provide equivalent access to both the price of energy and investment in production facilities. Of course, not all governments are attempting to discriminate and increase exports through subsidization of energy costs below market value. But those that do cannot claim that their actions merely reflect comparative advantage. Rather the advantage is a contrived one.

The stark contract between market and manipulated energy pricing is best illustrated by comparing the Mexican approach to energy pricing to that of certain Middle Eastern countries. Mexico intentionally sets its internal energy prices, including natural gas prices, to domestic industrial uses below market values and insists on receiving a much higher border price for gas exports of $4.40 per mcf., limiting exports to 300 million cubic feet per day. These limits were negotiated with the U.S. Department of Energy in 1979-80. U.S. DOE changed these rules for all gas imports in February 1984, and the Mexicans have no economic reason to continue this practice. Mexico has been flaring gas, but not because of lack of access to export markets. We understand they are now capturing up to 98 percent of previously flared gas and are delivering it to new, world scale ethylene facilities. PEMEX, however, has not completed downstream facilities to utilize the ethylene, and so is now flaring the ethylene. PEMEX is both the government energy monopoly and the basic petrochemical monopoly. They maintain extremely high tariffs on most petrochemical imports and limit ownership and control of foreign investment in downstream petrochemical products to less than a majority.

In contrast, most Middle Eastern countries are flaring associated gas because they do not have sufficient competitive access to export markets for their gas. In addition, they have adopted more liberal foreign investment policies that allow control particularly over marketing of the products, by the private partners in these ventures. The bill recognizes both the "natural advantage" of abundant supplies and the limited export access of the natural resource. "Fair market value" under those circumstances would not be determined by comparison to prices "generally available in world markets" or in U.S. markets. Net back of transportation and handling costs of liquified natural gas would also be taken into account. Finally, to the extent natural resource prices were "negotiated" in the past at market values at that time, those would not be considered subsidized prices at below fair market value.

I recognize that there are foreign policy implications in most international trade matters. Countries that establish subsidies later determined in a case to violate current U.S. trade law or the GATT Subsidies Code would also be impacted immediately. The natural resource provision is sufficiently limited in scope that it will offset only genuine unfair subsidies that distort the allocation of resources within an economy and distort trade. It will not countervail arbitrarily against countries which are pricing natural resources in a way that reflects true comparative advantage and fair market value.

There is no intent whatever to harm Third World economies. We are trying to protect U.S. industry and consumers from unfair government subsidies of a few countries. Such unfair practices result in less competition and ultimately higher prices for consumers by forcing the shut down of efficient U.S. producers—more efficient than these subsidized competitors.

The case of nitrogen fertilizer and ammonia is a good example. In 1982-83, when grain prices were low and the PIK program was in place, there was an unprecedented drop in fertilizer demand in the United States. U.S. ammonia producers cut back production by 30 percent and permanently closed 13 percent of U.S. ammonia capacity. This was on top of an earlier shakeout of production capacity in 1979-80, as new plants came on line and old plants retired. U.S. nitrogen exports dropped 33 percent. But nitrogen fertilizer imports increased 10 percent! Mexico doubled its ammonia exports to the United States in 1982, and both Mexico and the Soviets increased their share of the market in 1983!

With the expiration of the PIK program and a rebound in demand in 1984, the Mexicans increased their prices and reduced their exports to the United States. The Mexicans raised their import prices to $180 per ton in January 1984, from $120 per ton in the summer of 1983. The Soviets followed suit. There suddenly was no "cheap" ammonia, imports were reduced by unilaterial decisions of foreign governments, but U.S. capacity and production had been cut back and had to struggle to take up the slack. If the weather had cooperated, demand would have been much higher and shortages could have occurred. As it was, demand for the year ending June 30, 1984, looks like it will be about at 1982 levels—hardly a banner year for either farmers or fertilizer manufacturers.

The industry has survived this situation and the market is more or less in balance for the moment, but another oversupply/price depression cycle could spell real trouble—trouble for U.S. farmers who must have assured fertilizer supplies exactly at the time the weather says to fertilize. They cannot wait for some foreign government monopoly producer to decide whether it will sell them ammonia or not. As you may know, a large percentage of the U.S. productive capacity in ammonia is located in my district.

Two-tier pricing as practiced by Mexico is clearly the kind of subsidy that should be offset or eliminated under the fundamental criteria defining such subsidies in both U.S. law and international trading rules. It distorts the allocation of resources within that economy. It provides special assistance, protection and incentives for energy-intensive industries to overproduce and export. It increases exports and decreases imports beyond what the market would do. It is blatantly unfair and trade distorting, and it has injured U.S. producers—even in relatively small volumes—by oversupplying a commodity market and depressing everyone's price. You are in the business and you know what happens. It's great when you can buy cheap imports, but it doesn't help much if you cannot resell them because of insufficient demand. With ammonia for example, now when ammonia demand rebounds, imports are no longer cheap.

This is not the sort of import competition that will increase competition and lower prices for consumers. It drives out efficient competition and afterwards results in higher prices to our farmers. This legislation is directed only at unfairly subsidized petrochemical imports—not fairly traded imports. I believe this legislation is necessary to halt these unfair practices, so the marketplace can set prices and determine competition. If we do not do this much, then we are headed for the conflicts and problems which you fear and point out so well in your testimony. If subsidy practices like this keep increasing, then our alternative to this amendment is to match those countries subsidy for subsidy. I know that is not the result you seek, nor is it what I seek.

Imports of subsidized petrochemicals is a growing problem, one that will have a severe impact on the economic prospects for Louisiana and firms in my district.

I hope you understand that I am not saying that the legislation is without its problems. I hope you will review the points I have made in this letter and continue to bring your concerns to me, and to others involved with this issue, as this legislation progresses through the legislative process. We need your expert advice and should continue this dialogue until we all know as much as possible about the effect of this legislation.

With warm personal regards, I remain,

Sincerely,

GILLIS W. LONG,
Member of Congress.

BRIEF ON U.S. COURT OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE DECISION REJECTING COMMERCE DEPARTMENT'S USE OF THE BROAD RULE THAT GENERALLY AVAILABLE BENEFITS ARE NOT SUBSIDIES

(Prepared on Behalf of Ad Hoc Committee of Domestic Nitrogen Producers, June 25, 1984)

On June 8, 1984, the United States Court of International Trade (CIT) issued a Slip Opinion 84-67 that struck down the Commerce Department's broad rule that "generally available" benefits are not countervailable subsidies. The Court's decision refutes the Administration's principal objection to the Natural Resource Subsidy provision of H.R. 4784, "The Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984." The decision occurred in the appeal of Bethlehem Steel Corp. v. United States (Court No. 82-10-01369) on a South African Steel Case, which was affirmed on separate grounds.

THE COMMERCE DEPARTMENT RULE ON "GENERALLY AVAILABLE" DOMESTIC SUBSIDIES

In this case, the International Trade Administration (ITA) of the Department of Commerce ruled in September 1982 that a certain tax program "was not a bounty or grant." The ITA stated the general rule in that case that "our interpretation of the Act and past practice is that generally available benefits are not bounties or grants." 47 Fed. Reg. 39383. ITA read Section 771(5) of the Trade Agreements Act (19 U.S.C. § 1677(5)) as limiting countervailable domestic subsidies to those which are given to only one company or industry, or to a limited group of companies or industries, or to companies or industries in a limited region or regions of a country. ITA stated that Congress did not intend to require the assessment of countervailing duties for programs which benefited all industries. ITA reasoned that Congress intended that the term "subsidy" be given the same meaning as "bounty or grant" and stated that generally available programs had never been considered to confer a "bounty or grant."

THE COURT OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE REJECTS THIS BROAD RULE

The Court states in response to these assertions by ITA, "The Court rejects the broader rationale that, as a rule, generally available benefits are not subsidies." p. 5. (Italic added.)

The Court determined that the natural meaning of the phrase in Section 771(5) of the 1979 Act, "domestic subsidies, if provided or required by government action to a specific enterprise or industry, or group of enterprises or industries," covers situations in which benefits are given to a single enterprise or to as many as possible. (Italic added.)

The Court found that ITA's application of the "generally available" rule departed from Congress's intent: "The idea that a subsidy can exist only by means of a specific designation or singling out of a favored group from the productive sector has no support in logic or law. . . . A law created to deal with the advantageous effects of such benefits as are enjoyed by imports to be sold in the U.S. is hardly concerned with whether the challenged imports are the only beneficiaries or just one of many." p. 14.

Referring to ITA's argument and the structure of the language in the law using "illustrative examples," the Court stated, "From this extremely narrow position, [ITA is] seeking to erect a monumental diversion of the course of the countervailing duty law. The structure of this provision, the context of the prefatory material, and the words of the crucial phrase do not support the defendants' [ITA] position." p. 9. (Italic added.)

In reviewing the comprehensive and inclusive nature of the language of the Act and the legislative history, the Court stated, "this context alone dissolves the plausibility of the appearance in its midst of a momentous exception for 'generally available' benefits." p. 13. (Italic added.)

The Court then ruled, "A broad exception for practices or benefits which are generally available is rejected for the following reasons: It is contrary to the fundamental purpose of the law. It is not expressed in the statute. It is not to be read into the law by virtue of legislative history. It has not entered the law through legislative recognition of past administrative interpretation. Finally, it is not needed in order to avoid absurd or ridiculous applications of the law in individual cases." p. 10.

The Court also examined past cases and prior administrative practices (pp. 16–24) and found that "The plain meaning of this provision and its context does not suggest that 'generally available' benefits are excluded from the definition of subsidy." pp. 16–17.

THE COURT'S STATEMENT OF THE LAW

This opinion stands for the proposition that "The fundamental purpose of the countervailing duty law is to provide a special duty to eliminate the advantage an imported product may obtain from forms of assistance termed 'subsidies.' p. 10. "The primary object of the law is the removal of the advantage of a subsidy or the elimination of injury caused by products possessing the advantage of a subsidy." pp. 10–11. "From the point of view of the objective of the law and those whom it was meant to affect, the extent to which subsidization is practiced in the country of production is entirely immaterial." p. 11.

In the opinion of the Court, "Congress has covered the full range of possibilities, going from the subsidization of a single unit to all larger units, up to and including the entire productive sector." p. 14. The Court further stated that, "[T]he entire productive sector of a nation's economy is nothing more than a group of enterprises or industries." p. 14. The Court also noted that the words "generally available" are not found anywhere in the law.

THE CONCLUSION OF THE COURT: THE STANDARD IS "COMMERCIAL FAIRNESS"

The Court concluded that, "If we examine the specific examples of domestic subsidies listed in the statute we are at a loss to understand what ameliorating or transforming effect can possibly arise from the extension of these benefits to the entire economy. Can it be argued that financial assistance which is inconsistent with commerical considerations is no longer a subsidy when it is part of the basic policy of a government and available to all businesses? This approach cannot be reconciled with the fundamental purpose of the law which must extend to certain commercial advantages even when a country has chosen to make them universally available. The question is not what is normal in the economy under investigation, but rather what is reconcilable with the standards of commercial fairness envisioned by this countervailing duty law." p. 16. (Italic added.)

"As stated earlier, the Court's analysis of the law persuades it that the formulation in this proceeding of a broad exception for generally available benefits is contrary to the plain meaning and intention of the countervailing duty law." p. 24.

THE RECENT ORIGIN OF THE "GENERALLY AVAILABLE" RULE

The Court found that what was developing in administration of the law prior to this case was "not an exception for generally available benefits, but an exception for benefits which flow from certain basic types of government activity" (p. 22) such as general tax benefits and the building of wharves.

The Court noted that, "The first administrative determinations which unequivocally attempted a broad exception for generally available government programs were the determinations in the carbon steel investigations, one of which is here under judicial review. This is no more than a contemporary interpretation of the law by an administrative agency which we address in this opinion." p. 24.

The steel cases referred to were decided in August and September of 1982.

CONTROVERSIAL SUBSEQUENT APPLICATIONS OF THE "GENERALLY AVAILABLE" RULE LEAD TO THE FORMULATION OF THE NATURAL RESOURCE SUBSIDY PROVISION OF H.R. 4784

Subsequent to the steel cases in 1982, a series of cases were decided based on the same broad, exclusionary "generally available" rule. Some of those cases were: Ammonia, Carbon Black and Cement from Mexico, and Softwood Lumber Products from Canada. Other issues in some of these cases could have otherwise determined the outcome, but those issues were not determined because ITA applied the exclusionary "generally available" rule.

In the case of ammonia from Mexico, the subsidy at issue was two-tier pricing of natural gas used to make ammonia. The Mexican government established a single gas price for all domestic industrial users set below the export price to the United States and below the current market clearing price of gas in the United States. Ammonia is produced, sold and exported in Mexico only by PEMEX, a government monopoly, which is also the monopoly producer, seller and exporter of oil and gas wholly owned by the state.

ITA preliminarily determined that the gas pricing differential (between the lower domestic price and the export price) conferred neither an export subsidy nor a domestic subsidy on ammonia exports since all industrial users in Mexico could obtain gas at the same price. Using the "generally available" rule, the ITA determined that two-tier pricing did not provide a bounty or grant to a "specific enterprise or industry or group of enterprises or industries."

In the final ruling, the ITA again examined the Mexican gas pricing policies under which gas is provided to PEMEX and other domestic industrial users "at a price well below a commercially reasonable rate." The ITA again ruled that this pricing policy does not confer a bounty or grant that is counteravailable under U.S. law, because the lower price is "generally available" in Mexico.

As a result of this ruling, ITA reached an absurb result. It was discovered during the investigation that PEMEX gas production costs were higher than originally thought and actually exceeded the "generally available" industrial use price for gas. The ITA ruling meant that the "generally available" gas price was still not a counteravailable subsidy, even though that price was below PEMEX's own gas production costs.

IMPLICATIONS OF THIS COURT DECISION FOR THE NATURAL RESOURCE SUBSIDY PROVISION OF H.R. 4784

The Administration based its primary opposition to the Natural Resource Subsidy provision of H.R. 4784, in an April 3 letter to the Ways and Means Committee, on the "generally available" rule. It stated that this provision represented "a major departure from longstanding U.S. and international practice regarding the definition of a subsidy," because domestic subsidies are counteravailable "only if provided to a specific enterprise or industry or group of enterprises or industries."

In the April 3 letter, the Administration referred to an earlier case on "generally available" benefits, Carlisle Tire and Rubber Co. v. U.S. 564 F.Supp. 834 (1983). In that case, the Court of International Trade had ruled that any attempt to countervail all general domestic programs would be unadministerable and yield an absurd result. In the recent South African steel case, the Court distinguished that same case, finding "[The Court] does not see the alternative as being either the absurd assessment of countervailing duties on all beneficial acts of government or the exclusion from the effect of the law of all benefits which are generally available in a country. Both of these extremes have their absurdities." p. 28. (Italic added.)

The South African steel case just decided makes it clear that:

(1) The Natural Resource Subsidy provision is not a major departure from existing law; in fact, the ITA's application of the "generally available" rule is itself a major departure from the intent and purpose of the countervailing duty law.

(2) This rule has not been a longstanding U.S. and international practice regarding the definition of a subsidy, but, in fact, was first used by the ITA less than two years ago.

(3) "Generally available" benefits may be countervailed if they are "positive beneficial acts" as opposed to "the contraction of the exercise of governmental power" as are most general tax provisions like depreciation and investment tax credits. The standard is the "commercial fairness" of the subsidy practice, not whether it is made "generally available" to all industrial users.

In its April 3 letter, the Administration made the categorical statement that "Generally available domestic programs do not distort the allocations of resources within an economy." As the recent finding of the Court suggests, this categorical proposition is not defensible. It stands to reason that some positive beneficial government programs could cause such distortions and be subsidies. For example, natural gas priced below its commercial market value could create an incentive to develop excess production capacities in energy-intensive industries such as ammonia, cement, carbon black, or petrochemicals in general, but does not provide the same incentive for other industries. Obviously, such a subsidized gas price provides an enormous benefit to energy-intensive industries as compared to only a nominal benefit for all others. Under such circumstances, this subsidy practice provides a strong incentive to export excess production at marginal prices with little regard for supply/demand conditions in U.S. markets. The Court of International Trade has determined that the bestowal of the benefit and its commercial fairness are the critical features, not whether the benefit is given to one industry or all industries.

Based on the incorrect premise that no countervail against certain "generally available" programs would depart from both "longstanding" and "internationally accepted" practice, the Administration incorrectly concludes in its April 3 letter that the Natural Resource Subsidy provision of H.R. 4784 could violate GATT. The Subsidies Code was added to the GATT in 1979 and the current statutory language was then incorporated into U.S. countervailing duty law amendments in 1979. The ITA did not assert the "generally available" rule until late 1982. There could be no justifiable retaliation by any GATT member country or any other country solely on the basis of general availability of the subsidy practice. The Natural Resource Subsidy provision is consistent with the original intent of U.S. countervailing duty law and with GATT.

The pricing of energy below its "fair market value" can provide financial assistance, particularly to energy-intensive industries, which bestows an unassailable benefit on those industries' exports. It is inconsistent with commercial considerations. It violates the standards of commercial fairness envisioned by the countervailing duty law, and should clearly be countervailable under U.S. law and international trading rules. Failure to make such subsidies actionable leaves us only with the alternatives of sacrificing the U.S. basic petrochemical industry to subsidized foreign producers or subsidizing the U.S. industry ourselves.

THE ECONOMIC IMPACT OF THE PETROCHEMICAL INDUSTRY IN THE UNITED STATES, LOUISIANA AND TEXAS

(Prepared on Behalf of Domestic Nitrogen Producers' Ad Hoc Committee, by Margo Thorning, Ph.D.)

INTRODUCTION

The purpose of this paper is to provide estimates of the direct and indirect impacts of the petrochemical industry on the national economy, as well as on that of two major petrochemical producing states, Louisiana and Texas. In addition to providing information on the petrochemical industry as a whole, four key sectors of the industry are examined: polyethylene, methanol, ammonia and carbon black. These four sectors are the most vulnerable to unfair foreign competition from producers using government subsidized energy inputs. Some of the statistical data shown in the tables, particularly that for 1983, are estimates, and should be regarded as indicators of the relative importance of an industry rather than as exact figures. (See Appendix A.)

I. DIRECT EMPLOYMENT AND INCOME IMPACTS

To determine the amount of employment and income directly generated by the petrochemical industry requires that the industry be properly defined. Accordingly, the Standard Industrial Classification (SIC) scheme of the Bureau of the Census is used in this paper. Petrochemicals are those chemical materials which use hydrocarbons as raw materials. The petrochemical industry is the composite of eight four-digit sectors of Chemicals and Allied Products (SIC 28). These eight industries manufacture primary and intermediate petrochemical materials. The materials are used to manufacture products such as cellulose plastics, synthetic and silicone rubbers, yarn (man-made fibers), all kinds of dyes, creosote, freon, isopropyl alcohol, saccharin, fertilizers, and carbon black. Detailed analysis of four of the eight petrochemical industries is provided in this paper including plastics and resins, industrial chemicals, nitrogenous fertilizers and carbon black. Among the important products produced in this subset are polyethylene (SIC 2821), methanol and ethylene (SIC 2869), ammonia (SIC 2873), and carbon black (SIC 2895). (See Appendix A for SIC designations.)

The direct employment and income impacts of the petrochemical industry include only the jobs and earnings generated strictly with the industry itself and do not include the effect on other sectors of the economy. The indirect impacts examine the effects of changes on suppliers, as well as unrelated sectors of the economy.

A. EMPLOYMENT EFFECTS

The petrochemical industry provides a relatively small amount of employment in the manufacturing sector in the United States as a whole, because petrochemical production is a captial, as opposed to labor-intensive, industry. However, it is important in major producing states such as Louisiana and Texas, where it ranks high as a source of jobs. For example, 11.6 percent of Louisiana's manufacturing employment was in the petrochemical industry in 1983; the comparable figure for Texas was 4.4 percent (Table 1).

Certain sectors of the petrochemical industry are particularly important to employment in Louisiana petrochemical industry in 1983 were provided by the four key sectors: plastics and resins, industrial chemicals, nitrogenous fertilizer and carbon black. These same four industries provided 90.8 percent of the jobs in Texas' petrochemical industry.

B. INCOME EFFECTS

The effect of the petrochemical industry on income can be gauged by examining data on sales, value added and payrolls. In 1977, sales of the U.S. petrochemical industry were $53.0 billion; by 1983, they had increased by 45 percent to $76.6 billion (Table 3). Petrochemical sales increased by 53 percent in Louisiana and 58 percent in Texas, to $9.3 and $21.8 billion, respectively.

Value added is a more complete measure of the effect of an industry on income than is sales. Value added includes the income earned by labor and sole proprietors, as well as dividends and interest paid, and profits earned by those who have invested capital in the industry. In 1983, the petrochemical industry was responsible for $28.1 billion of the total income generated in the United States; and for $3.6 billion and $9.1 billion of the income earned in Louisiana and Texas, respectively.

Payrolls (which are included in value added) are another indication of the industry's importance. Direct wage and salary outlays were over $7.5 billion in the U.S. petrochemical industry in 1983. The industry paid over $600 million in wages in Louisiana and $1.3 billion in Texas in 1983.

The majority of sales, value added and payroll in the petrochemical industry is generated in the four key sectors: plastics and resins, industrial chemicals, nitrogenous fertilizer and carbon black (see Table 4). In 1983, for example, sales in these four sectors were 75.1 percent of the total petrochemical sales for the United States. In Louisiana, sales in the four sectors dominated the industry with 93.5 percent of the total; in Texas, the comparable figure was 86.6 percent. As Table 4 shows, the four sectors constitute a significantly larger share of the Texas and Louisiana petrochemical industry than of that of the United States as a whole.

II. THE INDIRECT IMPACT OF THE PETROCHEMICAL INDUSTRY

The direct impact of the petrochemical industry was described above. However, these data present an incomplete picture of the importance of the petrochemical industry to the United States and to states in which the industry ranks high in employment and sales. The reason that direct estimates such as sales, value added and employment in petrochemicals understate the industry's importance is that these measures do not take into account the fact that the industry buys from and sells to many other sectors.

Furthermore, the direct impact data presented in Section I ignore the effect of the spending for goods and services done by petrochemical employees and by employees in industries which supply the petrochemical industry. In addition to understating the private sector effects, the direct impact analysis does not take account of the tax revenues received by the local, state and Federal governments from the petrochemical industry.

Therefore, any change in the economic wellbeing of the petrochemical industry will have effects on the employment, income and tax payments of industries and individuals in many other sectors of the economy. When economic conditions cause a job to be either created or destroyed in the petrochemical sector, a chain reaction throughout the state is set in motion. This chain reaction, or multiplier effect, causes additional jobs to be created or lost in the state.

Various estimates of the size of the multiplier effect exist. The one chosen here to analyze the effect of a change in sales in the petrochemical industry on a state's economy is an average based on a survey of the major economic forecasting models. The average of the multipliers was 2, meaning that a $1 million increase in sales in the petrochemical industry would generate a total of $2 million of increased spending over the course of a year.[1] If petrochemical sales continue at the new higher level in succeeding years, an additional $2 million in spending will be created each year. Part of the increase in spending would be paid to the local, state and Federal government in tax revenue. Therefore, if petrochemical sales increase by $1 million in the states of Louisiana or Texas, for example, total spending will increase by $2 million over the course of a year. It should be noted that multiplier effects work in reverse. If the state of Louisiana loses $1 million in petrochemical sales, a total loss of $2 million in spending will result. As a consequence of the spending decline, jobs and tax revenues will also be lost.

It is possible to examine the consequences of an increase in petrochemical sales on specific industries which directly supply the petrochemical industry. These effects can be measured using the imput-output (I-O) tables produced by the Bureau of Economic Analysis at the U.S. Department of Commerce. An I-O table is a matrix of numbers which describes the direct interactions between all of the industries in the United States.[2]

Using the I-O table, the effect of a $1 million increase in sales in the petrochemical industry is estimated; the results are shown in Table 5. While the coefficients used here were designed for the national economy, they can also be used to estimate the impact of a sales increase on individual states. Approximately $616,000 in new sales in other industries which directly supply the petrochemical industry will occur as a result of $1 million in new sales in the petrochemical industry. Conversely, a $1 million loss in sales will result in a decline in sales in related sectors of $616,000.

III. EFFECT ON GOVERNMENT TAX REVENUES

The petrochemical industry contributes directly and indirectly to Federal, state, and local tax revenues. The multiplier concept described in Section II also applies to tax payments to the three levels of government. If sales rise in the petrochemical industry, the industry itself will pay more taxes; this is the direct impact. Indirect effects on tax revenues consist of taxes paid by employees of the petrochemical industry, and of industries which serve as suppliers and their employees. Although the indirect impact on tax revenues is probably larger than the direct effect, its measurement is complex. Accordingly, only direct impacts are estimated in this paper.

At the Federal level, the petrochemical industry paid approximately $1.4 billion, or 2 percent of total corporate tax payments in 1980 (the last year for which data are available). State and local tax payments by the petrochemical industry are not readily available. However, an idea of the importance of this industry to major petrochemical producing states can be gleaned from examining data from CF Industries' Louisiana petrochemical plants. These data indicate that each plant operating in Ascension Parish paid $79,000 in property taxes in 1983.[3] Each plant also paid about $100,000 in state and local taxes, for a total of $179,000 per plant. Assuming that millage rates and local sales taxes in Ascension Parish are typical of other parishes, each closing of a plant costs the state and parish $179,000 in property and sales taxes.[4] This estimate of the loss of tax revenue from a plant's closing is understated because of possible accompanying decreases in corporate income tax payments to the State of Louisiana. The revenue loss estimate is further understated because it measures only the direct effect and ignores the indirect effects caused by decreased sales and tax payments of the plant's suppliers.

[2] "Summary Input-Output Tables of the U.S. Economy: 1976, and 1978 and 1979," U.S. Dept. Of Commerce, Jan. 1983.

[3] Louisiana has a policy of granting a manufacturer a 10 year exemption on most property tax categories (inventories are not exempt) when a firm builds a new plant in the state.

[4] If the closed plant were less than 10 years old, the loss of tax revenues would be smaller.

APPENDIX A: METHODOLOGY USED IN ESTIMATING THE DIRECT IMPACTS OF THE PETROCHEMICAL INDUSTRY

Data on employment, sales, value added and payrolls for the U.S., Texas and Louisiana petrochemical industry for 1977 were obtained from the Bureau of the Census, U.S. Department of Commerce, and the Bureau of Labor Statistics, U.S. Department of Labor. Estimates of these data for 1983 were made in the following manner. First, ratios of sales to employment and average wages were made for each of the eight petrochemical industries using the 1977 Census of Manufacturer's data published by the U.S. Department of the Census. Second, a consistent employment series based on the 1977 Census data was estimated using the 1977-1983 change in employment in each petrochemical industry provided by the U.S. Department of Labor. Third, the ratios of sales to employment and average wages for 1977 were multiplied by the estimated 1983 employment to generate 1983 sales, value added and payroll. The 1983 estimates were adjusted for the inflation which has occurred since 1977.

APPENDIX B: THE MULTIPLIER CONCEPT USED IN ANALYZING THE PETROCHEMICAL INDUSTRY

The multiplier of 2.0 used in the analysis in this paper is an average of those of seven major economic forecasting models. These models were developed by: The Bureau of Economic Analysis, U.S. Department of Commerce; The Brookings Institution; The University of Michigan; Data Resources, Inc.; The Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis; the MIT-Penn-Social Science Research Council; and The University of Pennsylvania.

The major variables used in the seven economic forecasting models developed by the institutions listed above are assumptions about: (1) The marginal propensity to consume, (2) the marginal propensity to invest, (3) the marginal propensity to import minus the marginal propensity to export, (4) tax rates, and (5) interest rates. Each model is based on a particular set of assumptions about the size and strength of the above variables.

APPENDIX C: MAJOR PRODUCTS OF THE EIGHT INDUSTRIES INCLUDED IN THE PETROCHEMICAL INDUSTRY

The Standard Industrial Classification (SIC) Code developed by the Bureau of the Census classifies the major products of the petrochemical industry as follows:

1. SIC 2821: Plastic Materials, including polyethylene and nylon resins, and cellulose plastic materials.
2. SIC 2822: Synthetic Rubbers, including silicone rubber and fluorocarbon rubbers.
3. SIC 2824: Synthetic Fibers, including acrylic, olefin, polyester and vinal fibers.
4. SIC 2843: Surfactants, including textile scouring compounds, leather finishing agents, emulsifiers and soluble oils and greases.
5. SIC 2865: Cyclics and Aromatics, including benzene, organic color pigments, food and cosmetic dyes.
6. SIC 2869: Acyclics and Aliphatics, including ethylene and methanol, saccharin and freon.
7. SIC 2873: Nitrogenous fertilizers, including ammonia, urea, nitrogen solutions, and nitric acid.
8. SIC 2895: Carbon Black, including carbon black, furnace black and channel black.

REBUTTAL OF ADMINISTRATION OPPOSITION TO NATURAL RESOURCE SUBSIDY PROVISION OF H.R. 4784

(Prepared by the Ad Hoc Committee of Domestic Nitrogen Producers)

FOREWORD TO REBUTTAL

The April 3, 1984 letter from Secretary Baldrige and Ambassador Brock to Chairman Rostenkowski of Ways and Means sets forth the Administration's position regarding the Natural Resource Subsidy provision of H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984. The Administration opposes the provision chiefly on the grounds that it represents a "departure" from longstanding U.S. and international definitions of a countervailable subsidy. Yet the facts clearly demonstrate that two-tier or below-market value energy pricing, as practiced by a few state-owned energy monopolies, constitutes a subsidy which is countervailable according to the Administration's own standards.

Under current U.S. law, the Administration draws a rigid distinction between domestic subsidy programs which benefit specific industries over other industries in an economy, distort resource allocations, and increase exports while decreasing imports—saying such programs are countervailable in all cases—and programs which are "generally available" within an economy and hence are not presumed to provide special benefits to one industry over another, distort resource allocations or distort export/import trade—saying such programs are not countervailable in any case. The Administration argues that all government subsidy programs are either one or the other—directed at "specific industries" or else "generally available." The Administration states categorically that generally available subsidies do not distort the allocation of resources.

The major problem is that this mechanistic test fails to recognize the existence of a third category: domestic subsidy programs which are "generally available", yet result in the required distortions—great benefit to certain industries over nominal benefit for others, misallocation of resources, and trade distortion—which both the U.S. and the international community regard as the criteria of an actionable domestic subsidy. Only by disregarding conditions in the real world can the Administration deny the existence of this third category. The Natural Resource Subsidy provision is carefully drafted to cover this obvious gap in current law.

The provision is directed at the growing practice of two-tier pricing of natural resources, such as energy, where the state owns or controls production and pricing primarily through state-owned monopolies. Two-tier energy resource pricing exists when a government sets an artificial, below-market price on energy resources sold to its own domestic industries to make products, but will only export energy resources to other users at a much higher price. An excellent explanation of the impact of below-market energy pricing is found in the Mexican Industrial Development Plan (IDP) which states:

"This plant [the IDP] is complemented by an explicit policy of maintaining internal prices of energy sources for industrial use below that of the international market. This allows for stengthening of industry by giving it a substantial margin of protection via inputs. In contrast to other forms of protection which tend to make such costs more expensive and access to external markets more difficult, this mechanism constitutes a direct incentive to exports." (Italic added.)

Mexican two-tier energy pricing gives an enormous advantage to a few energy-intensive industries over its purely nominal effect on other industries; it distorts the allocation of resources in Mexico because it has encouraged the concentration of scarce capital in capital-intensive petrochemical plants, to the detriment of wider investment in badly needed labor-intensive industries, resulting in excess production of energy-intensive products like anhydrous ammonia, carbon black and cement at costs which do not recognize the true economic value of the energy used; and it directly increases exports of energy-intensive products and prohibits imports in a way which would not be possible in the marketplace without government intrusion.

The Administration falsely alleges that adoption of the provision would result in countervailing all "generally available" domestic subsidies. In fact, the provision applies only when a government prices natural resources like energy below fair market value, when the natural resource is not made available to competing producers at the lower price, and when the cost of the natural resource comprises a significant portion of the production costs of an import product. The provision obviously applies only to exports by intensive users of energy resources, not to nominal users or the residential users.

In Mexico, the state energy monopoly owns all energy resources. The monopoly sets the domestic price of energy resources like natural gas far below market levels, and the export price far above market levels. The monopoly and its subsidiaries are major energy users; they market and export many products produced downstream, such as ammonia, ethylene and other petrochemicals. The low domestic price also subsidizes the production of other energy intensive export products like carbon black and cement. Because production costs are artificially lowered by government intervention, Mexico's subsidized producers can use marginal pricing to export their excess production—regardless of demand conditions in export markets. Yet the Administration's mechanistic interpretation of the "specific industry/general availability" test can make no distinction between this kind of program and truly general government programs such as highway construction or public health care.

Because it can be demonstrated that this test is inadequate to cover a domestic subsidy with all the requisite distortive effects, the law must be changed to address that fact. We will only encourage more state ownership, production and subsidization of key natural resource based industries if we fail to modernize our trade laws. If governments intend to get into business, but are under no obligation to act like private producers, it is private producers that will lose out. For the Administration to avoid this truth in its arguments against adoption of the Natural Resource Subsidy provision is, in effect, to penalize private producers in the United States because they cannot act like governments.

Plainly stated, the U.S. petrochemical industry and other key energy intensive U.S. industries cannot be expected to compete with foreign governments that subsidize their export producers. If Congress doesn't act to offset this unfair government trade practice, we will have to choose between undue reliance on imported petrochemicals from subsidized producers or we will have to follow the lead of other nations by subsidizing our own producers. Neither alternative will enhance competition nor result in lower prices for U.S. consumers.

REBUTTAL OF ADMINISTRATION OPPOSITION

1. The Administration alleges that the Natural Resource Subsidy provision represents a major departure from U.S. and international practice regarding what is a countervailable subsidy.

The U.S. countervailing duty law states that domestic subsidies are countervailable if provided to a "specific enterprise or industry or group of enterprises or industries." Such subsidies are countervailable because they benefit one industry over another in the same economy, distort the allocation of resources, and serve to unfairly increase exports and decrease imports. The Administration has interpreted U.S. law and the GATT Subsidies Code to mean that a "generally available" subsidy is never actionable because it does not benefit specific industries over others. The Administration argues categorically that "generally available domestic programs do not distort allocations of resources within an economy."

The problem with this all-or-nothing distinction is that it leaves an obvious loophole where a "generally available" subsidy results in the same distortions which characterize subsidies to a "specific industry." The international trade community agrees that actionable domestic subsidy programs are those which provide benefit to one industry over another in the same economy, distort resource allocation within the economy, and serve to increase exports and limit imports. Such trade distorting subsidies should be countervailable no matter what name they are given.

Government ownership of energy and petrochemical production has blurred the current black and white distinction. When a government directly engages in furnishing, to its own monopoly users and export producers, a significant and necessary imput to production at below-market value, it directly involves itself in and distorts the production process. The Administration's interpretation of current U.S. law is incapable of distinguishing this program from other general government programs that are not intended to be countervailed.

Even a cursory examination of the Mexican government's two-tier energy pricing program reveals that the program specifically provides an enormous benefit to energy-intensive industries over other nominal users, and has resulted in the concentration of Mexico's scarce capital resources in energy-intensive industries as opposed to other industries, i.e. labor-intensive industries, which Mexico must develop to achieve a firm economic base. Furthermore, the program has definitely served to increase exports of petrochemicals while decreasing imports in a way which the marketplace, free from government intervention, would not do. In plain English, this "generally available" subsidy acts exactly like a subsidy to a specific industry or group of industries, and has the same injurious results.

The Administration claims that adoption of the provision would result in countervailing against all general domestic government programs affecting natural resources that indirectly lower production costs. This is completely incorrect. We agree that to countervail against all generally available government programs would lead to an absurd result. But the provision would not countervail against any of the examples cited by the Administration, such as "irrigation projects, high quality transportation systems, investment tax credits, capital recovery allowances, police and fire protection, rural electrification programs, and public health programs."

In fact, the provision applies only when a government prices natural resources like energy at below market levels, only when the low price is not made available to competing producers, and only when the cost of the natural resource comprises a significant portion of a product's production cost. Obviously, the provision only affects export producers of natural resource intensive products like petrochemicals. It has no effect on nominal industrial users or residential users.

The provision would only countervail against two-tier pricing subsidies to specific industrial sectors that receive a significant benefit. It will not countervail against all industries receiving such subsidies. It is thus consistent with the intent of U.S. law and with internationally accepted practices regarding what type of domestic subsidies may be offset. As such it is wholly consistent with the GATT and its Subsidies Code.

The U.S. petrochemical industry and other key energy-intensive industries cannot be expected to compete successfully against foreign governments and their subsidized producers. If governments intend to get into business, but are under no obligation to act like private producers, it is private producers which will lose out. For the Administration to avoid this truth in its arguments against adoption of the Natural Resource Subsidy provision is to penalize private producers in the United States because they cannot act like governments.

If Congress does not act to offset this unfair government trade practice, we will have to choose between undue reliance on imported petrochemicals from subsidized producers or we will have to follow the lead of other nations by subsidizing our own producers. Neither alternative will enhance competition nor result in lower prices for U.S. consumers. By inaction we will only succeed in encouraging more state ownership, production and subsidization of key natural resource-based industries.

2. The Administration alleges that the Natural Resource Subsidy provision exposes U.S. exports to serious risk of GATT retaliation.

We firmly believe the provision addresses only a domestic subsidy that is actionable under international rules, and that it provides a reasonable measure of the subsidy under the "fair market value" test. The provision is directed at a practice which meets virtually every internationally-recognized subsidy criteria, including those defined by the Administration.

The provision's "fair market value" test measures the subsidy as the difference between a government's artificially low domestic price and the actual fair market value of energy. The difference between a government's artificial domestic price and its higher export price of energy would also be a reasonable measure of the subsidy, unless the export price is also distorted by government intervention. The export price is assumed to be equivalent to "world" market prices, and that standard is well accepted as the price at which goods should enter export markets.

The provision would not prevent above-market pricing of exports of natural resources by a government. That practice may lose export sales of the natural resource, but a government may still choose to do so for non-economic reasons. The "fair market value" test will account for any resulting price distortions—flaring, etc.—but it does not prevent the practice of above-market pricing. If the export price is distorted above "world" market prices, then the "fair market value" test is used to assure that the countervailing duty only offsets the actual amount of the benefit. The "fair market value" test also allows for regional market differences from "world" prices where such prices are affected by limited access to world export markets and transportation restrictions. It can be argued that the GATT contemplates that there will be occasions when export prices may exceed domestic prices, but there is nothing in the GATT that precludes the United States from using such a differential as an indicator of subsidization as long as the measurement is reasonable.

The GATT does not preclude any country from taking unilateral action to stop material injury from being inflicted upon its producers through the use of subsidies. The GATT dispute process anticipates such action. If a GATT member nation contested adoption of this provision, it would have to prove in GATT that two-tier pricing is not an actionable subsidy, or that our method of measuring the subsidy was unreasonable, before it could retaliate against the U.S.

Neither the GATT nor the Subsidy Code nor the U.S. countervailing duty statute define the word "subsidy." Congress, the Executive Branch and the GATT have avoided doing so because it is agreed that any definition could be easily evaded.

However, the GATT and the Subsidy Code contain general provisions which shed light on what may constitute subsidies. For example, GATT article XVI contains language imposing an obligation on a government to notify the GATT if it "grants or maintains any subsidy, including any form of income or price support which operates directly or indirectly to increase exports of any product from or reduce imports of any product into its territory." A 1960 GATT panel noted that the phrase, "increased exports" was intended to include the concept of maintaining exports at a level higher than would otherwise exist in the absence of a subsidy. It further stated, "[it is] fair to assume that a subsidy which provides an incentive to increase production will, in the absence of offsetting measures, e.g., a consumption subsidy, either increase exports or reduce imports."

Paragraph 3 of Article VI of GATT provides that:

No countervailing duty shall be levied on any product of the territory of the contracting party imported into the territory of another contracting party in excess of an amount equal to the estimated bounty or subsidy determined to have been granted, directly or indirectly, on the manufacture, production or export of such product in the country of origin or exportation including any special subsidy to the transportation of a particular product. The term "countervailing duty" shall be understood to mean a special duty levied for the purpose of offsetting any bounty or subsidy bestowed, directly or indirectly, upon the manufacture, production or export of any merchandise.

It should be noted that a state trading provision is contained in the GATT, but that it has yet to be developed to provide guidelines concerning unfair state trading practices.

The Congress of the United States was the first legislative body to establish subsidies as an unfair trade practice and offset those subsidies with countervailing duties. Countervailing duty law was developed through administrative decisions of the U.S. Treasury and Commerce Department over the years. At the insistence of the United States, countervailable subsidies were included in the international trading rules of GATT for the first time in 1979. The GATT Subsidies Code practices are still developing and the U.S. must continue to be the leader, to impose greater discipline over subsidies in world trade. Otherwise, such practices will continue to proliferate. It is clearly better to impose that discipline earlier rather than later.

3. Our GATT trading partners might "mirror" this legislation, which would expose U.S. exports to countervailing duties elsewhere.

This refers to U.S. natural gas pricing regulations under the Natural Gas Policy Act (NGPA). In the 1970's, European Community nations complained that U.S. gas pricing regulations held the price of U.S. gas below its market value. The NGPA switched the pricing rules from "cost based pricing" to "commodity value pricing." This market-based pricing is wholly consistent with "fair market value" under H.R. 4784.

Since NGPA went into effect, U.S. gas prices have risen. Analysis of current wellhead prices paid by U.S. industrial users reveals that U.S. gas prices are now at market clearing levels and are not determined by government regulation. Average wellhead prices to industrial users are below current NGPA ceilings and are determined between buyers and sellers. Another proof that the market is working is that U.S. gas prices are at or below comparable BTU equivalent values of alternative fuels which are not regulated, and with which natural gas must compete. H.R. 4784 does not affect government regulation of residential gas prices.

In fact, the European Community recently settled a dispute over the Dutch system of two-tier energy pricing tariff which lowered the price of natural gas to Dutch petrochemical producers on the basis that it was an illegal state aid, though the dispute continues over whether they have done so adequately.

The U.S. is not vulnerable to mirror legislation if the provision is adopted because the marketplace is working to determine prices. The myriad of U.S. gas producers and private industrial users cannot be compared to government energy monopolies which own all production, and set a single price to their own industrial users below market value as a form of import protection and as an incentive to increase exports.

4. The Administration alleges that the Natural Resource Subsidy provision might adversely affect U.S. petrochemical firms' investments in foreign countries, some of which maintain differential pricing systems.

The provision is limited in scope. It would not apply inadvertently or indiscriminately to countries (or to U.S. investments in those countries) which exercise their true comparative advantage in natural resources. Experience indicates that exports from countries which permit equivalent foreign market access by private producers have not caused the kind of injury to U.S. producers with which the provision is concerned. Private producers in those countries must act as profit takers, and have not persisted in oversupplying U.S. markets and depressing prices below U.S. producers' production costs. It is the magnitude of the state control and monopoly practices of a few governments which are causing the problem.

The Natural Resource Subsidy provision would account for the effect of U.S. foreign investment in determining fair market value. If a country were so situated that it could not export natural gas, for instance, there would be no significant exports and no export price. The provision would not compare that country's domestic price to market clearing prices in the U.S. or Europe or any other market to determine fair market value. Such a country might even be flaring gas associated with oil production because it has no export market for gas. So long as that country sold gas to any private producer, including U.S. producers, in an arm's length transaction at a negotiated price which covered replacement costs and reflected the factors of competition for supply and relative abundance, such a price would presumably be the fair market value of gas in that country.

The significant investments which concern the Administration and other U.S. companies are predominantly located in Middle Eastern countries. These countries cannot export natural gas except by liquifying it. The expensive liquification process makes this gas uncompetitive with U.S. prices. Under the provision, fair market value of gas in such countries could not be compared to U.S. prices because the U.S. is not a commercially accessible export market.

On the other hand, the Mexican government not only two-tiers its energy prices for the benefit of its domestic industries, it denies access to the low domestic price to competing producers, while charging an export price which exceeds the fair market value price of gas in the United States. It establishes state-controlled monopolies in basic petrochemical production, and disallows or restricts foreign investment in other energy intensive industries. U.S. firms cannot own basic petrochemical plants in Mexico (nor, for that matter, in the Soviet Union).

The Natural Resource Subsidy provision encourages market-based "commodity value" pricing of natural resource and energy-intensive products. It encourages equivalent foreign market access by all private products. Without this amendment, current U.S. law encourages state-controlled production and pricing to avoid U.S. countervailing duty and anti-dumping laws. Foreign governments can take advantage of current loopholes in U.S. law through increasing state ownership and control of natural resources in direct competition with private producers both in the U.S. and in world markets.

5. The Administration alleges that the Natural Resource Subsidy provision prevents developing countries with abundant natural resources from capitalizing on their comparative advantage for the purpose of internal economic development.

Comparative advantage in supplies should not be confused with government programs which manipulate energy prices to the advantage of certain industries. The United States has the third largest proven reserves of gas in the world, many times more than Mexico. The U.S. can couple this comparative advantage with significant levels of low-cost gas production. U.S. gas prices, however, are now based on "commodity value" pricing. Gas prices to industrial users are not set by market forces, not production cost-based pricing regulations. In addition, the U.S. does not discriminate on the basis of producer nationality regarding price and access to domestic investment as do Mexico and the Soviet Union. The U.S. is now clearly relying on its comparative advantage in the marketplace to set prices. Mexico and the Soviet Union are not.

If a country sells gas in other markets at above-market prices—but decides instead to sell only to domestic users at artificially low, below-market levels—it is not exercising its comparative advantage. Rather, it is artificially lowering the value of its gas and incurring substantial "opportunity costs" by refusing to sell at more attractive market rates to willing buyers. Its rationale for so doing could be to protect its industries which depend on preferential access to subsidized energy because in all other respects—efficiency, location and ability to transport product inexpensively—they are at a total disadvantage. There is nothing in current US. law, the GATT or the Natural Resource Subsidy provision to prevent a government from making such non-economic choices for internal social, political or economic purposes. But it should be incumbent upon such a government to insulate its exports from utilizing such subsidies to the detriment of U.S. industries. Such choices are political choices and not an exercise of real comparative advantage in the marketplace.

The provision does not compel governments to make an "either-or" choice to either raise their domestic energy price or lower their export price as alleged. Such governments can continue to sell oil and gas at a lower price to aid internal development. The provision only requires that such governments recognize and account for their true "economic costs" of oil and gas—fair market value—when they export energy-intensive products to the U.S. market.

6. The Administration alleges that the Natural Resource Subsidy provision represents an intrusion into the sovereign affairs of foreign nations.

The provision does not intrude upon the "sovereign affairs" of other governments. It is in response to the intrusion of unfairly subsidized and traded imports into the U.S. market which have injured more efficient U.S. producers.

If a government exercises its sovereign power to expropriate or become the sole producer and seller of a natural resource, and uses its state monopoly power to create an unfair advantage for some of its exports, it should not be exempt from our unfair trade laws simply because it is a government. When it acts as a producer it must be treated as a producer. If governments are to be immune from the rules which govern the conduct of private producers, then U.S. companies will continue to be penalized and injured because they cannot act like sovereign governments.

For instance, state owned enterprises and government subsidized producers do not have to act as profit takers either in their home market or in export markets such as the U.S. They do not have to balance production with demand in order to achieve a selling price which covers production costs or return on investment as private producers must do. U.S. producers go out of business when sales prices are insufficient to cover production costs.

Government subsidized producers produce as much as they can (or as much as government policy requires) and export what is not consumer domestically to other markets. If their exports oversupply another market, the price of the commodity falls; but relative to the cost of subsidized production, they still sell at very high profits. If U.S. companies attempted to do business this way, regardless of true economic costs and demand conditions in the market, they would go out of business; unless, of course, U.S. companies were subsidized by the government.

The Natural Resource subsidy provision proposes a return to the primacy of market forces in determining the price and supply of energy-intensive products in the U.S. market. It does not establish quotas or higher general tariffs. It does not block imports. It addresses the root causes of subsidy practices inherent in two-tier energy and natural resource pricing and discourages their use as an incentive to increase exports of energy-intensive products. By assigning market values to energy-intensive imports, it levels the playing field between private and state controlled producers. It will force state-controlled producers to consider market conditions in the U.S. rather than using our market to get rid of excess subsidized production, and injuring more efficient U.S. producers in the process.

We believe that any retaliation in any form by GATT members or other countries is highly unlikely. More importantly, it is totally unjustified for such countries to retaliate if we are merely offsetting their subsidies—which by any international standard are unfair, trade distorting and actionable.

Re Natural Resource Subsidy Provision of H.R. 4784.

Mr. OLIN L. WETHINGTON,
Deputy Under Secretary for International Trade, U.S. Department of Commerce, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. WETHINGTON: I am responding to your request for further information from me following our discussion on May 23 regarding the Natural Resource Subsidy provision of H.R. 4784. At that time, you stated the Administration's major objection to the Natural Resource Subsidy provision was that "our national gas price regulations make us vulnerable" to mirror legislation. This objection appears to have originated from complaints by some European governments in the late 1970's that U.S. petrochemical and textile exports were benefiting from regulated U.S. natural gas prices that were "lower than world prices." You will recall I indicated that this objection is no longer valid. This letter and the enclosed analysis describes why the department's objection is not valid and why we believe that objection is based on an incorrect reading of the current situation.

First, we are not vulnerable to mirror legislation because it is clear that gas prices to U.S. petrochemical producers are now at market clearing prices, which represent "fair market value" under H.R. 4784. By virtually any measure—average wellhead prices, purchases by pipelines, or comparisons to decontrolled alternative fuel prices paid by industrial users in the United States—current U.S. natural gas prices to most industrial users are below NGPA ceiling prices and are negotiated between buyers and sellers in a competitive market. If NGPA were setting prices below fair market value, then virtually all gas would be selling at the maximum ceilings. That would again induce additional drilling and additional supplies, and prices would drop below ceilings agains.

Second, the provision applies only when the price of a natural resource like gas is specifically manipulated by a government to be lower than the export price or the fair market value of the resource. Fair market value is defined as the price a willing buyer would pay a willing seller in an arm's length transaction absent government intervention. As in the United States, fair market value pricing can exist within a framework of government regulation. The mere existence of a regulatory pricing system is not sufficient to constitute a subsidy under the Natural Resource Subsidy provision. Such regulation is not actionable so long as it does not function to artificially lower prices below fair market value.

Third, even assuming additional categories of U.S. gas are deregulated on January 1, 1985, prices to industrial users are unlikely to rise because current prices negotiated on new contracts already reflect market conditions. Increases and decreases in price will continue to be primarily determined by market forces. Since current average wellhead prices are dropping, if anything, NGPA may be acting to hold average prices to industrial users above market clearing levels.

We point out that any challenge to NGPA, claiming it bestows subsidy on U.S. producers, must take into account the myriad of prices at which gas is bought and sold in the U.S. marketplace by private producers, private distributors and private users. By contracts, in Mexico, PEMEX is the state monopoly producer of energy resources and basic petrochemicals, including all fertilizers. The government sets a single delivered price to all domestic industrial users. In Mexico, no myriad of private users competes for supply and price. PEMEX itself and the state-owned electric utilities are by far the major industrial gas users.

In addition, foreign producers and investors are denied any effective commercial access to the lower gas prices through export or through investment in petrochemical plants. The U.S. does not discriminate against market access by foreign investors in this fashion. Only with these aritificial constraints can Mexico maintain its differential pricing practice. The marketplace, operating under the market principle of comparative advantage, could not set prices in this way or at such rigid and discriminator differentials.

The Administration has repeatedly stated that under the internationally accepted definition of subsidy, a countervailable domestic subsidy is government action or direction that attempts to give one or more industries a special advantage over other industries in that economy. Two-tier energy pricing clearly gives an enormous advantage to a few energy-intensive industries over its nominal effect on other industries. In addition, the "accepted" definition requires that such a subsidy practice distort the allocation of resources within an economy. Clearly, two-tier energy pricing has distorted the allocation of resources within Mexico. It has encouraged the concentration of scarce capital in capital-intensive petrochemical plants, encouraging the excess production of energy-intensive products like anhydrous ammonia at prices which do not recognize the true economic value of the energy used. It also increases exports or energy-intensive products and prohibits imports in a way which could not exist without government intervention. The Mexican Industrial Development Plan specifically states:

"This plan [the IDP] is complemented by an explicit policy of maintaining internal prices of energy sources for industrial use below that of the international market. This allows for the strengthening of industry by giving it a substantial margin of protection via inputs. In contrast to other forms of protection which tend to make such costs more expensive and access to external markets more difficult, this mechanism constitutes a direct incentive to exports. (Italic added.)

In short, the effects of this pricing scheme meet virtually all of the international or U.S. standards for determining the existence of a countervailable subsidy.

Current U.S. countervailing duty law, as interpreted by the Commerce Department, however, adopts a single, simplistic mechanical test for actionable domestic subsidies. The Department concludes that a domestic subsidy bestowed on a specific industry or group of industries will distort the allocation of resources in all cases and is therefore countervailable. Conversely, a domestic subsidy made generally available, no matter how nominally, and regardless of its subsidizing effect on trade, will not distort the allocation of resources in any case and therefore is not countervailable. (See Secy. Baldrige and Amb. Brock letter to Chairman Rostenkowski, dated April 3, setting out Administration objections to H.R. 4784.)

Simple reason argues that such a mechanistic rule and a single test cannot be accurate in all cases to determine whether there is a distortion in the allocation of resources that affects imports and exports. There clearly could be a case of a domestic subsidy to a specific industry which does not result in the misallocation of resources or trade distortion. There also could be a case where a domestic subsidy made "generally available" is of such a nature that it does distort the allocation of resources and trade. For example, direct government intervention in the ownership, control and pricing of energy resources and downstream energy-intensive production through state monopolies, as contrasted to general tax policies, could produce such a result.

Even a cursory examination of the actual effect of two-tier energy pricing as practiced by the Mexican government demonstrates the distortive effect which is the hallmark of actionable subsidies even though it is "generally available" on a nominal basis. We do not believe that U.S. law or our international obligations under GATT require a blind allegiance to this single, exclusive mechanical test that flies both in the face of reason and the facts. It simply does not cover all countervailable domestic subsidies as defined under "internationally accepted" standards. The Natural Resource Subsidy provision is specifically limited to address only the particular case that has the required distortive effects, but which does not fall under the more general rule. It does not eliminate the general availability rule as some have alleged.

Regarding the past complaints of some European nations, U.S. gas prices are now comparable to producer prices in Europe. Some sale prices to industrial users may be distorted on the high side by individual state government taxes on energy (as in France) or by import contract prices, most notably those associated with the new Soviet gas pipeline. It would appear that based on the complaints in the 1970's, the Europeans believed that gas prices regulated below world market values would be a subsidy. The Natural Resource Subsidy provision's measure of subsidy is even more reasonable, since it is not based on a single world market price. It incorporates "fair market value," which accounts for regional and other market factors, as well as comparative advantage factors.

Under the Natural Resource Subsidy provision, price differentials from "prices generally available in world markets" would be taken into account wherever relevant. The Natural Resource Subsidy provision does not establish a single world gas price based on U.S. prices, any other country's prices, or the Btu equivalent price of oil as the standard for fair market value. The provision would account for regional differences in gas prices due to transportation limitations, and limits on accessibility to export markets on a commercial or competitive basis. The accessiblity factor must be fully considered under any "fair market value" determination in a country which cannot export significant amounts of natural gas except by liquefying it. This is the case for many Middle Eastern countries and countries like Trinidad in our hemisphere. These are all normal factors that should operate in the marketplace to establish prices.

The "fair market value" test, which is the cornerstone of the Natural Resource Subsidy provision, is anchored in market-based pricing principles. It is fully consistent with this Administration's position to accelerate deregulation of natural gas; revision of the former single border price rule on gas imports by DOE on February 22, 1984, to shift to competitive pricing between buyers and sellers; and decontrol of oil prices.

In summary, the U.S. is not vulnerable to mirror legislation if the Natural Resource Subsidy provision of H.R. 4784 is passed into law. The provision attacks specific forms of subsidy practices associated with state ownership and pricing of natural resources such as energy, and where state ownership and control of the downstream production and pricing of energy-intensive products accounts for a significant level of the total use of the resource. If the United States continues to rely solely on the single, mechanistic general availability test to exclusively define countervailable domestic subsidies, the result will be ever more serious injury to the U.S. petrochemical industry and other energy-intensive products. The unfairness is that we are not losing out to more efficient producers with a comparative advantage in low cost gas. We are losing out to less efficient government producers, which use their monopoly power and price manipulation to capture markets they otherwise could not capture.

We appreciate the Department's general concerns about this legislation, but we believe our specific concerns are also legitimate and address a growing subsidy and market access problem. We further believe that since the Natural Resource Subsidy provision is limited to countervail only against domestic natural resource subsidies which fall well within the internationally accepted definitions of such subsidies, the United States would therefore not be subject to compensation claims under GATT. Because the amendment would be part of our CVD law, we are entitled to all of the GATT review and dispute resolution mechanisms available to GATT members before any such claims could be made, and we have every reason to believe such an amendment to our CVD laws is a proper exercise of authority under our international obligations. We would be pleased to work with you to resolve our differences and seek a mutually acceptable solution to this problem as this legislation progresses.

Sincerely,

KENNETH Y. MILLIAN.

DETERMINING THE MARKET WELLHEAD PRICE OF NATURAL GAS FOR INDUSTRIAL USERS UNDER H.R. 4784

(Prepared on Behalf of Domestic Nitrogen Producers' Ad Hoc Committee, by Margo Thorning, Ph.D.)

INTRODUCTION

The purpose of this paper is to analyze the determinants of the wellhead price of natural gas paid by industrial users in the United States. This analysis supports the conclusion that market forces are the primary determinant of gas sales to U.S. industrial users. It has been suggested that current gas contract prices, rather than being determined by market forces, are being held down by the pricing provisions of the Natural Gas Policy Act (NGPA). This analysis indicates this is not the case. This distinction is important to the consideration of the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984, H.R. 4784.

The "Natural Resource Subsidy" provision of H.R. 4784 defines as a countervailable subsidy the practice of certain foreign governments in setting the domestic price of natural energy resources to industrial users, through government regulation or controls, below the export price or "fair market value" of those natural resources. This policy specifically benefits their energy-intensive industries by providing protection from imports and as an incentive to exports. It thus distorts the allocation of resources to favor such industries. H.R. 4784 would apply only to intensive users of a natural resource, like natural gas or fuel oil. Two-tier pricing of natural resources particularly applies to such pricing of natural gas or fuel oil used as feedstocks for production of petrochemicals or other products like cement.

Under H.R. 4784, the "fair market value" of gas in Mexico, for example, would be determined by the market clearing price or average price of gas to competing U.S. producers in the United States among other factors. It is basically a measure of the price at which Mexico could sell its gas in readily available markets at market prices as an alternative to sales at the subsidized level to industrial users in Mexico. The restrictions and limited scope of the Natural Resource Subsidy provision would also establish a different "fair market value" for natural gas from the Soviet Union or Saudi Arabia, since available competitive markets for export gas sales are in Europe or nonexistent in world markets, respectively.

In addition to showing that market forces primarily set current gas prices to industrial users in the United States under NGPA, alternative methods of determining the market clearing wellhead price of gas are presented.

I. WHAT DETERMINES THE PRICE OF NATURAL GAS?

There are two competing theories of what currently determines natural gas prices to industrial users in the United States. One theory holds that price ceilings incorporated in the Natural Gas Policy Act (NGPA) are keeping wellhead gas prices below the level which would obtain in the absence of regulation. An alternative theory is that gas prices are not being restrained by the price ceilings in the NGPA and that current gas prices represent conditions which would prevail in the absence of regulation.

A. Price ceilings for natural gas

If the price ceilings mandated by the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978 (NGPA) actually determine today's gas prices, then industrial users should be paying a price which reflects NGPA ceiling prices on new gas contracts. Although there are twenty-two different NGPA gas categories, pipelines are likely to be purchasing predominantly Section 102 or 103 gas because most of the gas currently available for sale falls into these two categories.[1] Therefore, the price charged for new contracts to industrial users should reflect the pipeline acquisition cost of Section 102 or Section 103 gas (Appendix A). As of March 1984, these ceiling prices were $3.63 and $2.87 per million Btu's respectively. Gas classified in lower NGPA price categories is generally not available because it is already committed under long-term contracts. There is gas available in higher price categories, such as Section 108 (stripper gas).[2]

If NGPA price controls are binding, that is, if they effectively hold the price of gas below the price that would obtain in the absence of regulation, then the wellhead price paid by users for current contracts would reflect a weighted average of NGPA ceilings prices paid by pipelines for new gas.

B. Market determination of gas prices

An alternative explanation to the notion that NGPA regulated price ceilings are controlling current gas prices to industrial users is that gas prices are determined by market forces. Evidence supporting this hypothesis would be data showing that current gas contract prices to industrial users are below what NGPA regulations allow. Natural gas decontrol would have little or no short-term effect on prices in this instance.

II. WHAT DOES THE EVIDENCE SHOW ON THE DETERMINANTS OF GAS PRICES?

The question of whether gas prices to industrial users are determined by NGPA ceilings or by the market forces of supply and demand can be analyzed by looking at recent gas market conditions.

First, in spite of the continued increase in NGPA price ceilings (Appendix A), the average well head price of gas has tended to decline since early 1983. Although the average for 1983 was $2.60, up from $2.46 per mcf. in 1982, well head prices have generally tended to fall since February 1983 (see Appendix B). While it did jump to $2.70 in September, the average price had dropped to $2.58 per mcf. by December. The decline in average wellhead prices suggests that prices agreed to in recent contracts are falling below ceiling levels and "market-out" actions by pipelines are allowing them to reduce the price paid for gas in existing contracts or stop their purchases altogether. For example, Transco, the major interstate pipeline, has exercised "market-out" provisions in its gas purchase contract with producers in order to lower the price it pays for Section 102 and 103 gas to $2.80 per MMBTu.

Second, comments by industry officials support the idea that many recently negotiated contracts have been for prices below NGPA ceilings. For example, the chairman of the Natural Gas Committee of the Oklahoma Independent Petroleum Association stated that gas now being sold in Oklahoma is priced at $2.40 to $2.50 per mcf. He added that no $3.00 gas is being sold in Oklahoma, no matter what category it has been given by NGPA.[3]

Third, some industry experts believe that lack of demand by pipelines for new sources of gas will depress prices for some time to come. John Brickhill, Vice President of Foster Associates, a Washington, D.C. energy consulting firm, recently stated that there are currently very few active interstate pipeline buyers. He added that most pipelines will have plenty of gas to meet market needs over the next two years without signing on additional suppliers.[4] If gas market experts such as Mr. Brickhill are correct, there should be little upward pressure on gas prices, even though NGPA price ceilings continue their escalation.

III. WHAT TECHNIQUES CAN BE USED TO ESTIMATE A FAIR MARKET WELLHEAD GAS PRICE?

A. The net-back method of estimating the fair market price of gas

In principle, determining the price of natural gas which would obtain in a free market is straightforward. Because gas competes directly with No. 6 residual fuel oil in the industrial user market, the price of No. 6 fuel oil is said to set a ceiling on the price industrial users would pay for gas.[5] At any higher price, industrial users would switch to residual fuel oil. Since petroleum products, including residual fuel oil, are decontrolled, their prices are market-determined. Therefore, comparisons between the Btu equivalent price of natural gas (most of which is still subject to regulation) and that of a substitute fuel as No. 6 fuel oil can shed light on the issue of whether the wellhead price of gas approximates a market price.

Comparing the Btu price of gas to that of No. 6 fuel oil involves the following procedure. In 1983, No. 6 fuel oil prices (for oil with greater than 1 percent sulphur) averaged $25.78 per barrel. The price of No. 6 residual fuel oil can be converted to an equivalent price expressed in dollars per million Btu's (MMBtu) by dividing $25.78 by the number of Btu's in a barrel of residual fuel oil. Residual fuel oil consumed by the industrial sector averaged 6.287 MMBtu's per barrel. Thus, the Btu-equivalent price of residual fuel oil was $4.10 per MMBtu ($25.78÷6.287). There are approximately 1.028 MMBtu's in 1,000 cubic feet of natural gas; therefore, $4.22 per mcf. is equal to $4.10 per MMBtu (1.028×$4.10=$4.22). Thus, an industrial user capable of switching between fuel oil and gas would not have been willing to pay more than $4.22 per mcf. for natural gas in 1983. A DOE survey of natural gas prices paid by about 10 percent of U.S. industrial users shows that the average for 1983 was $4.20 per mcf. (Appendix B). If the price had been higher, fuel oil would have been more economical.

To complete the computation of the wellhead price of gas, transportation and distribution costs must be deducted. If we assume that transportation costs average $0.40 per mcf. and that distribution costs average $1.00 per mcf., then the free market wellhead price of natural gas would equal $4.22—$0.40—$1.00=$2.82 per mcf. in 1983. In 1983, the average wellhead price was $2.60 per mcf (see Appendix B). The average wellhead price in 1983 ($2.60 per mcf.) reflects both prices for old gas, which are constrained by NGPA price ceilings, as well as recently negotiated contracts, which do not appear to be restrained by NGPA regulations. Judging by the net-back calculation, the 1983 average wellhead price of gas appears to approximate a market-determined price.

Additional evidence that markets are working to determine current gas prices can be seen in the trend of prices for gas purchased by major interstate pipelines. Gas purchase prices have declined from an average of $3.27 per mcf. in January 1983 to $2.73 per mcf. in December 1983, in spite of the continued escalation of NGPA price ceilings (see Appendix B). Again current gas prices appear to be consistent with the results of the "net-back" calculation shown above. Therefore, this analysis supports the conclusion that market forces are the primary determinant of gas sales to industrial users.

[1] Section 102 gas is new natural gas including gas from the outer continental shelf. Section 103 gas is from new onshore wells. Both categories are subject to decontrol on January 1, 1985.

[2] Under the NGPA, gas price ceilings in March, 1984 varied from $0.29 to $5.74 per million Btu's, depending on the category (one million Btu's equals 1,000 cubic feet of natural gas). NGPA prices are adjusted monthly to reflect changes in consumer price index.

[4] Natual Gas Intelligence, Feb. 13, 1984, p. 4.

[5] Although some gas purchase controls link gas price escalators to No. 2 fuel oil, it is not appropriate to compare the Btu equivalent price of this fuel oil with that of natural gas. No. 2 fuel oil is a premium petroleum product and is generally not used by industrial users since its price is relatively high.

B. An average of recently negotiated contract prices

An alternative to the "net-back" estimate of a market clearing price of gas is a volume weighted average of recently negotiated contract prices. This approach was incorporated in the Administration's 1983 natural gas decontrol proposals. Such a survey was to have served as a "cap" on prices which might otherwise "fly-up" above the market clearing level as a result of indefinite price escalators. The survey concept subsequently found its way into other decontrol proposals, indicating that the basic approach was acceptable to others.

In order to conduct a survey of recently negotiated wellhead prices for gas provided to industrial users, an examination of contracts on file at FERC would be necessary. The agency's Form 155 contains data on the price paid by a pipeline for gas to be sold to industrial users. That information, combined with the pipeline's most recent Purchase Gas Adjustment would permit the calculation of a range of prices representing current gas market conditions.

Preliminary analysis of recent gas purchase contracts on file at FERC indicates that most wellhead prices are falling within the range of $2.70 to $3.00 per mcf. Thus, the price calculated using the "net-back" method (illustrated in Section III. A.) appears to be a close approximation of current wellhead prices for natural gas

IV. WHAT DOES THE FUTURE HOLD FOR NATURAL GAS PRICES?

Given the decline in gas prices in the last year and the fact that a significant surplus of deliverability still exists (1.7 trillion cubic feet or 10 percent of U.S. gas consumption in 1983), it is unlikely that gas prices will increase significantly in 1984 or upon decontrol in 1985.[6] Thus, the current price appears to approximate the market clearing price which would occur after decontrol takes place, particularly with regard to Section 102 and 103 gas.

Although the current average wellhead price reflects the market clearing level, it is important to realize that it is an average. Price variations also exist among states with respect to the average wellhead price of gas within each state. This variation reflects several factors including: (1) the mix of regulation-defined gas categories in each state; (2) closeness to the points of consumption; and (3) the geographic concentration and nature of gas resources. These factors will affect actual market clearing prices at the wellhead in each producing state, as well as delivered prices to the industrial uses in the future. This simply means that price uniformity is unlikely to develop under either market forces or regulated prices.

It nevertheless appears that market clearing prices for industrial users will continue to predominate for the foreseeable future, even on a state-by-state basis. Losses of gas sales to industrial users which switch to other fuels due to price, or move offshore for cheaper gas, will have a more significant short-term impact on residential gas prices than will regulation. Residential users would be charged a higher share of fixed costs for transportation and distribution, thereby raising their delivered price even if wellhead prices remained relatively unchanged.

[2] Section 271.602(a) of the NGPA provides that for certain gas sold under an intrastate rollover contract, the maximum lawful price is the higher of the price paid under the expired contract, adjusted for inflation or an alternative maximum lawful price specified in this table. This alternative maximum lawful price for each month appears in this row.

[3] Commencing Nov. 1, 1979, the price of natural gas finally determined to be eligible as deep high-cost gas is deregulated.

[4] The maximum lawful price for tight formation gas applies on or after July 16, 1979.

[5] The price for interstate rollover gas is the higher of the price listed in this table or the just and reasonable price under the expired contact as adjusted for inflation.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Nebraska [Mrs. SMITH].

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Trade Remedies Reform Act before us today. This legislation will create more problems than it will solve, work to worsen our trade deficit, and harm American industries.

I strongly support, and U.S. policy has always favored, an open international trading system. I agree that we cannot ignore unfair practices by our trading partners. Present laws provide relief for producers harmed by unfair competition, and there may be a need to modernize these laws so that American industries may readily take advantage of them. But this legislation which comes to us under the guise of reform, takes us in the direction away from longstanding U.S. policy of free and open trade, and invites retaliation from our trading partners.

The enactment of the bill would violate the GATT, a treaty adhered to by 90 countries that together account for more than four-fifths of world trade. If the United States violates its international obligations under the GATT, other nations would have the right to retaliate against U.S. trade. I believe that they would retaliate and the American agriculture industry would bear the brunt of their response.

History provides ample precedent establishing the futility of trade barriers to protect domestic industry. The infamous Smoot-Hawley tariff of 1930, which set U.S. tariffs at an all-time high level, provoked foreign retaliation that substantially reduced U.S. exports and contributed to a world depression. The first trade battle I fought when I came to Congress involved the movement to ban the export of cattle hides from the United States to protect the domestic shoe industry. This effort could have cost the cattle industry $1 billion. We lost our soybean market to Brazil in the seventies due to an ill-fated embargo. After our Government moved to limit textile imports from China, that country refused to buy any wheat from us.

American agriculture is in a very precarious position today. Currently, about 35 to 40 percent of all commercial size farms are leveraged above 40 percent. This means that they are looking at negative cashflows. More important, these producers owe about two-thirds of the $125 billion farm debt. Their equity is slipping away as farm and land prices are plummeting. The farm economy will be more dependent than ever on the export markets this year.

Already farmers depend on exports to market the produce from 1 of every 3 acres of cropland. We export the production of 2 out of 3 acres of wheat we produce, 1 of 2 acres of soybeans, and 1 of 3 acres of corn. My own State of Nebraska sold nearly $2 billion of its produce abroad last year. These agriculture exports make a net contribution of approximately $20 billion to the U.S. balance of trade.

It is not only the agriculture industry that will be hurt by this bill. A strong export market for all industries affects our economy by improving productivity. Exports offer increased possibility for production and employment in the most efficient segments of the economy. The less productive segments of the economy are obviously hurt most by imports because they cannot compete. Should we penalize our most productive industries to protect the relatively unproductive ones? I don't believe we should. Restrictions on competitive imports and refusal to adjust to the realities of the world market prevent us from achieving higher growth and income and maintaining our leadership in the world economy. Agriculture has shown that it is the most competitive U.S. industry in the world markets. It should not have to pay for the lack of competitiveness of other domestic industries.

You know, Mr. Chairman, the other day I got a letter from the chairman and chief executive officer of a steel corporation with a steel mill in my State of Nebraska. He was writing to tell me that he opposed any quotas, tariffs or any other form of protectionism for the steel industry. He made a point that I believe is very relevent to today's debate. He said that if the presently proposed quotas and tariffs on steel are initiated, they would have an adverse effect on those steel products not provided protection. Foreign steel producers might substantially increase exports in those steel products that are not protected and seriously injure the more efficient domestic producers. That will be the identical result of the legislation we are considering today. Someone may be protected, but surely someone will be hurt. This bill just shifts the hurt from one industry to another.

Mr. Chairman, let us not repeat the mistakes of the past by adopting this bill. Let us move into the future of a competitive economy in the changing world markets. I urge my colleagues to adopt the motion to recommit this bill. This motion will allow us to provide the protection needed against unfair foreign competition while allowing our competitive and strong export industries a fair chance on the world markets.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a protectionist bill. This bill merely tries to say that subsidized products and dumped products, which have never been legal under the GATT, shall not enter the United States, except upon payment of duties to offset the unfair effects.

The bill tries to give effective remedies to U.S. citizens to enforce rights that they have always had under the GATT.

This bill is within the letter and spirit of the GATT.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BONKER].

Mr. BONKER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to commend the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee for his efforts on behalf of this legislation. Between the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GIBBONS] and the ranking member, we have two very prominent leaders on the trade issues here in the Congress. Given the protectionist impulses that exist in today's economy, I am surprised that the gentleman has not come before us with more drastic legislation.

So I think what the gentleman has offered here today is responsible indeed.

I must confess that I did have reservations early on about this trade remedy bill. Now that the targeting provisions have been completely removed and given the colloquy that has taken place between the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] and the chairman of the subcommittee, I now can fully support this legislation.

We have already discussed the staggering trade deficit which Secretary Baldrige now tells us will reach $130 to $140 billion this year. With that trade deficit comes incredible pressure upon those of us here in the Congress to do something about it.

Now, we can one of two ways. We can either export more or we can import less. And, of course, it is far more desirable to engage in export promotion and to increase our potential that exists in international markets. But we must also look at the other side of the ledger to see what is happening in terms of imports and how that is impacting our domestic industries.

The Trade Act is the proper mechanism for dealing with these import problems. It is compatible with GATT and international rules and the Gibbons trade remedy bill that is before us today, I think, is the proper extension of the Trade Act. It actually puts more teeth into our trade laws to deal with countervailing and antidumping problems.

The question before this body is, What are we going to do about unfair trade practices? We are all for free trade and when we attempt to talk about fair trade, we are talking about what other countries do to give their industries the competitive advantage in our domestic market. And what can we do about it?

I think what the chairman has given us today is the proper means for dealing with unfair trade practices, especially when they bring injury to our domestic industries.

In my particular area we are dealing with the problem of Canadians heavily subsidizing their wood products industry, which gives them an unfair advantage in our economy. In 1978, the Canadians had 18 percent of our wood products market. Today it is 35 percent and it is going up every day.

What is happening is that the Canadians are giving to their industry logs almost free, while our logs are provided at competitive prices that make it almost impossible for us to compete.

Now, the proper way to deal with the issue is to not come to the Congress and ask for special legislation. It is to deal with the matter through the International Trade Commission and through other provisions that exist in the Trade Act of 1974.

But we have got to provide more explicit language, which is exactly what the committee is attempting to do by identifying upstream subsidies and downstream subsidies so we can deal more fairly and more effectively with these unfair trade practices.

I rather imagine with the staggering debt in Third World countries, particularly in Latin America, that we are going to see more and more subsidized imports. We are going to see more and more dumping that is going to do injury to our domestic industries.

I am hopeful that the IMF, when it attempts to negotiate with Brazil and Peru and many of these other debt-torn nations, that it will stress the importance of not subsidizing their industries and trying to live by international rules, because if you push us too far and that trade deficit goes too high, the pressure will be upon us to do something about it.

We are all for fair trade, but let us make sure that the rules are played fairly by everyone involved.

□ 1900

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAYDOS], who is not only a fine Member of Congress but chairman of the Steel Caucus.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Chairman, last month an Associated Press news report datelined Taipei, Taiwan, appeared in the McKeesport, PA, Daily News. The thrust of this brief news item was that the Government of Taiwan has adopted an antidumping law to prevent foreign countries from selling goods in Taiwan cheaper than in their own domestic markets.

This article was brought to my attention by one of my constituents, Mr. Albert Benik of McKeesport, who raised some interesting questions in his letter.

Mr. Benik, I should explain, is a steelworker. He is very concerned about steel imports into the United States because those imports directly threaten his job. But Mr. Benik is also concerned about the flood of imports of other products into this country, products that often are dumped here at cutrate prices.

Mr. Benik finds it interesting that some of those countries who practice just this kind of trade deficit are the same ones who complain loudly when it is happening to them.

The article sent to me by Mr. Benik notes that the Taiwan Cabinet, after examining the situation, passed a new law and put it into effect immediately.

As Mr. Benik says:

> It took the Taiwan Cabinet one day to pass an antidump law. Our lawmakers have been trying for 15 to 20 years and solved nothing. There must be something wrong with our system.

The bill we are discussing today, H.R. 4784, the Trade Reform Act of 1984, is one part of the approach this country needs to answer Mr. Benik's question.

This bill is by no means a perfect measure, but it does go a long way toward improving America's ability to set reasonable procedures for dealing with continued unfair trade practices by other nations.

H.R. 4784 clarifies and expands current law to cover new forms of unfair trade practices. It limits the discretion of several government agencies to terminate investigations into them. And it changes some procedures in order to reduce delays in processing complaints.

I commend the chairman of the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Trade, Mr. GIBBONS, and the other members of the subcommittee for their work in developing this measure and in bringing it to the floor.

And I would urge them to move quickly by allowing H.R. 5081, the Fair Trade in Steel Act of 1984, to come to the floor for it, as much as the Trade Reform Act, is a vital element in our battle for survival in today's world.

As Mr. Benik says, we have been trying for too many years and have accomplished so little. We cannot afford to wait any longer.

Some 400 years ago, Nicolo Machiavelli said:

> Knowing afar off the evils that are brewing, they are easily cured, but when . . . they are allowed to grow so that everyone can recognize them, there is no longer any remedy to be found.

Well, I believe Machiavelli was only partially correct. I believe that even though the problems caused by unfair trade practices are well known throughout the country, we still have solutions available to us.

H.R. 4784, while not as comprehensive as other trade reform proposals, such as the Comprehensive Trade Law Reform Act, H.R. 4124, does take a major step in the right direction.

And, if coupled with the Fair Trade in Steel Act, could have a major impact on how our trading partners deal with us.

We are not newcomers to this problem of unfair trade practices. Just over 10 years ago, Mr. Speaker, in December 1973, when we were debating the Trade Reform Act of 1974, I said that bill didn't go far enough, didn't respond specifically enough to the problems.

And time has borne me out because today we are worse off than we were in 1973.

In that 1973 debate, I asked Congress to address itself to the underlying problem of international trade and to mandate the President to pursue certain policies with specified goals and objectives.

Again, in July 1979, when we were debating the amendments to the 1974 Trade Reform Act, I said that the bill, if enforced properly, would do what it pretended to do. But, if not enforced, it would go the way of many other bills—it will become ineffective, impotent, and actually destructive of the overall economic benefits that were devised in the first instance to protect against.

Well, Mr. Chairman, here we are again. We have before us a bill that, while more specific in its structure than either the 1974 or 1979 trade measures, still leaves too much room for administrative interpretation.

I suggest that we need more specifics, such as those embodied in H.R. 4124, which is designed to improve the operation of countervailing duty, antidumping duty, import relief, and other trade laws.

And, in addition to that, we need the Fair Trade in Steel Act. It is no secret that America's steel industry is suffering. Foreign imports are taking some 25 percent of the American steel market. Employment in the steel industry is near the quarter-million mark, less than half what it was in 1974. And giants in the American steel industry—United States Steel Corp. and Bethlehem Steel—have already diversified or are planning such moves to lessen their dependence on steel sales for revenues—actions that would again cut U.S. steel productivity and increase our dependence on foreign steel.

The Fair Trade in Steel Act, which would set a 15-percent quota on imported steel for a 5-year term, is a key element in enabling our steel industry to regroup and restore itself in order to compete favorably with foreign imports.

The combination of the two measures, the Trade Reform Act and the Fair Trade in Steel Act, would give us the ability to set reasonable limits on steel imports and to battle against unfair trade practices by foreign producers of steel, copper, and other goods.

Critics claim that our efforts will be counterproductive because our trading partners will shut their doors to our goods and services.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I contend that at the same time we in this country face unfair trading practices, such as dumping and subsidization, from our trading partners, those same traders have placed such severe restrictions on American firms trying to do business in those countries that we may have a lot less to lose than critics believe.

Mexico requires its six foreign car manufacturers to use locally produced parts and materials equal to 50 percent of each vehicle's value. Indonesia requires any exporter selling more than $750,000 of goods to the State sector to buy an equal value of local goods. Saudi Arabia, traditionally an open market, is now insisting that local partners be included in investments in that country. And the list goes on, continent-by-continent, country-by-country—Brazil, Nigeria, South Korea, and so on.

Why is buy American any less acceptable than buy Mexican or buy Brazilian or buy Japanese?

I am concerned that when we pass this trade reform measure before us today without the second element, it will be like creating a paper tiger. It will be much the same as Shakespeare says in Macbeth:

> Tomorrow, and tomorrow, and tomorrow, creeps in this petty pace from day to day, to the last syllable of recorded time; and all our yesterdays have lighted fools the way to dusty death. Out, out, brief candle! Life's but a walking shadow, a poor player, that struts and frets his hour upon the stage, and then is heard no more; it is a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing.

We need more than rhetoric; we need legislation that will produce light as well as heat.

I intend to support H.R. 4784, the Trade Reform Act of 1984, because it is an important step forward and because it, at the very least, expresses the concern of the Congress about illegal and unfair trade practices.

But, at the same time, I and the more than 200 Members of this body who are cosponsors of the Fair Trade in Steel Act, H.R. 5081, urge the chairman and members of the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Trade to bring that bill to the floor so that we can put some real teeth into America's trade policy.

The American people want us to take this action. Mr. Benik is not alone in his view. A recent survey by Fingerhut/Granados opinion research found that 76 percent of likely voters interviewed believe that Government policies toward foreign imports should be tougher. In fact, only 13 percent say the Government should allow more foreign products into our country.

In that same survey, 65 percent of the respondents endorse quota or tariffs on steel imports, while 20 percent opposed such action.

The second survey, by Opinion Research Corp. for the LTV Corp., focused on delegates to the Democratic National Convention and national opinion leaders.

One key question sums up the primary issue: Do you think the current world trade agreements are fair or unfair to the United States?

This question, when posed to national opinion leaders, brought the following response—37 percent said the agreements were fair, while 48 percent, nearly half, said the agreements were unfair.

Delegates to the Democratic National Convention responded similarly—32 percent said the agreements were fair, while 44 percent said they were unfair.

It is clear to me that the American people, like those who responded to the two surveys, like my constituent, Albert Benik, and like so many of us who support H.R. 4784 as well as the Fair Trade in Steel Act of 1984, believe that the passage of these bills is vital to the future economic health of this Nation and its industries and jobs.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ROBERTS], a determined advocate of trade expansion.

Mr. ROBERTS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, it occured to me, sitting here listening to this debate, that this is almost a special order in behalf of this bill. It is a virtual love feast on behalf of this legislation, with the exception of the remarks of the gentlewoman from Nebraska, and I wish to associate myself with her remarks. I really hate to curdle the milk of mutual support in behalf of this bill. I do so as a Member representing 58 countries out on the prairies of Kansas where we have to export two-thirds of our wheat crop. I have deep respect and deep admiration for the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GIBBONS], who is a staunch advocate of free trade. Whenever he speaks on free trade, I am like the E.F. Hutton ad, I stop and listen. The same is true with my good friend and colleague, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BONKER], and my good friend and colleague, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOORE].

But I guess I feel a little bit like the father who goes out to his young daughter on the porch swing and says, "Dear, it is time to come in. You and your boyfriend have been out there too long. It is 10 o'clock." And she says, "Why Dad?" And I say, "I am not too worried about what you do on the porch swing. It is what is going to happen down the road."

This act has been characterized as an effort to make the playing the field level for all players in the world export and import game. And I share my colleagues' desire for a level playing field and I share their frustration over problems caused by export subsidies. But there are those of us in farm country who worry that in this bill, while noble in intent, and certainly there are provisions in the bill that are constructive efforts to address the serious trade problems, nevertheless we worry that they will result in retaliation against U.S. farm exports and once again put the farmer on an export playing field that is uphill and we have bulldozed that hill to a mountain.

Now, we have received letters from the Secretary of Commerce and the Office of the Special Trade Representative and the Secretary of Agriculture, all in opposition to the provisions in the bill dealing with natural resource subsidies and the antidumping laws. Any of these provisions could lead to retaliation, despite the colloquy that you have heard on the House floor. But the most troubling provision of this bill is its broadening definition of "subsidy."

For instance, under this bill, such Government programs as irrigation projects, the REA Program, the payment-in-kind program, transportation systems, investment tax credits, even police and fire protection, could be countervailable or viewed as countervailable in domestic subsidies. And if international definition is expanded to include the language of this bill, all of the above-mentioned programs could lead to imposition of duties by our trading partners.

If this bill is enacted into law, we should be prepared to have our exports subject to the same rules under foreign mirror legislation. And according to all of the farm and commodity groups that have contacted me, this would be very detrimental to agricultural exports.

Mr. Chairman, it is with a heavy heart that I urge opposition to this bill and urge my colleagues to vote for the recommittal.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNDINE].

Mr. LUNDINE. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to support this bill and to reluctantly support the committee amendment which deletes the section dealing with targeting in this bill. I support this amendment because given the short time left in this session of the 98th Congress it is the only way which a consensus can be arrived at to secure House approval of this important bill.

Targeting is a reality in international competition which we cannot afford to ignore. I believe that targeting by foreign governments is doing extensive damage to the international competitiveness of U.S. industry. Unless and until the United States comes to grips with this growing problem, we cannot hope to establish a level playing field for U.S. competitors in the U.S. market or abroad.

At the same time, I can understand why some have serious concerns over the targeting section reported from the committee. Like many of them, I do not believe that the targeting section of this bill as reported from the Ways and Means Committee is the preferred way to deal with this serious problem. As a result, I went before the Rules Committee but failed to secure on a narrow vote permission to bring to the floor an amendment in the nature of a substitute for this section. My proposed amendment would have added several possible remedies to the bill to deal with targeting beyond the countervailing duty option provided in the original bill.

I am encouraged that the committee amendment now before us which deletes this section on targeting does call for continuing study of the problem. I only hope that the controversy over this issue this year does not prevent us from moving forward in the months ahead with a meaningful program to deal with foreign industrial targeting. The controversy which led to the deletion of this section is not over whether or not targeting exists and is damaging U.S. competitiveness, but rather over what is the appropriate remedy for foreign targeting. I am convinced that lack of action on this problem will mean continued erosion of U.S. world market shares and continued worsening of the already devastating $120 billion U.S. merchandise trade deficit we are facing this year.

Last year, I was appointed by the Honorable GILLIS LONG to cochair a task force on international trade for the Democratic Caucus. One of the principal findings of that effort was that the problem of foreign targeting of industry to capture export markets was having a serious negative effect on many key sectors of our economy and that present trade laws and domestic U.S. policies were not adequate to deal with this problem. We found that such targeting was having negative effects on many industries. The Japanese have successfully targeted machine tools and robotics and are now working on fiber optics, many developing nations like South Korea, Taiwan, Brazil, and Mexico are successfully targeting steel, and the EEC countries heavy electrical equipment—and the list goes on and on.

The fact that the United States has a defense program, NASA, and an agriculture price support system, must not prevent us from tackling this problem of targeting head on. These programs, unlike many foreign targeting efforts are not explicitly and solely geared to the capturing of export markets. I believe we will never live in a world nor can we ever create a world where government subsidy of industry of some sort does not exist. And, the United States cannot afford to ignore foreign industrial targeting. We need to challenge our foreign competitors and make them understand if they are going to continue their current practices, the United States will respond with trade actions and domestic policies which will create and maintain a comparative advantage in key U.S. industries.

U.S. industries need a level playing field. Effective macroeconomic policies, tough and effective trade laws combined with a U.S. industrial strategy is the only way we are going to meet foreign competition head on.

This legislation is a great step forward in strengthening and making our trade laws more effective. Even though we are deleting the section on targeting from this bill, we must take action in future months to make our trading partners understand that we are not going to leave unchallenged their continued targeting of our markets. The United States needs a strong trade policy combined with an industrial strategy if we are to remain internationally competitive in many key industrial sectors.

Additional international negotiations on subsidies and targeting are also important to deal with this problem, so the United States must exercise its leadership to bring our international trading partners to the international bargaining table. But progress on this front is going to be painfully slow, and in the meantime we cannot afford to ignore the economic consequences of foreign actions on the U.S. standard of living and competitiveness of our industries. We are living in an intensely competitive and interdependent world. If we are to continue to make economic progress, we must leave no stone unturned in this area.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNDINE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GIBBONS. I appreciate the statements the gentleman has made, and the gentleman knows how hard we struggle to keep the targeting matter in there. Unfortunately, we just could not get the consensus worked out to keep it in there. It was a very controversial part, and it may have held up and killed this bill.

We have not retreated from this provision at all, in fact, we are going to have a very rapid but thorough study of this whole matter by the administration and by our own technical staff. I want to assure the gentleman in the well that we intend to come back next year with a provision that tries to hit this right in the head; just where it ought to be hit.

Mr. LUNDINE. I am very encouraged by that. Thank you.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DERRICK].

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984. In 1983 the International Trade Commission investigated more unfair trade practices cases then they had in the prior 5 years. Many of these cases were filed against our five major trading partners, and directly impacted industries in my district; for example, print cloth against China, polyester dumping by Korea and Japan, and others. Just this week the domestic industry filed unfair trade cases against 13 countries.

These five countries alone, Taiwan, Korea, Hong Kong, China, and Japan exported 61.5 percent of the total textile and apparel imports that entered our borders in 1983—4.570 billion square yards. We are experiencing the worst trade deficit in history. Already there is a $6.2 billion trade deficit for the first 5 months of this year, up 68 percent from last year.

The domestic textile and apparel industries, employing upward of 2 million workers, have lost 240,000 employees over the last 3 years. Many of our foreign trading partners have been exercising more sophisticated techniques to subsidize their exports of textile and apparel to the United States. The textile industry is the most attractive business for developing countries to enter into.

I feel it is imperative that we reform the current trade remedy laws and at least give our domestic industries an opportunity to compete equally with their foreign competitors.

While many of my colleagues may not be completely satisfied with the entire bill, I feel it provides the most reasonable compromise possible between the various interests and gives U.S. industries the kind of relief they need from the unfair trade practices of our trading partners.

I urge my colleagues to support the adoption of this bill.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCE].

Mr. HANCE. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984. This legislation is vitally needed in order to make our unfair trade laws more efficient and to allow us to handle growing unfair trade practices on the part of our trading partners.

I would especially like to bring your attention to a section of the bill that corrects a glowing inefficiency in our Nation's countervailing duty laws. As you know, our countervailing duty law is one of the most basic tools that U.S. industry has to counter trade practices by nations that subsidize the production of their exports. Under these internationally recognized trade principles, if a domestic industry can prove a subsidy by a foreign government that injures or threatens to injure a domestic market, a countervailing duty or tariff is placed on that import to compensate for the unfair subsidy.

A serious flaw in this law has been discovered, however, as a result of a very narrow interpretation of the countervailing duty law by the Department of Commerce. The problem became painfully apparent in recent Commerce rulings concerning subsidized cement and ammonia.

In countries like Mexico, foreign governments essentially give away natural resource products such as oil and natural gas to their domestic industries. These subsidies have proven particularly effective in developing products for exports such as cement, ammonia, and carbon black. Energy is the primary input and cost factor in the production of these products, and Mexico is then able to undercut our domestic markets since they can then sell these products in the United States below the cost of raw materials to our domestic producers.

Commerce, however, has ruled that this is technically not a subsidy since all Mexican industries benefit from the subsidized energy prices. So what Commerce has said is that the greater and the more widespread a subsidy is, the less of a chance it will have of being called a subsidy.

Mr. Chairman, this is a ridiculous situation and one that this bill corrects. H.R. 4784 makes it clear that energy subsidies made available for energy intensive export products can be subject to our countervailing duty laws. The bill measures the subsidy by reference to a country's export price or, in the absence of exports, the fair market value of the energy source.

Our domestic industries, however, will still have to go through the normal process of filing an unfair trade case and proving that foreign subsidies are the cause of the unfair trade practice. But they will now have a fair chance in utilizing our trade laws, and will no longer have to sit aside and watch subsidized imports steal their domestic markets.

This legislation also contains a number of other provisions that will help improve our trade laws. One important section of the bill provides assistance to our Nation's small businesses that are affected by unfair trade but that have been prohibited from using our trade law due to their lack of both technical and financial resources.

Ironically, this bill offers an approach to our trade problems that is most often advocated by its opponents. Many of the opponents of this legislation argue that they are against protectionism, and that the proper solution to foreign subsidies and unfair trade is to streamline and improve our Nation's trade laws.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation is not protectionist. It streamlines and improves our Nation's trade laws so that our domestic industries can effectively combat illegally subsidized imports. It does exactly what its opponents say they want done.

I urge my colleagues to support the trade remedies reform bill.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER], who will provide compelling argumentation at this point.

Mr. BEREUTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I have great respect and deep affection for the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GIBBONS], the chairman of the Trade Subcommittee of the Ways and Means Committee. Indeed, for the whole committee that labor in this very difficult, controversial area of law while being buffeted by the winds of protectionism over there. It is not an easy task for them, I know.

Certainly if one were to only read the title of the bill, one would no doubt find little reason to oppose the measure. How could any rational Representative be against the bill to reform the remedies available to U.S. producers regarding unfair import competition? How can anyone be against such a laudable objective?

We know all too well that American exporters are frustrated at nearly every turn by increasingly sophisticated and omnipresent trade barriers. Negotiations to break down those barriers seem perpetually to take two steps forward and one step backward; a Michael Jackson step.

I rise today to urge my colleagues to vote against H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984, unless we approve Representative FRENZEL's motion to recommit this bill with instructions.

Many Members of this body may yet this day wonder what all the fuss is about regarding this bill. Certainly if one were only to read the bill's title, one would no doubt find little reason to oppose the measure. How could any rational Representative be against a bill "to reform the remedies available to U.S. producers regarding unfair import competition. * * *"? How can anyone find a more laudable objective?

We know all too well that American exporters are frustrated at nearly every turn by increasingly sophisticated and omnipresent foreign trade barriers. Negotiations to break down these barriers seem perpetually to take two steps forward and one step backward. At the same time, we know all too well that many American firms simultaneously are facing intense competition from foreign products often manufactured or marketed here as a direct result of special privileged circumstances.

With all the cries for action from industry and labor, we in the Congress have sought to respond. Lacking the tools or commitment necessary to negotiate away foreign trade barriers or to enhance the competitiveness of American exports, we have attacked the problem as best we could. We are asked to create a level playing field through this legislation.

In some respects, that effort has merit. Several of the reforms proposed in H.R. 4784 are long overdue. Those portions have received the administration's support and are worthy of enactment. Procedural reforms to speed consideration of unfair trade cases are welcomed as is the bill's effort to expand small business' access to the relief process.

Although portions of this prepared legislation are needed, several provisions of this bill are truly dangerous to the international trading system in general and to our own Nation's export performance in particular. We should not pass this bill unless these dubious provisions—especially those relating to downstream dumping and natural resources subsidies—are stricken from the bill.

WHAT H.R. 4784 PROPOSES

Under current law, countervailing duties may be imposed when a foreign government provides "any bounty or grant upon the manufacture or production or export of any article or merchandise" that is imported into the United States. Antidumping duties may be imposed when a "class or kind of merchandise is being, or is likely to be, sold in the United States at less than its fair value."

The downstream dumping section of this bill would make the indirect dumping of components or inputs embodied in imported finished products liable for countervailing or antidumping duties.

If a producer in country A, therefore, sells an intermediate product to another manufacturer in country B at less than fair value, and the country B producer turns around and exports a finished product to the United States containing the dumped goods from country A, such finished product might be subject to antidumping or countervailing duties. These changes do not apply, however, to intermediate products that are manufactured in the same country as the finished product.

The second especially troublesome portion of this bill, that relating to natural resource subsidies, would expand the countervailing duty code to include cases of government subsidization of basis resource products, such as energy. Reportedly, this section is designed to address so-called two-tier pricing systems, which establish higher export prices for natural resources than those available to domestic purchasers. PEMEX, the Mexican Government's petroleum monopoly, engages in such practices by charging foreign purchasers a higher price for natural gas than local buyers.

The legislation we have before us, however, does not merely apply to two-tier pricing systems. Any import embodying resources that have been provided by the Government at a price below fair market value may be subject to countervailing duties—even if the low-cost resource is available to all producers, foreign and domestic.

WHY WE SHOULD OPPOSE THIS LEGISLATION

Do not be beguiled by the apparent logic of these proposals. Do not look at these provisions in isolation from the dynamics of international trade. Do not ignore the fact that for every action there is a reaction.

Agriculture Secretary Block has said with regard to H.R. 4784, "The danger from enactment lies in the precedent such a law would set for interpretation of international trade agreements in ways that can be used against U.S. exports, as well as in the risk of immediate foreign retaliation where U.S. actions clearly violate these international agreements."

We must not allow ourselves to become intoxicated by the elixir of this quick fix solution. We must not resort to manipulating the system and cheating around the edges to compensate for our negotiating shortcomings or our trade deficit. Rather we must work within and change the international trading system to achieve the level playing field we all desire.

It's difficult and painful at times to lead by example, but we must do so. If we weaken in our commitment to the GATT [General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade] and to other multilateral trade agreements, despite their perceived or actual deficiences, I believe that the foreign reaction will be swift and significant. "To broaden these laws without prior negotiations with our trading partners on new rules on international trade," the National Foreign Trade Council has wisely cautioned, "would endanger the fragile consensus which forms the framework for an open trading system and the growth of world trade."

If we in this body have learned anything in these past few difficult years, it is that nothing will be the same again in the international trading system. The halycon days of the Yankee trader as we knew him are gone. No longer do we rule the world trading system effortlessly. No longer do we make the rules for others to follow. The benefits of trade have been discovered by others. They will not be ignored or forgotten.

Virtually every nation now takes an aggressive, active approach to international trade, frequently with a no-holds barred attitude. Tough times the world over, however, have prompted a frightening rise of protectionism. Countries have worked frantically to protect recession ravaged domestic industries.

In the rush to develop markets or to take them from others, nation has been set against nation. Countries who have been allies for centuries now frequently engage in bitter and divisive confrontation over the smallest bit of trading activity.

Let there be no doubt, that mood still flourishes. It flourishes even as the world economy enters recovery.

Once the desire for protectionism started to quicken and the opposition to it weakened of political necessity, its roots began to stretch deeper and wider into the fabric of the international economy.

Make no mistake. If we approve this bill as written, we will give every nation eager to impose import controls the excuse they anxiously seek. If we use this bill to send a message to our trading partners, don't be surprised if the message is interpreted to suit the objectives of others rather than of the United States.

I can assure you, if we don't support the international trading system no one else will. If we pass this bill, some may win a battle. But we will all lose the war.

Everyone has a stake in free trade and the international trading system. America's agricultural exporters have already grasped the importance of this policy debate. They have already learned the hard way the lessons of protectionism, because they frequently have been the victim of our ill-conceived efforts to protect certain sectors of our economy.

□ 1920

The gentleman from Texas a few moments ago said they will buy our grain if they need it. We are not the only alternative for grain and for soybeans. We should have learned that from the last embargo, not to mention the three previous embargoes in the last 11 years.

When we imposed textile import constraints, wheat exports suffered dramatically. When we threatened action in order to open foreign doors for wine exports, our corn gluten exports became an immediate target for retaliation. There are numerous examples of the damage we do when we act unilaterally.

We must reject this bill as written. We must reject the desire to protect. Instead, we must devote our energies to providing for economic growth, not to dividing a stagnant economic pie. We can only do that by working with other nations, not against them.

I fear that this bill will be evaluated on the basis of perceptions, rather than on the basis of prudent public policy considerations. We must resist this temptation. We must look beyond the short-term benefits to the long-term impact.

In closing, I would draw my colleagues' attention to a statement of the National Foreign Trade Council which gives us sound advice as to the path we must follow. "In the long run," the Council has said, "the U.S. response to foreign competition must be to develop broad economic policies to enhance the productivity of U.S. industry and the competitiveness of U.S. goods and services in the world marketplace."

I urge my colleagues to reject H.R. 4784 by voting for the Frenzel motion to recommit with instruction. Members will have that opportunity soon.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. TAUZIN].

Mr. TAUZIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to have the opportunity to express my enthusiastic support for H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984, and to commend Chairman GIBBONS.

The natural resource subsidy provision of the bill corrects an unfair subsidy not covered under existing trade laws which is threatening the survival of industries critical to Louisiana and the United States. Two-tier energy pricing by energy-rich nations is playing havoc with the ammonia and carbon black industries in my State. Ammonia and carbon black represent just the tip of the iceberg, with the rest of the petrochemical industry falling in close behind.

If a large segment of the Louisiana chemical industry should find it necessary to write off their existing facilities because they cannot compete due to subsidized imports, the resultant loss of jobs and tax revenues would be tremendous. Also, since over 60 percent of Louisiana natural gas that is purchased in the State is used either directly or indirectly by the Louisiana chemical manufacturers, the energy sector will also be severely impacted.

Since I represent an energy producing State and sit on the Energy and Commerce Committee I have been particularly interested in arguments by some who say that the natural resources subsidy provision makes the United States vulnerable to mirror legislation by the European Community. It has been suggested that current U.S. gas contract prices, rather than being determined by market forces, are being held down by the pricing provision of the Natural Gas Policy Act of 1978. These statements are misleading and incorrect.

First if the price ceilings mandated by the NGPA actually determine today's gas prices, then industrial users should be paying a price which reflects NGPA ceiling prices on new gas contracts. In fact, just the opposite is true. In spite of the continued increase in NGPA price ceilings, the average wellhead price of gas tended to decline since early 1983. Although the average price for 1983 was $2.60, up from $2.46 per mcf in 1982, wellhead prices have generally fallen since February 1983. While the average price did jump to $2.70 in September, it had dropped to $2.58 per mcf by December. This decline in average wellhead prices suggests that prices agreed to in recent contracts are falling below ceiling levels and market-out actions by pipelines are allowing them to reduce the price paid for gas in existing contracts or stop their purchases altogether.

Second, even assuming additional categories of U.S. gas are deregulated on January 1, 1985, expectations are that prices to industrial users are likely to remain roughly the same. If this is true, this would confirm that current prices negotiated on new contracts already reflect market conditions.

Although the current average wellhead price reflects the market clearing level, it is important to realize that is an average. Price variations also exist among States with respect to the average wellhead price of gas within each State. This variation reflects several factors including:

The mix of regulation-defined gas categories in each State;

Closeness to the points of consumption; and

The geographic concentration and nature of gas resources.

These factors will affect actual market clearing prices at the wellhead in each producing State, as well as delivered prices to industrial users in the future. This simply means that price uniformity is unlikely to develop under either market forces or regulated prices.

Third, any challenge to the NGPA, claiming it bestows a subsidy on U.S. producers, must take into account the myriad of contract prices and NGPA gas categories at which gas is bought and sold in the U.S. marketplace by large numbers of private producers, distributors and users. This complex pricing system does not lend itself to simple characterizations as to whether it reflects or affects the market. The major gas categories under NGPA are primarily based upon market factors, recognizing replacement cost, cost factors of drilling location, and date of first sale, which recognizes the transition and changes in energy pricing worldwide after 1973.

Fourth, the natural resource subsidy provision applies only when the price of gas or oil is specifically manipulated by a government to be lower than the export price or the fair market value of the resource. Fair market value means the price a willing buyer would pay a willing seller in an arm's-length transaction without Government intervention. Fair market value pricing can exist within the framework of Government regulation. Because gas competes directly with No. 6 residual fuel oil in the industrial user market, the price of No. 6 fuel oil is said to set a ceiling on the price industrial users would pay for gas. At any higher price, industrial users would switch to residual fuel oil. Since petroleum products, including residual fuel oil, are decontrolled, their prices are market determined. Therefore, comparisons between the Btu equivalent price of natural gas and that of a substitute fuel, such as No. 6 fuel oil, can shed light on the issue of whether the wellhead price of gas approximates a market price.

U.S. pricing policy is in sharp contrast to that practiced by other countries who would be subject to changes put forth under H.R. 4784. Certain energy-rich nations have constructed pricing systems which are simple, direct and clearly distort the economy. A clear offender is PEMEX, the Mexican energy producer, who set a single delivered energy price to all domestic industrial users. Arm's-length negotiation is nonexistent, as is any attempt to let market forces work to determine prices. In Mexico, no myriad of private users competes for supply and price. In fact, PEMEX and the state-owned electric utilities are the major industrial gas users. Mexico, and countries like it, can only maintain its differential pricing practice by adopting artificial constraints such as denying outside investors access to lower gas prices through export of the gas or through investment in petrochemical plants in that country. The NGPA does not operate under such rigid and discriminatory differentials.

The United States is not vulnerable to mirror legislation if the natural resource subsidy provision of H.R. 4784 is passed into law. the provision attacks specific forms of subsidy practices associated with state ownership and pricing of natural resources such as energy, and where state ownership and control of the downstream production and pricing of energy-intensive products accounts for a significant level of the total use of the resource. We are not losing out to more efficient produers with a comparative advantage in low cost gas. We are losing out to less efficient foreign government producers, which use their monopoly power and price manipulation to capture markets in this country they otherwise could not capture.

I strongly urge my colleagues to vote for H.R. 4784.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ERDREICH].

Mr. ERDREICH. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this measure, I want to commend the committee for coming forward with this measure. We need added sanctions and remedies against unfair trade.

This measure I wish were stronger. It does move us, though, down the path for fair trade. Let me tell my colleagues that the people in the Sixth District of Alabama are a little tired of hearing the rhetoric of free trade, and it reminds me of the comment of Henry Clay some 150 years ago when he said:

> The call for free trade is as unavailing as a cry of a spoiled child for the moon. It never has existed. It never will exist.

Fair trade we need in world trade. This moves us in that direction. Mr. Chairman, and I support the bill.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STANGELAND].

Mr. STANGELAND. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984. In spite of my great deal of respect for the chairman of the Trade Subcommittee and my ranking member, I think this is bad legislation for America's farmers.

I am the first to admit that there has never been, and probably never will be, a free world market for our farm products. Over the years, export embargoes, trade barriers, unfair foreign subsidies, and domestic cheap food policies—just to name a few—have prevented our farmers from receiving a fair price for their production.

But the fact remains that approximately 1 in every 3 acres of farmland produces for the export market and we presently export $20 billion more in farm products than we import.

The enactment of H.R. 4784 could prove disastrous for my wheat, soybeans, and feed grains farmers who are already struggling in today's depressed agricultural economy.

Unfortunately, H.R. 4784 would extend U.S. countervailing duty law into areas that many fear would invite direct retaliation against our farm exports and other key exports, or prompt the implementation of "mirror" legislation by our trading partners that could conceivably treat as unfair our own Rural Electrification Programs.

I firmly believe that the American farmer, when allowed to compete on a fair basis, can outproduce anyone in the world. But the President is right when he has stated that we are all in the same boat and it does not do us any good to shoot a hole in our trading partner's side of the boat. America's farmers, more than anyone else, realize the end result of a retaliatory trade war would mean less markets for our farm exports, huge surpluses and lower commodity prices at home, and a contracting world economy in which the people of every nation—including the United States—will be the biggest losers.

It is certainly true that you cannot have free trade unless you have fair trade. But the answer is in breaking down existing trade barriers and unfair foreign trade practices, not in raising new barriers that could lead us into a massive trade war where we all will ultimately suffer.

We must strive for a more open, free, and fair international trading environment where the efficiency of America's farmers will allow them to compete for and win foreign markets. I urge my colleagues to oppose H.R. 4784.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 seconds to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. REGULA].

Mr. REGULA. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the legislation. I think it is a beginning step in achieving fair as well as free trade for this Nation.

● Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in strong opposition to H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act which this Chamber is about to consider.

Without a doubt, critical reforms are necessary in order to combat the unfair and detrimental trade practices of foreign governments which are partly responsible for our increasing trade deficit. However, H.R. 4784, as reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, is clearly not the vehicle for this task.

I believe the legislation possesses a series of pitfalls which will expose U.S. exporters to unnecessary impairment. Such damage is likely to reverberate throughout the U.S. economy. Members, no doubt, have been informed of exporters' fears of retaliatory or "mirror" legislation if H.R. 4784 is enacted. This apprehension is well founded. At a time when the Congress should be taking action to encourage our trade partners to pursue more open and accessible markets, we are considering legislation which will cause protectionist responses. This is hardly a responsible method of streamlining and clarifying current trade policies.

Numerous questions have been raised as to the spirit and legality of the legislation with regard to its targeting, natural resources, and downstream dumping provisions. The legislation represents a significant departure from longstanding U.S. and international trade policy. Rather than providing additional protection for U.S. export concerns, the Trade Remedies and Reform Act of 1984 will subject such industries to more closed doors, and more closed markets.

Several firms, including a major national corporation in the district I represent, have complained that regulations of the Commerce Department and the slowness of that agency, have hindered their ability to compete internationally. I believe we should look at the hurdles we already have in the Federal Government before we institute sweeping changes of questionable utility.

In confronting this serious issue the committee has brought the subject of U.S. trade policy to the forefront of legislative debate. Nevertheless, the bill it sends to this body must be defeated for the ultimate benefit of U.S. exports. I strongly urge my colleagues to oppose H.R. 4784.●

● Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Chairman, the legislation before us, H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984, makes some laudable changes in our laws which seek to mitigate unfair trade practices.

I am particularly delighted with the inclusion of the section on natural resource subsidies in this bill. This provision seeks to address problems associated with newer and subtler forms of unfair trade.

As the committee report states, natural resource subsidies "involve a government controlled or regulated natural resource price that is lower for domestic use than the export price or the fair market value, is not freely available to U.S. producers for export, and constitutes a significant component cost of the product under investigation."

Activity under this new provision would be taken through the countervailing duty law for determining the existence and amount of any subsidy. If it is determined that a U.S. industry has been harmed by the importation of an imported product—in this case one involving a natural resource—that is subsidized by a foreign government, then countervailing duties may be assessed.

While the term "natural resource product" is not defined in the bill, the committee states that it intends it to apply to basic energy products such as petroleum and natural gas. I would add to that list, coal.

This provision is of some interest to me, as are current provisions of our trade laws which involve products being sold in this country at less than fair market value—dumping—because of the recent and rather dramatic increase in coal imports into the United States.

U.S. imports of foreign coal almost doubled between 1982 and 1983 with much of this increase coming from Colombia and South Africa. Coal imports in 1983 were valued at $54.3 million and are beginning to displace traditional coal sources in the Appalachian region. That is $54.3 million worth of coal and related coal miner employment lost by domestic producers.

I believe it is time for either the Department of Commerce or the International Trade Commission to look into this activity. The central questions in need of investigation are whether these coal imports are being subsidized by foreign governments, are being sold in the United States at below fair market value and whether these imports are harming domestic coal producers and to what extent is this damage.

In this respect, it is my understanding that the International Trade Commission is currently conducting a section 332 study on the position and competitiveness of U.S. coal in the world market. In my view, this study serves little purpose unless it also examines the impact of coal imports on domestic coal producers. I would urge the Commission to immediately expand its study in this respect.

The bill before us today is a needed defense to many of the unfair trade practices in existence today. I urge its adoption.●

● Mr. MOLLOHAN. Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure for me to have the opportunity to take time today to speak in favor of H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984.

Unfortunately, much discussion of our trade laws has become captive to slogans such as "protectionism," "free trade," and the like. These slogans do a disservice by preventing a thorough discussion of our trade problems and remedies. I would like to take a few minutes to explore what this legislation means in concrete terms, instead of just labeling it and walking away.

As all of us are increasingly aware, we are having problems in international trade. Our trade deficits for last year was $69 billion. This year, experts estimate it might run as high as $126 billion—an anticipated increase of 81 percent in our trade deficit from just last year. Since 1980, our increasing trade deficit has contributed to the loss of 2 million jobs and has caused the GNP to fall by 2 percent.

Clearly we are faced with a malignant problem that must be addressed or we will forever lose our foothold in the world of international trade. The problem is simple and it is real: American firms, those enterprises we have lauded as the best advertisement for our democratic free enterprise system, are now being forced to compete with foreign nations.

Let me repeat that statement. American firms are now having to compete against foreign nations. This means that foreign industries targeted for growth by their government can receive 90-percent financing at 3-percent interest, while American companies can only watch and hope they will survive to compete.

Rather than make dire predictions about what might happen, let me provide you with an actual example of what has happened in our new trade world. In my district in West Virginia, the Cabot Corp. operates a plant that produces an important petrochemical called carbon black, which is a rubber reinforcing agent that is widely used in tires and other rubber products. Carbon black feedstock represents 70 percent of the cost of producing carbon black.

Cabot and other U.S. carbon black producers must pay the world market price of $26 per barrel for this feedstock. In 1983, the U.S. Commerce Department found that the Mexican Government provides Mexican carbon black producers with this feedstock at $2 per barrel. As you can see, Mexican carbon black producers have an insurmountable advantage, because their Government provides the resource that represents 70 percent of the cost of producing carbon black at one-thirteenth the market price.

Mexico is using this unfair trade practice to aggressively enter the U.S. market. In 1982, total carbon black exports from Mexico totaled 6.7 million pounds. In 1983, Mexican exports to the United States tripled, to nearly 19 million pounds. In 1984, Mexico plans to export at least 40 million pounds of carbon black to the United States, more than doubling 1983 levels.

Mexico has announced plans to further expand its carbon black production capacity. This additional capacity will equal 25 percent of current U.S. capacity, and will be aimed at capturing additional U.S. market share. This poses a critical threat to U.S. carbon black producers and workers.

Under our current—and dated—trade laws, this kind of indirect subsidy cannot be—and was not—considered in countervailing duty cases. Our trade statutes force us to shut our eyes and pretend we are participating in another trade era and not living in the 1980's. Wishing this kind of substantial government interference would go away will not work. We must act both to protect American firms from these kind of predatory trading practices and to send a clear message to other countries that we are alert to their unfair trade practices and we will not tolerate them.

The bill before us today, H.R. 4784, is an outstanding proposal. It is a carefully crafted response to a complex series of international trade problems. It is narrow in scope and designed to respond only to the most egregious situations. For example, if this bill were law today, the Commerce Department, when considering the carbon black example I just described, would be permitted to consider Mexico's massive subsidies to their carbon black companies. Punitive measures would not be imposed on Mexico, there would simply be a frank recognition of the existing feedstock subsidy.

The legislation does not build a "Berlin wall" approach to trade, but simply permits us to take off our blinders and react to today's trade issues.

Any attempt to modernize our trade law is, unfortunately, met with cries of "protectionism." Applying a tourniquet to our hemorrhaging trade deficit to me is not protectionism, it is plain common sense.

I urge my colleagues to apply a bit of that common sense and vote for H.R. 4784.●

● Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the members of the Ways and Means Committee for their hard work on this trade bill. I am especially pleased with their effort to deal with one growing problem—the need for trade assistance for U.S. firms hurt by the unfair practices of our trading partners.

I think we all agree that current trade laws are working to the disadvantage of U.S. business. The size and growth of our trade deficit, and the stories we all hear from our constituents in a wide range of industries, show that American business is being hurt every day by the actions of its competitors abroad. Too often the governments of these countries allow their firms to evade internationally agreed upon laws, because it is in their economic interest. Sometimes, foreign governments even encourage practices that are unfair.

This administration, like the last, has tried hard to liberalize the international trading system in order to make it freer, fairer, and more beneficial to all. Our trading partners have not done their share to remove their barriers, but are content to continue to take advantage of the largest, most open market in the world: the United States. The result is that firms and entire industries in this country—in my State the shoe industry is one example—are forced out of business. As many of you know, despite a 75-percent import penetration and despite the loss of 100,000 jobs in the United States since 1968, the International Trade Commission decided recently against import relief for this devastated industry.

I think we can all agree that we must act now to change the unfairness in the international trading system. The question is, how should we change it?

The bill we have before us represents one attempt to strengthen our trade laws. It suggests some constructive changes that will simplify the trade remedies process to make it less costly and less burdensome for people involved in the cases. I am particularly pleased to see included in this bill a provision from an earlier bill that I introduced in the House, which would establish a trade remedies assistance office.

This office would provide small business a place in the government to receive a variety of types of trade information. The office would supply information on the remedies and benefits available under the trade laws, and the procedures and dates for filing petitions and applications under these laws. This bill further helps small businesses by requiring that the agencies responsible for administering the laws must also provide technical assistance in the preparation and filing of petitions and applications. I believe this provision is an important way of improving access to injured firms and industries that have in the past been precluded from taking action because of the cost and complexity of trade litigation.

During 7 days of hearings last spring, the Ways and Means Committee heard from a wide range of domestic groups and industries that have been hurt by imports from foreign countries and that do not feel the present trade remedy laws are adequate to address the problems. The committee heard that the cost to file a countervailing duty [CVD] or antidumping petition and carry it through to the end would be a minimum of $100,000 in legal fees. The process could easily last a year, and could drag on for several.

A representative of the Maine Potato Council testified at the hearing. She detailed the history of my State's problem in this agricultural commodity, a problem that began in 1975 when the industry first wrote to the U.S. Trade Representative regarding subsidies provided by Canada to the potato producers. The intent of these subsidies was to increase by 40 percent Canada's potato exports.

In 1978, the Maine Potato Council attempted to file a CVD petition in this case, but neither their local attorney nor the attorney general's office in Maine know how to advise them in the complicated procedure. The efforts of the Maine Potato Council have been long and complicated. They have had significant difficulty in getting the Federal Government to even look at their problem. Even with the aid of economics professors at the University of Maine, they have had problems in documenting evidence regarding injury. Throughout the entire process they have had to deal with great costs and difficulties in pressing their case.

Six years and over $100,000 later, the Maine Potato Council is now waiting for its appeal to be heard by the International Court of Trade in New York. No decision is expected before the end of this year at the earliest. The council presently owes over $50,000 of their expenditures, which is a large debt for a small producers association with an annual budget of about $80,000. It is no wonder that the witness from the council said in her testimony:

> The process for filing a petition with the International Trade Commission and the Department of Commerce is cumbersome * * * and perplexing for an individual who has no legal background and represents a small agricultural industry.

For this reason, I introduced a bill, H.R. 1269, to help reduce the burden. I am pleased that many of the provisions regarding the creation of a trade assistance office are retained in the bill before us. I believe it will go a long way to assisting with the trade concerns of many important industries.●

● Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Chairman, today I rise in strong support of H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act. As a cosponsor of this legislation, I believe it addresses many of the current unfair trade practices presently in effect. For too long, this Nation has been subject to these unfair trade laws and has been unable to compete fairly and effectively in the international market. I believe H.R. 4784 addresses and makes positive changes in many of these inequitable laws.

Presently, the U.S. trade deficit has grown to enormous proportions. While some would say this legislation is protectionism, I believe we must have fair and free trade. H.R. 4784 reacts to many of the present dumping practices and subsidies used by our foreign competitors in order to infiltrate U.S. markets. I believe this legislation will work to see that these practices are curtailed or certainly reduced and provide U.S. companies with a more fair, competitive atmosphere.

We must make some changes in our current trade laws to stimulate growth in our domestic markets and put our people back to work. H.R 4784 would make some of these changes and demonstrate to our foreign traders that the United States will not continue on its present course. We cannot continue to allow our foreign traders to apply barriers to free and fair trade on such products as citrus products, beef, and other agricultural items while allowing our own markets to remain open and fair to all competitors. I am committed to the passage of this legislation and strongly urge my colleagues in the House to vote for this important bill.●

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. Chairman, I fully understand the rationale that has brought the present bill, H.R. 4784, before us today. It is a feeling of frustration that we are being somehow made international trading patsies, that foreign governments through subsidies either overt or covert have captured larger and larger parts of our own domestic markets, while at the same time denying us access to their own markets. Such a feeling of frustration is certainly fueled by the prospect of ever increasing trade deficits, estimated at over $100 billion in the coming year. And besides that, quite frankly, there is a certain election year political appeal in passing such a measure. It is something to take home to our constituents to prove that we're valiantly standing up for American interests against the unfair depredations of foreigners.

For these reasons, this is an attractive bill, and I am sure it will garner significant support. It may even have the votes to pass this House. Many of us may vote for it with the clear understanding that it is in many ways a safe vote, since the other body may not pass it or, if it does, the President will surely veto it. In many ways, then, it is a safe vote.

But, to my mind, we have a greater responsibility here than to a safe vote on a bill that will, in all likelihood, go no farther than this floor. We have a responsibility to judge this legislation on its own merits, rather than taking the easy way out and comforting ourselves with the realization that any flaws in it will not come back to haunt us, since they will never actually be enacted into law. And, frankly, on its own merits, I cannot support this bill.

I cannot support this bill both because of some specific features it entails and, also, because in a broader more general context, it betrays a lack of willingness on our part to take up the real causes underlying our trading problems.

Specifically, there are several features of the bill which are simply not acceptable. The section dealing with the export target subsidy, for example, is not only a nightmare of impractibility, but a contradiction of what we ourselves are trying to do by various tax and spending priorities. The bill basically defines an export targeting subsidy as any Government plan or action which has the effect of making a foreign firm more competitive in exporting products to the United States. This would obviously involve us in an almost preternatural amount of meddling in the internal policies of many of our allies. At the same time, it would mark us as indeed playing with a double standard. Would the corporate tax breaks included in the 1981 tax bill, for instance, qualify, in a foreign government's eyes, as precisely the kind of subsidy we are speaking of here. More to the point, would our whole complex of agricultural support programs, including low interest loans, be regarded as a subsidy? This is one can of worms that would best be left unopened.

Even if the committee amendment deleting this section of the bill is passed, however, there are other troublesome sections still remaining. The same arguments, both of definition and verification, as well as applying a double standard, apply to the sections on upstream subsidies, downstream dumping, and natural resources subsidies. Passage of this bill, even without the targeting subsidy, will create an administrative nightmare which will open us up to retaliatory actions by the very countries we are seeking to increase trade with, and will hurt all our exports, particularly our largest, agriculture.

Beyond these objections to specific sections of the bill, however, there is also an objection on more general grounds. Even if all the administrative problems could be overcome, and even if we did not, in fact, face retaliation from our trading partners, there is, in this bill, a dismaying symptom of our root problem in the trade deficit. We seek, in this bill, to reduce our trade deficits by ad hoc, piecemeal protectionist procedures. We do not address the principal reason for our widening trade deficit, and without addressing that reason we will never solve our problems. That reason is the overvalued nature of the dollar in international money markets.

There are many reasons for this overvaluation, which has the effect of raising the price of all our exports by 25 percent, effectively pricing them out of the market, and reducing the price of all our imports by that same percentage, making them much more attractive. The principal reason, however, is without a doubt the deficit-driven real interest rates now prevalent in our country, which are at historic highs. The dollar is in great demand because of these interest rates, and this has been the major reason for our trade deficit.

We can certainly temporize with the trade deficit problem by passing piecemeal, unrealizable, and unrealistic legislation like H.R. 4784, but until we reduce our high interest rates by reducing our Federal deficits, through a combination of painful, but realistic, spending cuts and equitable increases in revenue, we are merely whistling in the dark. And I, for one, want no part of that particular charade.●

● Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984 and in support of the motion to recommit. This legislation was originally intended to address complaints that our trade statutes are too cumbersome, too costly, and too inefficient to be effective in insulating our industries against unfair import competition. Instead, what developed was a bill shaped by the heavy political hand of a few industries. Rules and procedures contained in this bill further deteriorate a troubled international trading system and expose our exports to the threat of retaliatory action by our trading partners.

The downstream dumping provision is the most confusing and least GATT defensible section in the bill, and would be almost impossible to administer. Dumping involves the accusation by a domestic firm that a foreign firm is selling products in a foreign market at a price below what a like product is sold for in its home market. Our dumping statute was written to be consistent with internationally agreed precepts in the general agreements on tariffs and trade concerning the definition of like product.

The GATT also stipulates that no product may be subject to both countervailing and anti-dumping duties to compensate for the same situation. Enacting H.R. 4784 would be a unilateral expansion of the concept of dumping to include component parts that might be supplied at a dumped price. Any remedy applied under this provision would violate our international obligations in these two respects and give other countries the license to retaliate against U.S. exports.

The second unilateral expansion of multilateral trading principles included in this bill is in the section on natural resource subsidies. United States and international trade practices have adhered to the well-established principle that natural comparative advantages do not constitute subsidies. Proponents of this provision argue that because H.R. 4784 limits our unilateral actions to natural resources, U.S. producers will escape the negative effects of similar provisions enacted in other countries. The problem is that it is going to be difficult to ensure that our trading partners don't pursue this concept to its logical extension. Once the principle of general availability and comparative advantage is relaxed by the United States, our trading partners could rationally argue that benefits such as irrigation projects, rural electrification programs, or reforestation programs are countervailable benefits. There are a few industries in the United States, such as textiles, which have benefited from controlled natural gas prices and thus would be subject to retaliation by "mirror" legislation in export markets.

There has been a great amount of discontent with two-tier pricing practices of countries like Mexico who supply natural gas to domestic producers at a price above production cost but below what they sell it for on the export market. Declaring this an illegal subsidy, while popular with some U.S. producers, intrudes on the right of the Mexicans to allocate their scarce resources in a way which will best foster economic and social development. Trying to prevent this practice is an intrusion on political and economic sovereignty and also conflicts with the theory of comparative advantage, a basic concept underlying the recognized economic benefits of international trade.

The third provision on industrial targeting, which I vigorously opposed during markup of H.R. 4174 and offered an alternative for, was deleted by an amendment adopted by the committee earlier this week. It is unfortunate that the committee is so responsive to the tardy concerns raised by labor about this bill, while certain sectors such as agriculture who will be hurt by it continue to be ignored.

In my view, we cannot continue to enact trade policy based on the concerns of specific industries and groups while the interests of other sectors are compromised. I urge my colleagues to oppose H.R. 4784 and adopt the motion to recommit. This bill needs to be returned to the Ways and Means Committee so that the legitimate proposals for trade remedy reform contained in H.R. 4784 can be preserved.●

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GIBBONS. I have no further requests for time, Mr. Chairman, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the bill is considered as having been read for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

No amendments are in order except amendments recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means, which shall not be subject to amendment.

The text of H.R. 4784 is as follows:

H.R. 4784

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. REFERENCE.

Except as otherwise expressly provided, whenever in this Act an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or repeal of, a title, subtitle, part, section, or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a title, subtitle, part, section, or other provision of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1202 et seq.).

TITLE I—AMENDMENTS TO COUNTERVAILING DUTY AND ANTIDUMPING DUTY LAWS

SEC. 101. CLARIFICATION OF GENERAL RULE.

(a) Section 701(a) (16 U.S.C. 1671(a)) is amended—

(1) by inserting ", or sold (or likely to be sold) for importation," after "imported" in paragraph (1);

(2) by inserting "or by reason of sales (or the likelihood of sales) of that merchandise for importation" immediately after "by reason of imports of that merchandise" in paragraph (2); and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "For purposes of this subsection and section 705(b)(1), a reference to the sale of merchandise includes the entering into of any leasing arrangment regarding the merchandise that is equivalent to the sale of the merchandise.".

(b) Section 705(b)(1) (19 U.S.C. 1671(b)(1)) is amended by inserting ", or sales (or the likelihood of sales) for importation," immediately after "by reason of imports".

(c) Section 731 (16 U.S.C. 1673) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "For purposes of this section and section 735(b)(1), a reference to the sale of foreign merchandise includes the entering into of any leasing arrangement regarding the merchandise that is equivalent to the sale of the merchandise.".

SEC. 102. PERIOD FOR CERTAIN PRELIMINARY DETERMINATIONS; CONGRESSIONAL NOTIFICATION.

(a) Subsection (c) of section 703 (19 U.S.C. 1671b(c)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "150th day" in paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu thereof "115th day"; and

(2) by amendment paragraph (2)—

(A) by striking out "investigation," and inserting in lieu thereof "investigation and the appropriate Committees of Congress,"; and

(B) by striking out "an explanation" and inserting in lieu thereof "a detailed justification, together with supporting information,".

(b) Section 733 (19 U.S.C. 1673b) is amended—

(1) by amending subsection (b) to read as follows:

"(b) PRELIMINARY DETERMINATION BY ADMINISTERING AUTHORITY.—Within 85 days after the date on which a petition is filed under section 732(b), or an investigation is commenced under section 732(a), but not before an affirmative determination by the Commission under subsection (a) of this section, the administering authority shall make a determination, based upon the best information available to it at the time of the determination, of whether there is a reasonable basis to believe or suspect that the merchandise is being sold, or is likely to be sold, at less than fair value. If the determination of the administering authority under this subsection is affirmative, the determination shall include the estimated average amount by which the foreign market value exceeds the United States price."; and

(2) by amending subsection (c)—

(A) by striking out "210th day" in paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu thereof "115th day"; and

(B) by striking out "investigation," in paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "investigation and the appropriate Committees of Congress,".

SEC. 103. TERMINATION OR SUSPENSION OF INVESTIGATION.

(a) Section 704 (19 U.S.C. 1671c) is amended—

(1) by amending subsection (a) to read as follows:

"(a) TERMINATION OF INVESTIGATION UPON WITHDRAWAL OF PETITION.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in paragraphs (2) and (3), an investigation under this subtitle may be terminated by either the administering authority or the Commission, after notice to all parties to the investigation, upon withdrawal of the petition by the petitioner or by the administering authority if the investigation was initiated under section 702(a).

"(2) SPECIAL RULE IN CASE OF AGREEMENTS OR UNDERSTANDING TO RESTRICT VOLUME OF IMPORTS.—An investigation may not be terminated under paragraph (1) by reason of any agreement or understanding to limit the volume of imports into the United States of the merchandise that is the subject of the investigation unless (A) the agreement or undertaking is offered by the government of the country in which the subsidy practice is alleged to occur, and (B) the President—

"(i) determines, after consulting with potentially affected consuming industries and with all United States producers of like merchandise (whether or not parties to the investigation) that the understanding or agreement would not, based upon the relative impact on consumer prices and the availability of supplies of the merchandise, have a greater adverse effect on United States consumers than the imposition of countervailing duties; and

"(ii) accepts the agreement or understanding.

"(3) LIMITATION ON TERMINATION BY COMMISSION.—The Commission may not terminate an investigation under paragraph (1) before a preliminary determination is made by the administering authority under section 703(b).";

(2) by amending subsection (b)—

(A) by striking out "or offset" in the side-heading thereto;

(B) by amending paragraph (1) to read as follows:

"(1) to eliminate the subsidy completely with respect to that merchandise exported directly or indirectly to the United States on the date the investigation is suspended, or"; and

(C) by striking out "within 6 months after the date on which" in paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "on the date";

(3) by amending paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of subsection (c) to read as follows:

"(1) GENERAL RULE.— If the administering authority determines that extraordinary circumstances are present in a case, it may suspend an investigation

"(A) upon acceptance by it of an agreement that meets the requirements set forth in paragraph (2) from a government described in subsection (b) or from exporters described in subsection (b); or

"(B) upon the entering into force of a quantitative restriction agreement that meets the requirements set forth in paragraph (3).

"(2) GENERAL AGREEMENT REQUIREMENTS.— The administering authority may not accept an agreement under paragraph (1)(A) unless—

"(A) the agreement will eliminate completely the injurious effect of exports to the United States of the merchandise which is the subject of the investigation,

"(B) the suppression or undercutting of price levels of domestic products by imports of that merchandise will be prevented, and

"(C) at least 85 percent of the net subsidy will be eliminated.

"(3) QUANTITATIVE RESTRICTION AGREEMENTS.—For purposes of this subsection, the term 'quantitative restriction agreement' means any agreement or understanding, accepted by the President, with the foreign government of the country in which the subsidy practice is alleged to occur—

"(A) that restricts the volume of imports into the United States of the merchandise that is the subject of the investigation,

"(B) that meets the requirements set forth in paragraph (2)(A); and

"(C) with respect to which the President determines that its entry into force would not, based upon the relative impact on consumer prices and the availability of supplies of the merchandise, have a greater adverse effect on United States consumers than the imposition of countervailing duties.

Before making a determination under subparagraph (C), the President shall consult with potentially affected consuming industries and with all United States producers of like merchandise, whether or not parties to the investigation.";

(4) by amending subsection (d)—

(A) by amending paragraph (1) to read as follows:

"(1) PUBLIC INTEREST; MONITORING.—The administering authority may not accept an agreement under subsection (b) or (c)(1)(A), nor may the President enter into a quantitative restriction agreement described in subsection (c)(1)(B), unless—

"(A) the administering authority or the President, as the case may be, is satisfied that suspension of the investigation is in the public interest, and

"(B) effective monitoring of the agreement by the United States is practicable.";

(B) by striking out paragraph (2), and

(C) by redesignating paragraph (3) as paragraph (2); and

(5) by amending subsection (i)(1)—

(A) by striking out "and" at the end of subparagraph (C),

(B) by redesignating subparagraph (D) as subparagraph (E), and

(C) by inserting immediately after subparagraph (C) the following new subparagraph:

"(D) if it considers the violation to be intentional, notify the Commissioner of Customs who shall take appropriate action under paragraph (2), and".

(b) Section 734 (19 U.S.C. 1673c) is amended—

(1) by amending subsection (a) to read as follows:

"(a) TERMINATION OF INVESTIGATION UPON WITHDRAWAL OF PETITION.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in paragraphs (2) and (3), an investigation under this subtitle may be terminated by either the administering authority or the Commission, after notice to all parties to the investigation, upon withdrawal of the petition by the petitioner or by the administering authority if the investigation was initiated under section 732(a).

"(2) SPECIAL RULE IN CASE OF AGREEMENTS OR UNDERSTANDING TO RESTRICT VOLUME OF IMPORTS.—An investigation may not be terminated under paragraph (1) by reason of any agreement or understanding to limit the volume of imports into the United States of the merchandise that is the subject of the investigation unless the President—

"(A) determines, after consulting with potentially affected consuming industries and with all United States producers of like merchandise (whether or not parties to the investigation) that the understanding or agreement would not, based upon the relative impact on consumer prices and the availability of supplies of the merchandise, have a greater adverse effect on United States consumers than the imposition of antidumping duties; and

"(B) accepts the agreement or understanding.

"(3) LIMITATION ON TERMINATION BY COMMISSION.—The Commission may not terminate an investigation under paragraph (1) before a preliminary determination is made by the administering authority under section 733(b).";

(2) by striking out "within 6 months after the date on which" in subsection (b)(1) and inserting in lieu thereof "on the date";

(3) by amending subsection (d) to read as follows:

"(d) ADDITIONAL RULES AND CONDITIONS.—The administering authority may not accept an agreement under subsection (b) or (c) unless—

"(1) it is satisfied that suspension of the investigation is in the public interest, and

"(2) effective monitoring of the agreement by the United States is practicable."; and

(5) by amending subsection (i)(1)—

(A) by striking out "and" at the end of subparagraph (C),

(B) by redesignating subparagraph (D) as subparagraph (E), and

(C) by inserting immediately after subparagraph (C) the following new subparagraph:

"(D) if it considers the violation to be intentional, notify the Commissioner of Customs who shall take appropriate action under paragraph (2), and".

SEC. 104. DEFINITIONS AND SPECIAL RULES REGARDING UPSTREAM AND OTHER SUBSIDIES, DOWNSTREAM DUMPING, MATERIAL INJURY, AND INTERESTED PARTIES.

(a) Section 771 (19 U.S.C. 1655) is amended as follows:

(1) Paragraph (5) is amended to read as follows:

"(5) SUBSIDY.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The term 'subsidy' has the same meaning as the term 'bounty or grant' as that term is used in section 303 of this Act, and includes, but is not limited to, the following:

"(i) Any export subsidy described in Annex A to the Agreement (relating to illustrative list of export subsidies).

"(ii) The following domestic subsidies, if provided or required by government action to a specific enterprise or industry, or group of enterprises or industries, whether publicly or privately owned, and whether paid or bestowed directly or indirectly on the manufacture, production, or export of any class or kind of merchandise:

"(I) The provision of capital, loans, or loan guarantees on terms inconsistent with commercial considerations.

"(II) The provision of goods or services at preferential rates.

"(III) The grant of funds or forgiveness of debt to cover operating losses sustained by a specific industry.

"(IV) The assumption of any costs or expenses of manufacture, production, or distribution.

"(iii) Any export targeting subsidy described in subparagraph (B).

"(iv) Any natural resource subsidy described in subparagraph (C).

"(v) Any upstream subsidy determined under section 771A.

"(B) EXPORT TARGETING SUBSIDY.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—The term 'export targeting subsidy' means any government plan or scheme consisting of coordinated actions, whether carried out severally or jointly or in combination with any other subsidy under subparagraph (A), that are bestowed on a specific enterprise, industry, or group thereof (hereinafter in this paragraph referred to as a 'beneficiary') of a kind referred to in subparagraph (A)(ii) and the effect of which is to assist the beneficiary to become more competitive in the export of any class or kind of merchandise. The actions referred to in the preceeding sentence include, but are not limited to, the following:

"(I) The exercise of government control over banks and other financial institutions that requires the diversion of private capital on preferential terms to specific beneficiaries or into specific sectors.

"(II) Extensive government involvement in promoting or encouraging anticompetitive behavior among specific beneficiaries; including the providing of assistance in planning and establishing joint ventures which have an anticompetitive export effect, the relaxation of antitrust rules normally applied to beneficiaries to assure the development of anticompetitive export cartels, the providing of assistance in planning or coordinating joint research and development among selected beneficiaries to promote export competitiveness, and regulating the division of markets or allocation of products among selected beneficiaries.

"(III) Special protection of the home market that permits the development of competitive exports in a specific sector or product.

"(IV) Special restrictions on technology transfer or government procurement that limit competition in a specific sector or beneficiary and thereby promote export competitiveness.

"(V) The use of investment restrictions, including domestic content and export performance requirements, that limit competition in a specific sector or beneficiary and thereby promote export competitiveness.

"(ii) DETERMINATION OF LEVEL OF EXPORT TARGETING SUBSIDY.—In determining the level of an export targeting subsidy, the administering authority shall utilize a method of calculation which, in its judgment and to the extent possible, reflects the full benefit of the subsidy to the beneficiary over the period during which the subsidy has an effect, rather than the cash cost of the subsidy to the government.

"(C) NATURAL RESOURCE SUBSIDY.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—A natural resource subsidy exists if a natural resource product is provided or sold within a country (hereinafter referred to as the 'exporting country'), for use (directly or indirectly) in the manufacture or production of any class or kind of merchandise in the exporting country, by a government-regulated or controlled entity, at a domestic price that, by reason of such regulation or control—

"(I) is lower than the export price or fair market value (whichever is appropriate) of the product in the exporting country,

"(II) is not freely available to United States producers for purchase of that product for export to the United States, and

"(III) would, if sold at the export price or fair market value (whichever is appropriate), constitute a significant portion of the total cost of the manufacture or production of such merchandise.

"(ii) LEVEL OF NATURAL RESOURCE SUBSIDY.—The level of a natural resource subsidy is the difference between the domestic price of the natural resource product and the export price of that product; except that if—

"(I) there are no exports of that product, or

"(II) the export price of that product is distorted by being either significantly higher or lower than market prices in the relevant market by reason of quotas or other government manipulation, the level of the natural resource subsidy is the difference between that domestic price and the fair market value of that product.

"(iii) DETERMINATION OF FAIR MARKET VALUE.—For purposes of this subparagraph, the term 'fair market value' means the price that a willing buyer would pay a willing seller for a natural resource product in an arms-length transaction in the absence of government regulation. In determining the fair market value, the administering authority shall take into account—

"(I) the prices at which the product is generally available in world markets, and

"(II) the market clearing price or the average United States price, whichever is appropriate, at which the product is generally available to United States producers, and shall also take into account the extent, if any, to which—

"(III) a comparative advantage of the exporting country in relation to other sellers (for example, any cost savings resulting from such factors as the availability of abundant supplies, lower production costs, or lower transportation costs), and

"(IV) the availability or lack of access to export markets, would result in a different market price in the exporting country in the absence of government regulation.".

(2) Paragraph (7) is amended—

(A) by inserting the following new clause at the end of subparagraph (C):

"(iv) CUMULATION.—For purposes of clauses (i) and (ii), the Commission shall cumulatively assess the volume and effect of imports from two or more countries of like products subject to investigation if—

"(I) the marketing of such imports in the United States is reasonably coincident, and

"(II) there is a reasonable indication that such imports will have a contributing effect in causing, or threatening to cause, material injury to the industry.";

(B) by amending subparagraph (E) to read as follows:

"(E) STANDARD FOR DETERMINATION.—The presence or absence of any factor which the Commission is required to evaluate under subparagraph (C) or (D) shall not necessarily give decisive guidance with respect to the determination by the Commission of material injury."; and

(C) by inserting after subparagraph (E) the following new subparagraph:

"(F) THREAT OF MATERIAL INJURY.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—In determining whether there is a threat of material injury, the Commission shall consider, among other relevant economic factors—

"(I) if a subsidy is involved, such information as may be presented to it by the administering authority as to the nature of the subsidy (particularly as to whether the subsidy is an export subsidy inconsistent with the Agreement), and

"(II) whether there is, based on any demonstrable adverse trend regarding the merchandise concerned (such as an increase in production capacity in the exporting country likely to result in a significant increase in exports thereof to the United States, a rapid increase in United States market penetration and the likelihood that the penetration will increase to an injurious level, the likelihood that imports will enter at prices that will have a depressing or suppressing effect on domestic prices, or a substantial increase in inventories in the United States), a probability that the merchandise (whether or not it is actually being imported at the time) will be the cause of actual injury.

A determination may not be made on the basis of mere supposition or conjecture, and sufficient information must exist for concluding that the threat of injury is real and that actual injury is imminent.

"(ii) IF EXPORT TARGETING SUBSIDIES INVOLVED.—In determining under clause (i) whether there is a threat of material injury by reason of an export targeting subsidy, the Commission shall consider—

"(I) the effect of the practices constituting the subsidy on the export competitiveness of the beneficiary of the subsidy, and

"(II) the extent to which such practices are likely to have a demonstrable adverse effect on the industry with regard to costs and availability of capital, outlays for research and development, and future investment.".

(3) Paragraph (9) is amended—

(A) by striking out "and" at the end of subparagraph (D);

(B) by striking out the period at the end of subparagraph (E); and

(C) by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(F) an association, a majority of whose members is composed of interested parties described in subparagraph (C), (D), or (E) with respect to a like product.".

(b) Subtitle D of title VII is amended by adding after section 711 the following new section:

"SEC. 771A. UPSTREAM SUBSIDIES AND DOWNSTREAM DUMPING.

"(a) UPSTREAM SUBSIDIES.—

"(1) DEFINITION.—The term 'upstream subsidy' means any action of a kind described or referred to in section 771(5)(A) (i), (ii), (iii), or (iv) by the government of a country that—

"(A) is paid or bestowed by that country with respect to a product that is used in the manufacture or production in that country of merchandise which is the subject of an investigation under subtitle A or B,

"(B) results in a price for the product for such use that is lower than the generally available price of the product in that country, and

"(C) has a significant effect on the cost of manufacturing or producing the merchandise.

In applying this definition, the member states of the European Economic Community shall be treated as being one country.

"(2) ADJUSTMENT OF GENERALLY AVAILABLE PRICE IN CERTAIN CIRCUMSTANCES.—If the administering authority decides that the generally available price for a product in the country of the manufacture, production, or export of the merchandise under investigation is artificially depressed by reason of any subsidy, or because of sales thereof in such country at less than fair value, the administering authority shall adjust such generally available price so as to offset such depression before applying paragraph (1)(B).

"(3) INCLUSION OF AMOUNT OF SUBSIDY.—If the administering authority decides, during the course of an investigation under subtitle A or B, that an upstream subsidy is being or has been paid or bestowed regarding the merchandise under investigation, the administering authority shall include the amount of such subsidy in any countervailing duty or dumping duty imposed under that subtitle on the merchandise.

"(b) DOWNSTREAM DUMPING.—

"(1) DEFINITION.—Downstream dumping occurs when—

"(A) a product that is used in the manufacture or production of merchandise subject to investigation under subtitle A or B is purchased at a price that is below its foreign market value (as determined under subtitle B without regard to this subsection),

"(B) that purchase price—

"(i) is lower than the generally available price of the product in the country of manufacture or production, or

"(ii) if the generally available price of the product in the country of manufacture or production is artificially depressed by reason of any subsidy or other sales at below foreign market value, is lower than the price at which the product would be generally available in such country but for such depression, and

"(C) the difference between the foreign market value and such purchase price has a significant effect on the cost of manufacturing or producing the merchandise under investigation.

"(2) INCLUSION OF AMOUNT ATTRIBUTABLE TO DOWNSTREAM DUMPING.—If the administering authority decides, during the course of an investigation under subtitle A or B, that downstream dumping is occurring, or has occurred, with respect to any product used in the manufacture or production of the merchandise under investigation, the administering authority, in calculating the amount of any countervailing duty or antidumping duty on such merchandise, shall include an amount equal to the difference between the foreign market value of such product and either (1) the generally available price, referred to in paragraph (1)(B)(i), of the product; or (2) the price, referred to in paragraph (1)(B)(ii), of the product that would pertain but for artificial depression, whichever price is appropriate.

"(c) SCOPE OF INQUIRY BY ADMINISTERING AUTHORITY.—The administering authority is nor required, in undertaking an investigation under subtitle A or B, to inquire regarding the presence of an upstream subsidy, or of downstream dumping, beyond that stage in the manufacture or production of the class or kind of merchandise that immediately precedes the final manufacturing or production stage before export to the United States, unless reasonably available information indicates that such a subsidy is being or has been paid or bestowed, or such dumping is occurring or has occurred, before such immediately preceding stage and is having or has had a substantial effect on the price of the merchandise.".

(c)(1) Section 514(a) (19 U.S.C. 1514(a)) is amended by striking out "771(9)(C), (D), and (E) of this Act." and inserting in lieu thereof "771(9)(C),(D),(E), and (F) of this Act.".

(2) Sections 704 (g)(2) and (h)(1) and 734 (g)(2) and (h)(1) (19 U.S.C. 1671c (g)(2) and (h)(1) and 1673c (g)(2) and (h)(1)) are each amended by striking out "(C), (D), or (E)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(C), (D), (E), and (F)".

(3) Section 1582(c) of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(A) by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (3),

(B) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (4), and inserting in lieu thereof ", and", and

(C) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(5) an association composed of members who present parties-at-interest described in paragraphs (3) and (4).".

(4) The table of contents for title VII is amended by inserting after the entry for section 771 the following:

"Sec. 771A. Upstream subsidies and downstream dumping.".

SEC. 105. NONMARKET ECONOMY PRICING.

Section 773(c) (19 U.S.C. 1677b(c)) is amended to read as follows:

"(c) STATE-CONTROLLED ECONOMIES.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—If available information (including all information supplied by an interested party within the meaning of section 771(9) (A) or (B)) indicates to the administering authority that the relevant sector of the economy of the country from which the merchandise is exported is State-controlled to the extent that sales or offers of sales of such or similar merchandise in that country or to countries other than the United States do not permit a determination of foreign market value under subsection (a), the administering authority shall determine the foreign market value of the merchandise on the basis of either—

"(A) the lowest free-market price of like articles in the United States if such price is a competitive free market price; or

"(B) the normal costs, expenses, and profits as reflected by either—

"(i) the prices, determined in accordance with subsection (a), at which such or similar merchandise of a comparable non-State-controlled economy country or countries in which the merchandise is produced is sold either—

"(I) for consumption in the home market of that country or countries, or

"(II) to other countries, including the United States, or

"(ii) the constructed value of such or similar merchandise in a non-State-controlled economy country or countries as determined under subsection (c).

If the administering authority determines that the lowest free-market price is not a competitive free-market price by virtue of a limited number of free-market suppliers of the merchandise in the United States market, it shall determine the foreign market value on the basis of subparagraph (B).

"(2) DEFINITION.—For purposes of this subsection, the term 'lowest free-market price of like article' means the lowest average price (adjusted to disregard the lowest 10 percent of the average) adjusted—

"(A) to account for the price depressing effect of imports of the dumped merchandise from the State-controlled economy country, and

"(B) for differences in quantity, level of trade, duties or other factors required to ensure comparability, charged for like articles in the United States by all producers from the United States or any non-State controlled economy countries regarding which—

"(i) no preliminary or final determination has been made under section 303, 703, or 705 that a subsidy, bounty, or grant is being provided with respect to like articles from that country, and

"(ii) no preliminary or final determination has been made under section 733 or 735 that like articles from that country are being, or are likely to be, sold in the United States at less than fair value, which, as determined by the administering authority, produces a sufficient quantity of like articles for the administering authority to determine a representative price.".

SEC. 106. VERIFICATION OF INFORMATION.

Section 776(a) (19 U.S.C. 1677e(a)) is amended to read as follows:

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—The administering authority shall verify all information relied upon in making—

"(1) a final determination in an investigation, and

"(2) a revocation under section 751(c).

In publishing notice of any action referred to in paragaph (1) or (2), the administering authority shall report the methods and procedures used to verify such information. If the administering authority is unable to verify the accuracy of the information submitted, it shall use the best information available to it as the basis for its action, which may include, in actions referred to in paragraph (1), the information submitted in support of the petition.".

SEC. 107. RELEASE OF CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION.

Section 777 (19 U.S.C. 1677f) is amended—

(1) by amending subsection (b)—

(A) by striking out "submitted)" in the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "submitted, or an officer or employee of the United States Customs Service who is directly involved in conducting an investigation regarding fraud under this title)", and

(B) by amending the second sentence thereof to read as follows:

"The administering authority and the Commission shall require that information for which confidential treatment is requested be accompanied by—

"(A) a nonconfidential summary in sufficient detail to permit a reasonable understanding of the substance of the information submitted in confidence, or a statement that the information is not susceptible to summary accompanied by a statement of the reasons in support of the contention, and

"(B) a statement permitting the administering authority to release under administrative protective order, in accordance with subsection (c), the information submitted in confidence, or a statement that the information should not be released under administrative protective order.";

(2) by inserting ", before or after receipt of the information requested," after "application," in subsection (c)(1)(A); and

(3) by inserting ", except that no distinction may be made between corporate counsel and retained counsel" immediately before the period at the end of the first sentence of subsection (c)(1)(B).

SEC. 108. SAMPLING AND AVERAGING IN DETERMINING UNITED STATES PRICE AND FOREIGN MARKET VALUE.

(a) Subtitle D of title VII (19 U.S.C. 1677a et seq.) is further amended by adding immediately after section 777 the following new section:

"SEC. 777A. SAMPLING AND AVERAGING.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—For the purpose of determining United States price or foreign market value under sections 772 and 773, and for purposes of carrying out annual reviews under section 751, the administering authority may—

"(1) use averaging or generally recognized sampling techniques whenever a significant volume of sales is involved or a significant number of adjustments to prices is required, and

"(2) decline to take into account adjustments which are insignificant in relation to the price or value of the merchandise.

"(b) SELECTION OF SAMPLES AND AVERAGES.—The authority to select appropriate samples and averages shall rest exclusively with the administering authority; but such samples and averages shall be representative of the transaction under investigation.".

(b) Subsection (f) of section 773 (19 U.S.C. 1677b(f) is repealed.

(c) The table of contents for title VII is amended by inserting after the entry for section 777 the following:

"Sec. 777A. Sampling and averaging.".

SEC. 109. ELIMINATION OF INTERLOCUTORY APPEALS.

(a) Section 516A(a) (19 U.S.C. is amended as follows:

(1) Paragraph (1) is amended to read as follows:

"(1) REVIEW OF CERTAIN DETERMINATIONS.—Within 30 days after the date of publication in the Federal Register of—

"(A) a determination by the administering authority, under 702(c) or 732(c) of this Act, not to initiate an investigation,

"(B) a determination by the Commission, under section 751(b) of this Act, not to review a determination based upon changed circumstances, or

"(C) a negative determination by the Commission, under section 703(a) or 733(a) of this Act, as to whether there is reasonable indication of material injury, threat of material injury, or material retardation, an interested party who is a party to the proceeding in connection with which the matter arises may commence an action in the United States Court of International Trade by filing concurrently a summons and complaint, each with the content and in the form, manner, and style prescribed by the rules of that court, contesting any factual findings or legal conclusions upon which the determination is based.".

(2) Paragraph (2)(A) is amended—

(A) by striking out "the date of publication in the Federal Register of" in the matter preceding clause (i); and

(B) by amending clauses (i) and (ii) to read as follows:

"(i) the date of publication in the Federal Register of—

"(I) notice of any determination described in clause (ii), (iii), (iv), or (v) of subparagraph (B), or

"(II) an antidumping or countervailing duty order based upon any determination described in clause (i) of subparagraph (B), or

"(ii) the date of mailing of a determination described in clause (vi) of subparagraph (B),".

(3) Amend paragraph (2)(B) to read as follows:

"(B) REVIEWABLE DETERMINATIONS.—The determinations which may be contested under subparagraph (A) are as follows:

"(i) Final affirmative determinations by the administering authority and by the Commission under section 705 or 735 of this Act, including any negative part of such a determination (other than a part referred to in clause (ii)).

"(ii) A final negative determination by the administering authority or the Commission under section 705 or 735 of this Act, including, at the option of the appellant, any part of a final affirmative determination which specifically excludes any company or product.

"(iii) A final determination, other than a determination reviewable under paragraph (1), by the administering authority or the Commission under section 751 of this Act.

"(iv) A determination by the administering authority, under section 704 or 734 of this Act, to suspend an antidumping duty or a countervailing duty investigation, including any final determination resulting from a continued investigation which changes the size of the dumping margin or net subsidy calculated, or the reasoning underlying such calculations, at the time the suspension agreement was concluded.

"(v) An injurious effect determination by the Commission under section 704(h) or 734(h) of this Act.

"(vi) A determination by the administering authority as to whether a particular type of merchandise is within the class or kind of merchandise described in an existing finding of dumping or antidumping or countervailing duty order.".

(4) Redesignate paragraph (3) as paragraph (4) and after paragraph (2) insert the following:

"(3) EXCEPTION.—Notwithstanding the limitation imposed by paragraph (2)(A)(ii) of this subsection, a final affirmative determination by the administering authority under section 705 or 735 of this Act may be contested by commencing an action, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (2)(A), within thirty days after the date of publication in the Federal Register of a final negative determination by the Commission under section 705 or 735 of this Act which is predicated upon the size of either the dumping margin or net subsidy determined to exist.".

(b) Title 28, United States Code, is amended as follows:

(1) Section 2636 is amended—

(A) by amending subsection (c) to read as follows:

"(c) A civil action contesting a reviewable determination listed in section 516A of the Tariff Act of 1930 is barred unless commenced in accordance with the rules of the Court of International Trade within the time specified in such section."; and

(B) by striking out subsection (d) and redesignating subsections (e) through (i) as (d) through (h), respectively.

(2) Section 2647 is amended to read as follows:

"§ 2647. Precedence of cases.

"The following civil actions in the Court of International Trade shall be given precedence, in the following order, over other civil actions pending before the Court, and shall be assigned for hearing at the earliest practicable date and expedited in every way:

"(1) First, a civil action involving the exclusion of perishable merchandise or the redelivery of such merchandise.

"(2) Second, a civil action commenced under section 515 of the Tariff Act of 1930 involving the exclusion or redelivery of merchandise.

"(3) Third, a civil action commenced under section 516 or 516A of the Tariff Act of 1930.".

TITLE II—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 201. ESTABLISHMENT OF TRADE REMEDY ASSISTANCE OFFICE AND TARGETING SUBSIDY MONITORING PROGRAM IN THE UNITED STATES INTERNATIONAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Part 2 of title II (19 U.S.C. 1330-1341) is amended by inserting after section 338 the following new sections:

"SEC. 339. TRADE REMEDY ASSISTANCE OFFICE.

"(a) There is established in the Commission a Trade Remedy Assistance Office which shall provide full information to the public, upon request, concerning—

"(1) remedies and benefits available under the trade laws, and

"(2) the petition and application procedures, and the appropriate fiing dates, with respect to such remedies and benefits.

"(b) Each agency responsible for administering a trade law shall provide technical assistance to eligible small businesses to enable them to prepare and file petitions and applications (other than those which, in the opinion of the agency, are frivolous) to obtain the remedies and benefits that may be available under that law.

"(c) For purposes of this section—

"(1) The term 'eligible small business' means any business concern which, in the agency's judgment, due to its small size, has neither adequate internal resources nor financial ability to obtain qualified outside assistance in preparing and filing petitions and applications for remedies and benefits under trade laws. In determining whether a business concern is an 'eligible small business', the agency may consult with the Small Business Administration, and shall consult with any other agency that has provided assistance under subsection (b) to that business concern. An agency decision regarding whether a business concern is an eligible small business for purposes of this section is not reviewable by any other agency or by any court.

"(2) The term 'trade laws' means—

"(A) chapter 1 of title II of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2251 et seq., relating to relief caused by import competition);

"(B) chapters 2 and 3 of such title II (relating to adjustment assistance for workers and firms);

"(C) chapter 1 of title III of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2411 et seq., relating to relief from foreign import restrictions and export subsidies);

"(D) title VII of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1671 et seq., relating to the imposition of countervailing duties and antidumping duties);

"(E) section 232 of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 (19 U.S.C. 1862, relating to the safeguarding of national security); and

"(F) section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1337, relating to unfair practices in import trade).".

"SEC. 340. TARGETING SUBSIDY MONITORING PROGRAM.

"(a) The Commission shall establish and implement a continuing program to monitor and analyze the industrial plans and policies of foreign countries and instrumentalities in order to discover whether targeting subsidies (as defined in section 711(5)(B)) are being planned or have been implemented.

"(b) In implementing the program, the Commission shall give priority to those countries and instrumentalities and product sectors in which the United States has significant economic or commercial interests. The Commission shall consult with other appropriate federal agencies and solicit the views and comments of the public in determining priorities for purposes of the preceding sentence.

"(c) The Commission shall regularly report the information resulting from the program to the administering authority (as defined in section 771(1)) and shall make such information (other than that requiring confidential treatment) available to the public.

"(d) Each agency of the United States shall provide to the Commission, upon its request, such information as the Commission considers to be necessary or appropriate for purposes of carrying out this section. Classified information shall be provided to the Commission under this subsection if the provider agency is satisfied that the Commission will enforce appropriate measures to prevent the loss or unauthorized disclosure of the information.".

SEC. 202. ADJUSTMENTS STUDY.

The Secretary of Commerce shall undertake a study of the current practices that are applied in the making of adjustments to purchase prices and exporter's sales prices under section 772 (d) and (e) (19 U.S.C. 1677a (d) and (e)) and foreign market value and constructed value under section 773 (19 U.S.C. 1677b) in determining antidumping duties. The study shall include, but not be limited to—

(1) a review of the types of adjustments currently being made;

(2) a review of private sector comments and recommendations regarding the subject that were made at congressional hearings during the first session of the ninety-eighth Congress; and

(3) the manner and extent to which such adjustments lead to inequitable results.

Within one year after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Commerce shall complete the study required under this section and shall submit to Congress a written report regarding the study and containing such recommendations as the Secretary deems appropriate regarding the need, and the means, for simplifying and modifying current practices in the making of such adjustments.

SEC. 203. EFFECTIVE DATES.

(a) Except as provided in subsection (b), this Act, and the amendments made by it, shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.

(b)(1) The amendments made by sections 101, 102, 104, 105, and 108 shall apply with respect to investigations initiated by petition or by the administering authority under subtitles A and B of title VII of the Tariff Act of 1930 on or after such effective date.

(2) The amendments made by section 109 shall apply with respect to civil actions pending on, or filed on or after, the date of the enactment of this Act.

(3) Section 339 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (as added by section 201 of this Act) shall take effect on the ninetieth day after such date of enactment.

"(2) SPECIAL RULES FOR QUANTITATIVE RESTRICTION AGREEMENTS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—Subject to subparagraphs (B) and (C), the administering authority may not terminate an investigation under paragraph (1) by accepting, with the government of the country in which the subsidy practice is alleged to occur, an understanding or other kind of agreement to limit the volume of imports into the United States of the merchandise that is subject to the investigation unless the administering authority is satisfied that termination on the basis of that agreement is in the public interest.

"(B) PUBLIC INTEREST FACTORS.—In making a decision under subparagraph (A) regarding the public interest, the administering authority shall take into account—

"(i) whether, based upon the relative impact on consumer prices and the availability of supplies of the merchandise, the agreement would have a greater adverse impact on United States consumers than the imposition of countervailing duties;

"(ii) the relative impact on the international economic interests of the United States; and

"(iii) the relative impact on the competitiveness of the domestic industry producing the like merchandise, including any such impact on employment and investment in that industry.

"(C) PRIOR CONSULTATIONS.—Before making a decision under subparagraph (A) regarding the public interest, the administering authority shall consult with—

"(i) potentially affected consuming industries; and

"(ii) potentially affected producers and workers in the domestic industry producing the like merchandise, including producers and workers not party to the investigation.

SEC. 103. REVIEWS AND DETERMINATIONS REGARDING CERTAIN AGREEMENTS.

(a) Subtitle C (19 U.S.C. 1675) is amended—

(1) by amending the subtitle heading to read as follows:

"Subtitle C—Reviews; Other Actions Regarding Agreements

"CHAPTER 1—REVIEW OF AMOUNT OF DUTY AND AGREEMENTS OTHER THAN QUANTITATIVE RESTRICTION AGREEMENTS"

(2) by amending section 751—

(A) by inserting "if a request for such a review has been received and" immediately before "after publication of notice" in that part of paragraph (1) of subsection (a) that precedes subparagraph (A); and

(B) by amending subsection (b)(1)—

(i) by striking out "704 or 734" and inserting in lieu thereof "704 (other than a quantitative restriction agreement described in subsection (a)(2) or (c)(3)) or 734 (other than a quantitative restriction agreement described in subsection (a)(2))", and

(ii) by striking out ", or 735(b)," and inserting in lieu thereof ", 735(b), 762(a)(1), or 762(a)(2),"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new chapter:

"CHAPTER 2—NEGOTIATIONS AND DETERMINATIONS REGARDING QUANTITATIVE RESTRICTION AGREEMENTS

"SEC. 761. REQUIRED NEGOTIATIONS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—

"(1) AGREEMENTS IN RESPONSE TO SUBSIDIES.—Within 90 days after the administering authority accepts a quantitative restriction agreement under section 704(a)(2) or (c)(3), the President shall enter into negotiations with the government that is party to the agreement for purposes of—

"(A) eliminating the subsidy completely, or

"(B) reducing the net subsidy to a level that eliminates completely the injurious effect of exports to the United States of the merchandise.

"(2) AGREEMENTS IN RESPONSE TO DUMPING PRACTICES.—Within 90 days after the administering authority accepts a quantitative restriction agreement under section 734(a)(2), the President shall enter into negotiations with the government of the country from which was exported the merchandise that was the subject of the terminated investigation for purposes of—

"(A) eliminating the dumping practice; or

"(B) reducing the dumping margin to a level that eliminates completely the injurious effect of exports to the United States of the merchandise.

"(b) MODIFICATION OF AGREEMENTS ON BASIS OF NEGOTIATIONS.—The administering authority may not implement any modification to a quantitative restriction agreement resulting from negotiations entered into under subsection (a) unless before the first anniversary of the date on which the administering authority accepts the agreement the following occur:

"(1) The President submits to the administering authority, and at the same time provides to those persons who were, or are, petitioners and interested parties in the related proceedings under subtitle A or B—

"(A) a description of the proposed actions that the government concerned is willing to take in order to achieve the objectives referred to in subsection (a)(1)(A) or (B) or (2)(A) or (B), as the case may be; and

"(B) the proposed modifications to the quantitative restrictions provided for in the agreement that the President believes are justified in response to the implementing of such actions.

"(2) The administering authority, on the basis of the best information available to it, decides that the proposed actions referred to in paragraph (1)(A) will either—

"(A) eliminate completely the subsidy of dumping practice; or

"(B) reduce the net subsidy or dumping margin.

"(3) If the decision of the administering authority under paragraph (2)(B) is affirmative, the Commission, on the basis of the best information available to its, decides that the proposed actions and the proposed modifications referred to in paragraph (1) are likely to eliminate completely the injurious effect of exports to the United States of the merchandise.

"(4) The administering authority invites the comment of those persons referred to in paragraph (1) regarding the proposed actions and modifications and takes into account all such comment that is timely submitted.

"(5) The administering authority is satisfied that the government concerned has implemented the actions referred to in subsections (a)(1)(A) or (B) or (2)(A) or (B), as the case may be, that it proposed to take.

"(C) SPECIAL RULE REGARDING AGREEMENTS UNDER SECTION 704(C)(3).—This chapter shall cease to apply to a quantitative restriction agreement described in section 704(c)(3) at such time as that agreement ceases to have force and effect under section 704(f) or violation is found under section 704(i).

"SEC. 762. REQUIRED DETERMINATIONS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Before the expiration date, if any, of a quantitative restriction agreement accepted under section 704(a)(2), 704(c)(3) (if suspension of the related investigation is still in effect), or 734(a)(2)—

"(1) the administering authority shall determine—

"(A) whether any subsidy is being provided with respect to the merchandise subject to the agreement and, if being so provided, the net subsidy, or

"(B) whether the merchandise is being sold in the United States at less than fair value and, if being so sold, the margin of sales at less than fair value; and

"(2) the Commission shall determine whether imports of the merchandise of the kind subject to the agreement will, upon termination of the agreement, materially injure, or threaten with material injury, an industry in the United States or materially retard the establishment of such an industry.

"(b) DETERMINATIONS.—The determinations required to be made by the administering authority and the Commission under subsection (a) shall be made on the record, under such procedures as the administering authority and the Commission, respectively, shall by regulation prescribe, and shall be treated as final determinations made under section 705 or 735, as the case may be, for purposes of judicial review under section 516A. If the determinations by each are affirmative, the administering authority shall issue a countervailing duty order or antidumping duty order under section 706 or 736 effective with respect to merchandise entered on and after the date on which the agreement terminates.

"(C) HEARINGS.—The determination proceedings require to be prescribed under subsection (b) shall provide that the administering authority and the Commission must, upon the request of any interested party hold a hearing in accordance with section 774 on the issues involved.".

(b) The table to contents of subtitle C of title VII is amended to read as follows:

"Subtitle C—Reviews; Other Actions Regarding Agreements

"Chapter 1—REVIEW OF AMOUNT OF DUTY AND AGREEMENTS OTHER THAN QUANTITATIVE RESTRICTION AGREEMENTS

"Sec. 751. Administrative review of determinations.

"Chapter 2—NEGOTIATIONS AND DETERMINATIONS REGARDING QUANTITATIVE RESTRICTION AGREEMENTS

SEC. 104. INITIATION OF ANTIDUMPING DUTY INVESTIGATIONS.

Section 732(a) (19 U.S.C. 1673a(a)) is amended to read as follows:

"(a) INITIATION BY ADMINISTERING AUTHORITY.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—An antidumping duty investigation shall be commenced whenever the administering authority determines, from information available to it, that a formal investigation is warranted into the question of whether the elements necessary for the imposition of a duty under section 731 exist.

"(2) CASES INVOLVING CERTAIN MERCHANDISE OF A KIND SUBJECT TO PREVIOUS DETERMINATIONS UNDER SECTION 735.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—If—

"(i) within the 2-year period before the date on which a petition is filed under subsection (b), final affirmative determinations were made under section 735 (a) and (b) regarding merchandise of the same class or kind as that covered by the petition (other than merchandise of that kind or class imported from the country to which the petition applies or from any additional supplier country); and

"(ii) in that petition the petitioner also alleges that the elements necessary for the imposition of a duty under section 731 exist with respect to merchandise of that same class or kind being, or likely to be, imported from one or more additional supplier countries;

the administering authority shall decide, within 20 days after the date on which the petition is filed, whether information reasonably available to the petitioner in the petition, as well as such relevant information as may be available to the administering authority, regarding each additional supplier country is sufficient to commence a formal investigation under paragraph (1) regarding imports of merchandise of that class or kind from that country.

"(B) ACTION AFTER DECISION.—If the decision of the administering authority under subparagraph (A) regarding an additional supplier country—

"(i) is affirmative, a formal investigation shall be commenced under paragraph (1); or

"(ii) is negative, the administering authority and the Commission shall monitor importations of merchandise of that class or kind from that country for such period of time (but not less than one year) as may be necessary for the administering authority to decide whether or not there is sufficient information to commence a formal investigation under paragraph (1) regarding that country, and if that decision is affirmative, the administering authority shall immediately commence such an investigation.

"(C) DEFINITION.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'additional supplier country' means a country—

"(i) other than the country to which the petition referred to in subparagraph (A) applies; and

"(ii) regarding which no investigation is currently pending under this subtitle with respect to imports from that country of the class or kind of merchandise covered by that petition.

"(D) EXPEDITIOUS ACTION.—The administering authority and the Commission, to the extent practicable, shall expedite proceedings under this subtitle undertaken as a result of a formal investigation commenced on any petition referred to in subparagraph (A) or under subparagraph (B).".

Section 774(a) (19 U.S.C. 1677c(a)) is amended to read as follows:

"(a) INVESTIGATION HEARINGS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in paragraph (2), the administering authority and the Commission shall each hold a hearing in the course of an investigation upon the request of any party to the investigation before making a final determination under section 705, 735, or 762(b).

"(2) EXCEPTION.—If investigations are initiated under subtitle A and subtitle B regarding the same merchandise from the same country within 6 months of each other (but before a final determination is made in either investigation), the holding of a hearing by the Commission in the course of one of the investigations shall be treated as compliance with paragraph (1) for both investigations, unless the Commission considers that extraordinary circumstances require that a hearing be held in the course of each of the investigations. During any investigation regarding which the holding of a hearing is waived under this paragraph, the Commission shall allow any party to submit such additional written comment as it considers relevant.".

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, these are merely technical amendments that correct some errors in the bill. I do not know of any opposition to them.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIBBONS. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. We love the amendments, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments offered en bloc.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means?

COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. GIBBONS

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, I offer additional committee amendments which were not printed in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

"(F) THREAT OF MATERIAL INJURY.—In determining whether there is a threat of material injury, the Commission shall consider, among other relevant economic factors—

"(i) if a subsidy is involved, such information as may be presented to it by the administering authority as to the nature of the subsidy (particularly as to whether the subsidy is an export subsidy inconsistent with the Agreement), and

"(ii) whether there is, based on any demonstrable adverse trend regarding the merchandise concerned (such as an increase in production capacity in the exporting country likely to result in a significant increase in exports thereof to the United States, a rapid increase in United States market penetration and the likelihood that the penetration will increase to an injurious level, the likelihood that imports will enter at prices that will have a depressing or suppressing effect on domestic prices, or a substantial increase in inventories in the United States), a probability that the merchandise (whether or not it is actually being imported at the time) will be the cause of actual injury.

A determination may not be made on the basis of mere supposition or conjecture, and sufficient information must exist for concluding that the threat of injury is real and that actual injury is imminent.".

SEC. 203. INDUSTRIAL TARGETING STUDIES.

The Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Labor, the United States Trade Representative, and the Comptroller General of the United States shall each undertake, and submit to the Congress not later than June 1, 1985, a comprehensive study of the problem of foreign industrial targeting, whereby foreign governments adopt plans or schemes of coordinated activities to foster and benefit specific industries, and of the desirability or need to amend the United States trade laws in order to provide effective remedies for domestic industries against the adverse effects of such targeting. To the extent consistent with agency jurisdiction, such studies shall include, but are not limited to—

(1) an analysis of—

(A) whether foreign industrial targeting should be considered as an unfair trade practice under United States law;

(B) whether current law, including the remedies under title VII of the Tariff Act of 1930, adequately address the subsidy element of foreign industrial policy measures; and

(C) the extent to which foreign industrial targeting practices are significantly affecting United States commerce; and

(2) any recommended legislation considered necessary based on the study results.

SEC. 204. EFFECTIVE DATES.

Mr. GIBBONS (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Chairman, these amendments delete the controversial provision on targeting subsidies and instead mandate studies by the appropriate Government agencies on this entire issue. Although the committee would have preferred to retain this section, there was substantial disagreement within the business community, organized labor, and the administration as to the appropriate way to address foreign industrial targeting. The mandated studies will allow for an in-depth analysis of this problem next year and will enable us to work out a more acceptable legislative solution.

I want everyone to understand that the committee's decision to delete the targeting provision should not be interpreted as a retreat from our long-standing effort to address this very serious problem. The decision to offer this amendment came only after much painstaking effort to work out some acceptable compromise; but in the end it became apparent that there is still not sufficient consensus within the Government or the private sector on what type of trade law changes are needed to deal with this very serious problem. So we thought it best to ask for some detailed Government analysis and recommendations. The Committee on Ways and Means will also be soliciting, from industry, labor, and other private sector groups, their views and recommendations, and early next year I intend to begin consideration of targeting legislation on an expedited basis.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIBBONS. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, we support the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GIBBONS].

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] for 5 minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, as I indicated earlier in the discussion on the rule and on the bill, I will have a motion to recommit. That motion to recommit will, as I discussed earlier, eliminate a number of the features of the bill, and if I can discuss it now I hope it will save time later when the motion is before the body.

We will eliminate in that motion the downstream dumping provisions, which are clearly illegal under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, and would subject U.S. exports to retaliation. The prime retaliation, the prospect would be agriculture, but hightech would be in there, too. It would also amend the natural resources provisions to go back to the original language suggested by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MOORE] to provide for fair market value, which is the internationally agreed standard.

It would also provide that when the President accepts a quota agreement in lieu of countervailing duties, that he consult with all affected parties, and that, we hope, will protect the producers and consumers from the adverse effects of another producer's countervailing duty complaint.

□ 1930

It will also amend the provision that requires extensive monitoring of outstanding dumping cases in the way that I described earlier in my statement under the scheduled debate time.

As I indicated, the Department has no alternative under the language of the bill than to monitor and in many cases it provides unnecessary work to be supplied by agencies who are hard pressed to do the things they are supposed to do now. It will maintain the other good parts of the subcommittee bill, including the simplification provisions requiring the dumping and countervailing hearings before the ITC be consolidated, that sampling and averaging be used in cases where applicable, and it will include the elimination of interlocutory appeals.

It will also maintain the provision that many Members have a great deal of interest in, that the Trade Remedy Assistance Office be open to small businesses in using our often complicated dumping and countervailing duty laws.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas. I understand the gentleman has a comment on this.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would like to ask my colleague, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER], whether he might respond to a question I have. I know this is a good bill in many respects, but I still worry about the definition given to natural resource subsidy, especially as it applies to agriculture. I wonder if the gentleman from Minnesota would yield to the gentleman from Nebraska to respond to me.

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BEREUTER. Yes. My answer will be based upon the best information from the Department of Commerce.

The natural resources amendments of this legislation is a major departure from longstanding U.S. and international practices regarding the definition of a subsidy. Under current law subsidies are potentially countervailable by another country only if the subsidy is provided to a "specific enterprise or industry, or group of enterprises or industries." Under the natural resource subsidy definition in this bill, such Government programs as rural electrification, Federal irrigation projects, and even general commodity price-support programs could leave the farmer and farm exports open to retaliatory trade measures by other countries.

As I said, this is based upon information available to me from the Department of Commerce and the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Minnesota would continue to yield.

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTS. Did I understand the gentleman to say that if in fact we have a program like the REA, which benefits the entire Nation and not just a wheat farmer that say lives in my area, that his exports could be challenged as being produced under a natural resource subsidy and be open to the possibility of some retaliation? I say could be, not would be.

Mr. BEREUTER. That is correct. The Commerce Department in looking at this legislation believes that the adoption of the natural resource amendments in H.R. 4784 would subject the United States to a GATT challenge, which we would certainly lose. The result could be GATT authorization to retaliate against U.S. farmers.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, if my colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota, would bear with me for one additional question.

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTS. Could the gentleman from Nebraska outline for me the impact the natural resources amendments would have on developing countries with abundant natural resources?

Mr. BEREUTER. The effect of this bill is said to be to force a developing country with an abundance of cheap natural resources either to raise its domestic price to world market levels or to lower its export price from the world market levels to the domestic price level.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] has expired.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. GIBBONS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, and I do not want to object, but I thought we had completed the general debate.

Does the gentleman from Minnesota intend under the motion to recommit to take 5 more minutes?

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield under his reservation, I believe that I was entitled to 5 minutes under my motion to recommit with instructions. It is not my intention to use it. I thought I would substitute this for the debate. We have leaked over by 1 minute.

Mr. GIBBONS. It is all right.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota to proceed for 1 additional minute?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENZEL. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska for a speedy conclusion.

Mr. BEREUTER. The bill would prevent the developing country from using cheap natural resources to encourage the development of domestic industries or prevent developing country from realizing a profit from its exports of the natural resource.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his explanation.

Mr. FRENZEL. In summary, Mr. Chairman, there are a number of organizations like the chamber of commerce, the Farm Bureau, the Grange, the Soybean Association, Forest Product Association, Business Roundtable, Port Authorities, Consumers for World Trade, and a host of other organizations that opposed this bill.

I believe that if my motion to recommit is accepted, they would approve it.●

● Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of Representative Frenzel's motion to recommit this bill to the Ways and Means Committee in order to effectuate several essential changes.

I would like now to speak particularly to my colleagues from the farm State. I want to underscore to them the importance of this vote. For if this motion fails and H.R. 4784 is passed as written, our constitutents, the farmers and ranchers of this Nation, will surely suffer. Let there be no doubt about that fact. That really ought to deeply trouble every Member of this body.

Passage of H.R. 4784 as written will be the excuse that our trading partners are looking for in order to justify imposition of even stiffer foreign trade barriers. The protectionism embodied within parts of this bill will be an open invitation to retaliation, In the words of Raymond Heck, immediate past president of the Iowa Soybean Association, "Every protectionist act calls for another one. It's just automatic."

America's farmers and ranchers, and this Nation as a whole, cannot risk such a result. The false allure of this quick-fix solution cannot be allowed to undermine the international trading system, the lifeblood of all our producers, manufacturers, workers, and exporters.

Agriculture has everything to lose, and nothing to gain, if this bill passes as now written. It will be a swift and certain target of retaliation. I ask my colleagues to think long and hard about the economic damage such retaliation will inflict on this sector of our economy and, in turn, on our economy as a whole.

Let's look at the facts.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture has forecast that fiscal year farm exports will reach $38 billion—an estimated 140 million metric tons—in value, producing an overall agricultural trade balance of $21 billion.

Out of the total world grain exported—including wheat, coarse grains, and milled rice—during the 1983-84 marketing year, USDA estimates that 43.9 percent will come from the United States.

The positive agricultural trade surplus contributed to the U.S. trade balance by offsetting in calendar year 1983 27 percent of the nonagricultural trade deficit.

Each dollar earned from agricultural exports stimulated an additional $1.23 of output in the U.S. economy in calendar year 1982, a multiplier effect of 2.23. Approximately 80 percent of this additional economic activity accrued to the nonfarm sector. USDA estimates that exports generated approximately $81.8 billion in total U.S. business activities, with the additional $45.2 billion representing the cost of supporting activities required to produce and transport products for export.

In calendar year 1982, an estimated 1.1 million full-time civilian jobs were related to the production, processing, and transporting of U.S. agricultural exports. Of these, approximately one-half million U.S. farm workers—15 percent of the farm labor force—were producing for export. In addition, more than 580,000 jobs in the nonfarm sector were related to the assembling, processing, and distributing of agricultural products for export. About 60,000 of these were in food processing; 270,000 in trade and transportation; 110,000 in other manufacturing sectors; and 140,000 in other services.

From their calendar year 1983 production, U.S. farmers exported 51 percent of their wheat crop, 45 percent of their rice crop on a milled basis, 22 percent of their unmilled corn, 25 percent of their grain sorghum, 53 percent of their soybeans, 43 percent of their raw cotton, 31 percent of their tobacco, and 50 percent of their almonds.

Of the total acreage of cropland harvested in calendar year 1982, approximately 37 percent of that acreage produced food grains for export. For feed grains, the figure was 20 percent, for oilseed crops the percentage was 32 percent, for cotton it was 3 percent and for other commodities, 8 percent of the acreage produced exported commodities. Of the total 115 million or 38-percent acres of cropland harvested in calendar year 1983 produced agricultural products for export.

In calendar year 1983, agricultural exports are expected to generate about 22 percent of U.S. farm income.

If members seek to use this legislation as a vehicle to retaliate against countries with objectionable trade practices, I would ask them to remember the following facts:

In calendar year 1983, Mexico purchased $1.7 billion of agricultural commodities from the United States.

During that same period, South Korea purchased $1.71 billion of our farm products. Taiwan was a $1.23 billion market for similar commodities.

Do we truly want to jeopardize these and many other markets for the minimum short-term benefits which this bill might bring? Do we really want to set such an example for the rest of the world? If we do, are we willing to live with the consequences of our actions?

The reforms proposed by this motion will preserve and improve the worthwhile improvements contained within this measure. Yet, it will eliminate those changes which violate our essential international trading obligations.

A vote for this motion will demonstrate our concern about international economic equity, but it will not do so at the risk of certain retaliation. It will be a step forward, not backward, in our drive for a fair international trading system.

I urge my colleagues to look beyond today. Think about tomorrow and the future of our international trading system. Vote "yes" on this motion to recommit with instructions.●

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. DURBIN] having assumed the chair, Mr. BOUCHER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 4784) to reform the remedies available to U.S. producers regarding unfair import competition, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 504, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendments? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

MOTION TO RECOMMIT OFFERED BY MR. FRENZEL

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit with instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. FRENZEL. I am opposed to the bill, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FRENZEL moves to recommit the bill H.R. 4784 to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report back the same to the House forthwith with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "Trade Remedies Reform Act of 1984".

SEC. 2 REFERENCE.

Except as otherwise expressly provided, whenever in this Act an amendment or repeal is expressed in terms of an amendment to, or repeal of, a title, subtitle, part, section, or other provision, the reference shall be considered to be made to a title, subtitle, part, section, or other provision of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1202 et seq.)

TITLE I—AMENDMENTS TO COUNTERVAILING DUTY AND ANTIDUMPING DUTY LAWS

SEC. 101. CLARIFICATION OF GENERAL RULE.

(a) Section 701(a) (19 U.S.C. 1671(a)) is amended—

(1) by inserting ", or sold (or likely to be sold) for importation," after "imported" in paragraph (1);

(2) by inserting "or by reason of sales (or the likelihood of sales) of that merchandise for importation" immediately after "by reason of imports of that merchandise" in paragraph (2); and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "For purposes of this subsection and section 705(b)(1), a reference to the sale of merchandise includes the entering into of any leasing arrangement regarding the merchandise that is equivalent to the sale of the merchandise.".

(b) Section 705(b)(1) (19 U.S.C. 1671(b)(1)) is amended by inserting ", or sales (or the likelihood of sales) for importation," immediately after "by reason of imports".

(c) Section 731 (19 U.S.C. 1673) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "For purposes of this section and section 735(b)(1), a reference to the sale of foreign merchandise includes the entering into of any leasing arrangement regarding the merchandise that is equivalent to the sale of the merchandise.".

SEC. 102. TERMINATION OR SUSPENSION OF INVESTIGATION.

(a) Section 704 (19 U.S.C. 167c) is amended by amending subsection (a) to read as follows:

"(a) TERMINATION OF INVESTIGATION UPON WITHDRAWAL OF PETITION.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—An investigation under this subtitle may be terminated by either the administering authority or the Commission, after notice to all parties to the investigation, upon withdrawal of the petition by the petitioner or by the Administering authority if the investigation was initiated under section 702(a).

"(2) SPECIAL RULE IN CASE OF AGREEMENTS OF UNDERSTANDING TO RESTRICT VOLUME OF IMPORTS.—An investigation may not be terminated under paragraph (1) by reason of any agreement or understanding to limit the volume of imports into the United States of the merchandise that is the subject of the investigation unless (A) the effective period does not exceed 24 months, (B) the agreement or undertaking is offered by the government of the country in which the subsidy practice is alleged to occur, and (C) the President—

"(i) determines, after consulting with potentially affected consuming industries and with United States producers of like merchandise (whether or not parties to the investigation) that the understanding or agreement would not, based upon the relative impact on consumer prices and the availability of supplies of the merchandise, and the relative impact on the competitiveness of the domestic industry producing the like merchandise, including any such impact on employment and investment in that industry, have a greater adverse effect on United States consumers than the imposition of countervailing duties; and

"(ii) accepts the agreement or understanding.

"(3) LIMITATION ON TERMINATION BY COMMISSION.—The Commission may not terminate and investigation under paragraph (a) before a preliminary determination is made by the administering authority under section 703(b).";

(2) by amending subsection (b)—

"(A) by striking out "or offset" in the side-heading thereto;

(B) by amending paragraph (1) to read as follows:

"(1) to eliminate the subsidy completely with respect to that merchandise exported directly or indirectly to the United States on the date the investigation is suspended, or"; and

(C) by striking out "within 6 months after the date on which" in paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof "on the date";

(3) by amending subsection (c) to add the following at the end of that subsection: (5) DEFINITION OF QUANTITATIVE RESTRICTION AGREEMENT.—of this subsection, an agreement to restrict volume means any agreement or understanding, accepted by the President, with the foreign government of the country in which the subsidy practice is alleged to occur—

"(A) that restricts the volume of imports into the United States of the merchandise that is the subject of the investigation,

"(B) that meets the requirements set forth in paragraph (2)(A);

"(C) with respect to which the President determines that its entry into force would not, based upon the relative impact on consumer prices and the availability of supplies of the merchandise, have a greater adverse effect on United States consumers than the imposition of countervailing duties; and

"(D) the effective period of which does not exceed 24 months.

Before making a determination under subparagraph (C), the President shall consult with all United States producers of like merchandise, whether or not parties to the investigation.";

(4) by amending subsection (i)(1)—

(A) by striking out "and" at the end of subparagraph (C),

(B) by redesignating subparagraph (D) as subparagraph (E), and

(C) by inserting immediately after subparagraph (C) the following new subparagraph:

"(D) if it considers the violation to be intentional, notify the Commissioner of Customs who shall take appropriate action under paragraph (2), and".

(b) Section 734 (U.S.C. 1673c) is amended—

(1) by striking out "within 6 months after the date on which" in subsection (b)(1) and inserting in lieu thereof "on the date"; and

(2) by amending subsection (i)(1)—

(A) by striking out "and" at the end of subparagraph (C),

(B) by redesignating subparagraph (D) as subparagraph (E), and

(C) by inserting immediately after subparagraph (C) the following new subparagraph:

"(D) if it considers the violation to be intentional, notify the Commissioner of Customs who shall take appropriate action under paragraph (2), and".

SEC. 103. REVIEWS AND DETERMINATIONS REGARDING CERTAIN AGREEMENTS.

(a) Subtitle C (19 U.S.C. 1675) is amended—

(1) by amending the subtitle heading to read as follows:

"Subtitle C—Reviews; Other Actions Regarding Agreements

"CHAPTER 1—REVIEW OF AMOUNT OF DUTY AND AGREEMENTS OTHER THAN QUANTITATIVE RESTRICTION AGREEMENTS"

(2) by amending section 751—

(A) by inserting "if a request for such a review has been received and" immediately before "after publication of notice" in that part of paragraph (1) of subsection (a) that precedes subparagraph (A); and

(B) by amending subsection (b)(1)—

(i) by striking out "704" and inserting in lieu thereof "704 (other than a quantitative restriction agreement), and

(ii) by striking out ", or 735(b)," and inserting in lieu thereof ", 735(b), 762(a)(1), or 762(a)(2),"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new chapter:

"CHAPTER 2—NEGOTIATIONS AND DETERMINATIONS REGARDING QUANTITATIVE RESTRICTION AGREEMENTS

"SEC. 761. REQUIRED NEGOTIATIONS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—

"(1) AGREEMENTS IN RESPONSE TO SUBSIDIES.—Within 90 days after the administering authority accepts a quantitative restriction agreement under section 704(a)(2) or (c)(3), the President shall enter into negotiations with the government that is party to the agreement for purposes of—

"(A) eliminating the subsidy completely, or

"(B) reducing the net subsidy to a level that eliminates completely the injurious effect of exports to the United States of the merchandise.

"(b) MODIFICATION OF AGREEMENTS ON BASIS OF NEGOTIATIONS.—The administering authority may not implement any modification to a quantitative restriction agreement resulting from negotiations entered into under subsection (a) unless before the first anniversary of the date on which the administering authority accepts the agreement the following occur:

"(1) The President submits to the administering authority, and at the same time provides to those persons who were, or are, petitioners and interested parties in the related proceedings under subtitle A or B—

"(A) a description of the proposed actions that the government concerned is willing to take in order to achieve the objectives referred to in subsection (a)(1) (A) or (B) or (2) (A) or (B), as the case may be; and

"(B) the proposed modifications to the quantitative restrictions provided for in the agreement that the President believes are justified in response to the implementing of such actions.

"(2) The administering authority, on the basis of the best information available to it, decides that the proposed actions referred to in paragraph (1)(A) will either—

"(A) eliminate completely the subsidy or dumping practice; or

"(B) reduce the net subsidy or dumping margin.

"(3) If the decision of the administering authority under paragraph (2)(B) is affirmative, the Commission, on the basis of the best information available to it, decides that the proposed actions and the proposed modifications referred to in paragraph (1) are likely to eliminate completely the injurious effect of exports to the United States of the merchandise.

"(4) The administering authority invites the comment of those persons referred to in paragraph (1) regarding the proposed actions and modifications and takes into account all such comment that is timely submitted.

"(5) The administering authority is satisfied that the government concerned has implemented the actions referred to in subsections (a)(1) (A) or (B) or (2) (A) or (B), as the case may be, that it proposed to take.

"(c) SPECIAL RULE REGARDING AGREEMENTS UNDER SECTION 704(c)(3).—This chapter shall cease to apply to a quantitative restriction agreement described in section 704(c)(3) at such time as that agreement ceases to have force and effect under section 704(f) or violation is found under section 704(i).

"SEC. 762. REQUIRED DETERMINATIONS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—Before the expiration date, of a quantitative restriction agreement accepted under section 704(a)(2) or 704(c)(3) (if suspension of the related investigation is still in effect),

"(1) the administering authority shall determine—

"(A) whether any subsidy is being provided with respect to the merchandise subject to the agreement and, if being so provided, the net subsidy, or

"(B) whether the merchandise is being sold in the United States at less than fair value and, if being so sold, the margin of sales at less than fair value; and

"(2) the Commission shall determine whether imports of the merchandise of the kind subject to the agreement will, upon termination of the agreement, materially injure, or threaten with material injury, an industry in the United States or materially retard the establishment of such an industry.

"(b) DETERMINATIONS.—The determinations required to be made by the administering authority and the Commission under subsection (a) shall be made on the record, under such procedures as the administering authority and the Commission, respectively, shall by regulation prescribe, and shall be treated as final determinations made under section 705 as the case may be, for purposes of judicial review under section 516A. If the determinations by each are affirmative, the administering authority shall issue a countervailing duty order or antidumping duty order under section 706 effective with respect to merchandise entered on and after the date on which the agreement terminates.

"(c) HEARINGS.—The determination proceedings required to be prescribed under subsection (b) shall provide that the administering authority and the Commission must, upon the request of any interested party, hold a hearing in accordance with section 774 on the issues involved.".

(b) The table of contents for subtitle C of title VII is amended to read as follows:

"Subtitle C—Reviews; Other Actions Regarding Agreements

"Chapter 1—REVIEW OF AMOUNT OF DUTY AND AGREEMENTS OTHER THAN QUANTITATIVE RESTRICTION AGREEMENTS

"Sec. 751. Administrative review of determinations.

"Chapter 2—NEGOTIATIONS AND DETERMINATIONS REGARDING QUANTITATIVE RESTRICTION AGREEMENTS

"Sec. 761. Required negotiations.

"Sec. 762. Required determinations.".

SEC. 104. INITIATION OF ANTIDUMPING DUTY INVESTIGATIONS.

Section 732(a) (19 U.S.C. 1673a(a)) is amended to read as follows:

"(a) INITIATION BY ADMINISTERING AUTHORITY.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—An antidumping duty investigation shall be commenced whenever the administering authority determines, from information available to it, that a formal investigation is warranted into the question of whether the elements necessary for the imposition of a duty under section 731 exist.

"(2) CASES INVOLVING CERTAIN MERCHANDISE OF A KIND SUBJECT TO PREVIOUS DETERMINATIONS UNDER SECTION 735.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—If—

"(i) within the 2-year period before the date on which a petition is filed under subsection (b), final affirmative determinations were made under section 735 (a) and (b) regarding merchandise of the same class or kind as that covered by the petition (other than merchandise of that kind or class imported from the country to which the petition applies or from any additional supplier country); and

"(ii) in that petition the petitioner also alleges that the elements necessary for the imposition of a duty under section 731 exist with respect to merchandise of that same class or kind being, or likely to be, imported from one or more additional supplier countries;

the administering authority shall decide, within 20 days after the date on which the petition is filed, whether information reasonably available to the petitioner, in the petition, as well as such relevant information as may be available to the administering authority, regarding each additional supplier country is sufficient to commence a formal investigation under paragraph (1) regarding imports of merchandise of that class or kind from that country or to monitor such imports under (B)(ii).

"(B) ACTION AFTER DECISION.—If the decision of the administering authority under subparagraph (A) regarding an additional supplier country is affirmative—

"(i) a formal investigation shall be commenced under paragraph (1); or

"(ii) the administering authority shall monitor importation of merchandise of that class or kind from that country for such period of time as may be necessary for the administering authority to decide whether or not there is sufficient information to commence a formal investigation under paragraph (1) regarding that country, and if that decision is affirmative, the administering authority shall immediately commence such an investigation.

"(C) DEFINITION.—For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'additional supplier country' means a country—

"(i) other than the country to which the petition referred to in subparagraph (A) applies; and

"(ii) regarding which no investigation is currently pending under this subtitle with respect to imports from that country of the class or kind of merchandise covered by that petition.

"(D) EXPEDITIOUS ACTION.—The administering authority, to the extent practicable, shall expedite proceedings under this subtitle undertaken as a result of a formal investigation commenced on any petition referred to in subparagraph (A) or under subparagraph (B).".

SEC. 105. DEFINITIONS AND SPECIAL RULES REGARDING UPSTREAM AND OTHER SUBSIDIES MATERIAL INJURY, AND INTERESTED PARTIES.

(a) Section 771 (19 U.S.C. 1655) is amended as follows:

"(1) Paragraph (5) is amended to read as follows:

"(5) SUBSIDY.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The term 'subsidy' has the same meaning as the term 'bounty or grant' as that term is used in section 303 of this Act, and includes, but is not limited to, the following:

"(i) Any export subsidy described in Annex A to the Agreement (relating to illustrative list of export subsidies).

"(ii) The following domestic subsidies, if provided or required by government action to a specific enterprise or industry, or group of enterprises or industries, whether publicly or privately owned, and whether paid or bestowed directly or indirectly on the manufacture, production, or export of any class or kind of merchandise:

"(I) The provision of capital, loans, or loan guarantees on terms inconsistent with commercial considerations.

"(II) The provision of goods or services at preferential rates.

"(III) The grant of funds or forgiveness of debt to cover operating losses sustained by a specific industry.

"(IV) The assumption of any costs or expenses of manufacture, production, or distribution.

"(iii) Any natural resource subsidy described in subparagraph (B).

"(iv) Any upstream subsidy determined under section 771A.

"(B) NATURAL RESOURCE SUBSIDY.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—A natural resource subsidy exists if a natural resource product is provided or sold within a country (hereinafter referred to as the 'exporting country') by a government-regulated or controlled entity, for use (directly or indirectly) in the manufacture or production of any class or kind of merchandise in the exporting country, at a domestic price that, by reason of such regulation or control—

"(I) is lower than the fair market value of the product in the exporting country, and

"(II) and that product would constitute a significant portion of the total cost of the manufacture or production of such merchandise.

"(ii) LEVEL OF NATURAL RESOURCE SUBSIDY.—The level of a natural resource subsidy is the difference between the domestic price of the natural resource product and the fair market of that product.

"(iii) DETERMINATION OF FAIR MARKET VALUE.—For purpose of this subparagraph, the term 'fair market value' means the price that a willing buyer would pay a willing seller for a natural resource product in an arms-length transaction in the absence of government regulations. In determining the fair market value the administering authority shall take into account—

"(I) the prices at which the product is generally available in world markets,

"(II) the extent to which a comparative advantage of the exporting country in relation to other sellers (for example, any cost savings resulting from such factors as the availability of abundant supplies, lower production costs, or lower transportation costs),

"(III) the degree to which the price of the natural resource or byproduct is depressed as a result of government regulation of eligibility to purchase such natural resource or byproduct,

"(IV) whether a system of dual pricing is maintained through government regulation in the country of origin, and

"(V) the availability or lack of access to export markets.

(2) Paragraph (7) is amended—

(A) by inserting the following new clause at the end of subparagraph (C):

"(iv) CUMULATION.—For purposes of clauses (i) and (ii), the Commission shall cumulatively assess the volume and effect of imports from two or more countries of like products subjects to investigation if—

"(I) the marketing of such imports in the United States is reasonably coincident, and

"(II) there is a reasonable indication that such imports will have a contributing effect in causing, or threatening to cause, material injury to the industry.";

such imports compete with each other and with like products of the domestic industry in the United States market.";

(B) by amending subparagraph (E) to read as follows:

"(E) STANDARD FOR DETERMINATION.—The presence or absence of any factor which the Commission is required to evaluate under subparagraph (C) or (D) shall not necessarily give decisive guidance with respect to the determination by the Commission of material injury."; and

(C) by inserting after subparagraph (E) the following new subparagraph:

"(F) THREAT OF MATERIAL INJURY.—In determining whether there is a threat of material injury, the Commission shall consider, among other relevant economic factors—

"(I) if a subsidy is involved, such information as may be presented to it by the administering authority as to the nature of the subsidy (particularly as to whether the subsidy is an export subsidy inconsistent with the Agreement), and

"(II) whether there is, based on any demonstrable adverse trend regarding the merchandise concerned (such as an increase in production capacity in the exporting country likely to result in a significant increase in exports thereof to the United States, a rapid increase in United States market penetration and the likelihood that the penetration will increase to an injurious level, the likelihood that imports will enter at prices that will have a depressing or suppressing effect on domestic prices, or a substantial increase in inventories in the United States), a probability that the merchandise (whether or not it is actually being imported at the time) will be the cause of actual injury.

A determination may not be made on the basis of mere supposition or conjecture, and sufficient information must exist for concluding that the threat of injury is real and that actual injury is imminent.

(A) by striking out "and" at the end of subparagraph (D);

(B) by striking out the period at the end of subparagraph (E) and inserting in lieu thereof ", and"; and

(C) by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(F) an association, a majority of whose members is composed of interested parties described in subparagraph (C), (D), or (E) with respect to a like product.".

(b) Subtitle D of title VII is amended by adding after section 771 the following new section:

"SEC. 771A. UPSTREAM SUBSIDIES.

"(a) UPSTREAM SUBSIDIES.—

"(1) DEFINITION.—The term 'upstream subsidy' means any action of a kind described or referred to in section 771(5)(A) (i), (ii), (iii), or (iv) by the government of a country that—

"(A) is paid or bestowed by that government with respect to a product that is used in the manufacture or production in that country of merchandise which is the subject of an investigation under subtitle A,

"(B) results in a price for the product for such use that is lower than the generally available price of the product in that country, and

"(C) has a significant effect on the cost of manufacturing or producing the merchandise.

In applying this definition, an association of two or more foreign countries, political subdivisions, dependent territories, or possessions of foreign countries organized into a customs union outside the United States shall be treated as being one country.

"(2) ADJUSTMENT OF GENERALLY AVAILABLE PRICE IN CERTAIN CIRCUMSTANCES.—If the administering authority decides that the generally available price for a product in the country of the manufacture, production, or export of the merchandise under investigation is artificially depressed by reason of any subsidy, the administering authority shall adjust such generally available price so as to offset such depression before applying paragraph (1)(B).

"(3) INCLUSION OF AMOUNT OF SUBSIDY.—If the administering authority decides, during the course of an investigation under subtitle A; that an upstream subsidy is being or has been paid or bestowed regarding the merchandise under investigation, the administering authority shall include in the amount of any countervailing duty imposed under that subtitle on the merchandise an amount equal to the difference between the prices referred to in paragraph (1)(B), adjusted, if appropriate, for artificial depression.

"(b) SCOPE OF INQUIRY BY ADMINISTERING AUTHORITY.—The administering authority is not required, in undertaking an investigation under subtitle A, to inquire regarding the presence of an upstream subsidy beyond that stage in the manufacture or production of the class or kind of merchandise that immediately precedes the final manufacturing or production stage before export to the United States, unless reasonably available information indicates that such a subsidy is being or has been paid or bestowed before such immediately preceding stage and is having or has had a substantial effect on the price of the merchandise.".

(c)(1) Section 514(a) (19 U.S.C. 1514(a)) is amended by striking out "771(9) (C), (D), and (E) of this Act." an inserting in lieu thereof "771(9) (C), (D), (E), and (F) of this Act.".

(2) Sections 704 (g)(2) and (h)(1) is amended by striking out "(C), (D), or (E)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(C), (D), (E), and (F)".

(3) Section 2631(k)(2) of title 28, United States Code, is amended—

(A) by striking out "and" at the end of subparagraph (C),

(B) by striking out the period at the end of subparagraph (D), and inserting in lieu thereof ", and", and

(C) by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(E) an association composed of members who represent parties-at-interest described in subparagraph (B), (C), or (D).".

(4) The table of contents for title VII is amended by inserting after the entry for section 771 the following:

"Sec. 771A. Upstream subsidies.".

SEC. 106. HEARINGS.

Section 774(a) (19 U.S.C. 1677c(a)) is amended to read as follows:

"(a) INVESTIGATION HEARINGS.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in paragraph (2), the administering authority and the Commission shall each hold a hearing in the course of an investigation upon the request of any party to the investigation before making a final determination under section 705, 735, or 762(b).

"(2) EXCEPTION.—If investigations are initiated under subtitle A and subtitle B regarding the same merchandise from the same country within 6 months of each other (but before a final determination is made in either investigation), the holding of a hearing by the Commission in the course of one of the investigations shall be treated as compliance with paragraph (1) for both investigations, unless the Commission considers that extraordinary circumstances require that a hearing be held in the course of each of the investigations. During any investigation regarding which the holding of a hearing is waived under this paragraph, the Commission shall allow any party to submit such additional written comment as it considers relevant.".

Section 776(a) (19 U.S.C. 1677e(a)) is amended to read as follows:

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—The administering authority shall verify all information relied upon in making—

"(1) a final determination in an investigation,

"(2) a revocation under section 751(c), and

"(3) a review and determination under section 751(a), if—

"(A) verification is timely requested by an interested party as defined in section 771(9)(C), (D), (E), or (F), and

"(B) no verification was made under this paragraph during the 2 immediately preceding reviews and determinations under that section of the same order, finding, or notice, except that this clause shall not apply if good cause for verification is shown.

In publishing notice of any action referred to in paragraph (1), (2), or (3), the administering authority shall report the methods and procedures used to verify such information. If the administering authority is unable to verify the accuracy of the information submitted, it shall use the best information available to it as the basis for its action, which may include, in actions referred to in paragraph (1), the information submitted in support of the petition.".

SEC. 108. RELEASE OF CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION.

Section 777 (19 U.S.C. 1677f) is amended—

"(1) by amending subsection (b)—

(A) by striking out "submitted)" in the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "submitted, or an officer or employee of the United States Customs Service who is directly involved in conducting an investigation regarding fraud under this title)", and

(B) by amending the second sentence thereof to read as follows:

"The administering authority and the Commission shall require that information for which confidential treatment is requested be accompanied by—

"(A) a nonconfidential summary in sufficient detail to permit a reasonable understanding of the substance of the information submitted in confidence, or a statement that the information is not susceptible to summary accompanied by a statement of the reasons in support of the contention, and

"(B) a statement permitting the administering authority to release under administrative protective order, in accordance with subsection (c), the information submitted in confidence, or a statement that the information should not be released under administrative protective order.";

(2) by inserting ", before or after receipt of the information requested," after "application," in subsection (c)(1)(A); and

(3) by inserting ", except that no distinction may be made between corporate counsel and retained counsel" immediately before the period at the end of the first sentence of subsection (c)(1)(B).

SEC. 109. SAMPLING AND AVERAGING IN DETERMINING UNITED STATES PRICE AND FOREIGN MARKET VALUE.

(a) Subtitle D of title VII (19 U.S.C. 1677a et seq.) is further amended by adding immediately after section 777 the following new section:

"SEC. 777A. SAMPLING AND AVERAGING.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—For the purpose of determining United States price or foreign market value under sections 772 and 773, and for purposes of carrying out annual reviews under section 751, the administering authority may—

"(1) use averaging or generally recognized sampling techniques whenever a significant volume of sales is involved or a significant number of adjustments to prices is required, and

"(2) decline to take into account adjustments which are insignificant in relation to the price or value of the merchandise.

"(b) SELECTION OF SAMPLES AND AVERAGES.—The authority to select appropriate samples and averages shall rest exclusively with the administering authority; but such samples and averages shall be representative of the transaction under investigation.".

(b) Subsection (f) of section 773 (19 U.S.C. 1677b(f)) is repealed.

(c) The table of contents for title VII is amended by inserting after the entry for section 777 the following:

"Sec. 777A. Sampling and averaging.".

SEC. 110. ELIMINATION OF INTERLOCUTORY APPEALS.

(a) Section 516(a) (19 U.S.C. 1516a(a)) is amended as follows:

(1) Paragraph (1) is amended to read as follows:

"(1) REVIEW OF CERTAIN DETERMINATIONS.—Within 30 days after the date of publication in the Federal Register of—

"(A) a determination by the administering authority, under 702(c) or 732(c) of this Act, not to initiate an investigation,

"(B) a determination by the Commission, under section 751(b) of this Act, not to review a determination based upon changed circumstances,

"(C) a negative determination by the Commission, under section 703(a) or 733(a) of this Act, as to whether there is reasonable indication of material injury, threat of material injury, or material retardation, an interested party who is a party to the proceeding in connection with which the matter arises may commence an action in the United States Court of International Trade by filing concurrently a summons and complaint, each with the content and in the form, manner, and style prescribe by the rules of that court, contesting any factual findings or legal conclusions upon which the determination is based.".

(2) Paragraph (2)(A) is amended—

(A) by striking out "the date of publication in the Federal Register of" in the matter preceding clause (i); and

(B) by amending clauses (i) and (ii) to read as follows:

"(i) the date of publication in the Federal Register of—

"(I) notice of any determination described in clause (ii), (iii), (iv), or (v) of subparagraph (B), or

"(II) an antidumping or countervailing duty order based upon any determination described in clause (i) of subparagraph (B), or

"(ii) the date of mailing of a determination described in clause (vi) of subparagraph (B),".

(3) Amend paragraph (2)(B) to read as follows:

"(B) REVIEWABLE DETERMINATIONS.—The determinations which may be contested under subparagraph (A) are as follows:

"(i) Final affirmative determinations by the administering authority and by the Commission under section 705 or 735 of this Act, including any negative part of such a determination (other than a part referred to in clause (ii)).

"(ii) A final negative determination by the administering authority or the Commission under section 705 or 735 of this Act, including, at the option of the appellant, any part of a final affirmative determination which specifically excludes any company or product.

"(iii) A final determination, other than a determination reviewable under paragraph (1), by the administering authority or the Commission under section 751 of this Act.

"(iv) A determination by the administering authority, under section 704 or 734 of this Act, to suspend an antidumping duty or a countervailing duty investigation, including any final determination resulting from a continued investigation which changes the size of the dumping margin or net subsidy calculated, or the reasoning underlying such calculations, at the time the suspension agreement was concluded.

"(v) An injurious effect determination by the Commission under section 704(h) or 734(h) of this Act.

"(vi) A determination by the administering authority as to whether a particular type of merchandise is whtin the class or kind of merchandise described in an existing finding of dumping or antidumping or countervailing duty order.".

(4) Redesignate paragraph (3) as paragraph (4) and after paragraph (2) insert the following:

"(3) EXCEPTION.—Notwithstanding the limitation imposed by paragraph (2)(A)(ii) of this subsection, a final affirmative determination by the administering authority under section 705 or 735 of this Act may be contested by commencing an action, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (2)(A), within thirty days after the date of publication in the Federal Register of a final negative determination by the Commission under section 705 or 735 of this Act which is predicated upon the size of either the dumping margin or net subsidy determined to exist.".

(b) Title 28, United States Code, is amended as follows:

(1) Section 2636 is amended—

(A) by amending subsection (c) to read as follows:

"(c) A civil action contesting a reviewable determination listed in section 516A of the Tariff Act of 1930 is barred unless commenced in accordance with the rules of the Court of International Trade within the time specified in such section."; and

(B) by striking out subsection (d) and redesignating subsections (e) through (i) and (d) through (h), respectively.

(2) Section 2647 is amended to read as follows:

"§ 2647. Precedence of cases.

"The following civil actions in the Court of International Trade shall be given precedence, in the following order, over other civil actions pending before the Court, and shall be assigned for hearing at the earliest practicable date and expedited in every way:

"(1) First, a civil action involving the exclusion of perishable merchandise or the redelivery of such merchandise.

"(2) Second, a civil action commenced under section 515 of the Tariff Act of 1930 involving the exclusion or redelivery of merchandise.

"(3) Third, a civil action commenced under section 516 or 516A of the Tariff Act of 1930.".

TITLE II—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 201. ESTABLISHMENT OF TRADE REMEDY ASSISTANCE OFFICE AND TARGETING MONITORING PROGRAM IN THE UNITED STATES INTERNATIONAL TRADE COMMISSION.

Part 2 of title II (19 U.S.C. 1330-1341) is amended by—

(1) by inserting after section 338 the following new section:

"SEC. 339. TRADE REMEDY ASSISTANCE OFFICE.

"(a) There is established in the Commission a Trade Remedy Assistance Office which shall provide full information to the public, upon request, concerning—

"(1) remedies and benefits available under the trade laws, and

"(2) the petition and application procedures, and the appropriate filing dates, with respect to such remedies and benefits.

"(b) Each agency responsible for administering a trade law shall provide technical assistance to eligible small businesses to enable them to prepare and file petitions and applications (other than those which, in the opinion of the agency, are frivolous) to obtain the remedies and benefits that may be available under that law.

"(c) For purposes of this section—

"(1) The term 'eligible small business' means any business concern which, in the agency's judgment, due to its small size, has neither adequate internal resources nor financial ability to obtain qualified outside assistance in preparing and filing petitions and applications for remedies and benefits under trade laws. In determining whether a business concern is an 'eligible small business', the agency may consult with the Small Business Administration, and shall consult with any other agency that has provided assistance under subsection (b) to that business concern. An agency decision regarding whether a business concern is an eligible small business for purposes of this section is not reviewable by any other agency or by any court.

"(2) The term 'trade laws' means—

"(A) chapter 1 of title II of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2251 et seq., relating to relief caused by import competition);

"(B) chapters 2 and 3 of such title II (relating to adjustment assistance for workers and firms);

"(C) chapter 1 of title III of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2411 et seq., relating to relief from foreign import restrictions and export subsidies);

"(D) title VII of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1671 et seq., relating to the imposition of countervailing duties and antidumping duties);

"(E) section 232 of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 (19 U.S.C. 1862, relating to the safeguarding of national security); and

"(F) section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (19 U.S.C. 1337, relating to unfair practices in import trade."; and

(2) by amending section 340 to read as follows:

"SEC. 340. TARGETING MONITORING PROGRAM.

"(a) The Commission shall establish and implement a continuing program to monitor and analyze the industrial plans and policies of foreign countries and instrumentalities.

"(b) In implementing the program, the Commission shall give priority to those countries and instrumentalities and product sectors in which the United States has significant economic or commerical interests. The Commission shall consult with other appropriate Federal agencies and solicit the views and comments of the public in determining priorities for purposes of the preceding sentence.

"(c) The Commission shall regularly report the information resulting from the program to the administering authority (as defined in section 771(1)) and shall make such information (other than that requiring confidential treatment) available to the public.

"(d) Each agency of the United States shall provide to the Commission, upon its request, such information as the Commission considers to be necessary or appropriate for purposes of carrying out this section. Classified information shall be provided to the Commission under this subsection if the provider agency is satisfied that the Commission will enforce appropriate measures to prevent the loss or unauthorized disclosure of the information.".

SEC. 202. ADJUSTMENTS STUDY.

The Secretary of Commerce shall undertake a study of the current practices that are applied in the making of adjustments to purchase prices and exporter's sales prices under section 772 (d) and (e) (19 U.S.C. 1677a (d) and (e)) and foreign market value and constructed value under section 773 (19 U.S.C. 1677b) in determining antidumping duties. The study shall include, but not be limited to—

(1) a review of the types of adjustments currently being made;

(2) a review of private sector comments and recommendations regarding the subject that were made at congressional hearings during the first session of the ninety-eighth Congress; and

(3) the manner and extent to which such adjustments lead to inequitable results.

Within one year the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Commerce shall complete the study required under this section and shall submit to Congress a written report regarding the study and containing such recomendations as the Secretary deems appropriate regarding the need, and the means, for simplifying and modifying current practices in the making of such adjustments.

SEC. 203. EFFECTIVE DATES.

(a) Except as provided in subsection (b), this Act, and the amendments made by it, shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.

(b)(1) The amendments made by sections 101, 103, 104, 105, and 109 shall apply with respect to investigations initiated by petition or by the administrating authority under subtitles A and B of title VII of the Tariff Act of 1930 on or after such effective date.

(2) The amendments made by section 110 shall apply with respect to civil actions pending on, or filed on or after, the date of th enactment of this Act.

(3) Section 339 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (as added by section 201 of this Act) shall take effect on the ninetieth day after such date of enactment.

Mr. FRENZEL (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion to recommit be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GIBBONS] desire to be heard on the motion to recommit?

Mr. GIBBONS. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, I certainly am not going to take 5 minutes. I just want to say, I have not read this motion to recommit because this is the first time I knew about it this afternoon. I listened, though, attentively to the debate on it. I think I understand it. I think I can remove anyone's doubts if they have a few minutes to listen to it specifically and debate those questions. I really do not think it is necessary to debate them. I think the whole basis upon which they are based in fallacious.

This is not a violation of our GATT agreements. I am a staunch defender of GATT and I worked very hard to keep this legislation within the letter and the spirit of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

A subsidy is a subsidy is a subsidy and subsidized trade is not free trade. It is not fair trade. In fact, it is very disruptive to the kinds of marketplace forces that most of us believe ought to control these matters. Unless we are firm about enforcing our rights under GATT, and that is what this bill does, enforces our rights under GATT very firmly, no one else is going to observe them.

We have got to have a bill like this so that we do have a right for people who have been injured or hurt by unfair trade practices—not unfair trade practices that SAM GIBBONS dreamed up, but unfair trade practices as outlined in the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade and unfair trade practices that have been recognized in this country for almost a century as being unfair.

Our laws simply have not worked correctly. This is an attempt to make them work correctly and I hope that we will unanimously vote down this motion to recommit.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to recommit.

There was no objection.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That request is out of order. The time is controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota, who has yielded back the 5 minutes that he had on the motion to recommit.

The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5, rule XV, the Chair announces that he will reduce to a minimum of 5 minutes the period of time within which a vote by electronic device, if ordered, will be taken on the question of the final passage of the bill, following the vote on the motion to recommit.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 128, nays 231, not voting 74, as follows:

□ 2000

Mr. COLEMAN of Missouri and Mr. HUGHES changed their votes from "no" to "aye."

Mr. TAUKE and Mr. HOPKINS changed their votes from "aye" to "no."

So the bill was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous matter, on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. KILDEE]. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

PROPOSED CONSIDERATION OF RESOLUTION IN THE MATTER OF REPRESENTATIVE GEORGE V. HANSEN

(Mr. STOKES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise the Members that I intend to call up a privileged resolution in the matter of Representative GEORGE V. HANSEN of Idaho next Tuesday, July 31, 1984. This notification should provide sufficient time for the Members to review the report of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct which was filed on July 19, 1984, and sent to the offices of all Members today.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause of rule I, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each question of agreeing to resolutions or on ordering the previous question on resolutions reported from the Committee on Rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

Such rollcall votes, if postponed, will be taken after the last rule is considered.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 3987, NATIONAL ARCHIVES AND RECORDS ADMINISTRATION ACT OF 1984

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 534 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 534

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 3987) to improve the preservation and management of Federal records, and for other purposes, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. All points of order against the consideration of the bill for failure to comply with the provisions of section 303(a)(4) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344) are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Government Operations, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Government Operations now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule, said substitute shall be considered for amendment by titles instead of by sections and each title shall be considered as having been read, and all points of order against said substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of section 303(a)(4) of the Congressional Budget Act and clause 5(a) of rule XXI are hereby waived. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions. After the passage of H.R. 3987, it shall be in order to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 905 and to consider said bill in the House, and it shall then be in order in the House to move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the said Senate bill and to insert in lieu thereof the provisions contained in H.R. 3987 as passed by the House.

□ 2010

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. BEILENSON] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes, for the purposes of debate only, to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT], pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 534 is an open rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 3987, the National Archives and Records Administration Act of 1984. The rule provides 1 hour of general debate, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Government Operations. Section 303(a)(4) of the Congressional Budget Act is waived against the consideration of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, the rule makes in order the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute as original text for the purpose of amendment, to be considered by title, instead of by section, with each title considered as read. Section 303(a)(4) of the Congressional Budget Act is waived against consideration of the substitute. The rule also waives clause 5(a) of rule XXI against the substitute. One motion to recommit with or without instructions is provided.

After passage of H.R. 3987, it is in order to take from the Speaker's table the bill, S. 905. The rule makes in order a motion to strike out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and to insert the text of H.R. 3987 as passed by the House.

Mr. Speaker, the rule waives section 303(a)(4) of the Budget Act against consideration of the bill. Section 303(a)(4) states that it shall not be in order to consider any bill which provides new entitlement authority first effective in a fiscal year until the first budget resolution for such fiscal year has been adopted. This waiver is necessary because section 102 of H.R. 3978 provides new entitlement authority by setting the rate of compensation for the Archivist of the United States at level III of the executive schedule. Since this new entitlement authority is first effective in fiscal year 1985 and no conference report on the first budget resolution has been adopted, the bill is in technical violation of section 303(a)(4) of the Budget Act. The same waiver is needed for the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The rule also waives clause 5(a) of rule XXI, prohibiting appropriations in a legislative bill, against the substitute. This waiver is necessary because section 104(a) of the bill permits expenditures of funds appropriated to the GSA to be used for the orderly transfer of personnel and funds from the GSA to the newly created National Archives and Record Services.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 3987 would make the National Archives and Records Administration and independent agency, restoring the Archives to the status it held from its founding in 1934 until it was incorporated into the General Services Administration in 1949, pursuant to the recommendation of the Hoover Commission. The principal archival functions previously exercised by the Archivist, and now vested in the Administrator of the GSA, will be returned to the Archivist who will be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The legislation provides for an orderly transfer of the National Archives and Records Services of the General Services Administration to the National Archives and Records Administration, administered under the supervision and direction of the Archivist of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 534 is an open rule, and I urge my colleagues to adopt this resolution.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this rule have been ably described. There are just a couple of points I would like to make about it.

One more time, Mr. Speaker, we are waiving the Budget Act. As a matter of fact in this rule, we are waiving it two more times; once to protect the bill and once to protect the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. In both cases we are waiving the requirement in section 303(a) of the Budget Act that a budget resolution be in place before we pass new entitlements. The bill provides new entitlement authority by setting the rate of compensation for the Archivist of the United States at level III of the executive schedule. Since this new entitlement authority becomes effective in fiscal year 1985, and since no budget resolution conference report has been agreed to in both bodies, there is a Budget Act violation.

In the Rules Committee the chairman of the Government Operations Committee promised that an amendment would be offered on the floor to cure this problem, and the Rules Committee went along with his request.

Mr. Speaker, in the future, it would be easier to cure these Budget Act problems before the bills are brought to the floor. It would avoid a lot of unnecessary waivers of the Budget Act.

Mr. Speaker, the only other waiver in this rule, is of clause 5(a) of rule XXI, which prohibits appropriations on a legislative bill. There is language in the bill which technically constitutes an appropriation in a legislative bill and a waiver is required to protect it.

Mr. Speaker, the bill made in order by this rule would reestablish the National Archives as an independent agency. The bill would transfer the current National Archives and Records Service along with its personnel and assets from the General Services Administration, where it has been housed since 1949.

Mr. Speaker, at the time of the Rules Committee meeting, the administration supported the establishment of the National Archives and Records Service as and independent Federal agency, but recommended that the House bill be amended to bring it into closer conformity with the Senate bill.

Mr. Speaker, under this open rule any necessary amendment may be offered. I support the rule so that the House may proceed to consider the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I have one request for time, and I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HORTON].

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the rule for the consideration of H.R. 3987, a bill to improve the preservation and management of Federal records.

The bill would separate the National Archives and Records Service from the General Services Administration and thus reestablish the Archives as an independent agency. The bill would also increase the authority of the Archivist of the United States to deal with improper dispositions of Federal records.

These provisions, taken together, will greatly strengthen the ability of the Federal Government to protect, preserve, and make available to its citizens the records which document its history.

This bill has been carefully reviewed and recommended by the Committee on Government Operations. It merits favorable consideration by the House of Representatives.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BROOKS], the very distinguished chairman of the committee.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this rule, which will provide for consideration of H.R. 3987, the National Archives and Records Administration Act of 1984. This rule will allow 1 hour of general debate and it is an open rule. It will enable us to have the fullest possible consideration of this important measure, which will improve the handling and management of our Nation's documentary heritage through the establishment of an independent National Archives.

I urge a favorable vote on this rule.

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 5151, HUNGER RELIEF ACT OF 1984

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 517 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 517

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5151) to alleviate hunger in the United States by strengthening Federal nutrition programs, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. All points of order against the consideration of the bill for failure to comply with the provisions of section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344) are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Agriculture now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule, said substitute shall be considered for amendment by titles instead of by sections, and each title shall be considered as having been read, and all points of order against said substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 5(a) of rule XXI are hereby waived. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. BEILENSON] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT], pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 517 provides for the consideration of H.R. 5151, the Hunger Relief Act of 1984.

The rule provides for 1 hour of general debate to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture.

It should be noted that the rule waives a point of order against the bill under section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act. Section 402(a) provides that it shall not be in order to consider any bill which authorizes the enactment of new budget authority for a fiscal year unless that bill has been reported on or before May 15 preceding the beginning of such fiscal year.

This waiver is technically needed because the Committee on Education and Labor, to which the bill was jointly referred, did not file a report on it by May 15, 1984. However, the Committee on Agriculture, which filed its report on May 15, 1984, deleted all provisions that would have been under the jurisdiction of the Education and Labor Committee. Consequently, that committee decided not to take any action on the bill, and has no objection to the bill being considered as reported by the Agriculture Committee.

The rule makes in order the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Agriculture as the original text for purpose of amendment. In order to expedite consideration of the substitute, the rule further provides that the substitute shall be considered for amendment by titles instead of by sections, with each title considered as read. The rule also provides for one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

House Resolution 517 waives clause 5(a) of rule XXI with respect to the substitute. This rule prohibits appropriations in a legislative measure. The waiver is needed because section 103 of the substitute would make recipients of AFDC and SSI benefits automatically eligible to receive food stamps. Since this change would have the effect of altering the allocation of the food stamp appropriation in effect for the current year, the provision would constitute a violation of the rule.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5151 makes various changes in the Food Stamp Program to help meet the food assistance needs across the country. The bill increases food stamp benefits for recipients by basing such benefits on the full cost of the thrifty food plan. It also permits the homeless to receive benefits. Further, the bill changes current law to make the practice of monthly reporting an option available to the States rather than a mandatory practice, and it requires States to cover more of the cost of overpayment of food stamp benefits. Finally, H.R. 5151 makes special allowances for those recipients who face high housing and utility costs, and increases the value of assets that food stamp recipients are allowed to hold.

Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any opposition to this open rule on H.R. 5151, and I would urge my colleagues to adopt it.

□ 2020

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the rule is an open rule, equally dividing the 1 hour of general debate.

The rule contains two waivers of the rules of the House, including:

A waiver of section 402(a) of the act, because the committee substitute contains authorizations that were not reported prior to the May 15 deadline in the year prior to becoming effective.

A waiver of clause 5(a) of rule XXI, because the committee substitute contains appropriations language.

The rule permits a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the committee to the bill or to the committee substitute.

The rule provides one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The bill, H.R. 5151, is opposed by the administration because:

It reverses several of the reforms in the Food Stamp Program contained in the Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981, which targeted assistance to those most in need.

It would add $3.4 billion to the President's budget over the next 4 fiscal years.

It increases food stamp benefits over and above the current annual inflation adjustments.

The bill does have some bipartisan support from members of the Committee on Agriculture, and the rule allows for ample debate and an open amendment process.

Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 5244 CIVILIAN RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT AUTHORIZATION ACT FOR FISCAL YEARS 1985, 1986, AND 1987

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 509 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 509

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5244) to authorize appropriations to the Department of Energy for civilian research and development programs for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Science and Technology, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule by titles instead of by sections, and each title shall be considered as have been read. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. FROST] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT], for purposes of debate only, pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 509 provides for the consideration of H.R. 5244, the Department of Energy Civilian Research and Development Authorization Act for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987.

House Resolution 509 is a simple open rule providing 1 hour of general debate to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Science and Technology. The rule provides that the bill is to be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule by titles rather than by sections and that each title shall be considered as having been read. The rule also provides for one motion to recommit.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5244 is a 3-year authorization for the operations, capital equipment and construction expenses for civilian research and development programs in the Department of Energy. Current authorizations for civilian R&D programs within the Department of Energy are contained in the Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1981 and are due to expire at the end of this fiscal year.

While the recommended authorization levels in the bill exceed administration requests, the programs funded in H.R. 5244 are vital to developing new methods of meeting our Nation's energy needs. Mr. Speaker, since House Resolution 509 is an open rule, any germane amendment, including those cutting funding levels, are in order. Consequently, I urge adoption of the rule so that this reauthorization may be considered by the full House.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, in the Rules Committee both the chairman and the ranking Republican member of the Committee on Science and Technology, agreed in asking for a 1-hour open rule. The Rules Committee provided exactly what they asked.

There are no waivers of points of order in this rule and no restrictions on amendments.

Mr. Speaker, there should be more rules like this one.

Mr. Speaker, the bipartisan agreement on the rule, however, does not extend to the bill made in order by the rule.

At the time of the Rules Committee meeting the administration provided a policy statement opposing enactment of the bill H.R. 5244, the Department of Energy Civilian Research and Development Authorization.

The administration opposes the bill unless it is amended to reduce and modify the authorization levels consistent with the President's Budget. The bill would authorize an increase of $206 million above the $3.2 billion in the President's 1985 request, and a 3-year increase of $1.4 billion above the budget planning levels.

Mr. Speaker, if we are serious about controlling the deficit problem in this country, this bill provides a good place to begin.

Under this open rule procedure it will be possible to offer amendments cutting the authorization levels.

I support the rule so that the House may proceed to consider the authorization bill.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RELATIVE TO ADJOURNMENT TO A DATE CERTAIN DURING THE REMAINDER OF THE 98TH CONGRESS

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 342) relative to adjournment to a date certain during the remainder of the 98th Congress, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

H. CON. RES. 342

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That notwithstanding the provisions of section 132(a) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 (2 U.S.C. 198), as amended by section 461 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1970 (Public Law 91-510; 84 Stat. 1193), the House of Representatives and the Senate shall not adjourn for a period in excess of 3 days, or adjourn sine die until both Houses of Congress have adopted a concurrent resolution providing either for an adjournment (in excess of 3 days) to a day certain, or for adjournment sine die.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, this is a formality which must be satisfied in each succeeding Congress. The Reorganization Act of 1946 provides that absent the adoption of such a resolution as this, the Congress would stand adjourned sine die on July 31. Obviously, we are not going to be ready to do that, and we have consistently done this over the years. I ask that we approve this resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMUNICATION FROM CHAIRMAN OF SUBCOMMITTEE ON COMMERCE, CONSUMER, AND MONETARY AFFAIRS OF COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the chairman of the Subcommittee on Commerce, Consumer, and Monetary Affairs of the Committee on Government Operations:

COMMERCE, CONSUMER, AND MONETARY AFFAIRS SUBCOMMITTEE,
Washington, DC, July 25, 1984.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker, House of Representatives, Room H-204, the Capitol, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: This is to inform you, pursuant to Rule L(50) of the Rules of the House, that Mr. Dean Scott, an employee of the General Accounting Office detailed to this subcommittee, has been served with a subpoena for deposition issued by the Superior Court of the District of Columbia.

After further consideration with the General Counsel to the Clerk of the House, I will inform you of the determinations which are required by Rule L(50).

Sincerely,

DOUG BARNARD, Jr.,
Chairman.

IN TRIBUTE TO THE HONORABLE JOHN G. FARY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in tribute to our former colleague and my good friend, the Honorable John G. Fary, Congressman from the Fifth District of Illinois from 1975 to 1982, who died on June 5. John was a dear friend of mine, and over the years we served in Congress together, we shared good fellowship and camaraderie, and we assisted each other on many legislative matters that benefited the city of Chicago, the State of Illinois, and our Nation. His death is a tremendous loss to the people of this country.

During the 7 years he served in the House of Representatives, John Fary distinguished himself as a member of the House Public Works and Transportation Committee, where he became chairman of the Subcommittee on Public Buildings and Grounds. He also served as a member of the Subcommittee on Surface Transportation.

Congressman Fary's dedication to his committee assignments, his loyalty to the Democratic Party, and his devotion to the highest standards of integrity were well known to all of those who had been privileged to have worked with him as a Member of the Congress of the United States.

John Fary played a leading role in the revitalization of Midway Airport in Chicago, and it was largely due to his efforts and hard work that flights have been restored from Chicago to Washington and Washington to Chicago. In April of this year in recognition of John Fary's accomplishments, legislation was enacted into law to designate the air traffic control tower at Midway Airport as the "John G. Fary Tower."

Because of John Fary's efforts during his last term, Illinois received more Federal highway funds than any other State, and he was known as an outstanding watchdog for the interest of the State of Illinois. Also, he played a key role in securing $38 million for the Little Calumet watershed plan in Illinois. When this project is completed, it will provide four reservoirs and hundreds of jobs in the Chicago area.

Before coming to Congress, John served as a legislator in the Illinois General Assembly for almost 22 years where he was highly respected by all of his colleagues as a most knowledgeable legislator and a dedicated public servant who was completely committed to his responsibilities, to his job, and to the Democratic Party of Cook County.

Congressman John Fary was a dedicated and devoted American, and a Congressman who performed his duties conscientiously and constructively on behalf of his constituency. He served his city well, and he left no stone unturned in his efforts to insure that Chicago and the State of Illinois received all of the benefits to which they were entitled under the law.

John was a highly respected member of the House Public Works Committee, a knowledgeable Member of Congress, and a good team player who will be sorely missed by all those he served, and by all of us in Congress who had an opportunity to work with him and to know him as a friend. Mrs. Annunzio and I extend our deepest sympathy to his wife, Lillian, his daughter, Marian, his son, James, and the other members of his family.●

● Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I greatly appreciate the opportunity to contribute a few words to this discussion in memory of and in tribute to our late colleague, the Honorable John G. Fary of Chicago.

I was greatly saddened at the news of his death last June, as I was disheartened at his departure from the Nation's Capital at the end of the last Congress. Such losses weaken not only our delegation but the entire body. In fact, our Nation lost a patriot, servant, and friend. There is no doubt that I certainly lost a close personal friend.

Mr. Fary came to Congress in 1975 to fill the vacancy created by the death of Hon. John Kluczynski. We quickly came to realize that we saw eye-to-eye on most issues. John and I would join our colleague FRANK ANNUNZIO in the Members' dining room for lunch almost every day, and the discussions that ensued would cover anything and everything. The problems of the world were solved every day, many times over, right there at our table. These memories of John Fary are among the things I treasure most.

John's habit of finding little trinkets and giving them away brightened up the lives of many, especially around here, where his humor and good cheer were always present even when times were bad. I still value the support he gave me and the insight and wisdom he was always willing to share.

I join my colleagues in extending sympathy to his wife Lillian, and his children, grandchildren, brothers and sisters. No finer man ever served in the House.●

● Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, on June 6 our friend and colleague from Chicago, John G. Fary, passed away.

John was a loyal member of the Illinois delegation and a dedicated Democrat. He is remembered fondly by his colleagues on the House Public Works Committee for his reliability in attending committee hearing meetings and hearings.

It was a hallmark of John's congressional service that it was punctuated by this type of reliability, and he made the House a more humane place by his kind words for everyone.

Most Members do not realize that John's political career began almost three decades ago. Although he started as an outsider, he quickly was embraced by the regular Democratic organization and was slated in 1954 to represent the Ninth District in the Illinois General Assembly. Here, his most noteworthy achievement was to legalize bingo for charitable organizations.

John was also a close ally of Mayor Richard Daley, and was chosen by the mayor to replace John Kluczynski as the Member of Congress from the Fifth Congressional District.

It was only fitting that John Fary replaced John Kluczynski on the Public Works Committee, and like his predecessor, fought to make sure that the city of Chicago and the State got their fair share of Federal funds for transportation and aviation.

John became the chairman of the Public Buildings and Grounds Subcommittee, and used this position to improve Federal facilities throughout the United States.

In recognition of John's outstanding work, the bridge over Cicero Avenue is named for him. In addition, the air traffic tower at Midway Airport is named for John Fary, and is an eloquent testament to his efforts to rejuvenate Midway Airport.

I know I express the sentiments of many Members who knew John Fary, and offer our deepest sympathies to his wife Lillian, his children, brothers, and sisters.●

THE NEED FOR CONGRESSIONAL OVERSIGHT ON THE CONTINENTAL ILLINOIS BAILOUT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ST GERMAIN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ST GERMAIN. Mr. Speaker, The bailout of Continental Illinois raises the greatest array of questions in the history of the Federal bank regulatory system.

It is my intention to explore these questions in depth in hearings that will begin in the Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee on September 18. Efforts to obtain documents and other background material is already well underway within the committee and will be intensified in the coming weeks.

The rescue of Continental dwarfs the combined guarantees and outlays of the Federal Government in the Lockheed, Chrysler, and New York City bailouts which originated in this committee. More important is the fact that the Federal Government provided assistance to these entities only after the fullest debate, great gnashing of teeth, the imposition of tough conditions, and ultimately, a majority vote of the House and the Senate and the signature of the President of the United States. The American public, whether it agreed or not, was fully informed in open hearings before its moneys and credit were committed. Its elected representatives had to stand up and be counted and have their decisions approved or rejected at the ballot box.

In the Continental bailout three appointed Federal regulators went behind closed doors, met with the bankers and decided this was the plan—fait accompli.

Ultimately these officials may establish the wisdom of their course, but the episode does point to the inordinate power of the bank regulatory system to commit moneys, create contingent liabilities for the Federal Treasury, and to reshape the banking industry without review or prior approval. It is a power unmatched by any other agency of Government. All the more reason why it is essential that this committee exercise its oversight responsibility to the fullest.

In the clatter of the public relations efforts, there will be many inferences that the bailout is somehow free—or at best being paid for with "funny" money that really does not count. The regulators and the Reagan administration should not attempt to deceive the American public.

The bailout commitments are not free. The FDIC's reserves, from which part of the rescue money is drawn, has been paid, in effect, by the millions of bank customers nationwide. But, it is not the $16 billion in reserves that gives FDIC and the bailout strength; it is the simple fact that the full faith and credit of the Federal Government stands behind the insurance funds and behind the FDIC actions—ill considered or not.

If there are enough Continentals, enough ad hoc bailouts, and FDIC-fueled nationalizations, then we can rest assured that Mr. Isaac or his successors will be standing here, hat in hand, asking for congressional appropriations to replenish the funds.

The Federal Reserve has poured billions of dollars into Continental through the discount window—the exact amount obscured under the veil of the agency's traditional secrecy. The Federal Reserve's income—and its great financial flexibility in such matters—is derived from public funds which the U.S. Treasury pays to it as interest on Government securities it has purchased for monetary policy purposes. The earnings on these securities, minus Federal Reserve expenses, are returned to the U.S. Treasury. So, when it embarks on adventures, subsidized lending to banks, and related bailout maneuvers, there is a reduction in the amount of earnings returned to the Treasury—a net loss to the taxpayer.

In the Continental bailout, the Federal Reserve has decided to convert its discount window from an overnight liquidity mechanism to a long-term loan operation. This raises a whole series of new policy questions about the use of the discount window—a massive Federal credit device that is unaudited.

If the shifting of funds between the Federal Reserve and FDIC and private banks and the complex restructuring does not sufficiently obscure the costs of the bailout, we can expect to hear much about the theory that eventually "most of the money" will be recovered. That's comforting theory and one which we all hope will prove to be correct. There are many who advance this same theory in behalf of urban programs, housing and small business. The plea that Federal outlays and guarantees in these areas will eventually be repaid and, thus be "cost free" has not seemed to loosen the heart strings or the purses of this administration. Perhaps a large bank will strike a different chord.

The immediate question of costs and contingent liabilities for the taxpayers may pale against some of the long-range policy implications of the Continental bailout.

The concept that the large shall not fail—inherent in this entire episode—is not lost on the banking industry. How this regulatory approach impacts on the thinking in the board rooms may have a lot to do with safety and soundness of the entire system.

There are substantial questions to be asked about the use of deposit insurance funds in the bailout and the shifting of funds between the Federal Reserve and the FDIC and the apparent distortion of the discount window.

Overall, the Continental bailout throws a spotlight on the immense power of the Federal regulatory structure:

The power to literally decide who lives and who dies in the banking industry.

The power to commit billions of dollars without advance approval.

The power to restructure local banking markets.

The power, apparently, to actually nationalize an institution without specific statutory approval and to establish the criteria for running such an institution, again without prior consultation or specific approval from the Congress.

All these questions need to be looked at when we launch our hearings in September. I want the committee to look at the regulatory history of Continental—when the regulatory agencies found troubles and what they did to force corrections. I want a thorough top to bottom examination of the bailout, its implications for the industry and the economy, its costs, its legal ramifications.

Some are citing the example of Franklin National—a 1974 bailout effort—as a precedent for the approach in the Continental case. But, let me remind everyone that Franklin had no precedent and that bailout proceeded, at best, on dubious statutory authority. Compounding an abuse of authority does not legitimize the action.

In short, Mr. Speaker, we intend to dissect the Continental case fully. A multibillion-dollar bailout surely requires complete congressional oversight effort. We will demand total cooperation from the regulators and the administration.●

HISTORY OF THE 64TH CHEMICAL DEPOT CO.

(Mr. PRICE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, one of my constituents and old friends, Mr. Norman L. Hoff of Belleville, IL, has written a history of the 64th Chemical Depot Co., which I would like to share with my colleagues.

The remaining members of the company still have a reunion every year, and this year I am proud to say that it will be in Belleville.

As Mr. Hoff himself says:

Many words have been written by historians about World War II, the battles, the strategies, the Generals, the Armies, the Divisions and Battalions. Little has been written about the small individual company units and their contributions to the final victory.

I would have to agree with that, so I include herewith the history for reprinting in the RECORD. I think my colleagues will find it interesting.

HISTORY OF THE 64TH CHEMICAL CO.

(By Norm Hoff)

In the beginning there was—Camp Sibert, Alabama. Camp Sibert, Alabama, the start of a new way of life for the members of the 64th Chemical Depot Company, Chemical Warfare Service, United States Army.

Camp Sibert, Alabama, a training camp of the C.W.S. was carved out of a 30,000 acre area of cotton fields, swamps and woodlands of the northeastern counties of Etowah and St. Clair, Alabama. This camp was named after Major General William L. Sibert, a native son of neary Gadsden, Alabama, who was highly instrumental in having the National Defense Act of 1920 create a permanent and separate branch of the United States Army to be known as the General Warfare Service.

Brigadier General Haig Shekerjian, a West Pointer with thirty-six years of military service, became the Camp Commander upon the activation of the camp on Christmas Day, 1942. The major elements of the camp were the Replacement Training Center and the Unit Training Center.

The Replacement Training Center was to train highly versatile replacements for Chemical units in addition to preparing a wide variety of specialists in its schools, including clerks, chauffeurs, mechanics, decontamination equipment operators, toxic gas handlers, maintenance and repairmen and gas non-commissioned officers.

In the Unit Training Center company units were trained for specific tasks, particularly for the highly skilled and technical operations C.W.S. would have to perform. Some of the types of chemical outfits were Air Operations, Smoke Generator, Maintenance, Laboratory, Decontamination Depot, Chemical Weapons and Processing companies.

The Chemical Warfare soldier was also trained to fight as a combat soldier and was schooled in the use of the rifle, machine gun, anti-aircraft weapons, bazookas, flamethrower, hand and rifle grenade.

The Chemical Warfare Service insignia design was that of two crossed chemical retorts over the six sided benzene ring. This insignia was worn with pride by all Chemical Warfare servicemen.

Camp Sibert, Alabama then became the home of the 64th Chemical Depot Company, members of which were still being processed through the induction centers in Peoria and the reception center at Scott Field, Illinois early in 1943.

Formation of the 64th Chemical Company actually began in August 1942 while the 3rd Chemical Mortar Battalion, stationed in Fort Bliss, Texas, was on maneuvers in the mosquito infested swamplands of Louisiana. It was there that a cadre of officers and non-commissioned officers were selected to form the 60th Chemical Depot company which was activated in August 1942 at Camp Shelby, Mississippi. Out of the 60th Chemical Company a new cadre was selected and in late January 1943 this cadre received their orders to proceed to Gadsden, Alabama and the newly built Camp Sibert, C.W.S. Training Center.

This cadre, commanded by Lieutenant Geske, consisted of Lieutenants Kostick, Frank, Griffin and Prince along with noncommissioned officers Slonski, Murray, Anderson, Kaisershot, Floresh, Timmons, Clemmons, Smith, Fealey, Zinz, Chester, Heiman, Webb and Whittaker, was then ready to receive the newly drafted raw recruits who arrived at Camp Sibert in February 1943.

The Unit Training Center of Camp Sibert then became the training area for the newly formed 64th Chemical Depot Company. After forming platoons, intensive training began. Close-order-drill, calisthenics, forced marches, inspections, class room instruction, handling and classification of toxic and nontoxic chemicals, inspections running obstacle course and infiltration courses, gasdrills and the use of gas masks, inspections, operation and maintenance of chemical weapons and equipment, training in the use of Enfield rifles, Springfield rifles, 30 cal. Carbines, 30 cal. machine guns, 50 cal. machine guns, hand grenades and rifle grenades and more and more inspection, became the order of the day.

Training came to an end on October 21, 1943 when the 64th Chemical Company boarded a troop train headed for Camp Shanks, New York, a Port of Embarkation. On November 3, 1943 abroad the English liner Queen Elizabeth, the unit along with twenty-two thousand other troops steamed out of New York harbor, bound for England.

After landing at Glascow, Scotland on November 9, 1943 the 64th boarded a troop train that took them to Westbury Wilts, England. At that time, due to a shortage of trained C.W.S. troops the 64th was split into three independently functioning units consisting of one service platoon and one-third of the Headquarters platoon in each unit. The First Platoon remained in Westbury Wiltshire while the Second Platoon went to Portsmouth with the Third Platoon going to Ashchurch, Gloustershire.

While in England, the 64th Chemical Company set up three separate Chemical Depots, operating and maintaining them, while at the same time quite a few small three and five man units covered the entire Southern Base Section of England, visiting with and training other units of the First Army and Third Army, including the 94th Division, and the 8th and 9th Air Force, giving courses in the operation of chemical weapons and equipment and the use of first-aid for chemical inflicted accidents and injuries.

On August 28, 1944 after reforming the outfit in Westbury, the 64th then left for the staging area at Southhampton where it boarded an L.C.I. and started the channel crossing on August 30, 1944. However, a heavy storm forced a return to port but the next day the crossing was made and the unit was landed on Utah beach, Normandy, France on Sept. 1, 1944.

The first assignment for the 64th on the continent was the manning of a Prisoner-of-War Stockade. On September 26th, the 64th advanced to Rennes, France and remained there until October 11 when the unit boarded the famous 40 et 8 (40 Hommes-8 Chaveaux) railway cars for the trip to Maastricht, Holland.

Once again the 64th was called upon to break up into three separate units to set up A.S.P.'s (Advance Supply Points) which, due to the ever changing positions of the advancing American, British and Canadian Armies, were always moving forward.

On Christmas Day, 1944, the First Platoon entered Aachen, Germany in support of units caught in the "Bulge", the German counter offensive. It was here on New Years Day, 1945, that two German ME-109 fighter planes on a strafing run, were shot down by Edward Chorney and Henry Lucianni manning a ground mount 50 cal. machine gun that had been converted to an air mount weapon from an idea by Charles Winters, using a fence post, a bicycle fork and bailing wire. For their efforts they were awarded the Bronze Star.

After the "Bulge" the A.S.P.s continued their advance across Germany, crossing the Roer River, the Rhine River and eventually marking time in the area west of the Elbe River.

Then came "the Day", May 8, 1945, VE Day, the day Germany officially surrendered, marking the end of the war in Europe.

Now came the waiting game. A time for relaxing but ever anxious for movement home. The redeployment of troops began. The 64th started the long journey home by way of Camp San Antonio to the Calais staging area in Marseilles, France. Here a number of "high pointers" in the outfit boarded a ship for the return to the States. For most of the 64th, however, a stint in the Army of Occupation was in order.

Esch, Luxembourgh became the Headquarters for the 64th. The stay here was short and soon the unit was on its way again. At Camp Baltimore the 64th was consolidated into the 7th Chemical Company for redeployment to the States.

This unit proceeded to Camp Phillip Morris and then on to LeHarve, France. Here, on December 6, 1945, the ships Thomas Hyde and George Washington loaded groups of the 64th for the homeward Atlantic crossing.

Arriving safely at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, the units debarked and began the final leg of the journey home by way of ferry boat and train to Camp Kilmer, New Jersey and train to Camp Grant, Illinois where the last members of the 64th Chemical Company received their discharge and the "Ruptured Duck" on Christmas Eve 1945, the one Christmas present everyone had hoped for.

Looking back, each member of the 64th when mentioning the name of a village or town or city can vividly recall an event or happening, some good, some bad but forever imbedded in their minds.

Remember ???

Alabama—Attalla, Gadsden, Glencoe, Huntsville, Birmingham—Rome, Georgia and New York City.

England—Bath, Bristol, Chippenham, Cheltenham, Ashchurch, Salisbury, Stonehenge, Trowbridge, Southhampton, Portsmouth, Westbury, Stratford-on-Avon, Yeovil, Winchester, Tidsworth, Glouster, London.

Remember ???

The 64th worked closely with a number of units of the 1st, 3rd and 9th Armies, most notable of which was the 84th Infantry Division, Ninth Army, and was cited and decorated for having participated in the Northern France Campaign, Ardennes and Central Europe Campaign and the Rhineland Campaign. The unit was cited for meritorious service by Lt. General W. H. Simpson, Commander of the U.S. Ninth Army. Numerous citations were awarded individual members of the 64th while serving under various commands.

Members of the 64th Chemical Company can look back with pride to their time in service to their country. Moreover, the fact that the 64th has been held together all these past years through the Reunion Committees gives each of them the opportunity to express their pride. The 64th Chemical Company was, and still is, a great outfit!

AUTHOR'S NOTE.—It has been a privilege for me to have been able to put together this brief history of the 64th in commemoration of this 25th Anniversary Reunion. I hope it will rekindle some good memories and that you will enjoy reading it.

There may be a few inaccuracies and some ommissions of events but the passage of thirty years creates a tendency to forget some things.

I want to thank Don Downs, Bob Cassel and Dave Chester for helping me compile the information outlined in this brief history of the 64th.●

STATUS REPORT ON CURRENT LEVEL OF SPENDING AND REVENUES FOR FISCAL YEAR 1984

(Mr. JONES of Oklahoma asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the procedures of the Committee on the Budget and section 311(b) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, I am submitting to the RECORD a letter to the Speaker advising him of the current level of spending and revenues for fiscal year 1984.

COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET,
Washington, DC, July 24, 1984.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: On January 30, 1976, the Committee on the Budget outlined the procedure which it had adopted in connection with its responsibilities under Section 311 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 to provide estimates of the current level of revenues and spending.

Pursuant to Committee Rule 10, I am herewith transmitting the status report under H. Con. Res. 91, the First Concurrent Resolution on the Budget for Fiscal Year 1984. This report reflects the adjusted resolution of October 25, 1983, and the current CBO estimates of budget authority, outlays, and revenues. The attachments show the latest estimate for the current level of fiscal year 1984 spending and divide that amount among committees.

The procedural situation with regard to the spending ceiling is affected this year by Section 5(b) of H. Con. Res. 91. As I explained during debate on the conference report on that resolution, enforcement against breaches of the spending ceiling under Section 311(a) of the Budget Act do not apply where a measure would not cause a committee to exceed its appropriate allocation pursuant to Section 302(a) of the Budget Act. In the House, the appropriate 302(a) allocation includes "new discretionary budget authority" and "new entitlement authority" only. It should be noted that under this procedure neither the total level of outlays nor a committee's outlay allocation is considered. This exception is only provided because an automatic budget resolution is in effect and will cease to apply if Congress revises the budget resolution for fiscal year 1984.

The intent of the Section 302(a) "discretionary budget authority" and "new entitlement authority" subceiling provided by Section 5(b) of the resolution is to protect a committee that has stayed within its spending allocation—discretionary budget authority and new entitlement authority—from points of order if the total spending ceiling has been breached for reasons outside of its control. The 302(a) allocations to House committees made pursuant to the conference report on H. Con. Res. 91 were printed in the Congressional Record, June 22, 1983, H. 4326. Adjustments to such allocations made pursuant to Section 2 of House Concurrent Resolution 91, the reserve fund, are reflected in House Reports 98-313, 98-354, 98-381, and 98-439.

The attached tables show where each committee currently stands compared to its 302(a) allocation of discretionary budget authority and of new entitlement authority.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

JAMES R. JONES,
Chairman.

U.S. CONGRESS,
CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE,
Washington, DC, July 23, 1984.

Hon. JAMES R. JONES,
Chairman, Committee on the Budget, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to section 308(b) and in aid of section 311(b) of the Congressional Budget Act, this letter and supporting detail provide an up-to-date tabulation of the current levels of new budget authority, estimated outlays and estimated revenues in comparison with the appropriate levels for those items contained in the most recently agreed to concurrent resolution on the 1984 budget (H. Con. Res. 91). This report for fiscal year 1984 is based on our estimates of budget authority, outlays, and revenues using the assumptions and estimates consistent with H. Con. Res. 91.

Since my last report the Congress has cleared H.R. 5174, Bankruptcy Amendments of 1984 and H. Con. Res. 328, making changes in the tax provisions of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 which affect revenue. Congress also cleared H.R. 5753, legislative branch Appropriations, 1985; and H.R. 5950, Federal Contribution for Presidential Nominating Conventions, which affect budget authority and outlays.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

GOVERNOR CUOMO'S MOVING KEYNOTE ADDRESS

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 25, 1984

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, last week, at our national convention, the Democratic Party demonstrated its far-reaching appeal to the American people. Perhaps no one better embodies or more eloquently expresses the ideals of our party than my most famous constituent, Gov. Mario Cuomo.

In his keynote address, he compared our Nation to a family, one which needs cooperation and understanding in order to grow. Governor Cuomo gave a moving tribute not only to our party, but also to the aspirations of all Americans. His speech is destined to take its place among the great orations of our time. I wish to submit his remarks to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, for it is an outstanding statement of the principles and vision of this great land.

TEXT OF GOV. MARIO M. CUOMO'S KEYNOTE ADDRESS

On behalf of the Empire State and the family of New York, I thank you for the great privilege of being able to address this convention.

Please allow me to skip the stories and the poetry and the temptation to deal in nice but vague rhetoric.

Let me instead use this valuable opportunity to deal immediately with questions that should determine this election and that we all know are vital to the American people.

"TALE OF TWO CITIES"

Ten days ago, President Reagan admitted that although some people in this country seemed to be doing well nowadays, others were unhappy, even worried, about themselves, their families and their futures.

The president said that he didn't understand that fear. He said, "Why, this country is a shining city on a hill."

And the president is right. In many ways we are "a shining city on a hill."

But the hard truth is that not everyone is sharing in this city's splendor and glory.

A shining city is perhaps all the president sees from the portico of the White House and the veranda of his ranch, where everyone seems to be doing well.

But there's another city, another part of the city, the part where some people can't pay their mortgages and most young people can't afford one, where students can't afford the education they need and middle-class parents watch the dreams they hold for their children evaporate.

In this part of the city, there are more poor than ever, more families in trouble, more and more people who need help but can't find it.

Even worse: There are elderly people who tremble in the basements of the houses there.

And there are people who sleep in the city streets, in the gutter, where the glitter doesn't show.

There are ghettos where thousands of young people, without a job or an education, give their lives away to drug dealers every day.

There is despair, Mr. President, in the faces that you don't see, in the places that you don't visit in your shining city.

In fact, you ought to know Mr. President, that this nation is more a "Tale of Two Cities" than it is just a "Shining City on a Hill."

Maybe, maybe, Mr. President, if you visited more places.

Maybe if you went to Appalachia where some people still live in sheds, maybe if you went to Lackawanna where thousands of unemployed steel workers wonder why we subsidized foreign steel.

Maybe, maybe, Mr President, if you stopped into a shelter in Chicago and talked with some of the homeless there; maybe, Mr. President, if you asked a woman who'd been denied the help she needs to feed her children because you said we needed the money for a tax break to a millionaire or to build a missile we can't even afford to use—maybe then you'd understand.

Maybe, maybe, Mr. President.

But I'm afraid not.

Because, the truth is, ladies and gentlemen, that this is how we were warned it would be.

President Reagan told us from the beginning that he believed in a kind of social Darwinism. Survival of the fittest. "Government can't do everything," we were told. "So it should settle for taking care of the strong and hope that economic ambition and charity will do the rest. Make the rich richer and what falls from their table will be enough for the middle class and those who are trying desperately to work their way into the middle class."

You know, the Republicans called it trickle-down when Hoover tried it. Now they call it supply side. But, it's the same shining city for those relative few who are lucky enough to live in its good neighborhoods.

But for the people who are excluded—for the people who are locked out—all they can do is to stare from a distance at that city's glimmering towers.

It's an old story. It's as old as our history.

DEMOCRATS AND REPUBLICANS

The difference between Democrats and Republicans has always been measured in courage and confidence. The Republicans believe that the wagon train will not make it to the frontier unless some of the old, some of the young and some of the weak are left behind by the side of the trail.

The strong, the strong they tell us will inherit the land!

We Democrats believe that we can make it all the way with the whole family intact.

And, we have more than once.

Ever since Franklin Roosevelt lifted himself from his wheelchair to lift this nation from its knees. Wagon train after wagon train. To new frontiers of education, housing, peace. The whole family aboard. Constantly reaching out to extend and enlarge that family. Lifting them up into the wagon on the way. Blacks and Hispanics, and people of every ethnic group, and native Americans—all those struggling to build their families and claim some small share of America.

For nearly 50 years we carried them all to new levels of comfort, security, dignity, even affluence.

And remember this, some of us are in this room today only because this nation had that kind of confidence.

And it would be wrong to forget that.

CLAIMING THE FUTURE

So, here we are at this convention to remind ourselves where we come from and to claim the future for ourselves and for our children.

Today our great Democratic Party, which has saved this nation from depression, from fascism, from racism, from corruption, is called upon to do it again—this time to save the nation from confusion and division, from the threat of eventual fiscal disaster and most of all from the fear of a nuclear holocaust.

That's not going to be easy. Mo Udall is exactly right, it's not going to be easy.

In order to succeed, we must answer our opponent's polished and appealing rhetoric with a more telling reasonableness and rationality.

We must win this case on the merits.

We must get the American public to look past the glitter, beyond the showmanship—to reality, to the hard substance of things. And we will do that not so much with speeches that sound good as with speeches that are good and sound.

Not so much with speeches that will bring people to their feet as with speeches that bring people to their senses.

We must make the American people hear our "Tale of Two Cities."

We must convince them that we don't have to settle for two cities, that we can have one city, indivisible, shining for all of its people.

Now we will have no chance to do that if what comes out of this convention is a babel of arguing voices. If that's what's heard throughout the campaign—dissident voices from all sides—we will have no chance to tell our message.

To succeed we will have to surrender small parts of our individual interests, to build a platform we can all stand on, at once, comfortably—proudly singing out the truth for the nation to hear, in chorus, its logic so clear and commanding that no slick commercial, no amount of geniality, no martial music will be able to muffle the sound of the truth.

UNITING THE PARTY AND THE NATION

We Democrats must unite.

We Democrats must unite so that the entire nation can unite because surely the Republicans won't bring this country together. Their policies divide the nation—into the lucky and the left-out, into the royalty and the rabble.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

The Republicans are willing to treat that division as victory. They would cut this nation in half, into those temporarily better off and those worse off than before, and they would call that division recovery.

Now we should not be embarrassed, we should not be embarrassed or dismayed or chagrined if the process of unifying is difficult, even wrenching at times.

Remember that, unlike any other party, we embrace men and women of every color, every creed, every orientation, every economic class. In our family are gathered everyone from the abject poor of Essex County in New York, to the enlightened affluent of the gold coasts at both ends of our nation. And in between is the heart of our constituency. The middle class—the people not rich enough to be worry-free but not poor enough to be on welfare. The middle class, those who work for a living because they have to. White collar and blue collar. Young professionals. Men and women in small business desperate for the capital and contracts they need to prove their worth.

We speak for the minorities who have not yet entered the main stream.

We speak for ethnics who want to add their culture to the magnificent mosaic that is America.

We speak for women who are indignant that we refuse to etch into our governmental commandments the simple rule "thou shalt not sin against equality," a rule so simple—

I was going to say, and I perhaps dare not but I will, it's a commandment so simple it can be spelled in three letters—E.R.A.!

We speak for young people demanding an education and a future.

We speak for senior citizens who are terrorized by the idea that their only security—their Social Security—is being threatened.

We speak for millions of reasoning people fighting to preserve our environment from greed and from stupidity. And we speak for reasonable people who are fighting to preserve our very existence from a macho intransigence that refuses to make intelligent attempts to discuss the possibility of nuclear holocaust with our enemy. They refuse. They refuse, because they believe we can pile missiles so high that they will pierce the clouds and the sight of them will frighten our enemies into submission.

Now we're proud of this diversity as Democrats. We're grateful for it. We don't have to manufacture it the way the Republicans will next month in Dallas, by propping up mannequin delegates on the convention floor.

But while we're proud of this diversity as Democrats, we pay a price for it.

The different people that we represent have different points of view. And sometimes they compete and even debate, and even argue. That's what our primaries were all about.

But now the primaries are over and it is time when we pick our candidates and our platform here to lock arms and move into this campaign together.

If you need any more inspiration to put some small part of your own differences aside to create this concensus, all you need to do is to reflect on what the Republican policy of divide and cajole has done to this land since 1980.

REAGAN'S PROMISES

Now the president has asked us to judge him on whether or not he's fulfilled the promise he made four years ago. I believe that as Democrats, we ought to accept that challenge. And, just for a moment, let us consider what he has said and what he's done.

Inflation is down since 1980. But not because of the supply-side miracle promised to us by the president. Inflation was reduced the old-fashioned way, with a recession, the worst since 1932. We could have brought inflation down that way. How did he do it? Fifty-five thousand bankruptcies. Two years of massive unemployment. Two hundred thousand farmers and ranchers forced off the land. More homeless than at any time since the Great Depression in 1932. More hungry, in this nation of enormous affluence, the United States of America, more hungry. More poor—most of them women—and he paid one more thing, a nearly $200 billion deficit threatening our future.

Now we must make the American people understand this deficit because they don't.

The president's deficit is a direct and dramatic repudiation of his promise to balance our budget by 1983.

How large is it? The deficit is the largest in the history of this universe; President Carter's last budget had a deficit of less than one-third of this deficit.

It is a deficit that, according to the president's own fiscal adviser, may grow as high as $300 billion a year for "as far as the eye can see."

And, ladies and gentlemen, it is a debt so large that as much as one-half of our revenue from the income tax goes just to pay the interest.

It is a mortgage on our children's future that can be paid only in pain and that could bring this nation to its knees.

Now don't take my word for it—I'm a Democrat.

Ask the Republican investment bankers on Wall Street what they think the chances of this recovery being permanent are.

You see, if they're not too embarrassed to tell you the truth, they'll say that they are appalled and frightened by the president's deficit. Ask them what they think of our economy, now that it has been driven by the distorted value of the dollar back to its colonial condition—now we're exporting agricultural products and importing manufactured ones.

Ask those Republican investment bankers what they expect the rate of interest to be a year from now. And ask them, if they dare tell you the truth you will hear from them, what they predict for the inflation rate a year from now, because of the deficit.

Now, how important is this question of the deficit.

Think about it practically: What chance would the Republican candidate have had in 1980 if he had told the American people that he intended to pay for his so-called economic recovery with bankruptcies, unemployment, more homeless, more hungry and the largest government debt known to humankind? Would American voters have signed the loan certificate for him on Election Day? Of course not! That was an election won under false pretenses. It was won with smoke and mirrors and illusions. And that's the kind of recovery we have now as well.

And what about foreign policy?

They said that they would make us and the whole world safer. They say they have.

By creating the largest defense budget in history, one that even they now admit is excessive. By escalating to a frenzy the nuclear arms race. By incendiary rhetoric. By refusing to discuss peace with our enemies. By the loss of 279 young Americans in Lebanon in pursuit of a plan and a policy that no one can find or describe.

We give money to Latin American governments that murder nuns, and then we lie about it.

We have been less than zealous in support of our only real friend, it seems to me, we have in the Middle East, the one democracy there, our flesh and blood ally, the state of Israel.

Our foreign policy drifts with no real direction, other than an hysterical commitment to an arms race that leads nowhere—if we're lucky. And if we're not, it could lead us into bankruptcy or war.

Of course we must have a strong defense!

Of course Democrats are for a strong defense. Of course Democrats believe that there are times when we must stand and fight. And we have. Thousands of us have paid for freedom with our lives. But always—when this country has been at its best—our purposes were clear.

Now they're not. Now our allies are as confused as our enemies.

Now we have no real commitment to our friends or to our ideals—not to human rights, not to the refuseniks, not to Sakharov, not to Bishop Tutu and the others struggling for freedom in South Africa.

We have in the last few years spent more than we can afford. We have pounded our chests and made bold speeches. But we lost 279 young Americans in Lebanon and we live behind sand bags in Washington.

How can anyone say that we are stronger, safer, or better?

That is the Republican record.

That its disastrous quality is not more fully understood by the American people I can only attribute to the president's amiability and the failure by some to separate the salesman from the product.

FOUR MORE YEARS OF REAGAN

And, now it's up to us. Now it's now up to you and me to make the case to America.

And to remind Americans that if they are not happy with all the president has done so far, they should consider how much worse it will be if he is left to his radical proclivities for another four years unrestrained. Unrestrained.

If July brings back Ann Gorsuch Burford—what can we expect of December?

Where would another four years take us?

Where would four years more take us?

How much larger will the deficit be?

How much deeper the cuts in programs for the struggling middle class and the poor to limit that deficit? How high will the interest rates be? How much more acid rain killing our forests and fouling our lakes?

And, ladies and gentlemen, the nation must think of this: What kind of Supreme Court will we have? We must ask ourselves what kind of court and country will be fashioned by the man who believes in having government mandate people's religion and morality?

The man who believes that trees pollute the environment, the man that believes that the laws against discrimination against people go too far. The man who threatens Social Security and Medicaid and help for the disabled.

How high will we pile the missiles?

How much deeper will the gulf be between us and our enemies?

And, ladies and gentleman, will four years more make meaner the spirit of the American people?

This election will measure the record of the past four years. But more than that, it will answer the question of what kind of people we want to be.

DEMOCRATIC CREDO

We Democrats still have a dream. We still believe in this nation's future.

And this is our answer to the question, this is our credo:

We believe in only the government we need but we insist on all the government we need.

We believe in a government that is characterized by fairness and reasonableness, a reasonableness that goes beyond labels, that doesn't distort or promise things that we know we can't do.

We believe in a government strong enough to use the words "love" and "compassion" and smart enough to convert our noblest aspirations into practical realities.

We believe in encouraging the talented, but we believe that while survival of the fittest may be a good working description of the process of evolution, a government of humans should elevate itself to a higher order.

Our government should be able to rise to the level to where it can fill the gaps left by chance or a wisdom we don't fully understand.

We would rather have laws written by the patron of this great city, the man called the "world's most sincere Democrat"—St. Francis of Assissi—than laws written by Darwin.

We believe, we believe as Democrats, that a society as blessed as ours, the most affluent democracy in the world's history, one that can spend trillions on instruments of destruction, ought to be able to help the middle class in its struggle, ought to be able to find work for all who can do it, room at the table, shelter for the homeless, care for the elderly and infirm, and hope for the destitute.

And we proclaim as loudly as we can the utter insanity of nuclear proliferation and the need for a nuclear freeze, if only to affirm the simple truth that peace is better than war because life is better than death.

We believe in firm but fair law and order. We believe proudly in the union movement. We believe in privacy for people, openness by government, we believe in civil rights, and we believe in human rights.

We believe in a single fundamental idea that describes better than most textbooks and any speech that I could write what a proper government should be. The idea of family. Mutuality. The sharing of benefits and burdens for the good of all. Feeling one another's pain. Sharing one another's blessings. Reasonably, honestly, fairly—without respect to race, or sex, or geography or political affiliation.

We believe we must be the family of America, recognizing that at the heart of the matter we are bound one to another, that the problems of a retired school teacher in Duluth are our problems. That the future of the child in Buffalo is our future. That the struggle of a disabled man in Boston to survive, and live decently, is our struggle. That the hunger of a woman in Little Rock is our hunger. That the failure anywhere to provide what reasonably we might, to avoid pain, is our failure.

DEMOCRATIC FUTURE

Now for 50 years, for 50 years we Democrats created a better future for our children, using traditional Democratic principles as a fixed beacon, giving us direction and purpose, but constantly innovating, adapting to new realities: Roosevelt's alphabet programs; Truman's NATO and the GI Bill of Rights; Kennedy's intelligent tax incentives and the Alliance for Progress; Johnson's civil rights; Carter's human rights and the nearly miraculous Camp David Peace Accord.

Democrats did it, Democrats did it—and Democrats can do it again.

We can build a future that deals with our deficit.

Remember this, that 50 years of progress under our principles never cost us what the last four years of stagnation have. And, we can deal with the deficit intelligently, by shared sacrifice, with all parts of the nation's family contributing, building partnerships with the private sector, providing a sound defense without depriving ourselves of what we need to feed our children and care for our people.

We can have a future that provides for all the young of the present, by marrying common sense and compassion.

We know we can, because we did it for nearly 50 years before 1980.

And we can do it again. If we do not forget. If we do not forget that this entire nation has profited by these progressive principles. That they helped lift up generations to the middle class and higher: gave us a chance to work, to go to college, to raise a family, to own a house, to be secure in our old age and, before that, to reach heights that our own parents would not have dared dream of.

That struggle to live with dignity is the real story of the shining city. And it's a story, ladies and gentlemen, that I didn't read in a book, or learn in a classroom. I saw it, and lived it. Like many of you.

I watched a small man with thick calluses on both hands work 15 and 16 hours a day. I say him once literally bleed from the bottoms of his feet, a man who came here uneducated, alone, unable to speak the language, who taught me all I needed to know about faith and hard work by the simple eloquence of his example. I learned about our kind of democracy from my father. And, I learned about our obligation to each other from him and from my mother. They asked only for a chance to work and to make the world better for their children and they asked to be protected in those moments when they would not be able to protect themselves. This nation and this nation's government did that for them.

And that they were able to build a family and live in dignity and see one of their children go from behind their little grocery store in South Jamaica on the other side of the tracks where he was born, to occupy the highest seat in the greatest state of the greatest nation in the only world we know, is an ineffably beautiful tribute to the democratic process.

And, ladies and gentlemen, on January 20, 1985, it will happen again. Only on a much, much grander scale. We will have a new president of the United States, a Democrat born not to the blood of kings but to the blood of pioneers and immigrants.

And we will have America's first woman vice president, the child of immigrants, and she, she, she will open with one magnificent stroke, a whole new frontier for the United States. Now, it will happen.

It will happen—if we make it happen; if you and I can make it happen.

And I ask you now—ladies and gentlemen, brothers and sisters—for the good of all of us—for the love of this great nation, for the family of America—for the love of God. Please, make this nation remember how futures are built.

Thank you and God bless you.●

CANCER PATIENTS EMPLOYMENT RIGHTS ACT OF 1984

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, last month I introduced H.R. 5849, the Cancer Patients Employment Rights Act of 1984. It is a bill to amend title VII of the Civil Rights Act by including cancer history among the provisions that one cannot be discriminated against in all aspects of employment.

I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues an excellent article which appeared in the New York Times of March 31 entitled "A Victim of Cancer; Then, of Employers." The article focuses in on the very same issue my legislation addresses—those people who have managed to beat cancer only to encounter various forms of employment-based discrimination which can and does include job and promotion denials and wage reductions as well as outright exclusion from benefits. The article written by Barbara Lazarus, a former cancer patient, who is director of the Center for Women's Careers at Wellesley College. She notes:

Cancer victims, after diagnosis or treatment, face further victimization, this time in the workplace. As recent American Cancer Society studies have shown, both blue and white collar workers who were once cancer patients are routinely denied employment because of their medical history, despite legislation in 37 States that prohibits such discrimination.

The mere admission that someone has had cancer can lead to dismissal. There are many reports of workers who were fired after their medical history became known or were refused the opportunity to return to work. Thousands of workers are denied promotion, are isolated from their peers and are ignored when special job opportunities arise because they're "no longer worth the investment."

My bill was inspired by an organization located in my congressional district known as Cancer Hopefuls United for Mutual Support [CHUMS]. They are an organization made up of cancer patients and survivors. They have done extensive work in this area and their research points to the fact that as many as 1 million Americans may have been victimized by this type of employment discrimination. There are more than 5 million Americans who have a cancer history some as long as 5 years. Annually some 800,000 Americans are diagnosed as having cancer of which almost half are cured. As the number of individuals with cancer histories continues to grow, it is imperative that we take steps to combat employment-based discrimination against these individuals.

On July 2, I conducted a press conference in New York City to formally announce the introduction of this legislation. At this point in the RECORD I would first like to insert the New York Times article and then some other articles written about the press conference.

[From the New York Times, Mar. 31, 1984]

A VICTIM OF CANCER; THEN, OF EMPLOYERS

(By Barbara Lazarus)

CAMBRIDGE, MASS.—Unlike Senator Paul Tsongas, most cancer victims don't have a career choice.

The Massachusetts Democrat had been told what some 33 percent of his fellow Americans will hear. His physician, at the Bethesda Naval Hospital, bringing the biopsy findings, said: "It is not benign."

Mr. Tsongas's disease—a mild form of cancer of the lymph nodes—does not require any treatment at this time, and his prognosis is good. His doctors had assured him that he could seek re-election and expect to serve out his six-year term. But the Senator, who is 43 years old, felt the need to reassess what was most important in his life. "Cancer makes you think about other things," he said. "If I'm going to have regrets, let it be on my political career and not on my family." He and his wife have three daughters, aged 10, 6 and 2. His decision has been praised as a heart-warming reaffirmation of the values of home and family.

If most cancer victims announced that they were leaving their high- or low-powered positions because they valued home and family, few would find it easy to get another job. Most employers aren't interested in hiring people who put domestic considerations above the demands of their work. Millions of women workers have discovered that you care about your family on your own time.

Cancer victims, after diagnosis or treatment, face further victimization, this time in the workplace. As recent American Cancer Society studies have shown, both blue- and white-collar workers who were once cancer patients are routinely denied employment because of their medical history, despite legislation in 37 states that prohibits such discrimination.

The mere admission that someone has had cancer can lead to dismissal. There are many reports of workers who were fired after their medical history became known or were refused the opportunity to return to work. Thousands of workers are denied promotion, are isolated from their peers and are ignored when special job opportunities arise because they're "no longer worth the investment."

Well-meaning but misguided colleagues stop asking them to take on difficult assignments for fear that it would be "too much of a strain," thus depriving them of the most interesting and challenging parts of the job.

People with a history of cancer feel pressure to work even harder than their peers for fear of reinforcing misperceptions of their fitness.

A business firm may worry that the prospective employee won't be able to do the job, may be frequently absent, will not pull his or her weight or will raise the company's insurance premiums. Sad to say, charges of discrimination, difficult to prove, require long and costly litigation.

Faced with these problems, cancer survivors adopt a variety of protective strategies. While current theories of counseling encourage cancer victims not to repress their experience but rather to talk openly about it, such openness can of course have disastrous repercussions for the job applicant.

Those who choose to be close-mouthed report loneliness, isolation, lack of support and colleagues' confusion over their actions in a variety of situations. For example, simply justifying frequent, regular visits for medical check-ups can pose difficulties.

In looking for a job, cancer survivors may be forced to select among employers primarily on the basis of the availability of health insurance. Certain occupations may be precluded for those people who wish to receive adequate medical or life insurance coverage.

What can be done? Employers need to learn that a diagnosis of cancer is not a death sentence, that discrimination on the basis of cancer history is illegal. Employees and job-seekers should learn their legal rights and seek help in planning and carrying out a career strategy. Professional counselors in the health and career fields need new theories and materials to support cancer victims in reassessing their career goals, exploring potential occupations, conducting a job search and succeeding at work. Fellow employees must learn not to treat colleagues as if cancer were catching or as if a cancer history rendered one unfit for the job. And a variety of new policies for health and life insurance are needed.

Of the 1 in 3 Americans who will have cancer, 48 percent will be alive five years after diagnosis and the majority of the rest will remain able to lead productive, useful lives for years even while undergoing treatment. Some will choose, as Mr. Tsongas did, to spend more time with their families. Some will prefer to redouble their efforts at work. Each of them deserves Mr. Tsongas's choice: to be able to look hard at what matters and to maintain or find meaningful employment without discrimination.

ASK BIAS LAW ON CANCER

(By Larry Sutton)

Rep. Mario Biaggi (D-Bronx) yesterday urged Congress to pass legislation protecting cancer victims from job discrimination.

Biaggi said that more than a million Americans with cancer are denied promotions, fired, or faced with "general attitudinal problems" by their bosses. He said that despite recent medical advances, "Just the notion of cancer makes many people think those who have it are untouchables."

The congressman said that cancer victims experience "a form of double jeopardy: fighting the cancer battle and then facing an insensitive society." He has introduced a bill, the Cancer Patients Employment Rights Act, which encourages employers to be more sensitive to the needs of employes with a history of cancer.

Attending a Manhattan press conference with the congressman yesterday were members of a group called Cancer Hopefuls United for Mutual Support. Sarah Splaver, the group's president, said the legislation would help cancer patients who are now afraid to challenge their bosses when they believe they are the victims of job discrimination.

Splaver said many employers discriminate against cancer patients because they refuse to believe that they can be cured and resume productive careers. "Why would you promote somebody if you think he's going to be dead in a week?" she asked.

Splaver also cited an example of a young man who worked for a large company and recently received an excellent employe evaluation. "Then the word leaked out that he had cancer, and a week later he got a pink slip," she said. She did not name the company or the employe.

[From the New York Times, July 3, 1984]

DOUBLE JEOPARDY

Cancer patients are placed in double jeopardy, according to Representative Mario Biaggi. "They fight for their lives, and fight for their economic lives," the New York Democrat said yesterday.

So he has introduced a bill prohibiting discrimination in employment against cancer patients. "More than 50 percent of cancer patients recover and are out there in the job area," Mr. Biaggi said. "But they studiously avoid telling people they're under treatment. Cancer has a myth—it's equated with death."

The employment problem was brought to his attention by Dr. Sarah Splaver, founder of Cancer Hopefuls United for Mutual Support. A psychologist who has had cancer, Dr. Splaver runs the organization from her home at 3310 Rochambeau Avenue in the Bronx.

Dr. Splaver said nearly one-quarter of the five million Americans who have histories of cancer have encountered job discrimination.

"We must get employers to know that we are surviving," she said. "They fire you because they think you're going to be dead soon. They're not going to hire you, and they're not going to promote you."

The bill's principal purpose is to amend Title 7 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which already "prohibits employment discrimination on the basis of race, religion, ethnic origin and age," Representative Biaggi said.

[From the New York Post, July 4, 1984]

JOB BIAS VS. CANCER VICTIMS UNDER FIRE

(By Charles Sussman)

Job discrimination against cancer victims came under attack by Rep. Mario Biaggi yesterday.

Joined here by leaders of a national organization called Cancer Hopefuls United for Mutual Support (CHUMS), Biaggi (D-N.Y.) urged Congress to pass legislation outlawing job discrimination against as many as a million Americans who have been cured of cancer.

About a quarter of an estimated 5 million Americans with a cancer history encounter some form of employment discrimination, Biaggi charged.

"This can and does include job and promotion denials and wage reductions as well as exclusion from benefits," he told a Manhattan press conference.

Biaggi has authored a bill, the Cancer Patients Employment Rights Act of 1984, aimed at discouraging job discrimination and encouraging employers to assist the employment cancer victims.

"We're delighted that the bill was introduced in Congress because cancer is emotionally and financially devastating, especially if you lose your job," Dr. Sarah Splaver, president of CHUMS, told The Post.

Anyone interested in donating either time or money to CHUMS was asked to contact its office at 3310 Rochambeau Av., The Bronx, NY 10467 or call 655-7566.●

TALENTED TEACHERS ACT WILL BRING AND KEEP TOP-NOTCH TEACHERS IN THE CLASSROOM

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, 25 years ago, President Dwight D. Eisenhower, expressing his concern about America's education system, said:

We must have teachers of competence. To obtain and hold them, we need standards. We need a national goal.

Our concern about American education, as expressed in the spate of recent reports, has not lessened in those 25 years. In fact, it has increased.

Two of the great tragedies in education is that so few of our top quality high school graduates seek careers in teaching and that so many of our best teachers leave the classroom—some for careers in school administration and others for careers outside the field of education.

The Talented Teachers Act, H.R. 4477, addresses both of those concerns. This bill shows that we recognize the importance of the teacher in the educational setting. Anyone with even modest familiarity and understanding of the recent reports knows that the classroom teacher is the key learning factor. Yes, books are important. Certainly good facilities stocked with all kinds of technical wizardry are helpful. But if there isn't a top-notch teacher working with students in the classroom, all of the other elements are just window-dressing.

Henry Adams once said, "a teacher affects eternity. He can never tell where his influence stops."

I am sure each of us can recall a teacher at some point in our lives who was instrumental in putting us on the path for the future.

There are all kinds of reasons why our best high school graduates seek careers in fields other than teaching—more money, better growth opportunities, better social acceptance, fewer noncareer demands on time and effort. The list goes on and on.

The real question is whether we, as a nation, can afford to lose this pool of potential students, the top graduating seniors in our high schools.

We are all aware that too many of today's high school seniors who express an interest in teaching as a career are those who score lower on standardized tests and have lower high school grades.

That's why H.R. 4477 is so important. The concept of offering financial assistance to the top quality high school students as an incentive to seek careers in teaching is a first step in the right direction. At the very least, it will get their attention and it could convince them that this Nation is making a commitment to quality education.

The second problem, closely connected to getting teachers, is keeping quality teachers in the classroom.

The National Fellowship Program created under the second part of H.R. 4477 offers us an opportunity to, at the very least, slow the movement of our best teachers out of the classroom and encourage them to use these awards to improve their teaching abilities, help other teachers in their schools and school systems and, perhaps, provide a new focus for the education community at large.

H.R. 4477 is another cornerstone in the 25-year effort to achieve the goal of excellence in American education. The Talented Teachers Act is a clear sign that we, the Congress, recognizes the problem and is prepared to make the commitment to solving it.

Getting and keeping quality teachers is one of the most important elements in this Nation's efforts to insure a quality education for all children. We cannot allow this opportunity to slip through our fingers.

There will be those who will say we can't afford this kind of program—that it will be too costly. To that I say, we can't afford not to have such a program because the future of this Nation is what we're betting.

There is an old African proverb that I believe applies:

Give a man a fish and you feed him for a day. Teach a man to fish and you feed him for a lifetime.

This legislation, the Talented Teachers Act, gives us a tremendous opportunity to take a giant step toward obtaining and keeping quality teachers in our classrooms.●

HORACE R. KORNEGAY

HON. TIM VALENTINE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Speaker, the Honorable Horace R. Kornegay, who served with great distinction in this House representing the Sixth District of North Carolina and who is chairman of the board of the Tobacco Institute, spoke today at Rocky Mount, NC, in my district. He spoke at a meeting of chamber of commerce officials, tobacco warehousemen, businessmen, bankers and merchants, tobacco growers, and interested citizens. The meeting was preparatory to the opening of the Rocky Mount Tobacco Market, on August 1, 1984, an event of great importance to the economic life of this area.

Horace Kornegay spoke of an important issue, a new unfairness doctrine, which seems to be developing in our land. I would like to share his remarks with my colleagues:

REMARKS OF HORACE R. KORNEGAY

These are the dog days of summer. Every four years at this time, a migratory mania strikes legions of otherwise normal Washingtonians.

This year so far, half the victims have just returned from San Francisco in an extremely exhausted condition.

And in a few weeks the other half will depart for Dallas where they will inflict the same punishment on themselves.

In the meantime, thanks to your chairman, a fortunate few of us have been invited to escape from the feverish shores of the Potomac to spend some time with you here in Rocky Mount.

I am so happy to have been asked to join with you in preparing for the grand opening of the Rocky Mount Tobacco Market on August 1st.

To all my good friends here assembled—and in particular to Charles Harvey—let me say that you should take great pride in your accomplishment. You have created in just four short years a memorable event. You have brought together Chamber of Commerce officials, tobacco warehousemen, businessmen, bankers and merchants, government officials, and growers.

You have assembled all of the people who are personally aware of and who personally share in the reality of you slogan: "Tobacco in Gold is Rocky Mount."

Last year, according to the Department of Agriculture, tobacco was gold in the Rocky Mount market to the tune of nearly $40 million.

But tobacco is more than money. It is also the symbol of shared values and shared traditions. Yes, tobacco is the thread that binds us together as a community . . . or as some would say a family.

The common bonds that knit us together in the tobacco family are often overlooked. But it is vitally important that we all focus our attention upon them. We must become aware of our roots and our heritage. Because greater public awareness of tobacco will provide greater public support for tobacco.

And the place to increase that awareness and support is right here in the heart of tobaccoland. Let us not forget, my friends, that vigilance, like charity, begins at home. Let us never take tobacco for granted. Let us never let the gold in the golden leaf become tarnished because of our neglect.

Looking back to the recent convention in San Francisco, I was impressed by two words that were emphasized again and again. One was "family".

The orators of the Democratic party were speaking of different things, but that word—family—surely applies to tobacco.

Geraldine Ferraro invoked an America rooted in the values of family, work, faith and community. But she could have been talking about values of a tobacco farm family in Rocky Mount or any one of a thousand other places in North Carolina or a dozen other states. Cultivation of the leaf was the cause that nurtured the families whose hard labor and honest faith has sustained tobacco communities for generation upon generation.

Mario Cuomo moved the audience at the convention with his story of how his family moved from Ellis Island, the immigration port of entry, to the Governor's Mansion in Albany. But his account was not unlike the tales that descendants of our tobacco farming ancestors could tell. The names and places were different, but the essential story was the same.

We Americans are a nation of immigrants—some came early, some came late. The early immigrants were called pioneers and settlers. But for most, achievement came from hard work, close family bonds, faith in themselves and faith in our great nation. These family values are not the property of any party . . . They are neither Republican nor Democrat . . . They are the virtures, the values, the strengths of the American people.

We members of the tobacco family are a proud people—with much to be proud about. As one writer put it most eloquently:

"There are as many kinds of tobacco farmers as there are tobacco! The mountain people of Kentucky grow it in backyard patches and the Carolina flatlanders cultivate dozen-acre spreads. Tobacco is grown by the Cajuns of Louisiana and the Crackers of Florida. It is grown by rich folk and poor, by black and white, by farmers who own land and farmers who are tenants, by those who have switched to mechanized farming and those who stick with the hand-labor methods of generations.

Despite the variety of tobacco farmers, they share certain things in common, including a belief in hard work, and a commitment to family, community, and rural life. Most important of all, they are convinced that tobacco is as crucial to their economic well-being as it was for the settlers of Jamestown in the early 1600's."

The other word that echoed from the San Francisco convention was "fairness." Walter Mondale focused on the unfairness that favors plutocrats.

"What we have today," he said, "is a government of the rich, by the rich and for the rich."

But, the unfairness issue also applies to tobacco and to tobacco smokers. We also seem to have a government of the nonsmokers, by the nonsmokers, for the nonsmokers.

Last May, as if to prove it, the federal government's top public health official announced an antismoking program that called for:

A nonsmoking society by the year 2000. That is, the end of tobacco in this country in just 16 years from now.

A ban on all tobacco advertising and promotion in the United States.

An unrelenting antismoking campaign by all U.S. physicians by which they "insist that their patients stop smoking."

A children's crusade aimed at getting parents to stop smoking.

A mobilization of youth groups like the Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, 4-H Clubs and the FFA in a vast antismoking movement.

American smokers are living under grossly unfair conditions. Indeed they live under conditions of restrictions, taxation, segregation and prohibition that would be unacceptable if imposed on any other class of citizens.

There seems to be a new unfairness doctrine abroad in this land. It permits some people to build the same kind of barriers against smokers that we have torn down when they divided people on the basis of race, color or creed.

Today's smokers are living in an America where they are less equal than nonsmokers. And that is unfair.

They are relegated to the back of planes, trains, and buses.

They are segregated in factories, offices and public places.

They pay higher insurance premiums.

They are often refused employment.

And, in an increasing number of jurisdictions—notably San Francisco—a single nonsmoker has the power to overrule the majority and ban smoking in an entire workplace.

And that is unfair.

The "unfairness" issue is created and maintained by a group called the Coalition on Smoking or Health . . . a trilateral lobbying alliance of the Cancer Society, Heart Association and Lung Association. They are aided and abetted by federal health officials and antismoking Congressmen.

This anti tobacco alliance will be found wherever freedom is being denied to smokers or whenever members of the tobacco family are being kicked around.

You will remember that the Coalition actively lobbied to eliminate the tobacco support program.

You will also remember that the Coalition remains an opponent even though the tobacco program is operating at no-net cost to the government.

So please also remember the Coalition's record of hostility when their volunteers ring your doorbells to solicit donations.

Led by this Coalition, our opponents have launched a hydra-headed attack on every segment of the industry . . . from trying to destroy the support program of the basic agricultural commodity to disrupting the advertising and marketing of the basic products . . . from trying to devastate the price structure by higher taxation to attempting to deny smokers the right to smoke in public.

Yes, tobacco is in trouble. Yes, the tide appears to be running against us. But let me invoke Mark Twain and remind you that the reports of our demise are greatly exaggerated.

As 1984 passes into history, I predict that it will not be a terminal year. I predict, it will rank as a year in which we won some and lost some.

But most of all 1984 may be recorded as the year we found a new unity against our old adversaries.

I believe that 1984 can be the year when the tobacco industry stopped its family squabbles and made two firm commitments: first, to unity; second, to ultimate victory.

Will Rogers said "I am not a member of any organized political party—I am a Democrat." Now, if the Democratic Party can abandon its discord and disorganization, and can come out of its convention in unity . . . is it too much to expect this great industry to do the same?

Certainly now is the time to follow Ben Franklin's advice and "hang together" so that we don't "hang separately."

The cigarette manufacturers who comprise the membership of The Tobacco Institute have been, are now, and will continue to be major stakeholders in this great industry. For decades, we have actively opposed attempts to eliminate, dismantle or destroy the tobacco program. And we will continue to do so.

At the same time there is an overwhelming need for all segments of the industry and its suppliers—from seed bed to sales counter—to circle the wagons. All allied tobacco interests must join together in actively resisting attempts to erode our rights as manufacturers to markets our tobacco products. All of the various interests in tobacco must form a united front to defend the rights of smokers to freely use the tobacco products we all work together to produce.

Smokers must be returned to the status of first class citizens of the United States.

Tobacco growers, auction warehousemen, associated agricultural groups must adjust their political thinking—from being commodity-oriented to becoming product-oriented.

There is no such thing as a support program for a commodity that can not be manufactured, marketed or consumed!

It has been said that things have to get worse before they can get better. I think that time has come for tobacco. By now everyone can see that the antismokers—however reasonable they sound—are actually out to destroy—tobacco—root, stock and branch . . . by the year 2000.

With your help . . . with your active help . . . the new prohibitionists will fail just as surely as the old.●

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK OBSERVED IN BUFFALO

HON. HENRY J. NOWAK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. NOWAK. Mr. Speaker, throughout last week, people all across the United States met to reaffirm their belief that the nations of Eastern Europe should some day be free to enjoy the same liberties we take for granted every day. Their belief was initially embodied in legislation which created Captive Nations Week 25 years ago.

I believe Captive Nations Week is just as important today as it has been in the past quarter century. There always seems to be something in the news related to Eastern Europe. We should not only consider this news for its face value, but we must also remember the individual people of each country. Today we hear about Bulgaria's alleged terrorist activities; we should also think about the citizens of that country who have to live under the control of such corruption. All the news about the Solidarity movement in Poland and the many attempts to repress it should immediately bring to mind the oppressed citizens of that country. The same goes for Andrei Sakharov and his wife, Yelena Bonner, who have been completely denied their basic human rights and personal freedoms.

Following is an article from the July 21, 1984, edition of the Buffalo News, reporting on the 25th annual dinner held in Buffalo to commemorate Captive Nations Week, a dinner at which my predecessor from the then 37th Congressional District of New York, Thaddeus J. Dulski, received well-deserved recognition for his longstanding support of the important annual observance.

[From the Buffalo News, July 21, 1984]

COMMITTEE'S HOPE IS FREEDOM FOR CAPTIVE EUROPEAN NATIONS

(By David Robinson)

They gathered to speak of hope for the day when Soviet-dominated lands in Eastern Europe would be free again and to let people in the United States know that those lands have not been forgotten.

"It's a moral issue. America has always stood for freedom," said Dasha Procyk, secretary of the Western New York Captive Nations Week Committee, as more than 100 Buffalo-area residents met at the Chopin Singing Society for the 25th annual dinner supporting freedom for Eastern Europe.

The dinner Friday night also honored former Buffalo Congressman Thaddeus J. Dulski, who was one of the co-sponsors of the legislation that created Captive Nations Week in 1959.

Calling the legislation "one of the greatest documents enacted into law," Mr. Dulski said Eastern Europeans can see in it "a spark of hope that someday, a light, a hope of the stars will come down upon them and say 'You are free.' "

It was a message that the audience, seated at tables arranged to represent each of the 10 captive lands, applauded roundly. The captive nations include the nations of Afghanistan, Albania, Bulgaria, Croatia, Estonia, Hungary and Poland and the Soviet republics of Latvia, Lithuania and the Ukraine.

While residents in those lands probably will never hear about the ceremonies, such as those in Buffalo Friday night that have taken place throughout the United States this week, Dr. Edward M. O'Connor, Chairman of the committee, said it was just as important to inform people in the United States.

But the main focus was on residents in those nations and the hope that they would be free someday.

"It tells the some 230 odd million peoples in Russian Empire that the West has not forgotten them," Dr. O'Connor said. "It tells them we are with you in your plight of the moment."

The group stated its opposition to the Soviet Union, unanimously endorsing a resolution urging the United States not to negotiate with the Soviets.

"We are the recipients of a free country because those countries (the captive nations) have stood up to be anti-Russian and have suffered the pain," said Mr. Dulski, who was presented with a plaque recognizing him as a co-sponsor of the legislation that created Captive Nations Week.

But mainly, they wanted to keep alive their dreams for freedom in those nations.

"It's very important not to let people lose faith behind the Iron Curtain," Ms. Procyk said.●

POLAND AND AMNESTY—A SIGNAL OF BETTER TIMES OR A GUISE FOR FURTHER REPRESSION?

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, this past weekend the Government of Poland announced, in conjunction with the 40th anniversary of the establishment of the Polish Communist state, its approval of amnesty for political prisoners. Under the terms of the amnesty, most of the country's political prisoners, including and especially those affiliated with the Solidarity labor movement, would be free and pending legal actions against hundreds of other dissidents would be dropped.

The chief Polish Government spokesman, Mr. Jerzy Urban, was quoted as saying, "The amnesty gives everyone who had committed a crime out of political motivation—and there are no exceptions here—a chance."

This dramatic action has evoked reaction in many quarters, including the United States. There is obviously some skepticism about the conditions of the amnesty, but for the most part the official U.S. position seems to indicate this to be a positive development.

The focus of attention at this time is what the U.S. Government might do relative to lifting the existing sanctions imposed against the Government of Poland in response to their declaration of martial law late in 1981. The issue arose at President Reagan's news conference on Tuesday night and he indicated that the terms of the new amnesty were being studied and if they "met the conditions we've laid down, yes, we will meet with regard to lifting the sanctions."

The President's caution, I believe, is well founded.

There are two sides to the amnesty question that must be looked at. The mere releasing of political prisoners is but one step. We must also carefully consider the conditions imposed on these individuals. In exchange for this amnesty, is the government going to crack down on all activities of these individuals once they are "freed"? Will the conditions be so harsh as to make the distinction between prison and freedom indistinguishable? That seemed to be the concern expressed by the great Polish freedom fighter and labor leader Lech Walesa. That is the concern which I feel holds the key to any action the U.S. Government might take.

The President also raised an issue relative to the sanctions, which should also factor into our deliberations. He pointed to a distinction between those sanctions whose impact is only felt by the government vs. those which affect the people as well. As the President said, "We don't want to impose hardships on the people." As we contemplate the lifting of sanctions, we should give priority to those which have been shown to impact on the Polish people before we move on those directed at the government.

The U.S. position for a total lifting of sanctions is very clear. The conditions were the freeing of all political prisoners, an end to martial law and the resumption of dialog with "society," which would include the Solidarity movement. Clearly, steps are being taken in all of these areas, but no one can say with accuracy that martial law has ended nor has the dialog commenced in any meaningful fashion. The passage of time will determine if the amnesty is a genuine one.

I support the approach being taken by the administration at this time and urge that no haste be exercised relative to the lifting of sanctions.

The Polish Government has expressed some displeasure over the fact that we have not fully embraced their amnesty proposal and totally lifted the sanctions. Most likely the reason we have not and should not is because of the previous record of the Polish Government. The people of Poland have lived under the oppressive yoke of martial law for almost 3 years. The Soviet puppet government has deprived individuals of all rights. Now they expect the world to believe that this era is behind them. We hope their motives are sound but we must be certain before we take such a major step as lifting the sanctions.

At this point in the RECORD I would like to insert the complete list of U.S. imposed sanctions on Poland as printed in the Washington Post of July 25:

Finally let me include an editorial from this morning's New York Post which I contend states the case very accurately:

[From the Washington Post]

U.S. SANCTIONS AGAINST POLAND

(By Gail McCrory)

The United States ordered the following economic sanctions against Poland after the imposition of martial law in December 1981 and the outlawing of Solidarity in October 1982:

Suspension of Export-Import Bank credit insurance on sales to Poland, a move aimed at curbing private exports to that country. In 1980, $25 million in such insurance had been granted.

Suspension of Polish civil aviation privileges in the United States.

Suspension of the Polish fleet's fishing rights in American waters. About one-third of Poland's total catch, or 230,000 tons, was made in American waters in 1980.

Further restriction of high-technology exports to Poland.

A ban on new U.S. government credits for food and other commodities.

Refusal to back Poland's admission to the International Monetary Fund.

Suspension after 22 years of most-favored-nation trading status for Poland, the first Soviet Bloc nation to be accorded it. The move effectively boosted tariffs on Polish manufactured goods, particularly textiles.

Curtailed shipment of nonhumanitarian agricultural commodities for distribution by the Polish government.

In November 1983, the United States agreed to negotiations on the government-backed portions of Poland's debt to the West—more than $10 billion of the total of more than $26 billion. Negotiations had been frozen at a meeting of NATO foreign ministers in January 1982. The first session took place in March of this year.

In January of this year, President Reagan agreed to allow a limited number of charter flights to the United States by Poland's national airline and eased some restrictions on Polish fishing privileges in American waters. His action followed an appeal by Solidarity founder Lech Walesa to spare Poland further economic damage.

AMNESTY IS ONLY THE BEGINNING

Poland's military government has seen fit to grant amnesty to 652 political prisoners. That is progress of sorts, but it by no means calls for removal of all of the economic sanctions imposed by the United States after the 1981 crackdown on Solidarity.

That Gen. Jaruzelski seeks the lifting of those sanctions is beyond doubt. They have cost Poland an estimated $13 billion in lost production at a time when its struggling economy can ill afford such losses.

There is even less doubt that Jarauzelski can expect any help from the Soviets—who surely disapprove of the amnesty but who also have serious economic problems of their own.

Thus the easing of pressure on Polish dissidents.

In return, the restoration of civil aviation rights and certain scientific and cultural programs can be reasonably expected.

Buy what of the Polish free trade union movement? What of the economic reprisals carried out against those deemed guilty of political offenses?

Until those questions are answered, any talk of restoration of U.S. food credits and—most especially—granting of most-favored-nation tariff status is premature in the extreme.

After all, it would be silly to lift all sanctions merely because Gen. Jaruzelski agreed to free several hundred men and women who had no business being in jail in the first place.●

NUCLEAR PARTS SOUGHT BY PAKISTANIS

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, last Saturday's Washington Post included an article which should raise serious concern in this body.

The article's headline read "Nuclear Parts Sought by Pakistanis." It revealed that Federal agents arrested several Pakistanis for trying to purchase and illegally export to Pakistan high-technology switches that could be used in triggering a nuclear weapon.

Our relationship with Pakistan in recent years has been based on two primary interests:

First, our strategic interest in maintaining the independence of Pakistan without Pakistani acquisition of nuclear weapons, and Second, Pakistan's interest in maintaining its own security in the face of an historically hostile India and the Soviet presence in Afghanistan.

The United States made a decision to pursue our half of these two interests by providing Pakistan with $3.2 billion in aid, including 40 of our sophisticated F-16 fighters. This aid was supplied in friendship and trust, on the condition that Pakistan not pursue a nuclear-weapons capability.

Unfortunately, Pakistan has apparently decided that their desire for nuclear weapons is greater than their desire for mutually beneficial friendship with the United States. I believe they are avidly pursuing a nuclear-weapons capability in direct abrogation of the well-known terms of our relationship. this is not the way a friend of the United States should act.

Our $3.2 billion in aid has not only apparently failed to convince the Pakistanis that we are a better guarantee of their security than a nuclear-weapons capability, but has supplied them with sophisticated delivery systems for their potential bomb. I ask my colleagues to join me in supporting legislation that would cut off all U.S. aid to countries like Pakistan that have not taken the simple step of renouncing the testing of nuclear weapons in the atmosphere.●

TELEVISION SUBTITLE EQUIPMENT FOR THE HEARING IMPAIRED

HON. DAVID E. BONIOR

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. BONIOR of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today legislation to provide a tax credit to ease the cost of purchasing television subtitle equipment for the use of the hearing impaired.

I am honored to be joined today in introducing this measure by a broadly based, bipartisan coalition including Mr. CONABLE, Mr. HARKIN, Ms. MIKULSKI, Mr. BATES, Mr. TRAXLER, Mr. MURPHY, Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. EDWARDS of California, Mr. KASICH, Mr. FORD, Mr. GUARINI, Mr. BROWN of California, Mr. MRAZEK, Mr. MARKEY, and Mr. GRAY.

Companion legislation is being introduced today in the Senate by the distinguished Senator from Vermont, Mr. LEAHY.

Television has become the eyes and ears of the world. It is one of the best ways we keep in touch and stay informed. But, for 16 to 18 million Americans who are deaf or hearing impaired, television has been a mute world. It has been a world with eyes, but no voice.

Imagine not being able to hear the local or national news. Imagine sitting down with your family to watch a movie. Everyone else is laughing or crying. Eager to be included, you ask what has happened, but your family, caught in the movie, motions you to wait.

In our society, television is more than a source of entertainment or news—it is the vital communication link between our people, the source of lifesaving information on natural disasters, the center of our civil defense alert system.

For the deaf and hearing impaired, the mute world of television has isolated them from current events and from shared experiences with neighbors and family. It has isolated them from the everyday culture that shapes our daily lives.

The world of television is slowly being opened to the deaf and hearing impaired through a system called closed captioning. Closed captions, invisible unless triggered by a special decoding device, enable viewers to read on the TV screen what they cannot hear. The special decoding device is commonly referred to as a line 21 decoder.

Today, closed captioning has emerged as the universal system adopted by all three networks and PBS. However, after nearly half a decade of use, there are still only about 80,000 decoders in use.

For too long, the cost of decoders—approximately $250 each—has deterred the expansion of that market. Families with hearing impaired members, struggling to meet special medical and education costs, as well as the expenses that face all Americans, have been unable to purchase decoders.

The hearing impaired start at a financial disadvantage. The median income of families headed by the hearing impaired is 84 percent of the general level. The figure is even worse for those families headed by a woman. Their income is just 74 percent of the general level.

Working with representatives from the National Association for the Deaf, the National Captioning Institute and Gallaudet College, we have developed a proposal that would go far toward expanding the decoder market, and at a minimal cost.

The proposal would amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide an income tax credit for expenses incurred by an individual taxpayer for purchase of television subtitle equipment. Only purchases of the equipment for use by a hearing-impaired individual will qualify for the credit.

The tax credit would apply to all captioning systems, including line 21 and the special CBS system, "Extravision." It would apply whether or not the decoders are purchased separately or are already integrated into a television set.

The tax credit under the bill is not refundable. The credit is for 50 percent of the cost of the subtitle equipment, up to a maximum of $250. The bill is estimated to cost less than $6 million per year.

Last year, some 17,000 decoders were purchased. This bill is projected to immediately increase sales to 25,000 per year. That is not only a jump of 41 percent, it represents an increase of 20 percent in the total number of decoders in use. By 1988, nearly 40,000 decoders a year will be purchased.

Since use of the line 21 system began in 1979, the hearing impaired across America have worked hard to ensure its full implementation. Just this year, following a landmark decision by CBS, all three networks and PBS have adopted line 21 closed captioning, creating a common and universal system.

That was a major breakthrough, yet no network, no matter how well intentioned, can maintain any programming absent a market. That is a hard fact to face, but it has a flip side as well. Given a strong market, no network will overlook the needs of the hearing impaired.

Now, as in the past, our Nation faces a basic choice. We can be one people, united by equal opportunity, sharing a common vision of hope, or we can let ourselves be divided into separate communities.

Wishing alone will not make us one people. We become one people because we pledge ourselves and our resources to the dream of equal opportunity; because we work to eliminate the barriers of access and communication that threaten to divide us.

I call the attention of my colleagues to the text of the bill, which follows:

H.R. 6029

To amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide an income tax credit for expenses incurred by an individual taxpayer for the purchase of television subtitle equipment to be used by a hearing-impaired individual

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. CREDIT FOR TELEVISION SUBTITLE EQUIPMENT.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subpart A of Part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to credits allowable) is amended by inserting before section 45 the following new section:

"SEC. 44I. TELEVISION SUBTITLE EQUIPMENT FOR USE BY HEARING-IMPAIRED INDIVIDUALS.

"(a) CREDIT ALLOWED.—In the case of an individual, there shall be allowed as a credit against the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year an amount equal to 50 percent of the television subtitle equipment expenses paid or incurred by the taxpayer during the taxable year.

"(b) MAXIMUM DOLLAR AMOUNT LIMITATION.—The amount of the credit allowed under subsection (a) for any taxable year shall not exceed $250 ($125 in the case of a married individual filing a separate return).

"(c) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this section—

"(1) TELEVISION SUBTITLE EQUIPMENT EXPENSES.—The term 'television subtitle equipment expenses' means any amount paid or incurred by the taxpayer for the purchase and installation of any television subtitle equipment for use by any hearing-impaired individual who is an individual described in any paragraph of section 152(a) with respect to the taxpayer.

"(2) TELEVISION SUBTITLE EQUIPMENT.—The term 'television subtitle equipment' means equipment—

"(A) which is used in connection with a television,

"(B) which permits subtitles (which, but for such equipment, would not appear on the television screen) to appear on the television screen, and

"(C) the original use of which commences with the hearing-impaired individual referred to in paragraph (1).

"(3) HEARING-IMPAIRED INDIVIDUAL.—The term 'hearing-impaired individual' means an individual whose audible, aural perception is not functional at 70 decibels or lower in the better ear without a hearing aid."

(b) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for subpart A of part IV of subchapter A of chapter 1 of such Code is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 44H the following new item:

"Sec. 44I. Television subtitle equipment for use by hearing-impaired individuals.".

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall apply to expenses paid or incurred after December 31, 1983, in taxable years beginning after such date.●

OUR CONTINUING VIGIL FOR OUR MISSING AMERICANS

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, on July 20, 1984, National POW-MIA Recognition Day, President Reagan addressed 800 family members of American prisoners of war and missing in action at the White House. In a moving ceremony, which included a flyover of military planes in the missing man formation, President Reagan's speech reaffirmed the Government's commitment to finding a full and final accounting of our MIA's and POW's, and signaled a continuing vigil for our 2,500 Americans who never returned from Southeast Asia.

During this past week, the Government of Vietnam returned the remains of eight individuals to U.S. Government representatives. Our central identification laboratory [CIL] in Honolulu is in the process of identifying these remains, an action which hopefully will put to rest some of the uncertainty that the families of our missing in action and prisoners of war have experienced over the past decade.

On POW-MIA Recognition Day, the National League of Families of American Prisoners and Missing in Southeast Asia also held their 15th annual meeting in Washington. The families, of our missing, gathered in large numbers this year to meet with Government officials to discuss recent initiatives between the Lao and the United States as we plan a joint excavation of a U.S. crashsite in Laos later this year. Government officials also indicated to the families that slow progress was being made between our Nation and the Vietnamese Government in obtaining a full accounting of our missing and in securing information on live Americans, and the repatriation of remains.

Mr. Speaker, I request that there be inserted at this point in the RECORD a copy of President Reagan's remarks which give a strong and clear signal to our Nation and to the world that our missing in action and prisoners of war will not be forgotten:

REMARKS OF THE PRESIDENT AT CEREMONY FOR NATIONAL POW/MIA RECOGNITION DAY

THE PRESIDENT. Ladies and gentleman, distinguished guests. Welcome. We are here today to recognize and honor a small, but very special group of Americans: our former prisoners of war and those who are still missing.

Four times in this century we have been forced painfully and reluctantly to send our men and women to fight in wars on foreign shores. Some of them made the supreme sacrifice of their lives. Some others made sacrifices in many ways equally grave—they were imprisoned by the enemy.

Their incarceration often included beatings and torture, starvation and all forms of emotional and psychological abuse. It also entailed the terrible loneliness of living through lost years, of seeing the days tick away without friends, without loved ones, without family and community.

What has sustained such men and women in their isolation is a question I think all of us have asked ourselves many times. What kept them going when faith waned, as it must have, and questions began to haunt and doubts began to accumulate. We hear the stories of the returned prisoners of World War II, and Korea, and Vietnam, and we marvel at how they kept going.

I recall that when many of our prisoners returned from Vietnam eleven years ago, a number of them said there were three things that helped them survive captivity and return with honor: faith in God, faith in their fellow prisoners, and faith in their country.

By faith, they didn't mean only love—though they demonstrated that in abundance. They meant a heartfelt belief that they would not be abandoned, that we at home would move mountains to return them safely to us after the war.

Our prisoners of war have been, and are, the bravest of the brave. They kept a trusting heart, they retained their spirit and their will, and they kept the faith. They trusted us, and that trust did us great honor.

Among us here today are some American prisoners of war. May I say that you are, as the great always are, more than the sum total of yourselves. You're a testament to the strength and the character of the American people. You are a symbol of our spirit. You're an expression of American trust. Your heroism is as old as war itself, as old as names like Andersonville, and Los Banos, and Camp 5, and the Hanoi Hilton.

Most of those places are gone now or empty, but the silent left in their place surely echoes with the quiet, unheard valor of those who suffered there and clung to the belief that their government and their loved ones would be semper fi—always faithful.

We honor you and that honor is unending. There are others to whom we must be semper fi: Those who are still missing—the men who went across the sea, who never returned and whose fate is unknown.

Along with us today are some of the relatives and friends of those still missing—from Korea and Vietnam. They, too, have shown more than their share of heroism, holding the standard for those who went away and are not yet returned to us, insisting that the world remember and respond, asking all of us to help them in their great effort, never giving up or abandoning hope.

Our administration inherited the challenge of accounting for the missing in January of 1981, two decades after the first man was placed on the missing list in Vietnam and almost three decades after the armistice in Korea. There'd been many obstacles and excuses in that time as to why progress could not be made. We found three years ago that the greatest obstacle that we could face and would continue to face was the passage of time.

Despite the daunting specter of 31 years since the end of the Korean War, we have pressed the government of North Korea for an accounting. We will continue to do so. But I want you to know that we've received some valuable information from some dedicated veterans of that war on possible grave locations of some of their fellow soldiers. And we've acting on this information. If it is confirmed, we will return their remains to their homes and to their loved ones.

We're in regular dialogue with the government of Laos. And through reciprocal actions, that government seems to have gained a greater understanding of the importance to us of the POW/MIA issue. We in return have gained a greater understanding of their feelings and problems. This process had led us to discussions of joint crash site searches. And in this regard, I want to pass on some good news to you. Late last night, we were informed by the government of Laos of official agreement in principle to excavation of a U.S. crash site. We're working out the details now. We welcome this cooperative gesture.

In Vietnam, the government turned over the remains of several more U.S. servicemen three days ago. The Vietnamese also offered to resume technical-level meetings in August, and we appreciate these actions. We look forward to an acceleration of the process, an acceleration that was pledged to our delegation that traveled to Hanoi in February.

Ann Griffiths helped to arrange those negotiations. And, Ann, we appreciate your help and all that you've given to this process.

It's important to note that 30 years ago today, July 20, 1954, the Geneva Accords were signed. It was hoped that the truce agreement would bring peace to the Vietnamese people. Instead, they have been at war ever since. And those wars have caused untold human suffering. Today, Vietnam continues to fight in Kampuchea and on its northern border. Nearly ten years after the end of hostilities, the United States and the government of Vietnam still have major differences.

But we're encouraged that Vietnam has agreed in principle that our two countries should cooperate on the POW-MIA issue as a separate humanitarian effort. Peaceful cooperation, negotiations, with its neighbors in Kampuchea and a resolution of the POW-MIA issue provide the key for ending Vietnam's isolation. Normal relations with the international community can bring an end to the long suffering of the people of Vietnam. And I believe it to be in Vietnam's own interest to choose this path. It's a decision that we would truly welcome.

I'm mindful that I stand here before the families of many of the missing. I'm mindful that you gave your sons and husbands and fathers into the care of our government when they left to fight for our nation. You knew they might die in battle. But you had, and will always have, every right to expect that your government will not abandon those who failed to return.

In this, you, too, showed trust, and I tell you again, your trust will not be in vain. For many years, you stood alone in your quest for answers. Well, today, you're not alone. And I tell you from my heart, you will never be alone again.

Across the nation this week, hundreds of ceremonies are taking place in an outpouring of concern and understanding and solidarity. Balloons are being released across the country, a prayer ministry is ongoing, and the small black and white flag you see over this house flies proudly. All of this is good and fitting.

In January of last year, I said to you that we must fulfill our obligations as a matter of highest national priority.

Much has happened since then to give us some hope of progress. It's agonizingly slow for you and for us. But we must not lose faith in each other because of lack of action from the other side.

Two months ago I received the remains of the unknown serviceman of Vietnam. And I said to all the nation, and most especially to all of you, that we write no last chapters, we close no books, we put away no final memories until your questions are answered.

Your husbands, fathers, and sons and brothers did their duty by this nation and this nation will do its duty by them. Today we stand together. And soon we will look up and see, as a symbol of our longing, a Missing Man Flyover.

And today I pledge—and we will not rest until that formation is complete. May God bless you always.●

PRIVATE COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES IN PENNSYLVANIA: BETTER TEACHERS GIVE STUDENTS A BETTER CHANCE

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal in the past 2 years about the weaknesses of the American education system and about the failures of our institutions of higher education to take action.

Various educational surveys, starting with the National Commission on Excellence in Education and rapidly followed by the Carnegie study on education and so many others, have indicated that American public schools, especially our high schools, were failing to challenge our youth, most particularly in science and mathematics, but in other subject areas as well.

The thrusts of these various reports has been to seek more rigorous graduation standards of our high school students and, by implication, a call for better prepared teachers at that level.

We have seen efforts in the Education and Labor Committee to respond to those calls by approving bills aimed at assisting local school districts in attracting and keeping top teachers and by offering assistance to high ranking high school seniors who would consider teaching as a profession.

Still there is much to be done. Our colleges and universities, both private and public must take a lead in this area. They will have to bear the weight of complaints about the teachers in our public school system. They will have to devise programs to insure that those who enter the teaching profession in the future are knowledgeable in their subject area as well as in the art of teaching.

We know there is a way to go. Reports trickling in from around the Nation indicate how far. In Florida, for example, where prospective teachers must pass a State examination in order to be eligible for certification, large numbers of graduating collegians have failed. Over the 2 years that the State test has been in place, nearly 40 percent of those seeking certification as teachers have been unable to achieve the minimum goal.

Texas is another State that has begun testing prospective teachers. The Texas Education Agency recently reported that only half of the 2,738 college students who took its basic skills competency test—which is required for admission to teacher education programs—passed the three-part examination.

And these are only students seeking to enter the teaching profession. What about the thousands of teachers already in America's classrooms? What can or should we do to ensure that their skills and knowledge are being upgraded?

Well, steps are being taken in some areas and, as a member of the Pennsylvania congressional delegation and its current chairman, I am proud that some of the private colleges in my home State are taking a giant step in providing some leadership.

Twelve private colleges and universities in Pennsylvania have embarked on a 4-year effort to improve high school instruction in literature, history, and foreign languages.

Starting next year, the colleges will set up four, 3-week residential institutes in each of three summers to bring together junior and senior high school teachers to study major issues in their fields.

By the end of the 4-year program, 480 teachers from Pennsylvania's 160 to 200 high schools will have participated in these summer institutes.

Funding for the project includes a $390,000 grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities for the first year and additional funds will be received through a $400 tuition fee to be paid by each teacher's school district.

The sponsoring colleges, organized as the "Commonwealth Partnership," are Allegheny, Bryn Mawr, Bucknell, Carnegie-Mellon, Chatham, Dickinson, Franklin and Marshall, Gettysburg, Haverford, Lafayette, Lehigh, and Swarthmore.

In the Education and Labor Committee we have reviewed bills that would provide assistance to private and public colleges and universities that worked closely with local school districts. It appears the Pennsylvania 12 have decided that improving the skills of public schoolteachers is far too important a task to be delayed until such time as Congress or various State legislatures take action on such a proposal.

I am proud to be a Pennsylvanian and to offer my personal commendation as well as that of the entire Pennsylvania delegation to the 12 private colleges and universities who have risen to meet an important challenge in our public education system.●

THE TRAGEDY OF CYPRUS CONTINUES

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to remind my colleagues that last Friday, July 20, marked a tragic, 10-year history of the invasion of the island of Cyprus by the Government of Turkey.

It was 10 years ago that many of us stood in this House and condemned the aggressive, illegal and unwarranted attack upon an island which has been characterized as a "flourishing center of Greek civilization." More importantly, it has been populated by both a Greek and Turkish Cypriot population that, until 1974, had succeeded in sharing their island without serious dispute. Yet, with military weapons supplied by American dollars, Turkey embarked on a military invasion and occupation that not only terrorized and divided the island—but which made the Greek Cypriots refugees in their own land.

The history of this occupation is not new to anyone who has followed the decade of defiance by the Government of Turkey in refusing to leave Cyprus. While we in Congress successfully managed to cut off military aid to Turkey after the 1974 coup, this cutoff has not been secured on a permanent basis. Today, we provide the Government of Turkey with a license to continue this occupation without providing any incentives for a settlement on the so-called Cyprus question.

Today, we have poured hundreds of millions of foreign aid into Turkey, claiming its strategic significance as the basis for our refusal to place conditions upon this aid that would resolve the Cyprus question. Today, 1,619 Greek Cypriots remain missing and unaccounted for by the Turkish Government. There are 200,000 refugees as a result of the Turkish invasion which, when compared to their percentage of the population, represent a significant portion of the total population. I believe that it is time that we take a bold and decisive stand against the continued subsidization of the Turkish occupation of Cyprus. Further, I believe that its strategic significance can continue to be recognized by the United States while at the same time recognizing the need to demand a resolution of this problem.

Our need to confront this issue has been elevated in importance over the past year when Turkish aggression boldly declared the independence of the "Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus." Despite condemnation of this move by our own Government as well as the Security Council of the United Nations which called upon member states not to recognize it, the sovereignty of Cyprus has been seriously compromised with but a whimper and a whisper by the international community.

Today, 37 percent of the island is occupied by the Turkish Army. This occupation represents 70 percent of the economic wealth of the island. The practical result of this control is that Greek population has been forced to leave their homes and to be resettled by force. They have been denied their civil, human, and political rights. They have been subjected to death, disease, physical and economic abuse. In short, they have become pawns in an international game of aggression—pawns which remain ignored and forgotten by a large portion of the rest of the world.

It is easy for us to stand here and claim the banner of human rights as the reason why we should seek an immediate and bold solution to the Cyprus question. However, these words will fall on deaf ears if we do not accelerate our efforts, both diplomatically and economically, to resolve this situation. The Turkish Government has proven—indeed—that "human rights" is a phrase which finds no meaning in their language. As such, recognizing their refusal to address the human rights dimension of this problem, it is our duty, to provide a way in which to retain our strategic interests in this area of the world without neglecting the needs of the citizens of Cyprus. The United States has the tools at our disposal to put an end to the tragedy of Cyprus. Our Government, which proudly proclaims our role as protector of the free world, can address this problem in a reasoned fashion which will not neglect Cyprus. As such, I call upon our State Department and the administration to use our good offices to force a new initiative that will end the occupation of Cyprus and will restore to this nation the peace and sovereignty it deserves.

I commend our colleagues in the Senate for working aggressively to address the Cyprus question in this year's foreign aid bill. I would hope that their efforts, combined with those of us in the House that have spent many years seeking to end this problem, would see concerns placed on the national agenda this year.

We cannot afford to forget what took place in Cyprus 10 years ago. At the time, I stated, as I do again today, that "the eyes of the world are apprehensively focused upon the Island of Cyprus" as well seek a solution to the problem. Today, 10 years later, the world cannot forget what remains as a brutal reminder of oppression and tyranny in the southern Mediterranean, that continues unabated. I remain dedicated to working to address this problem and seek a peaceful and just settlement of the Cyprus question before another decade comes to pass.●

MIA'S HONORED AT NORTH CAROLINA CEREMONY

HON. JAMES G. MARTIN

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. MARTIN of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, members of the North Carolina congressional delegation gathered at Seymour-Johnson Air Force Base in Goldsboro on Monday morning of this week to honor the more than 60 North Carolinians missing in action in Southeast Asia.

This was a very moving and inspirational ceremony. As the dean of the North Carolina delegation, our colleague JIM BROYHILL, of North Carolina's 10th Congressional District, spoke to the audience of several hundred people. I would like to submit his remarks for the RECORD.

Thank you. On behalf of the Members of the North Carolina congressional delegation in Washington—both those present and those absent, permit me to add my welcome to each person here this morning.

To my good friend, Ken McDonald, I say a word of appreciation and gratitude to you and your staff for all the work you did to make this morning's event a reality.

Two months ago, when I received the letter from the Speaker of the House, asking me to organize this ceremony for North Carolina, I recognized the need to appoint someone qualified and willing to do the hard work necessary to make such an event a success. I immediately thought of Ken McDonald. Ken works every day on behalf of the veterans of North Carolina and their families. You may say that is his job, but to Ken, it is more than a job, it is a challenge.

Ken and his staff work hard, as do those of you who work on the local and State levels, here on this base and on the others throughout our State, to assist those who have served and who are now serving our Nation. We thank each of you who played a role in organizing this program.

To those of you who went to personal sacrifice to be here today, and to those who drove long distances, let me thank you, too, for helping to make this day a time to remember and to reflect on the past.

As all of you know, Memorial Day, 1984, marked a most significant milestone in our Nation's history as the unknown soldier from the Vietnam War was laid to rest in Arlington National Cemetery.

There were those who had some misgivings about this ceremony. They felt—and understandably so—that such an event may mark an end to the Vietnam chapter in our American history. However, the President has reassured all concerned that this is not the case. The administration efforts to secure a full accounting of the nearly 2,500 still unaccounted for will continue to be given a high priority.

I know that President Reagan feels very deeply and very sincerely about the MIA issue, as do your elected Representatives and Senators in Washington. We share your frustration. We share your concerns. We want answers, just as you do. We can only hope that the administration efforts will yield some positive results in the near future.

Today's ceremony is the result of congressional action taken last year. West Virginia Senator ROBERT BYRD's amendment to the Department of Defense Authorization Act officially authorized a commemorative medal for the families of American personnel still missing or otherwise unaccounted for in Southeast Asia.

The official count of those missing stands at 2,489 American servicemen and civilians. The Department of Defense designated the Air Force as the executive agent for the military services to assist the various congressional delegations in organizing the ceremonies.

Locating the next of kin was not always an easy matter for the Air Force. We learned about some of you rather late and we regret that, but we are glad that you were able to join with us today. Others may not have been located, and if this is the case, we regret it very much.

While no medal, no ceremony, no words, and no action will compensate for the tremendous pain, the often constant worry and concern, and the feelings which you have experienced over the years during and since the Vietnam conflict, your Government takes pride in ceremonies such as this which are taking place across our great Nation.

The Memorial Day ceremony and the POW-MIA Day rememberances are two additional steps in sending a long-overdue message from the people of our great Nation to our Vietnam-era veterans. We say today—and we should say more often and with more pride—we appreciate the sacrifices which have been made to help keep our country strong and free.

Today, I am certain that we all have feelings about the Vietnam War and about what has happened in our country and elsewhere since the actual fighting ceased.

Some may feel a sense of pride—pride which results from the knowledge that sacrifices were made by those who fought and died, by those former prisoners of war who were fortunate to return to American soil by those still missing, and certainly the sacrifices which were made by the families of those still unaccounted for.

Others may feel a sense of humility—humility occasioned by recognition of the courage exhibited by those who were held captive against their will. You are going to have the opportunity to hear from one of these brave and loyal former POW's and a great American, Capt. Red McDaniel, in just a few minutes.

Pride, yes.

Humility, yes.

Others, probably all of us, feel a certain sense of pain and sorrow. Pain because we have been without loved ones for many years. Sorrow because we miss them. Many children have grown up to be young women and young men without really knowing their fathers. Some say it is weak to shed a tear. I say they are wrong. Shedding tears of sorrow and pain for those we love, those we miss, and those we care deeply about are not signs of weakness. They are signs of love, signs of gratitude, and signs of feeling and caring.

There are other feelings—feelings of frustration because the answers to our questions are slow in coming or they do not come at all. Our Government has pledged to continue to seek answers, to apply pressure whenever possible.

I am sure I speak for all the Members of the Congress from North Carolina when I say that we will do whatever possible to keep the pressure on the administration to continue its efforts to resolve this issue.

I have always felt a deep sense of gratitude for the patriotism of most Americans. Yes, we remember those who received so much publicity for unpatriotic acts.

However, in working on the details of this ceremony, my staff and I have been reminded again of the tremendous patriotism which you display today despite what you have been through in the recent past.

One lady called my office this week to say that she was coming to the ceremony today. She has six children—three boys and three girls. All three boys are in the military . . . one is an Army officer, another is a Marine Corps officer, and the third is an Air Force officer.

This is just one example of many I could cite, but it illustrates the faith which we have in our country. It's people like you who have made our Nation strong, and it is people just like you around the country who will keep us strong and free in the crucial years ahead.

Today then we think of the past, the present, and yes, the future.

We must ourselves be worthy of the sacrifices which our sons and daughters, our husbands and wives, and our parents have made and indeed continue to make for our Nation.

Let us then promise ourselves to never forget the sacrifices which so many have made for all of us. Let us then be forever grateful, forever appreciative, and forever remembering those whom we honor today.

I speak for the Members of the North Carolina congressional delegation when I say, "Thank you and God bless each and ever one of you."●

AMERICAN PRISONERS OF WAR IN SOUTHEAST ASIA

HON. JOHN R. McKERNAN, JR.

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, at the request of a constituent, Mr. John Minott of South Portland, ME, I am submitting to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter which his late son, George, a Vietnam veteran, wrote to the governments of Laos and Vietnam on American prisoners of war.

The material follows:

I just this minute finished reading an article on the subject of American citizens being held, against their will, as prisoners in Laos and Vietnam. The general thesis of this article, which, by the way, is a nationally distributed magazine, was that American servicemen, held as prisoners, do exist in one or both of your countries. I think this is appalling and inhuman if, indeed, these allegations directed toward you are valid.

You see, the war in Vietnam was a political situation that grew from a very complex system of arrangements dating back hundreds of years. The fact that the Western countries of the world were colonists, and in sense gross exploiters of the world, is a historical and situational fact that cannot be altered. However, the United States was never an active participant in this type historical colonialism. The reasons of America entering the war had to do with personalities and conditions in Europe, particularly France, brought about by the Soviet Union in attempts to agitate its perceived nemises—capitalist Europe and America.

So, now we see a conflict in Europe between the pro-communists and the pro-capitalists. This struggle was going on in a particularly intense way in France, where the general sentiment of the people was to pull out of Southeast Asia—Vietnam, in particular—because the cost of running the colony was much greater than the profit incoming as a result of Vietnam being a colony of France. All the while, the leaders of your two countries, as well as many, many government and military officials in the respective regimes, were getting French dollars pouring into their pockets as well as French education, culture . . . thus, we now see a reluctance, even remorse to see these French-brought goodies leave—on the part of Laotian and Vietnamese officials who didn't particularly give a damn about the peasantry or even where their countries were headed. And from the research I've done, Southeast Asia has always had problems with corruption, graft, et al. So now we see Laotians and Vietnamese contributing to the resulting war.

Then the U.S. did enter, maybe unwisely, but not with malice or ill will toward you or your people. You see, the Soviet Union used you as one would use dispensable property to a conflict. They—Soviet Union—initiated a conflict to expand in Europe and, to throw the Western powers off balance, also supported a civil revolution in Vietnam. Subsequently, the U.S., as would the Soviet Union, entered the scene knowing both were part of the same convoluted web being woven by the pro-communist forces of the globe.

So now we see the war as a matter of conflicting ideologies and communist versus capitalist—in which the victor enhances its world prestige and influence over the remaining parts of the globe. During this time, the communist forces were struggling to gain momentum in order to espouse their proletariat philosophy. The U.S., on the other hand, regarded, and somewhat correctly, this Soviet-inspired movement as anti-democratic and totalitarianistic. So, however unjustly, your countries were sold out by Russia and other communist forces.

This brings us to the U.S.'s involvement in Indochina. And, as a remark aside—I, personally, would have let you fall prey to these ideological lunatics, but that wasn't how the top American advisors felt. They were concerned for your freedom, yes, that's right, your life, your rights your freedom. And now, even though the war cost you dearly and even though you might be justly embittered toward the U.S. for their awkward but well-intentioned helping hand, I wish you could see it in your hearts to extend the gift of life to the families and friends of American servicemen being held prisoner by you by returning the men to the homeland they were born to. They are men and have the need to act as men just as you have the need to act as a man—that is, honorably and justly, by not letting your hate and ideologies fog or mist your perception of the hearts and minds of people.

I urge you—return these men to us so that we may explain to them why fifteen years of their lives have been spent in another country, for crimes they are not responsible for nor in any way accountable to. I do hope this letter finds its way to you and I also hope you do not misinterpret it as the letter of a capitalist-exploiter; I am not. I am only an American who is proud to be an American, but, above all, I am a man urging another man to help still another man. Thank you.●

A-TEAM PROGRAM

HON. LANE EVANS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. EVANS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with our colleages an article brought to my attention by Mr. Floyd Ham, president of the Toulon LaFayette Unit School Board in Toulon, IL. It concerns a bold and exemplary new program for motivating elementary students to achieve their academic potentials.

The originator of the "A-Team program" is Supt. Charles Zbrozek, who was honored last year in the Illinois State Board of Education's Those Who Excel Program. Mr. Zbrozek was recognized for his dedication, creativity, and excellence in education. His teaching methods are reaching far beyond the confines of his school district, as the A-Team Education Kit becomes a nationwide program in July.

The A-Team approach is unique in that it motivates all students to set appropriate individual goals, and then rewards them with a certificate signed by Superintendent Zbrozek saying they are official members of the A-Team for that week. At the end of the school year, those students who make the A-Team at least once receive an autographed photo of the four members of the popular NBC television show by the same name. Guidelines for making the team include improving one's grades, turning in homework on time, participating in class, and being more attentive. The key to the program's success is its ability to motivate students to strive for academic excellence by having them identify their efforts with their television heroes.

The program has become so successful that NBC is now promoting the program to schools across the country. It will provide posters and certificates for NBC affiliates to distribute to area schools. The program will end each school year with a grand prize motivational trip to Universal Studios and Disney Land for the star pupil and their parents.

Mr. Speaker, I commend to our colleagues this article, printed in the June 1, 1984, issue of the Peoria Journal Star, about Mr. Zbrozek and his unique educational program.

TOULON PUPILS WORK HARDER TO MAKE THE 'A-TEAM'

(By Marsha Hausser)

The 'A-Team' is on yet another adventure—this one to improve children's grades.

Imagine Mr. T saying, "I want you to get good grades" or "I pity the fool who doesn't do his homework." Imagine winning a trip to California to see filming of the 'A-Team' as a reward for doing well in school.

It's happened.

Heidi Roberts, a sixth-grader at Toulon Grade School is going to California this summer with her parents for 10 days to see the 'A-Team,' tour Universal Studio and visit Disneyland, all because for 19 weeks she was a member of the A-Team—Toulon's reward for good school work.

The success of the program, as well as others around the country, has prompted NBC to sponsor similar programs nationwide.

Since last fall, Toulon fourth-, fifth- and sixth-graders have earned their way onto the 'A-Team' every week by improving their grades, turning in their homework on time, answering more in class, or even being more attentive.

It was Charles Zbrozek's idea. He is the principal of Toulon Grade School and the district superintendent.

The 'A-Team' is now and was in the fall one of the highest-ranked TV shows in the nation, and most of our students watch the show, Zbrozek said. "I happened to get the idea by seeing a Mr. T poster that was on sale at the mall. It says, The 'A-Team' wants you. It seems to me that the 'A-Team' could stand for a lot of things."

So he bought two posters, huddled with his teachers, had some certificates made up, and the 'A-Team'—Toulon style—was born.

Every week Zbrozek, with the 'A-Team' music in the background, would read the names of pupils who were recommended by at least one teacher to be on the 'A-Team' for some improvement or achievement. The students would receive a certificate signed by Zbrozek saying they were official members of the A-Team at Toulon for that week.

At the end of the school year, every pupil who made the 'A-Team' at least once received an autographed photo of all four members. Every student made the 'A-Team' at least four times during the year, Zbrozek said. Students also got t-shirts that said, "I'm important: I'm on the A-Team."

NBC picked up the idea after Zbrozek sent letters to NBC management. NBC liked the idea so well it will begin promoting the 'A-Team' concept for schools across the country this summer and will provide posters and certificates to NBC affiliates to distribute to schools.

To the planners involved, the idea has struck gold because it links role models to an important cause.

Motivation, Zbrozek said, has been the school's major problem the last few years.

"We were looking for a motivational tool for our young people that would get them excited and involved in their education and use some of the role models and influential media sources that influence them outside of school," Zbrozek said.

Out of about 125 pupils in all three grades, about 40 were making the 'A-Team' every week. After a telecast on Channel 25 about the program, 70 per week was the average, Zbrozek said.

Even with stricter standards second semester, requiring two teachers to recommend a student, the average has stayed at 60.

The measurable results have been nothing less than amazing.

"We have gotten a lot more out of our students this year than in past years simply in the level of quantity and quality of the work turned in," Zbrozek said.

And at first glance at the students' Science Research Association (SRA) scores, "We think we have improved," he said.

"We've seen an awful lot of bad habits disappear, such as sloppy work, not studying, or not turning in homework."

Wednesday Heidi Roberts' name was the last pulled in a drawing to see who would win the trip to California. The 37 students whose names were read before her had been on the 'A-Team' at least 80 percent of the time and some made it every week.

The trip is being sponsored by WEEK-TV and NBC.

WEEK-TV General Manager Frank Bussone is optimistic that the concept will catch on. "I think next year you'll see the Toulon idea adopted at least close to nationwide."

Al Ovadia, director of corporate creative services for NBC in Burbank, Calif., is working for that goal.

Called the "A-Team Honor Roll" the program would be nearly identical to Zbrozek's idea, except recognition would be given on a monthly basis. If a student made the 'A-Team' four months in a row, he or she would receive a certificate and a membership card into the A-Team Honor Roll.

The A-Team's following includes seven million children who watch NBC's top-rated show, Ovadia said.

Ovadia said the four team members, who portray Vietnam veterans turned Robin Hoods of sorts, are enthused about the program.

"They're tremendously excited about it," Ovadia said.

The four will have a hand in preparing a letter to students that they will get with a poster of the team, and will chaperone students who win trips as part of the program in the future, Ovadia said.

Ideas similar to the one in Toulon have taken root in about 100 schools throughout the nation, Ovadia said.

The success seems to be similar. In one Florida school, a student who had been getting Cs and Ds started getting As and Bs once the A-Team program began, Ovadia said.

"If it works, and if that's what will motivate them, then I think it's important," Ovadia said.●

FACTS AND FIGURES FOR THE PRESIDENT

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, time and time again President Reagan has tried to assure the American public that his budget cuts have not hurt the poor. And time and time again Members of the House and Senate, various media reporters and respected research groups including the Congressional Research Service, have presented the President with the facts which dispute his claims.

The President believes that if he says something often enough that it will become true. I am here to tell the President that it just isn't so. No amount of false rhetoric will feed hungry children or put a roof over their heads. No amount of false rhetoric will keep elderly people from freezing to death in the winter. And no amount of false rhetoric will solve the multiple causes of poverty in this country.

Mr. Speaker, the voodoo math that President Reagan applies to budget areas that affect the poor is truly reprehensible. In order to push through his economic packages, in the past 3 years, the President has committed a social Pearl Harbor with the worst massacre of social service, educational, housing, nutrition, job-training, and consumer programs in our history. His budgets have wiped out the modest gains made in the prior 15 years by women, the elderly, minorities, and the young, and have driven millions into poverty. Programs for the needy have lost about $16 billion which translates into a loss of about 1 in 6 dollars.

I agree with Franklin Delano Roosevelt that, "The Presidency is a place of moral leadership." So I am deeply troubled by the notion that national issues like the level of poverty, are simply dismissed by this President. All of his promotional flack, however, cannot hide from us one central fact: This administration has lost its moral moorings.

Mr. Speaker it is time that this President stop whistling the trickle down boogie and get the facts. I have included an excellent editorial from today's Washington Post so that Mr. Reagan can begin to collect the facts on his budgets and their impact on the poor.

The article follows:

FACTS AND FIGURES FOR THE PRESIDENT

"Not one single fact or figure," said President Reagan at his press conference this week, substantiates charges that his budget cuts have hurt the poor. May we remind him of not one, but two . . . or three or four more anyway?

Here's one hot off the press. The morning after the president's press conference the Congressional Research Service released a study analyzing cuts in cash welfare included in the administration's 1981 program. The study found that these cuts alone pushed more than half a million people—most of them children—into poverty.

That's just one small part of the picture. Many other programs for low-income people were also cut. And many of the people losing benefits were already poor, so their losses don't show up in the simple poverty count. Others were made worse off, but not quite enough to qualify them for official poverty. If the president is really interested, he might want to look at several other studies that confirm and enlarge upon the CRS findings.

For example, a recent study from the General Accounting Office found that a large percentage of families whose welfare benefits were cut were poor either before or after their losses. The cuts also caused many families to lose all medical coverage as well, run out of food at least once during the study period or have their utilities shut off.

The Congressional Budget Office has done several relevant studies. One released this spring, for example, showed that, as a result of the president's policies, families with incomes below $10,000 lost $23 billion in after-tax income and benefits over three years, while families with incomes above $80,000 gained $35 billion.

It is true, as the president pointed out, that certain programs for the needy are now spending about $64 billion a year compared with about $41 billion in 1980. But the president forgot to adjust that spending for inflation—a mistake he never makes when he talks about military spending. Prices rose by more than 25 percent over the period. And the cost of medical care—which accounts for the rise, in Medicaid, the fastest growing of the programs—rose still faster.

The increase the president points to is also inflated by the fact that the low-income housing programs he included in his total are still spending money authorized in the Carter years. He also failed to note that others—such as welfare and food programs—would have been much lower if Congress had made additional cuts he asked for. And he neglected to count losses in those programs for the needy—job programs, day care and other services—that took the biggest cuts.

Nor did the president take account of the fact that the deep recession, cutbacks in unemployment insurance and the growing number of elderly people mean that more people are now in need of help. Adjusting for all these factors, the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities estimates that all programs for the needy are spending about $16 billion less this year than they were when the president took office. That's a loss of about one in six dollars.

What's that again about not a single fact or figure?●

DR. RUDI UNTERTHINER A GRATEFUL AND PROUD AMERICAN

HON. GUY VANDER JAGT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. VANDER JAGT. Mr. Speaker, one of the wonderful experiences as a Member of Congress, Mr. Speaker, are those occasions on which new acquaintances and friendships are made with truly remarkable and unique individuals. Such has been the case for me with Dr. Rudi A. Unterthiner, M.D., of Rancho Mirage, CA. A magazine article featuring Dr. Unterthiner, which appeared in Palms to Pines some years ago, written by John Pinkerman, is an excellent presentation of this outstanding man. I am delighted to include that feature story at the conclusion of these remarks.

At a time when pride and honor in our country is at a renewed height one can better appreciate the contributions of the Unterthiners of this country to that wonderful and needed spirit. Some years ago, Dr. Unterthiner, an immigrant from Italy as a young man in the 1950's, commented, "I just hope I can contribute in some small way in identifying with this great country and getting it and the young people of today back to the principles on which it was founded."

Although he had no family in the United States and received no financial help from his family in Europe, Rudi was determined to get a medical education in the United States. It took him 9 years to achieve that goal as he worked at a wide variety of jobs to finance his education while coping with ever changing immigration rules and regulations. After receiving his M.D. in 1967, Rudi went on to study plastic and reconstructive surgery. He completed his training in 1973 and has since been practicing his specialty in southern California and throughout the world.

Rudi's tireless efforts both at home and abroad are based on his constant support of the American philosophy that spurred him to come to this new country in the first place—individual liberty and unfettered opportunity. He has achieved both and has contributed so much more.

The article entitled "Rudi Unterthiner . . . A Human Being, Doctor, and a Plastic Surgeon" follows:

[From Palms to Pines]

RUDI UNTERTHINER, A HUMAN BEING, DOCTOR AND A PLASTIC SURGEON

(By John Pinkerman)

The observation is true but we meet some people who are more interesting than others—and Dr. Rudi Unterthiner is one of them.

Unterthiner is, perhaps, the most fascinating and genuine decent human being this reporter has encountered during 45 years of putting one word after another. He is a plastic surgeon living amid the wealth of Rancho Mirage and practicing in Palm Springs, his clinic in Rancho Mirage and Beverly Hills. All this should make him supersensitive, perhaps stuffy, certainly one unwilling to talk openly with a newsman.

However, success notwithstanding, he is an open and friendly man, a man with great humility and one who is proud to be an American, even grateful. And, despite the stories he might be able to tell about facelifts he has done for many Hollywood beauties—and some who weren't quite so beautiful—he would rather talk about his goats, his mule, his horses, his St. Bernard dog, his gracious half-Shoshone Indian wife, his two enthusiastic children and the trips he makes to Puerto Citas, Mexico, for volunteer surgery and general practitioner doctoring in behalf of the poor, the sick, and the maimed.

Unterthiner did not always have it so good. He did not always live in the comfortable but unpretentious house with two imported cars—plus his "farm", complete with date palms. But, since able to toddle (born in 1938) in the Italian Tirol village of Sterzing (once part of Austria), he has been a determined person. His determination? To be a doctor.

"I think the fact that I saw so many injured and wounded people from World War II must have had something to do with that goal," he said in an interview at his home. Actually, he could have made a living as a ski star or instructor and his athletic build and step indicate he still could. But, doctoring was his aim. "My grandfather also had something to do with this," he said, "even though he may not have known it. He was wounded in the war and he also was a wood carver as most people in our area were—when he wasn't working in the coal mines. Sometimes I liken plastic surgery to wood carving—shaping things for the better. And, don't forget plastic surgery comes from the ancient Greek word 'plasticos' or 'capable of being molded'."

In any event, the young Austrian who really was an Italian by nationality, came to the United States on a temporary visa seeking a college education—because he said, "North America has by far the best medical educational system in the world."

He first landed in Northfield, Minn., at Carleton College, and he made his way as he did for several years, as a ski instructor. He went back to the Tirol for more money-earning in the coal mines, but returned to America, working on the ski slopes of Aspen, Colo., attending the University of Colorado part-time. He also worked at the Denver airport, gas stations, and in several other jobs. And, he observed a development in Americana that has disturbed older generation Americans: "There were obvious great opportunities here and it made me sad to see the failure to appreciation for the country by many U.S. kids."

This observation, however, did not shake him from his own goal. On he went to Spokane, again as a ski instructor and student at Whitworth College. He found a way to get a pilot's license and earned $14 an hour moonlighting as a crop duster. This was pure gold—and it kept his doctoring hopes alive.

The problem was to get into an American medical school. Not being a U.S. citizen, this was tough, as was what then was a hefty $1,800-a-year tuition in private schools. "But, I was going to be a doctor or bust," he said, "and I remembered the encouragement I had gotten as a youngster from the Jewish doctor in our otherwise all-Catholic village back home."

Eventually, he was accepted at the University of Edmonton in Alberta, Canada, and during summers worked crop dusting and as a medical assistant in Lewiston, Idaho, and Colton, Wash. It was at this time that he met his wife, Linda—actually as he assisted in examining her when she applied for a job at a state hospital where he was a temporary employee. They were married six months later in Edmonton.

Following graduation he did intern work at the University of British Columbia medical center, then all his residency work in Southern California. At first, as he rotated in and out of the various specialized departments, he considered following neurosurgery but became depressed by some of the more horrible emergency accident cases involving brain damage. Finally, he had the opportunity to observe and assist in saving the hands and fingers of a small boy injured in a lawnmower accident. "I knew immediately I had found my speciality," he said, "which would be helping to restore full health for injured people."

He did his specialized plastic surgery study at the University of Cincinnati, then returned to California. "I just wasn't cut out for the Midwest," he said. "I love the biculturality of California, along with the mountains, the lakes, the ocean, the desert."

He started practice as a specialist in Lancaster, Calif., but soon the Hollywood show biz crowd was filling his office, and shortly afterward he found it necessary to move to Beverly Hills.

"Without knowing it," he said, "I suddenly found myself in the middle of the show business world. It has meant a lot to my success, but I am really far more at home with my goats here, or flying down to Puerto Citas where I spend Christmas, Easter and other weekends doing basic doctoring as well as surgery."

Today, Unterthiner has his main office in Palm Springs, going to Beverly Hills one day a week and as a consultant only. But, it is the approach to medicine and his attitude on America that make this man something different than the ordinary successful specialist. One bit of evidence of this is the fact that he still spends one weekend a month doing Air Force reserve military duty. "I think I owe it to this country," he said. "It has been so good to me." Also, it was partly through Air Force service (plus four personal "lobbying" hitchhiking trips to Washington) that he was able to become an American citizen.

This man also seems to understand the responsibilities of his profession as few others do. "First, I'm a human being." he said. "Second, I'm a doctor. Last, I'm a plastic surgeon. I'm a real doctor and I keep up on general medicine. It is my privilege to help others—that's why I go to Mexico—and I feel very humble about what I'm doing. That's why, too, the Hollywood tinsel doesn't mean that much to me; I enjoy being a plain old general practitioner, getting back to my goats and with a cold beer in my Mexican village."

"Through these experiences and my desire to help, I hope I can contribute in some small way in identifying with this great country and getting it and the young people of today back to the principles on which the country was founded."

Such is the nature of 39-year-old Rudi Unterthiner, a man among men, a down-to-earth man who sets a sterling example for his professional contemporaries—or any other American.●

CONTINUATION OF OUTER CONTINENTAL SHELF MORATORIA IS COUNTERPRODUCTIVE TO U.S. INTERESTS

HON. TOM CORCORAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. CORCORAN. Mr. Speaker, the Wall Street Journal, in a June 28 editorial clearly outlined the counterproductive nature of our continuation of moratoria on exploration for oil in certain offshore areas of the United States. These moratoria have been implemented by the Congress through funding limitations on appropriations bills relating to the Department of Interior. Specifically, these moratoria restrict the Interior Department's ability to offer exploration and development leases on the Outer Continental Shelf.

I oppose OCS moratoria, both on grounds of substance and on grounds of procedure. It simply makes no sense to lock up this vast potential energy resource. Furthermore, by implementing this policy through the appropriations process, we are depriving ourselves of adequate consideration of this important matter by the relevant House authorizing committees.

Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of our colleagues, I would like to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the text of the June 28 Journal editorial on this subject.

[From the Wall Street Journal, June 28, 1984]

DEEP-SIXING DEBATE

For the past three years, the Reagan administration has been crossing carefully through the mine field of environmental regulation, trying to protect the environment while encouraging further energy and industrial development. And the environmental zealots have been using all sorts of backdoor ploys in the courts, Congress and the media to block the administration's policy initiatives.

This week the Supreme Court stepped in and said enough is enough. In a decision involving the Clean Air Act, the justices ruled that the Environmental Protection Agency can use flexibility in adopting regulations to meet air-pollution standards. Specifically, the court supported the administration's "bubble" concept, which holds that total pollution from a number of sources, such as smokestacks, at a single factory or plant can be treated as if under a bubble. Businessmen say this allows them to meet the clean-air standards more efficiently and at much lower cost.

Fresh from this defeat, the environmentalists are turning to Congress today to try to tie up another administration effort—this time, offshore oil exploration. For the last three years, without benefit of hearings or full debate, Congress has established moratoriums restricting the Interior Department's ability to offer exploration and development leases on the outer continental shelf. The amount of territory covered has increased from 736,000 acres in fiscal 1982 to more than 50 million acres currently.

Now Reps. Sidney Yates and Leon Panetta, along with other congressmen from California, Florida and New England, are hoping to extend this moratorium on 50 million acres for another year by attaching an amendment to an Interior Department bill. It does make you wonder just how isolated Congress has become from the real world. The newspapers are running stories daily about U.S. utilities on the verge of shutting down nuclear-power projects and declaring bankruptcy, while Iraq bombs away at ships in the Persian Gulf. And our Congress wants to blithely lock up 50 million acres of potential oil fields.

The House Appropriations Committee is scheduled to take up the measure today and it's likely to sneak through unless someone demands that matters of such significant economic consequence as the development of our offshore resources deserve thorough hearings and debate.●

TAIWAN ACTS! AMERICA STALLS!

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, a steelworker from my 20th Congressional District in Pennsylvania recently sent me a newspaper clipping which illustrates why so many Americans are puzzled at the action—or inaction—of their Government.

The clipping, from the June 16 edition of the Daily News in McKeesport, PA, announced that Taiwan had adopted an antidumping law to prevent foreign countries from selling their products in Taiwan cheaper than domestically produced goods. The new law, intended to protect local industries threatened by imports, was to take effect immediately.

Mr. Albert Benik of 726 Reynolds Avenue, McKeesport, pointed out that our stores are filled with the products from many nations, including those from countries who cry "foul" when America talks about protecting its home markets.

While we hem and haw about enforcing our trade laws and defending our home markets, other nations act. While we fret over the possibility of retaliation from trading partners, other nations act. While we worry about the possibility of a trade war, other nations are waging one against us.

Mr. Speaker, legislation has been introduced in this Congress to save the American steel industry. It is cosponsored by more than 200 Members. I would like to see it come before the House in the near future. In the interim, I ask my colleagues to read Mr. Benik's letter and follow Taiwan's example.

TAIWAN ADOPTS ANTI-DUMP LAW

TAIPEI, TAIWAN.—Taiwan has adopted an anti-dumping law to prevent foreign countries from selling goods in Taiwan cheaper than in their own domestic markets, the government announced Friday.

Government officials said the law, approved by the Cabinet Thursday, would take effect immediately.

The new law, they said is intended to protect local industries that might be threatened by imports resulting from Taiwan's move to lower import taxes and relax domestic market restrictions.

Officials said Taiwan would impose dumping duties and countervailing taxes on goods sold here cheaper than in their country of origin.

Congressman JOSEPH GAYDOS,
McKeesport, PA.

DEAR MR. GAYDOS: Being a steelworker in tubular products, this explains my concern for the contents of the enclosed article. It pertains to all imported goods (from a country) who cries foul when we even mention such a nasty word as quotas. Our stores are filled with their products in shoes, tools, clothing, food etc. In fact we have imports from many other foreign countries. Steel is one of their biggest profits.

It took the Taiwan cabinet one day to pass on anti dump law. Our lawmakers have been trying for 15 to 20 years and solved nothing. There must be something wrong with our system.

Sincerely,

ALBERT BENIK.●

THE MONEY LAUNDERING PENALTIES ACT OF 1984

HON. WILLIAM J. HUGHES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, Today I am introducing the Money Laundering Penalties Act of 1984 which was ordered favorably reported this morning by the House Subcommittee on Crime.

Joining with me in introducing this measure is JOE MINISH, the chairman of the Banking Oversight Subcommittee who will be working on this measure in the Banking Committee, and Crime Subcommittee members HAL SAWYER, LARRY SMITH, BRUCE MORRISON, CHUCK SCHUMER, ED FEIGHAN, and CLAY SHAW.

The Crime Subcommittee, in the course of its oversight over the enormous problems of drug trafficking and organized crime, has heard time and again about the staggering sums of currency that are involved in money laundering offenses. In the Cutaia case, two men, when they were arrested for violating the Currency and Foreign Transactions Reporting Act by transporting currency of more than $5,000 without filing the necessary report had a total of $435,000 in cash in their luggage. This case is typical of the sums of money laundered in a single violation of this act.

This bill will dramatically improve the enforcement of the Currency and Foreign Transactions Reporting Act. One of the principal problems with the act is that the penalties are terribly low. The bill would raise the civil penalty for a willful violation of the act by a financial institution from $1,000 to $10,000. More importantly, the criminal penalty, now a misdemeanor with a maximum 1-year imprisonment and a $1,000 fine would be raised to a felony with a maximum of 5 years imprisonment and a $250,000 fine.

The bill also provides specific authority for customs officers to make warrantless searches for evidence of violations of the Currency and Foreign Transactions Reporting Act of conveyances or persons entering or departing from the United States.

The bill raises the threshold to more than $10,000, which triggers the duty to file a report when one is transporting currency out of the country. Currently, the amount is more than $5,000. Since the threshold was enacted 14 years ago, the effects of inflation have rendered this level an inconvenience to larger numbers of international travelers. The Treasury Department believes that this will also improve the enforcement of the act by eliminating the burden of processing a larger number of unnecessary reports that are filed.

The final section of the bill provides important authority for the Secretary of the Treasury to make rewards to persons who provide information about violations of the act which leads to the collection of a fine, a penalty, or the forfeiture of currency of more than $10,000. This provision would encourage law-abiding citizens, who may have important information about the activities of a money launderer, to come forward with their information. After all, they are exercising no small amount of courage in providing information on persons who may be drug traffickers or organized crime figures. I think a reward is appropriate and will help our law enforcement report.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill appear at this point in the RECORD.

H.R. 6031

A bill to improve the criminal enforcement of provisions of law relating to currency and foreign transactions

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Money Laundering Penalties Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. (a) Section 5321(a)(1) of title 31, United States Code, is amended by striking out "a civil penalty of not more than $1,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "a civil penalty of not more than $10,000".

(b) Subsection (a) of section 5322 of title 31, United States Code, is amended by striking out "$1,000, or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both" and inserting in lieu thereof "$250,000, or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both".

(c) Subsection (a)(1) of section 5316 of title 31, United States Code, is amended by striking out "more than $5,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "more than $10,000".

(d) Subsection (a) of section 5317 of title 31, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by inserting "(1)" after "(a)"; and

(2) by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(2) A customs officer may stop and search, without a search warrant, a vehicle, vessel, aircraft, or other conveyance, envelope or other container, or person entering or departing from the United States with respect to which or whom the officer has reasonable cause to believe there is a monetary instrument being transported in violation of section 5316 of this title.".

(e) Chapter 53 of title 31 of the United States Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 5323. Rewards for informants.

"(a) The Secretary of the Treasury may pay a reward to a person who provides information which leads to the collection of a criminal fine, civil penalty, or forfeiture, which exceeds $10,000, for a violation of this subchapter.

"(b) The Secretary shall determine the amount of a reward under this section. The Secretary may not award more than 25 percent of the net amount of the fine, penalty, or forfeiture collected or $150,000, whichever is less.

"(c) An officer or employee of the United States, a State, or a local government who provides information described in subsection (a) in the performance of official duties is not eligible for a reward under this section.".

(f) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 53 of title 31 is amended by adding at the end the following new item:

"5323. Rewards for informants.".●

FREEDOM ISN'T FREE

HON. MICHAEL BILIRAKIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, last Friday, this Nation honored those men who served their country with more than the usual measure of devotion and patriotism. Our prisoners of war and those missing in action represent the truest test of duty to this democracy, and on their day of recognition the citizens of America took a few moments to remember the sacrifices of these courageous soldiers—some of whom returned, and others who are still unaccounted for.

Mr. Speaker, in my district there is a particularly sensitive young woman, Lisa Worthington, and she saw a need to express her feelings toward our POW's and MIA's in a poem she composed for the occasion. Miss Worthington read this touching memorium in Dunedin, FL, before a gathering of disabled American veterans from the DAV Chapter 103 in Dunedin. I know those in attendance were moved by her eloquence and I wanted to share her poetry with my colleagues.

Mr. Speaker, herewith is the poem by Barbara Elizabeth (Lisa) Worthington, of Dunedin, FL:

FREEDOM ISN'T FREE

(By Barbara Elizabeth Worthington)

It was bought for you and me with young men's blood and mother's fears, young wives cryin salty tears.
Each of us should bow his head in loving memry of the dead who gave us liberty, sweet liberty.
We still live in the land of the free with liberty, sweet liberty.
No one here's going to ask our name where we're goin or why we came.
No one cares if we're white or black if we go to church, or a li-tle slack.
We can live anywhere that we want to in the land that boasts the red white and blue.
We stidl have the right to cast our vote to argue with the govt if it gets our goat.
Yes, freedom is precious as we each know but we must maintain it for it to grow.
Cause freedom isn't free, it was bought for you and me with young men's blood and father's tears and unborn babies through the years.
Each of us should bow his head in loving memry of the dead who gave us liberty, sweet liberty.
We still live in the land of the free with liberty, sweet liberty.
Most of us here are having fun but, know full well how it's been won.
Our precious freedom has been given by troops of men who entered heaven.
They left this land to fight our foe as into battle they did go.
We celebrate the gift they gave. Our country, under God, they saved.
Let's each of us bow our head in thought realizing the gift these young men bought with screams of pain as they would die our liberty's price came very high.
Yet, not a man or his mother would save his life for any other form of government but democracy which lets us live in the land of the free.
Each of us should bow his head in loving memory of the dead who gave us liberty, sweet liberty.
We live in the land of the free with liberty, sweet liberty.
But, freedom isn't free it was bought for you and me with young men's blood and mother's tears and unborn babies through the years.
It's been bought by men who died too young killed with prayers on their lips and carrying a gun.●

THE SUPREME COURT

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington report for Wednesday, July 25, 1984, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE SUPREME COURT

The Supreme Court of the United States has just ended more than nine months of deliberations, during which it issued almost 160 opinions in criminal law, the environment, civil rights, immigration policy, free speech, foreign travel, draft registration, copyright law, and church-state relations. While much of the new law made by the court has to do with the rights of criminal suspects and the power of the police, the scope of the court's work shows why this almost invisible branch of government can be extremely powerful.

Several things about the court's work caught my attention. The first was the success of the Reagan Administration, which took its entire political agenda to the court and got virtually everything it sought. This was especially true in the area of criminal law, where the court seemed to adopt outright a new philosophy championed by the President: the rights of society should take precedence over those of the accused when public safety and the needs of victims are at stake. The court moved in a conservative direction here.

Another distinguishing feature of the court's work this term was the continuing near-equal ideological division among the justices. Some 20% of the case this term (29 in all) were decided by one-vote margins. The significance of this fact is evident when the advancing age of the justices is considered: since five of the justices are 75 years of age or older, the next President will use appointments to leave his mark on the court.

Yet another feature of the court's work this year was more important in that it might represent a turning point in the court's history. The court is often thought to be a guardian of individual liberties, but whenever the rights of the person clashed with the prerogatives of government this term, government nearly always won. In fact, that government has authority over the individual was perhaps the clearest theme running through the court's decisions. The court generally did not seem to do this in the name of liberalism or conservatism, but acted instead at the request of elected government. Powerful private interests, as well as those of society's "have-nots," lost ground. The signal that the court sent is that if there is to be added protection for people's rights, it must come from the legislative and executive branches of government, not from an actively intervening, policy-making judiciary.

In the area of criminal law, law enforcement and corrections were the big winners. The court held that evidence seized by police relying in good faith on a defective search warrant could be used at trial. It said as well that any illegally obtained evidence could be used at trial if the police would have discovered it lawfully. In other major cases, the court ruled that police need not read a criminal suspect his rights before questioning if public safety is threatened, and that juvenile delinquents may be held without bail before trial. Also, it decreed that prison inmates have no right to privacy in their cells, and that states may impose the death penalty without assessing its relative severity.

The court handed down two major rulings on the environment, both favorable to industry. In the first, it said that the federal government does not have to take account of the environmental concerns of coastal states when it offers oil and natural gas leases on the outer continental shelf. In the second, it said that industry in regions where the air is dirty should be regulated under the looser standards applied to industry in regions where the air is clean.

In the area of civil rights, the court said that federal laws prohibiting sex discrimination in colleges receiving federal aid apply only to the departments getting the money. Also, it ruled that states may prevent organizations such as the Jaycees from denying full membership to women. Expressing skepticism that equality could be achieved by preferential treatment, the court held that job seniority outweighs affirmative action when layoffs are necessary. In other cases, it held that law firms cannot take sex or race into account when promoting attorneys to partnership, and that public school must provide facilities for handicapped pupils who are incontinent.

Following the lead of Congress, the court took action on unresolved immigration issues. It ruled that illegally obtained evidence may be used against aliens in deportation proceedings. Also, it decided that raids on businesses by immigration officials looking for illegal aliens do not violate the Constitution, and that illegal aliens have the full protection of federal labor laws.

In the area of free speech, the court determined that judges must allow the press to observe jury selection at trials. It broadened the exposure of magazines to libel suits, and it ruled that sleeping on a park bench is not a form of protest protected by the First Amendment. Finally, it allowed cities to ban all advertising from public property, struck down state limits on the fund-raising advertisements of charities, and invalidated a federal law barring editorials on public television and radio stations.

Other important decisions stand out in the record of the term just ended. The court upheld restrictions on travel to Cuba, and it approved the law that makes male college students ineligible for federal financial aid if they do not register for the draft. It ruled that neither the sale nor use of home video recorders violates the copyright law, and that a state may condemn land for the purpose of breaking up large estates. Finally, in a new openness toward government involvement in religion, it decided that a city may put up a Nativity scene on public property.

The court postponed action on many cases until its fall term begins. One raises the issue of whether drugs taken from students in unlawful searches by teachers can be admitted at trial. Another is an effort to limit federal authority over states and cities under the Tenth Amendment.

As I reviewed the court's work, my impression was that the court, no less than Congress, has tried to read the mood of the country.●

AN OPPORTUNITY WE'D BETTER NOT MESS UP

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, today's Journal of Commerce contained an excellent warning by Mr. Werner Fornos, president of the Population Institute pertaining to the upcoming International Conference on Population in Mexico City. It is printed below for the benefit of my colleagues.

Mr. Fornos' advice that the focus of the conference must be on population growth and the importance of establishing workable family planning programs in developing countries rather than on curbing abortions is good advice.

The administration has previously made its position clear that it would not permit Government funding to be used for abortions here or abroad. That said, the administration should now make every effort to support the focus of the Conference, how to make available to the 400 million couples throughout the world the family planning information they now seek.

AN OPPORTUNITY WE'D BETTER NOT MESS UP

(By Werner Fornos)

Not much newspaper ink was lavished on the International Conference on Population, to be held Aug. 6-13 in Mexico City, until anti-abortion ideologues staked out that forum as a battleground. Virtually overnight world population news, previously relegated to the obituary pages, catapulted to page one and prominent space in editorial columns throughout the land.

Election year political pressure on the White House had led to a U.S. policy statement for the Mexico City conference announcing a cutoff of U.S. funds to private organizations that use non-governmental funds to provide voluntary abortion services or referrals.

This reprehensible position will deny citizens of poorer countries services that are readily and legally available to our own citizens. Moreover, it will indirectly contribute to a vast increase in abortions that frequently result from a lack of modern family planning services, which would be further diminished by the withdrawal of U.S. population funds for these private agencies.

The Mexico City conference, expected to attract representatives from some 150 countries, really is not about abortion; it is about a global response to excessive world population growth. As such, it may well turn out to be the most important international meeting of this century.

It is no exaggeration to claim that the outcome of this conference could go a long way toward determining the size at which the world's population will ultimately peak.

That size is currently projected at anywhere from eight billion to more than 12 billion, a difference roughly equivalent to the entire population of the world today. Whether this planet's human numbers stabilize at the lower or upper end of the scale—or somewhere in between—might well be decided by actions taken, or by the opportunities missed, in Mexico City.

Ten years ago, when the United Nations sponsored the World Population Conference in Bucharest, Romania, there was no international consensus on what should be done about the world's rampant population growth; rather, it was left to each nation to decide what would work best in its own individual setting.

There has been a considerable change in national attitudes since Bucharest. Many countries of the developing world—where 92 percent of global population growth is occurring—that were then resistant, reluctant, or proceeding with utmost caution toward reducing fertility rates are now convinced that their future hinges, to a great extent, on their ability to substantially limit their population growth. Attesting to the change in attitudes is the fact that while the 1974 Bucharest conference was called by industrialized nations, the 1984 Mexico City conference has been requested by developing nations.

While the annual global rate of population increase has dropped from about 2 percent to 1.7 percent in the past 10 years, world population has soared in absolute numbers by some 700 million—an unprecedented 83 million since last year. Though sufficient time has not elapsed for actual population growth to recede, several developing countries credit population and family planning programs with contributing to positive corollary benefits, including lower maternal and infant mortality. Today, 80 percent of the people in the developing world live under governments that wish to reduce fertility rates.

There is growing acceptance of well-conceived and vigorously implemented voluntary population and family planning programs as vital elements of economic progress in developing countries. Such acceptance is conducive to an atmosphere in which international cooperation and coordination can now be formulated for a massive global effort to ensure that world population will be brought into balance with the world's resources.

That effort will require nothing less than a maximum commitment by the industrialized world to provide assistance in developing and delivering the technology, expertise and financial aid necessary for poorer nations to stabilize their populations. It will require a simultaneous commitment by poorer countries to exert the leadership and promote the sense of urgency that will bring family planning directly to the doorsteps of their people.

For instance, no one is going to solve India's population problem—a country growing by two million people a month—except India; but the will and determination of India must be augmented by resources that simply are not available in that country.

Success or failure in meaningfully reducing world population growth will be determined ultimately not by governments or organizations but by the decisions of millions of individual couples. The best and most recently available information is that some 400 million couples around the world want to limit their family size, but lack access or means to family planning service. The Mexico City conference can be the launching point for making the desire of these couples to control their own fertility a reality and pave the way for future generations to achieve a better quality of life.●

1984 CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE VIGIL FOR SOVIET JEWS

HON. GERALDINE A. FERRARO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Ms. FERRARO. Mr. Speaker, on July 4, America's Independence Day, a Soviet Jewish woman was told by the authorities that her request to emigrate to Israel to rejoin her sister was denied, yet again.

That woman is Ida Nudel. When I first arrived in Congress in 1979, adopting Ida Nudel as my Prisoner of Conscience, she was a prisoner in Siberia, jailed for asserting her human rights—rights affirmed by international accords—to practice her religion and be reunited with her family. Today, Ida Nudel is still a prisoner—forced by the Soviet regime to live in a small provincial town, far from her home in Moscow; denied the health care she needs; condemned to a menial job, and harassed each time she gathers with Jewish friends.

I highlight her story today as part of our 1984 Congressional Call to Conscience for Soviet Jewry. I want to thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COUGHLIN] for focusing the attention of this House on the worsening plight of Ida Nudel and nearly 3 million other Soviet Jews.

By participating in this annual vigil, we signal the Jews of the Soviet Union—and their Government—that we will not forget or abandon the cause of human rights anywhere in the world. Ida Nudel cannot hear us now. But we hear her. Ida Nudel and the spirit of freedom she represents will not be stifled.●

GUAM WILL MISS GENERAL CLARENCE R. AUTERY

HON. ANTONIO BORJA WON PAT

OF GUAM

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. WON PAT. Mr. Speaker, the people of Guam recently lost a good friend with the transfer of Maj. Gen. Clarence R. Autery from his post as Commander of the 3rd Air Divison, Andersen Air Force Base in Guam.

For the past 2 years, General Autery has done a most remarkable job of commanding this vital outpost of the Strategic Air Command. Under his skilled leadership, Andersen Air Force Base has achieved new heights of readiness and stands today as one of the most effective commands this Nation has anywhere. This Nation is most fortunate to have extremely competent managers such as General Autery serving in the U.S. Air Force. It is men such as he which really gives our country the edge over the other side and not merely our technical expertise.

General Autery also showed another side of his impressive personality while he was stationed on Guam. He took more than a casual interest in the affairs of his new home and in the process, gained a host of new friends on Guam. I can personally testify that the General is one of the best liked military commanders to have ever served at Andersen and this is an indication of the kind of personable and articulate leader he is.

When I had the pleasure of touring Andersen recently, I was amazed at the great understanding General Autery showed of local affairs and his sensitivity to these issues and the feelings of the civilian population. He cared and it showed in his outstanding relations with the island's civilians and in the process did a great public relations job for the Air Force. There were several incidents of concern to the local population which arose during his tour of duty on Guam. And in every instance, General Autery handled these situations with absolute skill and compassion. He is in every sense of the word a true professional.

He will certainly be missed on Guam by countless individuals who came to rely on his honest approach to life and his candid opinion. I speak for all of my constituents when I wish him the best of success in the future and our hope that one day he will return to Guam and be once again with his friends there.

At this point I ask that the general's biography be inserted in the RECORD for the review of my colleagues. Thank you.

MAJOR GENERAL CLARENCE R. AUTERY

Major General Clarence R. Autery is commander of the 3rd Air Division, Andersen Air Force Base, Guam.

General Autery was born Sept. 23, 1933, in Corrigan, Texas. He attended Baylor University where he received bachelor of arts and bachelor of laws degrees. General Autery completed the Army War College, Carlisle Barracks, Pa., in 1975.

He received his commission through the Air Force Reserve Officer Training Corps program at Baylor University. The general began primary pilot training at Malden Air Base, Mo., in December 1957 and completed basic training at Craig Air Force Base, Ala., in January 1959.

Following graduation General Autery was assigned to Seymour Johnson Air Force Base, N.C., as a B-52G co-pilot. In September 1961 he was assigned to the 42nd Tactical Reconnaissance Squadron, Toul-Rosieres Air Base, France, where he flew RB-66's. He remained there through January 1965, when he was sent on temporary duty for his first combat tour of duty at Takhli Royal Thai Air Force Base, Thailand. After RF-4C transition training, General Autery volunteered for and served a second combat tour of duty with the 11th Tactical Reconnaissance Squadron, Udorn Royal Thai Air Force Base, Thailand.

Returning to the United States in January 1967, General Autery was assigned to Headquarters U.S. Air Force, Washington, D.C., as an operations staff officer in the Directorate of Operations and later as an executive officer for the deputy chief of staff for plans and operations. In July 1971 he became commander of the 17th Tactical Reconnaissance Squadron at Zweibrucken Air Base, Germany, where he again flew RF-4C's. He subsequently served as 26th Tactical Reconnaissance Wing chief of maintenance. He moved to Ramstein Air Base Germany, in October 1973, to serve as executive officer for the commander in chief, United States Air Forces in Europe. He then attended the Army War College.

General Autery was assigned to the 456th Bombardment Wing at Beale Air Force Base, Calif., in July 1975 as assistant deputy commander and shortly thereafter became deputy commander for resource management. The wing was redesignated the 17th Bombardment Wing in September 1975 and he was appointed vice commander in March 1976. While he was serving in that position, the wing designation changed to the 100th Air Refueling Wing in September 1976.

In July 1977 he transferred to Ellsworth Air Force Base, S.D., as vice commander of the 28th Bombardment Wing and took command of the wing in April 1978. General Autery was assigned to Headquarters Strategic Air Command, Offutt Air Force Base, Neb., as director, command control, in the Office of the Deputy Chief of Staff, Operations, in March 1979. In February 1981 he was appointed SAC's assistant deputy chief of staff for operations. He assumed his present command in August 1982.

The general is a command pilot. His military decorations and awards include the Legion of Merit, Distinguished Flying Cross with two oak leaf clusters, Meritorious Service Medal, Air Medal with seven oak leaf clusters and Air Force Commendation Medal.

He was promoted to major general May 1, 1983, with date of rank July 1, 1979.

General Autery is married to the former Charlotte Lockery of Liberty, Texas. They have two children: Lyn and Reuben, Jr.

Established Civilian Advisory Council:

Sought advice of local community leaders.

Fostered cooperation and understanding with local community.

Provided assistance to local schools:

Made athletic facilities and equipment available.

Sponsored College Preparatory Curriculum Enhancement Program to provide honors courses for talented students in local school system.

Encouraged volunteer support for schools and school activities.

Interfaced with DOE officials and accreditation team members to continually support and improve facilities and quality of education.

Supported community activities and events:

Planned support, troops, equipment and material in support of gubernatorial inauguration, Jan 83.

Assisted in planning, providing troops and equipment, participated in direction of Fiestan Guam events (July 4, Liberation Day).

Participated in state funerals as the senior U.S. military officer on the island.

Hosted meriendas for Miss Guam Universe, Fiestan Guam and Miss Guam Hemisphere candidates.

Guest speaker for local Chapters of Rotary, Kiwanis and Chamber of Commerce.

Supporter of local Civil Air Patrol Chapter.

Active supporter of events dealing with Guam Discovery Day, recognition memorials for Guamanians who were MIA/KIA in past conflicts.

Active supporter of Happy Labor Day.

Contributed to and supported Guam special Olympics.

Contributed to and supported St. John's Table Fashion Tea.

Hosted Island Leadership Day providing local teenagers to be leaders for a day.

Insured active support of Sister Village Program:

Supported village and squadron activities.

Encouraged understanding and cooperation.

Visited every village and commissioner and as many of the residents as possible.

Provided support during 1983 Summer drought:

Assisted in planning response to crisis.

Provided equipment and water for drought stricken areas.

Hosted Nippon TV Show about Andersen AFB which provided significant publicity in Japan about Guam thus aiding the tourism industry.

Consistently included GovGuam officials when hosting dignitaries stopping at Andersen AFB, such as Speaker Tip O'Neill, Premier of the People's Republic of China, and others.

Sponsored Annual Open House at Andersen AFB, opening base and displaying Air Force aircraft and activities to the local community.

Assisted GovGuam in response to a hostage situation and shooting incident at Micronesian Hotel by providing armored vehicle for DPS use.

Provided transportation and logistics for the Bishop of Agana to visit parishioners on Wake Island.

Supported the first international swim meet held on Guam with facilities and workers from Andersen AFB.

Provided volunteer workers and equipment to construct athletic facilities for the village of Yona.

Involved with Guam's economic development by interfacing with Guam contractor's Association and Asian Pacific Parliamentary Union.

Highly supportive of the ARC LIGHT Chapter of the Air Force Association and its objectives. The organization has consistently provided close ties between the Air Force and local communities.●

H.R. 6021

HON. BILL ARCHER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, on July 25, I introduced H.R. 6021 to repeal what many now consider to be a grievous mistake made by provisions of the Tax Reform Act of 1984—the virtual elimination of seller financing in thousands of transactions involving the sale of property.

While those changes were supposedly aimed at curbing some perceived abuses in this area, the new rules go far beyond that and unfairly penalize the totally innocent who comprise the overwhelming majority of those involved in seller financing.

The new law requires sellers to charge an interest rate which is at least 110 percent of the applicable Federal borrowing rate. If that 110-percent test is not met, the seller is deemed by the Internal Revenue Service to have received an imputed interest rate of 120 percent. In other words, if a seller charges less than 110 percent of the applicable rate, he is taxed as if he received 120 percent. That has the effect of placing the test rate at or above the market rate—which means that seller financing is essentially dead at the very time when it is again becoming the key element in many transactions taking place.

The only exemptions from the new rules are principal residences which sell for less than $250,000 and farms selling for less than $1 million.

Nothing was done to preserve seller financing of other property or small businesses, which is an area in which such financing is often a critical factor. Even in the two areas where limited exemptions were provided, the thresholds preclude seller financing in totally legitimate transactions. The more expensive the property, the more likely it is that seller financing will be a necessary part of the transaction.

The intent of H.R. 6021 is to repeal those changes made by the Tax Reform Act of 1984 so that thousands of completely innocent sellers and buyers will not be penalized by rules intended to curb limited perceived abuses.

Prior law already authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to set a test rate—currently 9 percent—for existing imputed interest rules. If additional rules are necessary, then let us in Congress develop specific, direct rules to address defined areas of abuse.

There is still time to correct this serious flaw in the new law before the rules go into effect on January 1, 1985. Similar repeal legislation is being pursued in a bipartisan manner in the Senate.

Representatives LES AUCOIN, BARBARA BOXER, DANIEL B. CRANE, PHILIP M. CRANE, and FRANK WOLF have joined me as original cosponsors of H.R. 6021. I urge others in the House to join as cosponsors so that we can restore seller financing to the marketplace before it is too late.

In the recent tax bill, Congress responded to the pleas from the American people to do something about interest rates by increasing those rates in a significant area of real estate financing. That is not what the people wanted or needed—nor is it what I think a majority of the House intended to do. H.R. 6021 is our opportunity to correct the mistake before its adverse effects are felt.●

CONGRATULATIONS TO WALT DAVIS

HON. RICHARD C. SHELBY

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. SHELBY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Walt Davis of Alabaster, AL, the newly elected president of Civitan International for the 1985-86 year.

The elections were held June 30 at the MGM Grand Hotel in Las Vegas during the club's annual international convention. The convention, no doubt, hosted scores of other potential international presidents, representing 2,000 clubs from around the world. Yet, the majority recognized an outstanding leader in Walt, and tapped him to guide the organization to continued success this next year.

A Civitan for 19 years, Walt was a member of the Birmingham and Center Point Civitan clubs prior to moving to Alabaster 11 years ago. He has held each office in the Alabaster Civitan Club, including president.

Other previous service to the Civitan organization have him in such positions as district governor of approximately 55 central Alabama clubs. He has also served as chairperson of the international growth committee.

His natural leadership ability was recognized 2 years ago when he was made an honorary Canadian citizen at the Civitan International convention in Montreal.

Walt is the accounting manager for the Alabaster district of Alabama Power Co. He is a member of the First United Methodist Church of Alabaster.

His lovely wife Barbara teaches at Montevallo Elementary School and they have a daughter Lea, who will be senior at Thompson High School.

Walt has given so much of himself to others over his past years in service to the Civitans. I believe this tribute is certainly deserving to this outstanding individual.

It is with the greatest of honor that I extend my best of congratulations to Walt Davis as he assumes this new role. He has brought great honor and pride to his family, his company, the Alabaster community, and the State of Alabama. I wish him the very best of luck in all of his future endeavors.●

ANIMAL STRESS STUDIES FURTHER ILLUSTRATE NEED FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 3170

HON. JAMES J. HOWARD

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, over a year ago, I introduced legislation, H.R. 3170, which would establish a special commission to investigate all aspects of intensive farm animal production. It was my feeling, and still is, that we should really investigate the direction in which livestock production is headed and determine if it is absolutely safe and beneficial to consumers and farmers.

Major farm organizations opposed my legislation primarily because they said that studies at the Agricultural Research Service [ARS] of the Department of Agriculture and the Federal Drug Administration [FDA] were underway and such legislation would duplicate these efforts. Although the FDA studies are ongoing, the ARS study concerning stress of farm animals has been released and the findings have not put this issue to rest, but have raised additional questions that will need to be addressed.

The ARS study consisted of 10, 1- and 2-year research projects relating to farm animal care in intensive production systems. Eight of the funded projects were at State university agricultural experiment stations, while two were at ARS research locations. Projects were divided among poultry (4), swine (4), and veal calf (2) productions systems. The cost of these studies was $380,000.

The June 4 findings as released by the Department of Agriculture were not very significant. However, the preliminary draft report of the Texas A&M University study on veal calves did contain very dramatic conclusions and it is only because the April issue of the Vealer magazine—the trade publication of the American Veal Association—printed a preliminary draft of these findings were we able to read what the Texas A&M research concluded.

These findings were very negative toward present veal production techniques. Most notably, the Texas A&M study found that veal calves raised under intensive conditions required five times the amount of medication as those raised in nonintensive conditions. In addition, the results indicated that long-term close confinement can have adverse effects on the overall productivity of calves by inducing stress. It is easy to understand why those connected with the American Veal Association were very concerned about the preliminary draft and commenced a fundraising campaign so that they could prepare its defense.

However, those significant findings were not contained in the report released by the Department of Agriculture on June 4. Mr. Speaker, I believe this is another example why we need this matter to be looked at by an independent panel. Certainly, the Texas A&M results would be of great interest not only to the veal farmer, but to the consumer as well. The ARS study has not answered the serious questions that surround this matter, but instead has raised more questions which further suggest that H.R. 3170 should be approved.

I would like to print the preliminary draft of the Texas A&M study as printed in the April edition of the Vealer magazine so that my colleagues can also read these findings.

SUMMARY OF ARS-FUNDED DAIRY VEAL MANAGEMENT STUDIES

There is a current need to examine the behavior, physiology and production of veal calves raised in individual stalls vs group pens. Thus, two of the 2-year cooperative animal care research studies funded by ARS focused on the well-being of veal calves raised in intensive housing. Systematic evaluations were made of integrated physiological and behavioral data to determine if stress exists and, if so, to quantitate it.

Dr. Ted Friend and associates at Texas A&M University conducted a series of trials using Holstein bull calves raised in each of three treatments: (1) narrow stalls, (2) individual pens, or (3) individual calf hutches with yards. Two groups (10 animals per treatment) were observed during consecutive fall seasons. A fourth treatment, group raised calves in a yard, was also observed during the second season. At six weeks of age, physiological and behavioral data were obtained. Four days after the start of the observations, each hutch-reared calf was switched with a stall-reared calf and the observation continued.

The physiological data obtained at 6 weeks indicate that a state of chronic stress was induced in stall and pen calves. The adrenal glands in the stalled and penned calves significantly increased in function, as determined by the adrenal's response to ACTH compared with the hutch-and-yard-reared calves. Plasma similarly increased. The immune system (neutrophils and lymphocytes) of the calves was likewise altered, probably reflecting the influence of increased release of glucocorticoids. Five serum chemistry items (total serum protein, Ca, glucose, blood urea nitrogen, and creatine kinase) were also significantly affected by treatments.

Switching the hutch calves with the stall calves caused a reversal of adrenal function and T3 concentration within 9 days. This supports the hypothesis that the observed changes in physiology were a direct result of housing methods. There was no difference in gain, as expected, since all calves were fed the same amount of milk replacer. The stall and pen calves required approximately five times the amount of medication as the hutch and yard calves.

The stall and pen calves showed a significant increase in rate and amount of movement (running, jumping, etc.) when removed from the stalls and pens for open field tests. Stall calves stumbled and fell more frequently than calves from other treatments. The greater incidence of highly active behavior in stall and pen calves, despite a higher incidence of lameness, attests to the strength of motiviation induced by intensified drives.

Stall and pen calves also engaged in more social play (head butting, running together, etc.) than calves from the less confining treatments. Hutch and yard calves commenced grazing sooner, suggesting the frustration of one drive may influence the display of other behaviors.

Results from these studies indicate calves require some degree of exercise to prevent lameness and chronic stress. Relationships were indicated between increasing degree of constraint, increasing stress and decreased disease resistance. The results indicate that long-term chronic close confinement can have adverse effects on the overall productivity of calves by inducing physiological changes associated with stress. The results also indicate that calves have a drive for social interaction and exploration as well as for locomotion.●

NICARAGUA'S OUSTER OF CHURCHMEN

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, I consider myself a man of balance, a moderate. I, therefore, believe that it is important to look at all sides of an issue. A few weeks ago, the Nicaraguan regime threw out 10 priests who participated in a march in support of another priest. The Sandinistas cannot expect their claim of adherence to the charters of guaranteed freedom of the Organization of American States to be taken seriously in the future if violations of these basic freedoms continue.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to include two editorials from my home State on this subject. One is from the Omaha World Herald and the other is from the smaller Norfolk Daily News. Notwithstanding the perspective of a newspaper from Nebraska's biggest city as compared to the newspaper of a smaller city, they both came to the same conclusion: That throwing out priests for participating in a march is not a great step toward further democratization. Indeed, it is quite the opposite.

[From the Omaha World Herald, July 16, 1984]

SANDINISTA CLAIMS FALL SHORT

If more evidence were needed to show that the Sandinista government in power in Nicaragua is moving toward totalitarianism instead of democracy, the Sandinistas' expulsion of 10 Catholic priests provided it.

The priests were expelled after a protest march in support of another priest who had been accused of helping U.S.-backed rebels.

Archbishop Miguel Obando y Bravo of Managua said it appeared that the 10 were chosen for deportation mainly because they worked with peasants and laborers.

The Sandinistas appear to be applying pressure on the Catholic Church because the church is one of the few remaining forces in Nicaragua willing to stand up to the government.

It is difficult to understand why some church groups in the United States continue to defend the Sandinistas.

In many countries where governments hold their power by the consent of the people instead of by intimidation, marches like that are so common that many of them don't even make news.

But in Nicaragua, the government apparently felt so threatened by the marchers and what they represented that it felt required to throw some of the demonstrators out of the country.

That doesn't do much to support the Sandinistas' claims of wanting to build a free, democratic society in Nicaragua.

[From the Norfolk Daily News, July 16, 1984]

REACTIONS AWAITED

The reaction of all the activist clergy men and women to the ouster of 10 Roman Catholic priests from Nicaragua will be awaited with interest. Pope John Paul II has already protested, but it would be better to hear from those in this country who have eulogized the Sandinista government.

The expulsion came after a protest march by 27 priests, in support of the Rev. Luis Amado Pena, accused by the government of supplying explosives to U.S.-backed rebels. Obviously, no protests, no matter how orderly, can be tolerated.

The expulsion was defended by Sergio Ramirez, a member of the ruling junta in Nicaragua. "The foreign priests were involved in internal politics in Nicaragua, something that is punished with expulsion in countries everywhere."

Not where free expression is tolerated, Sergio, and both religion and political freedom respected.

The pope had a special plea, "I ask the Lord to illuminate the minds of those responsible so that they may reverse this decision, openly harmful to the church and the needs of the Catholic population of Nicaragua." To that prayer could have been added, ". . . and harmful to the cause of freedom in Central America," quite apart from any sectarian considerations.●

MARYLAND PRIDE IN TOBACCO FESTIVAL

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues the Maryland Pride in Tobacco Festival being held in Leonardtown, MD, on July 28 and 29.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, tobacco is an important crop to the State of Maryland and in particular, the first district. A 1980 University of Pennsylvania study linked 2.7 percent of all private sector jobs in Maryland, one in 37, directly or indirectly to tobacco. As you know, Maryland's colonial history begins with tobacco. Maryland was the only colony founded expressly to grow the leafy plant. Tobacco is grown in five southern Maryland counties, three of which are in my district. Maryland tobacco is officially classified as type 32 by the U.S. Department of Agriculture and it is uniquely suited to the light, sandy soil and long growing season of the middle Chesapeake Bay region.

Mr. Speaker, southern Maryland takes great pride in its tobacco heritage. Therefore, the Maryland Pride in Tobacco Festival is a big event in southern Maryland.

The festival will include a parade and opening ceremonies, farm equipment displays, food and drink, a working farm tractor pull, music, a tobacco spitting contest to name a few. Among the other activities are the following: Pipe smoking contest, Belly Buckin contest, Horse pulling contest, Pony Rides, Old Farm Museum, Baseball Dumping and much more. In addition to these activities there will be a variety of local entertainment as well as an abundance of great food.

Mr. Speaker, Maryland tobacco farmers, as well as tobacco farmers from other States, recently faced an economic crisis because of this year's low tobacco prices. The low prices were due in part to the impact of sharp increases in tobacco imports from other countries. Fortunately, my colleagues and I were able to pass legislation which provided emergency funds to assist these farmers.

Maryland tobacco farmers are a proud and independent group, and they take great pride in their product. And I take great pride in commending them this weekend during the Maryland Pride in Tobacco Festival. They truly have just cause to celebrate.●

FAMILY CONVENTION IN SOUTH JERSEY

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, the Reverend Jesse Jackson, Governor Cuomo of New York, and former Vice President Walter Mondale, in their remarkable speeches last week at the Democratic Convention, electrifyingly reminded our Nation of the importance of the family in all of our lives. Family life is the basis on which this Nation was built and it is the very foundation through which we share lasting support to grow.

I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues a most commendable Westville Grove, NJ, resident, John Paynter, who is calling a notable family reunion of his numerous relatives on July 28, at the Deptford Roller Rink in Gloucester County. John Paynter's grandfather, Paul David Paynter, was a slave in southern Delaware, and was set free in 1836. John Paynter, educated in Thorofare, NJ, for many years has operated a local business. He has held membership in the St. James AME Church for the past 65 years and deaconship for the last 40.

John Paynter is a very proud family man, whose offspring have made headlines with their high school athletic accomplishments. He is a man who enjoys his children, grandchildren, and great grandchildren—all 125 of them.

Mr. John Paynter boasts a distinguished past and present and is planning an auspicious future event.

Mr. Speaker, the following article that appeared in the Gloucester County Times describes this heartwarming affair. I commend the article to the attention of my colleagues:

[From the Gloucester County Times]

PAYNTER REUNION WILL BE A REAL FAMILY AFFAIR

(By Bob Shryock)

John Paynter is having a rather unusual family reunion on July 28, and he understandably will be forgiven for not being able to include all of the cousins, nieces, nephews and assorted other Paynter descendants.

If John could afford to rent Veterans Stadium or the Grand Canyon, there is a chance he could accommodate them all.

"This is just for my children, my grandchildren, and my great grand-children," explains the 77-year-old Westville Grove resident. "At my little house, there isn't room for anybody else."

Well, there really isn't room for all of those on the invitation list.

Saying that John Paynter has a lot of grandchildren and great grandchildren is like saying J. Paul Getty has a lot of money.

John and his first wife, the late Maude Paynter, had seven children, a modest enough number.

But one of their daughters, Gloria Holmes of Thorofare, has 18 children and 32 grandchildren.

Another daughter, Doris Moore, who lives next door to granddad in Westville Grove, has 15 children and 25 grandchildren.

Sons Robert Paynter and John Paynter each have eight children.

Granddad admits he isn't completely sure of the accuracy of his numbers.

"But I expect 116 grandchildren and great grandchildren to be at the reunion," he says. "I know there'll be 63 grandchildren. And 63 great grandchildren. Or is it 62?"

What he needs is his own Hallmark birthday card concession.

John Paynter is immensely proud of his offspring. He points out that his family has produced enough headline-grabbing high school athletes among the Paynters and Moores that he could field his own family football team. One of them, Glenn Moore, was a schoolboy All-American at Deptford High.

John said his reunion will start about 11 a.m. on the 28th, and activities will shift around noon to the Deptford Roller Rink next door.

"I've scheduled the roller rink for them for two hours, and I've ordered them 100 pairs of skates."

He also plans to cook up enough hot dogs and hamburgers to feed a Michael Jackson concert crowd.

"A lot of the family have volunteered to bring food with them, but I told them, 'No sir, this is my reunion. I'll take care of it.' I've put away the money for this."

John Paynter's family is steeped in Gloucester County tradition.

His grandfather, Paul David Paynter, was a slave in southern Delaware who was set free in 1836.

"He took to the woods and managed to work his way up across the Mason-Dixon Line. In those days, the Delaware River would freeze over, 18 or 20 inches of ice, and granddad walked across the river and came out near National Park."

In 1837, he met a Woodbury woman who lived in a tent. She took him in and they married. Their son, who also was named Paul David Paynter, was born in 1850 and worked for 40 years for Billy Thompson at the old Washington park, site of the current Texaco Co. When John Paynter was born in 1907, his father was 57 years old.

Educated in Thorofare, John has operated a cesspool business for many years. he still is somewhat active in the business, which is run by his son, Bobby.

John and his first wife, Maude, were married 49 years before she passed away in 1977. He remarried (Helen) four years ago. John has been a member of the St. James AME Church in Thorofare for 65 years, and has been a deacon the last 40.

Although he is spry and active, John Paynter says he wants to bring all of his grandchildren and great grandchildren together for a reunion because he isn't sure he'll ever be able to do it again.●

SOCIAL SECURITY COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENTS

HON. BARBER B. CONABLE, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, I introduced H.R. 6019, a bill which will assure that Social Security beneficiaries and supplemental security income recipients will receive an annual cost-of-living increase this year, and in future years—provided the trust funds have adequate reserves as provided in the 1983 Social Security Amendments.

This bill implements President Reagan's request that current beneficiaries receive a timely COLA in January 1985, regardless of whether the Consumer Price Index records a 3-percent increase for the measuring period, which ends September 30, 1984. It appears likely, based on current actuarial estimates, that the 3-percent threshold will not be crossed. But the outcome is not certain, and since data won't be available until mid-October—when the rest of you will be campaigning—I suggest we resolve the issue now.

By way of background, Social Security law includes two important provisions relating to COLA's. The first, which this bill addresses, requires that the Consumer Price Index increase at least 3 percent in order for beneficiaries to receive any cost-of-living adjustment. Increases of less than 3 percent are not lost, but are added to the following year's CPI measurement. If the COLA is not triggered in any given year—as is probable this year, beneficiaries have to wait, in effect, for another year to receive the cost-of-living increase that is under 3 percent.

The second provision, in the 1983 amendments, is a COLA fail-safe measure, which calls for an alternative computation of COLA's for any year in which trust fund reserves fall below critical levels. My bill does not change this safety mechanism.

Perhaps at this point, I should assure Members that H.R. 6019 would not have an adverse impact on the Social Security trust funds. The bill would provide a total benefit payout on January 1, 1985, estimated at $5 billion. This amount is below projections for the cost of the COLA by the Social Security trustees, and the administration in its budget, because both had estimated increases in the CPI of over 4 percent. None of these estimates, by the way, would trigger the COLA fail-safe provision.

Now, let me explain more fully why I believe we should eliminate the 3-percent trigger. First, when the 1983 amendments were enacted—few, except perhaps our President, expected inflation to fall so dramatically, and we did not foresee the possibility that—having just waited 6 months for a delayed COLA for 1983, current beneficiaries would receive no COLA at all in 1984.

Second, and to clarify my concerns about future years—the 3-percent trigger originally was provided in large part for administrative reasons. The Social Security Administration's computer systems simply weren't up to the task of processing small changes in a cost-effective manner. Today, however, I'm relieved to report, SSA's computer system is being modernized, and the adjustments are feasible. Third, the Congress wanted to place an effective cap on benefits, and saw the COLA trigger as one approach. In view of the new fail-safe provision, and the restored solvency of the trust funds, I believe that denying small increases is unwarranted not only in this, an election year, but in future years as well.

Let me also point out that the current statute links the annual COLA's to increases in the FICA taxable wage base, and in annual earnings test levels; that is, the amount beneficiaries are permitted to earn and still receive full benefits. My bill dissolves that linkage, permitting the tax base to seek its own level independently of COLA's. Because the Social Security system's long-range solvency—or lack of it—is viewed over a 75-year perspective. I believe it is reasonable to assume that annual disparities in wage and price fluctuations will, over that long stretch of time, complement one another. Prices may rise faster than wages in some years, and the reverse may be true in other years, but over a long span the two should even out. Let me clarify further that COLA's are based on increases in the Consumer Price Index, and adjustments in the wage base are based on average annual wage increases. Linking tax base increases to COLA's actually may serve to disrupt a tendency for annual disparities to adjust themselves.

For all these reasons, I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 6019, and support it now.●

THE SAN FRANCISCO GIANTS

HON. JOHN P. MURTHA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, while I cannot trace the origins of the name of San Francisco's baseball team, after spending a week in the city at the Democratic National Convention, I would like to say that the name is very appropriate given the giant helping of leadership, hospitality, and warmth I saw in the city.

Following my return to the East, a friend of mine remarked that San Francisco set the perfect tone for the convention. Its weather, its openness, its hospitality, its sights and businesses gave a tone to the entire convention that helped set its direction and mood.

I would like to start by congratulating the mayor of San Francisco, the Honorable Dianne Feinstein. The coordination and planning that were evident in every turn of the convention could not have happened without a great deal of work by the mayor, and it was essential to a smooth-running convention.

In addition, the extra effort put forward by the San Francisco police who were unfailingly courteous and helpful while working long hours and supervising many marches and parades showed a dedication to duty that speaks for the finest of our men and women in uniform.

And the entire Democratic congressional delegation from the San Francisco area made us all feel at home, and in particular, I want to mention Congresswoman SALA BURTON who with charm and great hospitality made us all feel welcome and at home.

The citizens of San Francisco should take great pride in the outstanding job they did in adapting, welcoming, and hosting the thousands of delegates and observers who descended on their city for the Democratic National Convention.

Sometimes when things go so smoothly, we tend to forget all the hard work and effort that went into the planning and development of the convention and its impact on the city. I wanted to thank all of those involved on behalf of the delegates who I talked to who were all most appreciative of the wonderful job done by the San Francisco officials and citizens.●

RADICAL CHANGE

HON. DANIEL B. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. DANIEL B. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, since my election into the U.S. House of Representatives, some of my most prime concerns have been to reduce waste and fraud in Government spending; to promote a strong America; to balance the Federal budget and curb the deficit; to cut taxes; and to return to the several States the control of many governmental activities.

Mr. Bob Wright, retired editorial page editor for the Danville Commercial News, Danville, IL, understands and supports many of the ideals which I espouse. The following column first appeared on November 30, 1975, and was updated for reprinting on Saturday January 21, 1984, in the Commercial News.

I believe in Mr. Wright's statements and hope that you, my colleagues in the U.S. Congress, will agree. The article was reprinted as follows:

"AMERICANS 'RADICAL'? ABSOLUTELY!"

A Gannett News Service story, datelined Louisville, KY, read: "Three leading national pollsters say that Americans are more despondent about the future and want 'radical' change."

You bet they want change.

Americans want to see men and women in Springfield and Indianapolis and Washington who will legislate and administer what they promise during their campaigns.

Americans want to see state and federal governments try to live within their incomes the way they are compelled to do.

Americans would like to see all members of the U.S. House and Senate back at work the day after a holiday instead of using every commemorative date as an excuse for a 10-day "recess."

Americans would like to vote for candidates without the nagging doubts as to whether their choices will serve out their terms in the houses of government or the houses of correction.

Americans would like to see a reduction in a civilian U.S. "army"—the army of federal employees which never seems to lack for volunteers.

Americans would like to see a change in the practice that once a federal tax goes on, it never comes off.

Americans would like to see every federal agency have to justify its program and budget from scratch every year instead of being allowed built-in expansion of funds and personnel.

Americans would like to see fewer "chiefs" and more "Indians" in the disbursing of their own federal tax money—there would be more left to disburse!

Americans would like to see more of the genuinely deserving disadvantaged among us actually helped to help themselves and fewer opportunists helping themselves to the lion's share.

Americans would like to see more of their hard-earned money staying at home in the first place and less coming back from Washington in the guise of "revenue sharing"—minus Washington's cut for handling charges.

Americans would like to see more high school graduates who can read, write and converse both comprehendingly and comprehensibly, and fewer educational cripples.

Americans would like to be able to take their garbage out at night without fear of being mugged at the kitchen door.

Americans again would like to be able to go to the supermarket and come home with more than a bag of groceries for less than a bag of money.

These are only a few of the changes that Americans are "radical" enough to want. Gannett's famed pollster, Lou Harris, hit the bull's-eye with the advice: "Please take off the labels. The opportunities aren't liberal or conservative. They're radical."

Maybe, just maybe, there will come a day when we will have "radical" office-seekers who will say what they mean and mean what they say and get this country turned around in the right direction.●

CARL HANSEN—A SOURCE OF JOY TO COUNTLESS CHILDREN

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, Congressman NORM MINETA and I would like to bring to the attention of our colleagues a great children's entertainer who has been a source of fun and joy to the children of California for several decades and has been known to generations of those children as "Hocus Pocus," the clown and magician. His real name is Carl Hansen, and Mr. Hansen is being honored with a surprise ball to celebrate his 80th birthday on July 27. We know our colleagues join us in congratulating him on his long career and on the fine work he has done with so many children.

Born in Denmark, Mr. Hansen started in entertainment as a stuntman for Warner Bros. in 1927. Later, he learned magic, and that became the primary source of his act. During World War II, Mr. Hansen served the USO as a master of ceremonies, magician, and comedian.

Mr. Hansen and his wife, Florene, lost two children at a very early age. From that point, he dedicated himself to entertaining and helping children. He made a practice of visiting sick and crippled children, a practice which he continues to this day. It was during those visits to hospitals that he got the name "Hocus Pocus" in the performance of his magic act.

Eventually, "Hocus Pocus" began his own television program on KNTV in San José, and he was on the air for 9 years, a record for the longest running daily children's television program in northern California. He has continued his program on cable television.

In 1969, he returned to his native country and performed before an audience of over 20,000 at Tivoli in Copenhagen.

Mr. Hansen served for 2 years as president of the Society of American Magicians—in 1955 and 1956—and he is a member of Saahareens, a society of professional magicians.

Mr. Speaker, Carl Hansen, in addition to performing in this country and his native Denmark, has performed in Mexico, Canada, Germany, and Sweden. He is truly an international figure, and we are proud and fortunate to have had him entertaining our children in San José and Santa Cruz areas for these many years. We all wish him a very happy birthday and the best of luck for the future.●

TRIBUTE TO JACK McJILTON, MAYOR OF RANTOUL

HON. EDWARD R. MADIGAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to ask my colleagues to join me in saluting a dear friend and distinguished public servant, Jack McJilton, who stepped down this April after 15 years of service as mayor of Rantoul, IL.

In an era when concern about Government spending and Federal deficits is on all of our minds, we can all learn a lesson from Jack McJilton. Jack held fast to a pay-as-you-go system while tripling the Rantoul village budget over his 15-year tenure. These years saw the construction of a civic center, municipal building, main fire station, fire substation, and a wastewater treatment plant. Streets and sidewalks were upgraded. Village accounting and recordkeeping systems were computerized. Rantoul accomplished all of this without issuing a single bond to finance village services, and has avoided the trap of depending on revenue-sharing funds to substantially finance the village's operational budget. This fiscal success was the result of wise investments by village financial managers, judicious use of Federal revenue-sharing funds, and above all, a conservative approach to spending, credit for which goes squarely to Jack McJilton.

Jack's leadership has benefited Rantoul in more than a material sense. Rantoul has a relatively low crime rate, due to an efficient police department. Because of sound fiscal management of the municipally owned utilities, residents pay a penny less per kilowatt-hour than their surrounding neighbors. Rantoul provides an ambulance service and a volunteer fire department. Hundreds of children participate in the recreation department's summer athletic program. In short, Rantoul provides a model of a small city, especially noteworthy in an area hit hard by the country's recent economic slump.

Rantoul has weathered its share of storms with Jack at the helm. The worst of these was precipitated by the announcement in April 1978 that the town's chief industry, Chanute Air Force Base, would be shut down. McJilton remembers the battle that followed as 11 months of turmoil, sweat, and blood. The base remained open.

Those who worked closely with Jack ascribe his success to the teamwork he encouraged as an administrator. He treated the village board members as equals, keeping them informed and seeking their advice. His style was gentle persuasion, and he hastened to put differences behind as quickly as possible. His choice of advisers—village comptroller, police chief, community development director, and others—all contributed to the success of Jack's team.

Jack's political career began as a village trustee in Fisher, where he was born and worked in his family's lumber and construction business before becoming a partner in an International Harvester implement dealership in Rantoul in the 1950's. In 1963, he was elected to the Rantoul Village Board, and 6 years later, to mayor. While mayor, Jack found time to serve as vice president of the Illinois Municipal League, and was selected to represent central Illinois on the league's executive council.

Mr. Speaker, as Jack heads off to his retirement in Minocqua, WI, where he's been fishing for the last 45 years, let us take our hats off to a man who embodied the all too rare political virtues of humility, commonsense, and an ability to admit and learn from his mistakes during his 15 years as mayor of Rantoul.●

FAREWELL TO DAVID KAPLAN

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, today my staff and I bid farewell to David Kaplan. David has worked in my office for the past year performing a dual role as a computer specialist and legislative aide. He is leaving Capitol Hill to attend law school at the University of California at Los Angeles [UCLA]. In the span of David's tenure, he has added a unique and professional style to my congressional operation. His warm and good natured personality and his ability to work well under pressure will undoubtedly serve him well in the future. On behalf of my staff and I, we wish David the best of luck in law school and want him to know that our hearts and support are with him as he embarks on his new endeavor.●

TALENTED TEACHER ACT

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, in the very near future the House will be taking up H.R. 4477, the Talented Teacher Act, which was introduced on a bipartisan basis by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SIMON], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GOODLING], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COLEMAN], and myself.

The Talented Teacher Act is one of the few education proposals to emerge from a plethora of task force reports and blue ribbon commissions that has bipartisan support across the board. It has been endorsed by every major education group, including the National Education Association, the American Federation of Teachers, the American Association of School Administrators, the National Parent-Teachers Association and many others.

I am pleased that the Talented Teacher Act also has the endorsement of Ernest L. Boyer of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching. U.S. News & World Report recently published results of a survey of American leaders that named Boyer as one of the three most influential persons in the education field.

The following is the letter of endorsement that he wrote regarding the Talented Teacher Act:

THE CARNEGIE FOUNDATION
FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF TEACHING,
July 24, 1984.

Hon. RON WYDEN,
Longworth House Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN WYDEN: I'm very pleased that the Teacher Talent Act (H.R. 4477) is moving forward in the Congress and will soon be on the House floor for a vote. Passage of this legislation would send the strongest possible signal to educators and citizens across the land that America is serious about public school renewal.

Last year, The Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching completed a comprehensive study of American secondary education. We visited schools from coast to coast, talked to thousands of principals, teachers, and students and listened carefully to their problems and their hopes. We concluded that the top priorities for school improvement are to give recognition to gifted teachers already in the classroom and to attract outstanding students into teaching. Your proposal would promote these two essential goals and everyone concerned about the future of the nation's schools should, I feel, support this vital legislation.

The time has come for bold, imaginative action at the national level. By giving scholarships to our most able high school seniors who plan to enter teaching and fellowships to outstanding teachers, the Talented Teachers Act would serve as a valuable model for the states and local districts and provide a dramatic statement to the nation. Clearly, the enactment of H.R. 4477 would demonstrate in a powerfully effective way that the Federal government is an essential partner in promoting excellence in the nation's schools.

Warm regards,

ERNEST L. BOYER,
President.●

CYPRUS CONFLICT MUST END

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, as I speak before you today, 10 long years have passed since that infamous day, July 20, 1974, when Turkish troops invaded the peaceful island of Cyprus and with one shot shattered the lives of thousands of innocent people. I am disappointed to inform my colleagues that an entire decade later absolutely no progress has been made in resolving this never-ending conflict.

For this reason, I am today introducing a resolution in the House of Representatives that seeks to remedy the injustice that was visited upon the Cypriot people 10 years ago and continues to disrupt their lives. My resolution emphasizes the value of continued negotiations to mediate this dispute and effect a solution. It furthermore underscores the fact that our Nation has a tremendous stake in the peaceful resolution of the Cyprus conflict because of the strategic importance of maintaining peace and tranquility in the eastern Mediterranean. As a nation with a justifiably earned reputation as the defender of human rights and justice throughout the world, we are charged with the mission of taking the initiative in attempting to mediate this dispute and end the bitter conflict that has reaped thousands of lives, separated hundreds of families, resulted in the disappearance of nearly 2,000 Cypriots and disrupted the sound economic base of Cyprus.

In keeping with our role as a champion of freedom, my resolution calls on our President to appoint a special envoy of internationally recognized stature with the mission of acting as a mediator for all the parties involved in this conflict and attempting to negotiate a just and peaceful settlement. This special envoy would also be responsible for mediating differences between Greece and Turkey relating to the control and use of the Aegean Sea, its continental shelf and its airspace. Because Greece and Turkey are so important to not only the NATO alliance but to our own strategic interests as well, it is only fitting that our Nation take a leading role in attempting to mediate a dispute that has plagued the region for over a decade.

The onslaught of Turkish troops in July of 1974 brought the beginning of an unlawful occupation of Cyprus that has lasted for 10 years and produced nothing but misery and hardship for the Cypriot people. Over 18,000 Turkish troops still remain on Cyprus as tyrants of a people that have been known in centuries past for their love of freedom and democracy. My resolution calls upon the Government of Turkey to withdraw all its forces from Cyprus. The continued presence of foreign troops and colonists denies the Cypriot people their fundamental right to self-determination. Cyprus will never again enjoy peace and stability as long as foreign troops continue to form an unwanted presence on Cyprus. I call on our Government, with this resolution, to diligently pursue every avenue to seek a prompt resolution of the Cyprus conflict and of the tensions that exist between Greece and Turkey.

During the past decade, though feeble attempts have been made to reach a solution acceptable to all the Cypriot people, the intrasigence of the Turks and Turkish Cypriots has impeded any progress. The infrequent resumption of the intercommunal talks between the Greek and Turkish Cypriots have proven futile and frustrating. Clearly, what is needed is the insight of a special third-party negotiator with the expertise and reputation to be able to mediate this deep and frustrating conflict.

Our own country's best interests in the Mediterranean and the Middle East dictate that we work diligently and tirelessly to seek an effective solution to the conflict that continues to plague the Cypriot people. Last November, the Turkish Cypriot leader Rauf Denktash, supported by the Government of Turkey, issued a Unilateral Declaration of Independence declaring the secession of Turkish occupied Northern Cyprus and effecting a devastating partition of Cyprus. To quell any doubts about the seriousness of this declaration, I would like to inform my colleagues that the Turkish Cypriots have already developed their own flag, have exchanged ambassadors with Turkey and have even begun colonizing the ghost town of Varosha in an attempt to annex the city as well. The intransigence that the Turks have exhibited during this conflict should be condemned by our Government and by all nations that respect the value and sanctity of human life.

The situation that currently exists on Cyprus is simply not acceptable. We have the ultimate responsibility for sending a clear signal to the Turkish authorities that we are convinced that the illegal partition of Cyprus is not only contrary to the interests of the Cypriot people but also to those of the United States. Our country's reputation has been built on our active support for justice and political and religious freedoms throughout the world. I urge my colleagues to lend their support to this resolution in the interest of promoting a peaceful and timely solution to this problem. In keeping with our traditional support for liberty and freedom, it is our responsibility to actively speak out against this injustice and act to solve this conflict.●

CHELTENHAM HIGH SCHOOL CELEBRATES CENTENNIAL

HON. LAWRENCE COUGHLIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I pay tribute to Cheltenham High School, in my congressional district, which is marking its 100th anniversary with a yearlong series of events.

The first township high school in Pennsylvania, Cheltenham has proven itself an innovative institution which has established a reputation for high academic standards and for producing outstanding scholars.

Its reputation was established from the beginning. Four students were graduated as its first high school class and three of them went on to college.

Cheltenham High was founded by George W. Flounders in an upstairs room of the Ashbourne Grammar School. Starting with a 1-year curriculum, the school introduced a 2-year course of studies in 1889. By 1896, it had evolved into a 3-year high school with courses such as algebra, mental arithmetic, geometry, rhetoric, spelling, physical geography, literature, philosophy, physics, Latin, freehand drawing, and bookkeeping.

Situated in an expanding area adjoining the city of Philadelphia, Cheltenham High has enjoyed remarkable growth without sacrificing the quality of its academic studies. It moved to larger quarters in 1906, 1926, and in 1959 to its present location—a multimillion-dollar structure with modern teaching advancements. Eight years later a major addition also was completed.

Among the highlights of Cheltenham High's history are the adult school started in 1917, National Honor Society established in 1921, guidance program initiated in 1926, and graduation of its largest class, 658, in 1972.

In honoring Cheltenham High on this centennial anniversary, I believe it is important that we consider its contribution to the community and its children. By far, this contribution outweighs the actual physical structure with its teaching facilities and conveniences.

Cheltenham High has set—and maintained—a high standard. At a time when our public education system has been subjected to criticism, I hope that Cheltenham High will continue to do what it has been doing for 100 years—providing the best possible education to the greatest number of township pupils possible. I salute Cheltenham High, its administrators, faculty, students and—most of all—the township citizens whose constant support has produced this 100th anniversary celebration.●

THE PLIGHT OF SOVIET JEWS

HON. JAMES M. SHANNON

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, the word "Refusenik" has become an international symbol of cultural and religious repression. It signifies the plight of a Soviet Jew who is continually denied permission to emigrate to Israel and is then ostracized, abused, demoted or fired at work, subject to arbitrary arrest, and often beaten or imprisoned. As the Soviet Union clamps down more and more every year on Jewish emigration, the ranks of the Refuseniks grow. It is an alarming situation.

As a proud participant in this year's congressional call to conscience vigil, I have "adopted" a Refusenik whose saddening case I have become familiar with. His name is Lev Furman and, though he does not have the prominence of Andrei Sakharov, his case is equally heart rending and equally instructive about the repression of Soviet Jews.

Lev Furman is a 37-year-old language teacher currently living in Leningrad with his wife and parents. He graduated from the Leningrad Electrotechnical Institute in 1972 but he has not worked as an electrical engineer since that time. He has been making a living by teaching Hebrew and German to private pupils. In April 1974, Furman applied to emigrate to Israel but he was refused on the basis that he had access to "secret" information on magnetic dialectrics while working at a research institute in 1971. In fact, Lev was only a technician at the institute; whereas the senior research worker, Dr. Boria Rubinstein, was allowed to leave the Soviet Union in 1974. Yet this was only the beginning of Mr. Furman's oppression.

Since 1974, Furman's language lessons have repeatedly been interrupted and stopped by the KGB or the Soviet police. He has been put in jail without charge, had his typewriter confiscated without reason, and he has been beaten severely and physically harassed a number of times. His parents are elderly and unable to cope with the stress of this harassment. His father Mikhail was jailed for 10 days one time for "hooliganism." His mother Beila is constantly depressed and she has been in and out of a mental hospital.

In 1982, Furman was fired from his job as porter because his employers said that as a trained engineer he could not be allowed to perform menial labor. His last emigration request was denied because it "would not be in the interests of the Soviet state."

Mr. Speaker, I am certain that my colleagues will agree that cases of human rights violations such as Lev Furman's are shocking and morally unconscionable. It is imperative that we do whatever we can to end the oppression and humiliation of Soviet Jews and thereby extend the realm of human rights to that oppressed group of individuals that we call "Refuseniks." Morality demands that we be unceasing in our efforts to liberate Soviet Jewry.●

SOVIET JEWS

HON. HERBERT H. BATEMAN

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. BATEMAN. Mr. Speaker, the plight of Soviet Jews has been a major concern for the U.S. Congress for quite some time. These individuals are forced into remaining under a system of government which openly practices repression of groups regarded as potentially harmful to the state. The Soviet Jews are considered such a group simply as a result of their religious beliefs.

During the Second World War, the United States sacrificed a great many of our most talented young people in order to destroy a similarly repressive regime. The current Soviet policies toward the Jews parallel several of the Nazi practices concerning the Jews during the 1930's and 1940's. The Soviets not only harass these people through denial of basic human and civil rights, but also by imprisonment for "crimes against the state" which were never committed and denial of permission to visit relatives or emigrate to Israel. There is no reason for these policies except as a blatant attempt by the Soviet officials to persecute Jews because of their religious beliefs.

Isaak Shkolnik represents the plight of the Soviet Jew. Mr. Shkolnik was charged with treason by Soviet authorities in 1972 simply as part of a Soviet effort to stem the tide of applications from Jews to emigrate to Israel. Mr. Shkolnik had applied for an exit visa some time before this. The Soviet authorities dug hard and deep to fabricate evidence showing the Vannitsa resident's guilt. After 9 months of maintaining his innocence, Shkolnik pleaded guilty when his court-appointed lawyer informed him that a death sentence would follow a plea of innocence. He was sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment.

At Isaak's insistence, his wife and daughter emigrated to Israel in December 1973. Since Isaak's release from a labor camp in 1979, he has repeatedly applied for a visa to join his family in Israel. His requests have been denied, and consequently he has not seen his family in 11 years.

Isaak Shkolnik is but one example of the thousands of Soviet Jews who are victims of the repressive Soviet totalitarian government. We in Congress must continue to recognize this great injustice and work for a dramatic change in Soviet policies and practices. Through the efforts of such programs as the 1984 Congressional Call to Conscience Vigil for Soviet Jews, the Congress must work with the President to bring freedom to these oppressed people.●

AIR FORCE 12 OUTSTANDING AIRMEN OF THE YEAR

HON. THOMAS F. HARTNETT

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Speaker, the following individuals while serving as members of the Air Force Association Enlisted Council have contributed immeasurably to the defense posture of the United States of America. This distinguished council, composed primarily of 1983's U.S. Air Force 12 Outstanding Airmen of the Year, was charged with advising the Air Force Association and the Air Force on a wide range of topics in support of our Nation's defense. This unique group generated support and influenced policy at the highest levels of AFA and the USAF air staff, formulating positions that our Nation must take to ensure that the U.S. Air Force is the world's best. The distinctive accomplishments of these individuals reflect great credit upon themselves and the United States of America:

Master Sergeant Daniel Alati, Technical Sergeant Frank M. Anderson, Chief Master Sergeant James C. Binnicker, Technical Sergeant Pearl E. Dandridge, Staff Sergeant Steven A. Dubron, Senior Master Sergeant Robert E. Jacques, Senior Master Sergeant Marvin L. Kennedy, Senior Airman Christopher Menna, Master Sergeant Thomas Merrick III.

Technical Sergeant Ronny A. Morris, Master Sergeant Harold O. Overton, Chief Master Sergeant of the Air Force Sam E. Parish, Senior Master Sergeant Tommy Roberts, Technical Sergeant Carol L. Santos, Chief Master Sergeant Richard C. Schneider, Technical Sergeant Guadalupe Silva, Technical Sergeant Mark A. Smith, Chief Master Sergeant Richard J. Tinneny, and Staff Sergeant Mary L. Young.●

EXPLANATION OF ABSENCE

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, due to the sudden deaths of two close friends, I missed yesterday's floor votes. Over the weekend my good friend and long time business associate, Bud Foley, suffered a fatal heart attack. And, on July 19, Carla Giles Odom, the daughter of a close family friend and lifelong business associate, Gwen Giles, suffered a tragic and untimely death. Having known and worked with these individuals for many years, their deaths have touched me very deeply, and it was necessary for me to be in St. Louis for the funerals. Had I been present yesterday, I would have voted nay on rollcall vote No. 313, title VIII of the Senate amendment to H.R. 1310, the equal access provision.●

KATHRYN PINDER RETIRES AFTER 21 YEARS OF SERVICE

HON. ROY DYSON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to your attention the retirement of one of my constituents from public service, Mrs. Kathryn N. Pinder. After 10 years of faithful work as administrative assistant and 11 prior to that as clerk to the county commissioners, Mrs. Pinder will retire on July 31.

Mrs. Pinder, a native of Kent County, became clerk to the county commissioners in August 1963. In 1975, she was appointed administrative assistant and has served six boards of commissioners. As administrative assistant, her duties entailed preparing the annual budgets as well as being responsible for investments. Overall, she headed the day-to-day operations of the office.

Mr. Speaker, prior to her work with the commissioner's office, Kathryn Pinder worked for 17 years at the extension office for Triple A, which is now the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. She is a member of the Maryland Association of Administrative Offices and has held a past board position. She has also received a life membership in this important organization.

Mrs. Pinder resides in Chestertown, MD, with her husband, Arthur, and has two daughters, Kay P. Kille and Sandra P. Hudson. The Pinders also have two grandchildren, Sean and Chuck Kille. They have made Chestertown their home for the past 40 years.

Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to share with you and our colleagues the commendable service of Kathryn Pinder. I salute this woman's 21 years of devoted service to Kent County. I am sure that the residents of Kent County appreciate her hard work as much as I do. Kathryn Pinder is a special citizen of Maryland's First District and has earned my highest respect.●

CONGRATULATIONS GLENBARD EAST HIGH SCHOOL SYMPHONIC BAND

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased and proud to announce that the Glenbard East High School Symphonic Band of Lombard, IL, received the Best Band Award at the American School Band Directors Association national contest held June 15 and 16 at the University of Northern Iowa in Cedar Falls.

This competition, which was by invitation only, included 17 nationally recognized high school bands from nine different States.

At a time when we hear about so many problems associated with young people in our society, it is both heartening and gratifying to see a group of dedicated young people devote their time and talent to a joint effort that requires talent, enthusiasm, discipline, and hard work.

The Sixth District of Illinois, and our State, is very proud of the Glenbard East High School Symphonic Band and the honor they have brought home from the Iowa contest. I know my colleagues join me in congratulating them on this most impressive achievement.●

THE CONTRIBUTIONS OF CARMEN E. ARROYO

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to bring to the attention of my colleagues the work of Carmen E. Arroyo. On June 26, 1984, Ms. Arroyo will commemorate 11 years of service to Community School Board No. 7 in the South Bronx. Since it has come under the strong influence of Ms. Arroyo, school board No. 7 has become an example to be emulated by other New York school boards. Indeed, the last reading scores provided by the city of New York show that the children of board No. 7 have improved remarkably in their reading skills. Without a doubt, this increased proficiency will enhance their opportunity to succeed both academically and occupationally. This could not have been so without the inspiring leadership and wise guidance of Ms. Arroyo.

Ms. Arroyo's success is fueled by her commitment to the needs of her community. Born in El Barrio Cuchillas de Corozal, in Puerto Rico, she graduated from Corozal with honors in 1950, and the College of New Rochelle in 1979. Before Ms. Arroyo even graduated from college in 1973, Gov. Nelson Rockefeller appointed her to the State Medicaid Advisory Council. That same year she was also appointed to Community Planning Board No. 1. By 1980, she was its chairperson.

In 1973, Ms. Arroyo was also elected to serve as a member of Community School Board No. 7. In 1974, she became its treasurer. Two years later, the commitment she exhibited when fighting for the needs of students and the intelligence which she brought to those battles lead her colleagues on the board to elect her chairperson. In 1983, she was reelected to that position.

Not only has she served her community, but also her party. Indeed, in 1980, she became Democratic female district leader of the 75th Assembly District in New York. In 1983, she rose to the same position in the 73d Assembly District of New York. This year she was a delegate-at-large to the Democratic Convention.

What makes her achievements increasingly laudable is not only the scope of her dedication, but also the fact that they have come from a single mother of three boys and four girls. Today she is also a grandmother of six. Moreover, one of her children is well on his way to continue this tradition of service to the community as a doctor.

This mother of seven, community servant, political activist, and poet stands as the epitome of the Puerto Rican woman and resident of the South Bronx. My hope, Mr. Speaker, is that future generations of Americans will find inspiration and hope in the example set by Carmen Arroyo.●

HON. BILL ARCHER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. ARCHER. Mr. Speaker, on July 25, I introduced H.R. 6020, a bill which would prohibit the use of Federal matching campaign funds for foreign travel by candidates for Federal office and their staffs. It would limit receipt of foreign gifts or travel by candidates for Federal office and their staffs. This bill would require that candidates for Federal office comply with the same standards of conduct already required of Federal officials under current law.

Presently, under the United States Code, there are strict regulations governing the receipt of gifts from foreign governments by Federal employees. If a Federal employee, including a Member of Congress, accepts a tangible gift or a gift of travel valued at more than $140, that employee must subject the gift to the approval of his or her employing agency. Federal employees are restricted from receiving gifts of travel taking place outside of the United States. The one factor which determines whether or not an employee can lawfully accept a gift of travel or a tangible gift is if the acceptance of that gift is appropriate, consistent with the interests of the United States, and permitted under the regulations of the employing agency.

It is my belief, and the belief of many Americans, that these same restrictions should be placed on candidates for Federal office. If this standard of conduct is appropriate for current Federal employees and elected officials, it should also be required of those who seek a position as an elected official. In my opinion, there can be no justification for perpetuating this dual standard.

An additional consideration of mine relates to the use of Federal matching funds for the purpose of foreign travel by a candidate. The American taxpayer should not be financing the quasi-diplomatic activities undertaken during campaigns by candidates who are not authorized to negotiate for the United States.

The need to clarify our laws in this area is certainly justified. The possibility of a candidate accepting foreign travel from a foreign government is not unprecedented and has the potential of violating delicate and critical official diplomatic negotiations already engaged in by our Government.

The unauthorized actions of citizens in the capacity of a candidate negotiating with a foreign government could have grave and serious consequences. Such actions usurp the authority of the President and of the Congress of the United States. This bill would ensure that the actions of candidates for Federal office will be confined to those appropriate and consistent with the interests of the United States.

I understand that many candidates may find it politically desirable to make overseas travel their trademark. Such trips may be used as political tools to further the campaigns and careers of candidates. These appeals to foreign governments, ostensibly on behalf of the United States or international humanitarian concerns, have the potential to complicate or jeopardize U.S. foreign policy. Unauthorized actions and negotiations with foreign governments may interfere with current foreign policy objectives and measures already enacted to deal with international matters in the most effective manner.

I believe there is a compelling case for H.R. 6020, and that it will help to assure that candidates for Federal office comply with the same standards of conduct as Federal employees. I urge my colleagues to join me in support of H.R. 6020.●

CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, in 1776 Thomas Jefferson wrote in the Declaration of Independence "that all men are created equal: that they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." These words still ring in the ears and live in the hearts of the American people. Unfortunately though, for many of the world's peoples these words ring hollow. Much of our planet's population lives under systems of government in which dissent and protest are stifled and oppression and censorship abound.

On July 17, 1959, President Eisenhower signed into law a resolution, adopted unanimously by the Congress, designating the third week in July "Captive Nations Week." The purpose of such designation was to inform the American public of the historical precedents exhibited in the experiences of the captive nations.

As this year marks the 26th observance of the captive nations resolution, we reaffirm our commitment to its principles. The people of the free world must be ever watchful for the rise of despotism and steadfast in their opposition to the spread and tyranny around the globe.●

BOB COOK

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, in June, the Illinois State Senate and the Illinois House of Representatives both passed resolutions in praise of Robert E. Cook, the executive vice president of the Illinois Association of Realtors, who is about to end his 28-year association with that organization.

I want to take this opportunity to make our colleagues aware of this fact. Too often we forget that our country has many sources of strength. Among them is the voluntary industry or trade organization dedicated to the betterment of its members and the general community. The Illinois Association of Realtors is one such group and it has contributed to the growth of my home State.

Bob Cook has played a vital role in that growth. He is one of those amazing fellows whose many professional and community activities and high degree of success in his various undertakings make the rest of us wonder what his secret is. Well, Bob Cook has no secret. He just loves his work and his community and has been willing to work hard for both of them.

A native of Illinois, he earned a degree in political science from Wheaton College and served his country honorably as a naval officer in World War II and then again in the Korean conflict. He has been elected president of the Illinois Jaycees and has served as deacon, trustee, and moderator for Cherry Hill Baptist Church.

Bob Cook has received just about every prestigious award that his professional colleagues can bestow, including the highest honors of the American Society of Association Executives, the National Association of Realtors, and the Illinois Association of Realtors.

I think by now you begin to get the drift—Bob Cook is one of those outstanding citizens whose value to his colleagues, his community, and his country cannot be exaggerated.

It is a pleasure for me to bring Bob Cook to your attention and the attention of all our colleagues. So long as America keeps producing men and women with Bob's qualities, this country has nothing to worry about.●

ON THE PASSING OF HAROLD (BUD) FOLEY

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to express my profound sorrow on the passing of Harold (Bud) Foley and my sincere condolences to his wife Bernice and his children John and Christine. I originally came to know Bud Foley during the years I worked for the pipefitters. In the years since, I have treasured his support, advice, and friendship. My wife Carol and I send our deepest condolences to Bernice Foley and the family.

As president of the Missouri Pipe Trades and the St. Louis Building and Construction Trades Council, a former Florissant comitteeman, a veteran, and, most recently, as a delegate to the 1984 Democratic National Convention, Bud Foley fought for and dedicated his life to the well-being of his fellow citizens. His vigor, intelligence, and compassion on behalf of the interests of workers will be sorely missed.●

A HISTORIC INEQUITY

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced legislation to correct a historic inequity. Up until World War II, draftees and enlistees who served during periods of conflict, as opposed to career-enlisted personnel, rarely rose above the entry rank of E-1. As a result, their surviving spouses receive dependency and indemnity compensation at the E-1 rate. Had these soldiers, sailors, and marines served in a later period, their spouses would benefit from the rank that they would have achieved through promotions which have become relatively standard today. For example, it is rare for an enlisted person to complete a tour and be discharged at a rank lower than E-3 unless he or she has been the subject of disciplinary action.

The current level of compensation for an E-1 surviving spouse is $461 per month and the E-2 rate is $475. This legislation would raise the DIC rate to $486, the E-3 rate. There are less than 20,000 surviving spouses who would benefit from this legislation. The cost is minimal and the result is parity with the benefits of those who served in a later period when promotions were given at the completion of training.●

ANNIVERSARY OF THE TRANSIT WORKERS UNION

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, the New York Transit Workers Union marked its 50th anniversary in April 1984.

The union was founded in April 1934 by a small group of courageous people who began organizing late in 1933, despite the threats aimed at them by a company union.

Hanging over their heads was the fact that 12 million Americans were out of work in a labor force that numbered less than half of what we have now. These desperate unemployed would have done anything for a job in transit.

New York's transit industry had successfully resisted the attempts by various craft unions to bring genuine trade unionism onto the properties over a 50-year period.

Goaded by miserable conditions, and a 10-percent cut in their pay, the band of activists finally formed a Transport Workers Union Delegates Council which in turn issued a proclamation calling for the establishment of a new union.

At the time of the call to organize TWU, trolley operators got 62 cents an hour after 5 years' experience; conductors earned 54 cents and railroad clerks drew 43 cents an hour. There were no paid vacations or holidays. Sick leave was only a dream. And whatever pension plan existed wouldn't pay enough to allow a retiree to exist.

The Wagner Act—Labor's Magna Charta—was not enacted until 1935, so there was no protection for the TWU organizers during their struggle. Only their relentless efforts to contact and secretly sign up their fellow employees enabled them to avoid retribution.

By 1936, the union had gotten strong enough to come out in the open. The program of action that was developed included:

A guaranteed minimum wage of $25 a week.

Restoration of the 10-percent wage cut of January 1, 1933.

Reduction of work to 8 hours per day and 48 hours per week.

Guaranteed full workday for track, structure, and building departments, regardless of weather conditions.

A paid vacation.

The right to resign from the phony IRT pension plan.

Time and a half for overtime.

No layoffs because of technical improvements or unification.

Reinstatement of all employees fired and blacklisted because of TWU activities.

Recognition of TWU as the sole bargaining agent of the workers.

Throughout its history, the TWU has worked for the civil rights of all Americans. The 1934 union constitution stated that the purpose of the union was to "unite in this industrial union, regardless of race, creed, color, sex or nationality, all workers eligible for membership."

Following TWU's first contract settlement with the IRT in 1937, it insisted on upgrading Negro porters to every classification on every transit line in the system.

In 1944, the union successfully put an antidiscrimination clause into its first contract with the Philadelphia Transportation Co. Despite a wildcat strike staged in an attempt to defeat this clause, the TWU maintained its commitment against discrimination.

Up to and including our current civil rights struggles, TWU members have been a vital part of civil rights coalitions.

What of the future? The TWU, in the company of many other unions, seeks a society in which full employment exists. Putting America back to work is a goal which can be shared by all Americans.●

CHILD CARE

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 26, 1984

● Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, a columnist recently noted, "People seem to have an irresistible itch to tell other people how to raise their children." I suspect that that is a truism today even as it has been throughout the ages.

As national attention has focused on the problem of child care, particularly before and after school care, there have been those who have pointed fingers at parents who must work to support their children. Looking for villains is a waste of time. It is our responsibility to look to the well-being of our children who are the potential victims of a social and economic system which gives lipservice to the well-being of children while ignoring the present need to provide mechanisms for their care. We seem to be a society which likes the idea of children while ignoring the reality that affordable care is a necessity for them.

Affordable care can be provided by parents and other family members or it can be provided by concerned caretakers outside the family. For the affluent, it is possible to decide to forgo the income of a parent so that a parent can remain at home with the children. That is not necessarily an available option for the working poor couple or single parents who must work to survive. When a parent cannot be available full time, what can be done to protect and care for our children?

The House has just taken a small but important step in passing H.R. 4193, the School Facilities Child Care Act. This bill will provide $30 million for startup and operating costs for afterschool programs in public schools and other community facilities. The other body now has the opportunity to pass a similar bill. It is my hope that legislation will be passed by both Houses and that we can begin to address the issue of providing care for the children of this country.●

SENATE—Friday, July 27, 1984

(Legislative day of Monday, July 23, 1984)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

All glory and honor and praise to Thee, O God.

Loving Father in Heaven, we thank Thee for life's common blessings. Help us never to take them for granted as though we deserved them more than those who are deprived. We thank Thee for families, homes, friends, good neighbors, and a place of privilege in which to labor. We thank Thee for good food, pure water which we enjoyed yesterday, will enjoy today, and have the prospect of enjoying in our tomorrows. We thank Thee for health and strength, for good minds and sound bodies. May we who always have more than enough of everything remember with compassion those who never have enough of anything.

We pray for the oppressed, the persecuted—for those who are displaced, hungry, and homeless—for children who suffer the tragic effects of malnutrition and their parents who suffer helplessly with them. We remember the unemployed and those experiencing futility. Grant O God, that we who are free from such inhuman indignities may respond in love to those who hurt.

In Jesus' name. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, today, after the two leaders and the special order, there will be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business, and then we will be back on the pending business, which is the Hoover Dam bill, and the pending question will be the Metzenbaum amendment No. 3419.

Cloture has been filed on the motion to concur in the House amendments. That motion will ripen into a vote on Monday, 1 hour after a quorum is established, 1 hour after we convene, unless we change that time.

I have not yet talked to the minority leader about establishing a time that may be more suitable, but I will do that and attempt to set that time on Monday if we do that by noon today.

Mr. President, I do not expect today to be a long day. I do not expect us to finish the Hoover Dam bill either. I wish to, but I do not imagine we will.

We might be able to get to MilCon, the military construction bill, but that was less than probable last evening when the Senate recessed, but for the sake of optimism, let me include that on the list of things we might do.

Beyond that, Mr. President, the leadership on this side will examine the list of available items and see what we can clear to do.

But I would not expect this to be a long day.

SENATOR SPECTER RECEIVES GOLDEN GAVEL AWARD

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, at approximately 4:30 p.m., Thursday, July 26, Senator SPECTER accumulated 100 hours of Chair duty, making him the second recipient of the Golden Gavel Award during the 98th Congress. Senator SPECTER established this record by consistently presiding over the Senate for 2 to 3 hours every week without fail.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. GOLDWATER]. Under the previous order, the Democratic leader is recognized.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time reserved for the minority leader be set aside for his use later in the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

WHY A "STAR WARS" PROGRAM IS MORE LIKELY TO BRING NUCLEAR WAR

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this is the fourth in my series of replies to Gen. Daniel Graham's seven arguments designed to rebut criticism of the Strategic Defense Initiative or Star Wars. General Graham has framed each of his arguments as a rebuttal to what he regards as the principal objections to the antimissile system. This Senator opposes the Star Wars program for a whole series of reasons. But I am willing to let General Graham select the arguments he considers most serious and answer the Graham rebuttal. General Graham's fourth response was that the critics of the antimissile system called it "provocative and destabilizing."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the fourth part of General Graham's defense of the antimissile system be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IT IS "PROVOCATIVE AND DESTABILIZING"

Answer. This is the same old tired argument that was central to the adoption of Mutual Assured Destruction (MAD) theory in the early 1960's. That theory mandates the vulnerability of populations to nuclear destruction as a positive good. As John Newhouse, supporter and chronicler of MAD put it: "Killing people is good; killing weapons is bad."

To the MADmen, then and now, defending our people is provocative because it would reduce the terribleness of Soviet vengeance if we ever struck them with nuclear weapons, and the sheer terror of it all is their formula for peace!

In conformance with the MAD theory, we have not only dismantled such defenses as we once had, we have failed to apply available technology to the problem of defending ourselves.

If attention to defense of the civil population is indeed "provocative and destabilizing", those who believe so should be greatly provoked by the Soviet Union which has spared no effort to defend its population against nuclear attack.

Massive and constantly upgraded active defense systems exist in the USSR along with a huge Civil Defense program. In fact, the USSR has over the years since we adopted MAD, spent one ruble on strategic defense for every ruble on strategic offense. Part of this has been spent in patent violation of the ABM Treaty.

Small wonder. The Soviets have shown a strong contempt for the mandated vulnerability aspects of the MAD theory from its inception, calling it "bourgeois naivete." Somehow it seems that for the United States to defend its population is provocative; for the Soviets to do so is not.

To argue that strategic defense is destabilizing requires an assumption that today's balance-of-terror is "stable". It is obviously not. Today we move ever closer to a "hair-trigger" launch-on-warning posture wherein accidental launch of a few missiles, a false signal in communication systems, or erroneous intelligence could set off a catastrophic war. High Frontier will move us away from the instability of MAD toward the stability of Mutual Assured Survival.

To argue that defenses are provocative is to argue that building a castle wall is more provocative than amassing cannon. It makes no sense to logical men and women.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Now how about it? Would a defensive missile system be provocative? Would it make nuclear war more likely or less likely? The answer, of course, depends upon your assumptions. If you assume that a defensive missile system will evoke no change from the other side, if you assume the adversary will simply and quietly accept the technological advantage that will nullify their deterrent, destroy the capability they have built up to retaliate effectively for any attack on their country, then "Star Wars" would not be provocative or destabilizing. But does any informed and sane person really believe that the Russians would accept such an effective abolition of their superpower status? Would we?

Look at it from our standpoint. Would we quietly accept such a Russian coup?

Suppose the Soviet Union were going all out with an antimissile system which we firmly believed would succeed in knocking out our capability to retaliate if they initiated a pre-emptive nuclear strike against this country? Would we accept it? Of course not. No one who has ever occupied the White House, or in all likelihood ever will, would accept such a military coup by the Soviet Union or any other country. We would pour whatever technological and economic resources we needed to overcome such a decisive Soviet advantage. If we would race to win back our balance of military power, does anyone believe the Soviets would not do precisely the same thing. So if we go ahead with "Star Wars" what options will the Soviets have? They can race to do the same. Or they can concentrate primarily on building up their offensive missiles to overcome our budding antimissile defense.

Why would they be most likely to spend their economic and technological resources? Answer: wherever they could get the surest, cheapest, and quickest payoff. And on this one I would bet the old homestead against a confederate dollar they would beef up their offensive missiles. Why not? Our own Defense Department has testified that unless we can persuade the Soviets through arms control agreements to limit their offensive missiles they would be able to overwhelm any antimissile program by simply producing more offensive missiles. A greater number of Soviet offensive missiles alone would defeat "Star Wars," provided only they built enough and, of course, they could. For both the U.S.S.R. and the USA, nuclear weapons constitute a small fraction of total military cost. Both superpowers could easily increase their nuclear offensive power fivefold or tenfold if convinced that national survival depended on it. Of course, if the Soviets concentrated on technological improvements to assure the penetration by their offensive missiles they would have a second option for overcoming the antimissile system.

Third, they could try to build their own antimissile. This would almost certainly be far more costly.

But there is no reason why they could not pursue all three options simultaneously. Having started "Star Wars" and faced with the Russian offensive and perhaps defensive buildup too, how would we respond? This country would know the arms race had entered a new dimension on both fronts. I repeat both—not just the antimissile front but the missile and antimissile front both. The one sure consequence is that the nuclear arms race, having entered the new defensive and space dimension, would continue to escalate more swiftly than ever before. Would this be more or less likely to bring nuclear war? The answer is simple, and very clear.

Of course, such an accelerated arms race would bring a greater likelihood of nuclear war. Why? Because we would be entering an entirely new, unpredictable and uncertain phase of the arms competition. For more than 30 years—ever since both superpowers developed the capability to destroy each other we have lived through a period of uneasy peace between the world's two great powers. Why has a superpower war been avoided for more than 30 years? One dominant reason. Each side knew that if it used nuclear weapons against the other, it would suffer an absolutely certain devastation.

It has been clear for more than 30 years that the initiation of nuclear war by either superpower against the other would be an act of certain suicide. It has been a lead pipe cinch that both countries would perish. Maybe the same result, a standoff, would follow if both countries engage in a trillion-dollar antimissile arms race that would in turn greatly escalate the offensive missile arms race. Maybe peace would continue. Maybe but not certainly. It is that element of uncertainty—the possibility that the Soviet Union might under these circumstances achieve a sudden and decisive and temporary technological breakthrough advantage. Of course, if we achieved that kind of an advantage, I am convinced we would not use it and would not initiate a war. I certainly do not have the same confidence in the peaceful attitude of the Soviet Union. And that is what haunts this Senator.

This is why it is so imperative that we stop the nuclear arms race and stop it now with the most far reaching and comprehensive nuclear arms control measures we can verify. We have to be sure we can verify it and, of course, negotiate it so it is mutual.

LET'S NOT RERUN THE HOLOCAUST

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the National Archives, as part of the commemoration of its 50th anniversary, is showing a film series titled "Films for the 50th—A Documentary Retrospective." These films touch on important aspects of American culture and history over the last 50 years.

Appropriately, one of the recent films was a documentary on the Nazi concentration camps. Even though the atrocities at Auschwitz, Treblinka, and Dachau occurred in Europe, no one can deny that the Holocaust is also part of American history. The genocide that took place was morally an international crime.

The documentary on the Nazi concentration camps, which is titled "Night and Fog," was a French film produced in 1955. From the first frames, showing peaceful landscapes seen from behind the barbed wire of a concentration camp, the viewer is struck by the tragedy of the Holocaust.

"Night and Fog" graphically portrays the horror of Hitler's final solution. It shields the audience from no painful aspect of the Holocaust. Children and old women in wheelchairs are seen herded like cattle into trains with no windows. Hundreds of unwilling passengers were packed in each car. They arrived at one of the many concentration camps, and the narrator reminds us that, "no one will enter more than once."

The archway over the entrance to the camp reads "Work is Freedom," but we soon see that the work expected is only freedom from death—and even then, only for as long as the prisoners can withstand the work.

"Night and Fog" goes on to hit you continuously with horrible images, facts, and figures. Again and again, the viewer is reminded of the immensity of this crime. One stark sequence shows page upon page of names from thick concentration camp registry books. The sheer number of victims is hard to imagine.

The film concludes with a thought-provoking statement: "There are those who pretend this happened once, at a certain time, in a certain place." Let me say that we all should realize that the people who think this are fooling themselves. From Carthage, through the Ottoman Turk's genocide of the Armenians, to the slaughter of Cambodians under the Pol Pot regime, genocide has not just occurred once. And there is no guarantee that it is not happening now and that it will not happen again. Nothing can guarantee that genocide will not occur again. That is why we must try our best to reduce the risk of genocide.

The ratification of the Genocide Convention by this Senate would be an important step. The horror captured on the film, "Night and Fog," should not be documented again, with different scenery, and new villains and victims.

Let us help assure that it is not.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for not to extend beyond the hour of 10:30 a.m. with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. GORTON]. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, is morning business still in effect?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is still in morning business but the time for morning business is about to expire.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I would like to be briefly recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

THE SO-CALLED STAR WARS

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Wisconsin is back on the floor. I was occupying the chair when he had a brief discussion this morning on General Graham's continued comments about the so-called star wars.

This disturbs me, not the remarks, necessarily, of the Senator from Wisconsin, but the whole developing attitude in the House and the Senate in opposition to any research on our part relative to an ability to either intercept Russian satellites that need intercepting or to render useless by the use of electronic devices any satellite that might be doing us damage.

Mr. President, I happen to recall instances in history when the world has been faced with similar propositions and, I would say, equally as dangerous in their consideration at that time. I refer to the advent of gunpowder and great problems internationally; the coming of the tank in World War I, which was supposed to end land warfare; the advent of the aircraft in World War I, further developed in World War II; the advent of bombing And against all of these weapons, counterweapons were developed. We continually move forward in our suggested theater of operations. When General Graham discusses the possibilities of war in space, I think we should pay attention to him and all the other people who see in space not only a potential for war but, even beyond that, a very great potential for peace. This is something I cannot discuss on the floor, but we are well along, in my humble opinion, in the development of equipment that can well herald the day of peace. I am not sure whether the Soviets have the same ideas or not, but I have a suspicion that they do.

What we are talking about really when we get into this research on the detection and the apprehension of satellites that we feel need that attention and apprehension is not catastrophic means such as many people think—nuclear arms. That is not included in the thinking of General Graham. For example, to render ineffective one satellite that is in space for the purpose of observation or the purpose of repeating messages from Earth for the detection of infrared would require 1 or 2 watts at the most of laser, which would not destroy the satellite; it would merely render it inoperative.

I think it is a rather sad commentary upon the state of the American mind when we want to limit the research that we have proposed in the development of our ability to take care of satellites that would prove to be disadvantageous to our future or even advantageous to the Soviets in the bringing of war. I recall the Senator from Wisconsin said, and I completely agree with him, that the possibility of nuclear war being started by either of the major powers is very, very remote. But I do believe, and believe very strongly, that we should be allowed to go ahead with the rather limited research which we have asked for—probably as many as 10 experiments a year. We now are limited to two. We have the factor of time that will limit a great number of them. But I hope that both the House and the Senate—and we are, I might say, discussing this very thoroughly in the conference on armed services—would come to an agreement that we could go ahead with the research which is necessary for us to be able to do as we have done in the past, develop antitank weapons, antiaircraft weapons, and so forth and so on.

I merely wanted to make those comments, and I am glad that the Senator was on the floor when I made them.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, are we in morning business now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are still in morning business.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I thank my good friend from Arizona for his remarks. I think what he says is very prudent. I think we have to recognize the kind of costs we are talking about here. By far the biggest single increase in research and development in the armed services authorization was for this antimissile program. It went from about a billion dollars to about a billion and a half. The administration asked for a 70-percent increase. They tell us that it is going to be $25 billion over the next 5 years, so it is a huge program, very, very costly. They tell us we will not know until 1992 whether an antimissile system would be practical. Then we will have spent $50 billion in research and development, and according to Secretary DeLauer the cost will be, he says, staggering. If we look at what he tells us, the cost will be close to one-half trillion dollars.

So I am saying that the cost is very great. I say if we proceed in this defensive missile way, we are going to violate the ABM treaty at one time or another. It may or may not be a good thing to renounce, but it is something we have to recognize.

That means the Soviet Union is going to match what we have done. It will match us not only in defensive missiles but match us in offensive missiles. That means the arms race will step up, the costs will be tremendous, and the uncertainty on both sides will be greater. For that reason, I think the prospects of nuclear war may be greater than they are with the present kind of deterrence we have on both sides.

I am delighted that my good friend from Arizona has spoken up. He is far better versed than this Senator on these military matters. He served for years with great distinction on the Armed Services Committee. He is a real expert in this field, perhaps one of the only two or three experts in the Senate. So I have great faith in what the Senator has to say. But I think we should recognize that we may be moving in the direction of accelerating an arms race which will cost a great deal and will create an uncertainty that is worse than it is now, and perhaps bring nuclear war closer.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I could not agree more with the Senator relative to cost. I queried Dr. DeLauer at great length during one hearing, and at great length several times since, and I have to admit what the Senator has said. He does not know.

We want to do the experimentation that we are now engaged in at a relatively low price in order to be able to tell in a matter of a few years whether we should go ahead with it. I am not standing here saying that we should spend a trillion dollars for this, but the Soviets already have a pretty good ability in this intercept field. I think we have, too. But I would much prefer to see the Congress take a hands-off position until we know a little bit more about the cost. And Dr. DeLauer will be the first one to say, "I don't know." He has told our committees that he does not know. But the only way we are going to find out is through research and development, and when the time comes then to make the decisions I think we can talk a little bit more intelligently.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Is it not true, however, that the administration has indicated their program would cost $25 billion for R&D in this field over the next 5 years?

Mr. GOLDWATER. He said he did not know. Now, he mentioned the figure of $22 billion as an off the top of the head possibility. But the research I am talking about is an ongoing research that we have been doing.

Mr. PROXMIRE. The Senator is correct absolutely. We have had a billion dollars in research this year in this area.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I say for the safety of our country a billion dollars is not a lot of money. I would rather spend a billion dollars on research for the protection of our country and the whole world, I might say, than throw a billion dollars around on some of the things we throw it around on here.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Senator.

SOCIAL SECURITY COST-OF-LIVING ADJUSTMENTS IN 1985

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I was necessarily absent when the vote was called on amendment number 3423, which is intended to assure Social Security recipients that they will receive a cost-of-living increase next year.

If I had been present I would have voted for the well-reasoned approach that was offered by Senator MOYNIHAN, and would have asked to be a cosponsor.

I have been a strong and constant advocate of the needs of Social Security recipients from the program's inception. It was my privilege as a Member of the House of Representatives to affirmatively cast my vote for the original Social Security legislation on April 19, 1935.

It is my belief that Social Security is an example of a Federal Government program that has worked and fulfilled its original promise.

We are advised that the Social Security trust funds are in satisfactory condition and this will allow for the commitment that the Senate has made to the recipients of the Social Security program in 1985. These increases will allow the beneficiaries to keep pace with the rise in prices.

It is encouraging that inflation is at a low level but we must remember the elderly and disabled in most cases are unable to keep pace with increases in prices, no matter how low they may be.

The further positive action in the Senate guarantees that the Social Security Program will receive a timely COLA on January 1, 1985.

THE RETIREMENT OF MAJ. GEN. ALBERT B. AKERS

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, Maj. Gen. Albert B. Akers recently retired from the U.S. Army after more than 33 years of distinguished professional service. General Akers graduated from the U.S. Military Academy in 1951 and was commissioned as a second lieutenant of the artillery. I came to know General Akers during his last assignment, as the commanding general at Fort Jackson, SC. He leaves the Army appreciative of the opportunity he has had to serve his country and to return in some way the education and experience he has received.

It was, indeed, an honor to have worked closely with General Akers on matters of great importance to the State of South Carolina and to our Nation. I know firsthand the positive impact that General Akers' life has had on the military preparedness of our country. The respect and admiration given him has been well earned for his far-reaching achievements and great influence.

As General Akers begins a new era in his life, I believe that he can take great pride in his distinguished career of service to our Nation and rest assured that the flame of freedom burns ever brighter because of his many contributions.

May God bless General Akers and his wife, Mary, with years of happiness and good health. I firmly believe that this happiness is well deserved, as I believe that I am lucky to be able to call Gen. Albert B. Akers my friend.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a paper entitled "Fort Jackson Renaissance" be included at the conclusion of my remarks. This paper is a description of the progress and achievements made by General Akers at Fort Jackson, making it the finest Army basic training installation in the United States.

There being no objection, the paper was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORT JACKSON RENAISSANCE

At Fort Jackson, the path to excellence has been charted by a Renaissance of high standards involving training, quality of life, service, commitment and discipline. This rebirth of vitality and purpose creates a positive environment in which the "Fort Jackson Team" is molding a cohesive military and civilian community. The Renaissance, more than anything else, is a philosophy of how to train and how to take care of people. It is an all-encompassing surge forward to make Fort Jackson a training center of excellence and a better place to live and work—where training is tough and demanding because it must be and because it is expected to be—where appearance of the post provides the right backdrop for excellence in training—where better support to the community causes better support by the community—where individual and group pride in accomplishment bring about pride in being a part of the "Fort Jackson Team". In order to move forward on a broad front, innovation was necessary and shaping attitude was the key.

Innovation in training had to be founded on a professional cadre that reflected the meaning of "think, look, and act as a leader." The officer and non-commissioned officer professional development program became our number one priority because a well-trained, competent and disciplined cadre is essential to providing quality soldiers. Included as part of our professional development program was a new initiative called professional guidance which called upon leaders at all levels to teach and apply the morals, values, ethics and traditions unique to the profession of arms.

The Renaissance has had a dramatic impact on the quality of Fort Jackson's training. Initial entry training (IET) is tougher, more demanding and focuses on producing soldiers who are fit to fight and have the positive attitudes necessary to win. We want to develop soldiers who can take orders and accomplish them to exacting standards. Training starts in the Army's largest Reception Station, continues through rigorous Basic Training and does not end until trainees have met or exceeded the demanding standards of Advanced Individual Training. At Fort Jackson, the attitude that trainees must "think, look and act as soldiers—always" is constantly reinforced. Our approach to IET is called the "Total Training Environment" in which everything is viewed as training. Every task, every minute is approached with a positive attitude and a plan to exploit each training opportunity for maximum benefit. Phased training, increased emphasis on conduct and discipline, enhanced standards, tough physical readiness training, common skills reinforcement and testing in AIT, and FTXs for all MOS producing schools are a few of Fort Jackson's training initiatives designed to provide the operating forces with soldiers who are team players immediately ready to contribute to unit mission accomplishment.

Quality of life has been addressed rigorously in Fort Jackson's Renaissance effort. Quality of life means our living and working conditions, our recreational activities and our community services for soldiers, civilian employees and family members. Key programs include the Installation Modernization Program, the Command Sponsorship Program, Task Forces and special activities and events.

The Installation Modernization Program's goal is to modernize the post's facilities in which Fort Jackson's soldiers, their families and civilians work, live and relax. Currently, forty percent of our facilities in use today were constructed during World War II as temporary buildings. These substandard facilities need replacement not only because of the high energy and maintenance costs to maintain operation, but more importantly, because the very visible, deplorable state of these facilities connotes and leads to perceptions of second class citizenship, a lowering of performance and professionalism, and a lack of team spirit and community pride. First rate work and recreation facilities are the backdrop to good training, and we have made considerable progress in our renovation and construction projects.

Newly completed construction projects include the Alpine Lodge for hunters and fishermen, the Cadence Club for AIT soldiers, the Officers' Club, and the Roller Skating Rink. Key renovations include the Fort Jackson Welcome Center, the Army Community Service facility, the Post Exchange Shoppette, the Public Affairs/Media Center, the Fort Jackson Post Office, a major Post Hospital upgrade, and the Post Headquarters, with numerous other facilities in planning for upgrade. New projects either under construction or slated for construction this year include a Guest House, Commissary, Chapel/Child Care Center, Education Center, and EM Club for permanent party soldiers. Conceptually complete is a Soldier Service Center which will provide, under one roof, administrative and financial services for all soldiers to include in-processing and outprocessing of trainees, permanent party, separatees, retirees and their families. The Welcome Center will also become a part of the Soldier Service Center. Effort has been initiated to secure the necessary funds to complete design of the facility and to initiate construction. Across the installation effective management procedures, along with state-of-the-art equipment, such as word processors, sophisticated telephone systems, and computers, have increased the efficiency and teamwork of Fort Jackson operations.

The Command Sponsorship Program is the bridge between the separate but related worlds of training and quality of life. Sponsorship creates a positive environment in which Fort Jackson units share the benefits and responsibility for the success of the various quality of life activities and facilities. Sponsorship of post activities by units establishes the setting for quality training and creates a climate of positive community involvement.

The spirit of community involvement and support also extends to the special activities and events that are held at Fort Jackson. These activities and events link the Fort Jackson community with civilian neighbors in nearby communities. Examples include Torchlight Tattoo on the 4th of July, Volksmarches and the Annual South Carolina Special Olympics.

In short, the Fort Jackson Renaissance represents a dedication to excellence involving training, quality of life, service, discipline and commitment . . . a must for the Army of the 1980s.

TRIBUTE TO COLOMBIA'S "WAR WITHOUT QUARTER"

Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, last month a brave crusader against international drug trafficking was brutally murdered. Rodrigo Lara Bonilla, who had served as Minister of Justice of Colombia, was gunned down by cocaine dealers, due to the Minister's increasingly effective efforts to curb his country's involvement in the drug trade.

The sacrifice this great man has made with his life has not been in vain, however. Colombia has declared a "state of siege" on drug traffickers, and listed below are some of what Colombian authorities have accomplished thus far: 390 persons have been arrested; 617 houses have been searched; 25 airplanes, 38 trucks and 1 ship have been seized; and 300 tons of marijuana and 164 kilos of cocaine have been confiscated. Colombia is, indeed, waging "War Without Quarter" on drug traffickers.

The reasons for this awakening on the part of Colombia and its citizens to the dangers of drug trafficking are not exclusively related to that nation's collective outrage over Lara Bonilla's assassination. Colombians, increasingly concerned by the growing size, aggressiveness, power, and sheer arrogance of the narcotics organizations, could no longer ignore the fact that their nation was being taken over. For example, the amount of cocaine money that was coming into Colombia had grown to the extent that cocaine dollars were being blamed for wild distortions in the Colombian financial system and even for the failure of one major bank.

Another reason for this increased awareness is the alarming increase in cocaine use by Colombia's young people. The drug networks had encouraged the creation of an internal Colombian market for a cocaine product of low quality, thus not for export—Basuka, a paste of semiprocessed coca leaves suitable for smoking. Their campaign was so successful that Colombian officials believe that this cocaine base is now the most abused stimulant among Colombian youth, and the most dangerous. Not only is it addictive, but it can often create a nightmarish hangover of psychosis.

In their search for profits, then, the Colombian drug dealers do not spare even their own. This internal marketing of cocaine has brought home to the Colombians a problem they once believed was limited to the United States and Europe. With recent developments, however, the Colombians are waking up to the devastating effects of drug trafficking on their society.

It is also obvious that the Colombians will no longer tolerate the violence of the drug underground. In Colombia, there are five guerrilla groups known to be in existence, with more than 10,000 rural and urban fighters. Murders, kidnapings and street crime occur so often in Colombian cities that private bodyguards and armored cars are considered necessities for any family of means. With estimated revenues of $500 million per year, Colombian cocaine operators are willing to use any means to protect their organizations. That situation has created such lawlessness in Colombia that the citizens of that nation are demanding a return to order.

And it is working. As the editor of Colombia's most widely read newspaper, El Tiempo, stated recently:

We are dealing with an inconceivable challenge and a monstrous provocation that obliges a change in the rules of the game * * * the people demand more authority and an iron fist.

Mr. President, the people and the Government of Colombia should be encouraged and supported in their efforts. It will not be a simple thing to rid their homeland of the scourge of drug dealers, but with the kind of determination exhibited by Rodrigo Lara Bonilla in his short time in office, we know that Colombians can and will be successful in obliterating drug trafficking.

I respectfully request that the enclosed article entitled "Colombia Fights Back After Waking to Ravages of Drug Trade," in the Washington Post, dated May 21, 1984, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLOMBIA FIGHTS BACK AFTER WAKING TO RAVAGES OF DRUG TRADE

(By Jackson Diehl)

BOGOTA, COLOMBIA.—In city slums, teenagers on street corners smoke an addictive raw cocaine base that offers a brief high and often a nightmarish hangover of psychosis.

On the sparsely settled southeastern plains, police discover an "industrial complex" of narcotics: 19 laboratories, 44 buildings, an airstrip with five planes, a power plant and a communications complex. They also discovered 12.5 metric tons of pure cocaine which would be worth up to $1.2 billion on the street in the United States.

In Bogota, Appeals Court Judge Rodolfo Garcia Ordonez removes a neatly typed, anonymous letter from his top desk drawer. "We order you," it says, "not to intervene again" in the case of a major cocaine trafficker from the commercial center of Medellin. "Otherwise we will be obliged to submit you and your family to a fatal accident," it adds.

These are among the public manifestations of Colombia's vast narcotics underworld. It is a business that during the past five years has grown from an easy-to-ignore illicit traffic with American users to a virtual state-within-a-state maintaining its own public figures, factories and armies here. It is arrogant enough to challenge openly the official leaders of Colombia.

La mafia may have reached its apex on the evening of April 30, when two hired men from Medellin gunned down justice minister Rodrigo Lara Bonilla, who virtually alone had crusaded against the narcotics trade and tried to warn the country that it was a threat.

Since then, President Belisario Betancur has declared a state of siege and a "war without quarter" on drug traffickers. Authorities have arrested more than 500 suspects. The public in this chronically troubled nation of 27 million seems to have awakened.

"The assassination showed the degree of aggressiveness and arrogance, and the sheer size that the narcotics organizations had arrived at," said Garcia, a former prosecutor of narcotics cases. "It was a shock that caused people to analyze a situation they had not paid much attention to before."

The outrage over the Lara Bonilla killing in part seems to reflect public frustration with decades of rampant violence and rural lawlessness that made Colombia a logical base for smuggling and crime.

Since 1948, when a decade-long civil war known as la violencia erupted between Colombia's traditional Liberal and Conservative parties, wide zones of the undeveloped countryside and the backstreets of big cities have ruled by successive bands of guerrillas, smugglers and crime networks.

Today Colombia is plagued by five leftist guerrilla groups with more than 10,000 rural and urban fighters. Murders, kidnapings and street crime are so common in the cities that private bodyguards and around care are considered virtual necessities for any family of means. Medellin, meanwhile, has been a capital of contraband ranging from marijuana, methaqualone and emeralds to illegally imported American cigarettes.

In this vast underworld, the Colombian cocaine organizations, with their huge installations and estimated $500 million in annual revenues, have become both the dominant powers and the public symbols of national lawlessness.

* * * * *

It was not always that way. The Colombians who began in the late 1970s to establish networks for refining coca leaves grown in Peru and Bolivia into cocaine and shipping it abroad initially seemed to enjoy public indifference and occasional complicity.

The richest of the traffickers in fact became national celebrities, tolerated and even toasted for their eccentric habits and vast wealth. One of the best-known of those accused by the government of conducting the trade, Pablo Escobar Gaviria, was elected to Congress as an alternate delegate in 1982.

Escobar won support around Medellin by donating lighting systems to the stadiums of his favorite soccer teams. On his sprawling ranch, he built artifical lakes and his own airport and stocked a private zoo with exotic animals. One local magazine was even moved to call him the "native Robin Hood." He is now a fugitive.

What has changed national attitudes toward such flamboyant figures has been the increasing influence of the cocaine organizations within traditional institutions and the spread of both drug consumption and violence within the country.

Eager to replace the coca plants smuggled from Peru and Bolivia with local products, the Colombian organizations several years ago began to encourage the expansion of coca growing in Colombia from a few isolated sites to more than 40,000 acres of fields by last year, according to officials here.

While vast tracts of land were thus taken over by the narcotics industry, Colombian coca leaves proved to be of relatively poor quality. So, Colombian authorities say, the drug networks have sought to create an internal market for raw cocaine base, a paste of semi-processed coca leaves suitable for smoking.

The marketing effort has been frighteningly successful. Although no accurate surveys have been done, law enforcement and family-welfare officials believe that cocaine base, or basuka, may be the most abused stimulant among Colombian youth—and the most dangerous. Because it is only partly processed, the base is usually laced with impurities, such as gasoline residues, that can cause almost immediate neurological damage among users.

The internal marketing of cocaine brought home a problem that many Colombians once perceived as limited to the United States and Europe. By early this year, meanwhile, the influence of narcotics money seemed to be everywhere. Many experts blame cocaine dollars for wild distortions in the financial system and even the failure of one major bank.

Lara Bonilla charged that narcotics capital was financing six of Colombia's 14 professional soccer teams. In nationwide municipal elections in March, authorities acknowledged that millions of dollars from the traffickers had gone into the campaign funds of the Liberal and Conservative parties.

Finally, there was the violence, going beyond gangland slayings among drug traders. Lara Bonilla and U.S. officials charged that Escobar and another alleged trafficker, Carlos Lehder Rivas, helped found a right-wing terrorist group known as Death Kidnappers, which has been blamed for hundreds of assassinations of suspected guerrillas as well as threats and attacks on judges, prosecutors, journalists and politicians opposed to the drug trade.

Evidence revealed this year by Colombian police and U.S. drug enforcement officials indicated that some traffickers had turned from infighting to cooperation with major leftist guerrilla groups. In return for arms and money, U.S. officials charged, some fronts of the Colombian Revolutionary Armed Forces were providing land and high-powered protection to cocaine-processing centers.

The assassination of Lara Bonilla, a promising young leader of the political establishment, seemed to be the last straw.

"We are dealing with an inconceivable challenge and a monstrous provocation that obliges a change in the rules of the game," wrote editor Enrique Santos Calderon in Colombia's most respected newspaper, El Tiempo. "The people demand more authority and an iron fist."

TEXTILE IMPORTS

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I recently read a most disturbing article that appeared in the July 25 edition of the Washington Post concerning fraudulent shipments of textile/apparel products into this country.

The article pointed out several cases where major textile exporting countries have blatantly disregarded existing quotas and textile agreements with the United States in their effort to capture an even greater share of our domestic market. The article quoted the testimony of Thomas Gray, a senior Customs Service agent, who reportedly told the House Commerce Committee that Customs had seized $19.6 billion in illegally shipped textile products from October 1983 to mid-July of this year. Unfortunately, this amounts to but a small portion of the massive and expanding problem of illegal textile goods shipments.

Textile/apparel imports into this country over the first 5 months of this year are 45 percent higher than the import volume over the same timeframe in 1983. The textile/apparel trade deficit totaled $6.2 billion over that same period. Needless to say, these figures represent record increases.

Mr. President, I cannot understand how such rapid import growth could be allowed to take place in contravention of our textile trade agreements and a commitment by President Reagan to keep import growth in line with domestic market expansion and his directions to the White House staff to do this. The textile multifiber arrangement and bilateral trade agreements between the United States and various exporting countries are generally designed to limit the major exporters of textiles to growth rates of between 1½ and 3 percent over the next 4 years. Obviously, these agreements are being totally disregarded by many of our trading partners.

Mr. President, it is time for the present administration to address this problem head on. Steps must be taken immediately to preserve textile jobs in this country. Toward that end, I would recommend the following corrective actions:

First, countries whose exporters disregard textile trade agreements and participate in fraudulent practices should face immediate and substantial reductions in their import quotas.

Second, customs officials should be placed in foreign countries in order to examine U.S.-bound shipments of textile products and to determine the actual country of origin.

Third, a system of import licensing should be implemented so that customs officials can better control the influx of textile products into the United States.

Fourth, anticounterfeiting legislation, passed by the Senate earlier this summer, should be promptly considered and approved by the House of Representatives. This legislation creates a Federal felony and stiffer civil penalties for persons convicted of intentionally trafficking counterfeit goods.

Fifth, textile product labeling legislation, which I introduced to help consumers better identify American-made textile products, and which has also been approved by the Senate, should be considered and passed by the House expeditiously.

Mr. President, while these suggestions pertain primarily to textiles, I wish to remind my colleagues that a similar situation exists today for many industries. Trading partners that continue to deal in less than good faith make it very difficult for our policymakers to support the concept of "free trade."

For these reasons, Mr. President, I again emphasize that efforts must be exerted in order to correct these problems. I offer these suggestions today in hopes that action will be taken by the administration and, where legislation is necessary, by the congressional committees with jurisdiction over trade, to address these serious problems.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the Washington Post article of July 25, 1984, to which I referred earlier in my statement.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CUSTOMS SAYS TEXTILES POSE SERIOUS PROBLEM

(By Stuart Anderson)

When they landed in Los Angeles, the bolts of polyester fabric carried "Made in Korea" labels. But on the boxes they were shipped in, the same label had been crudely crossed out and the documents accompanying the shipment declared that the fabric's country of origin was Japan.

That $2 million shipment was described by a U.S. Customs agent yesterday as a drop in the bucket of a multibillion-dollar scam by countries around the world to beat U.S. textile quotas.

Some countries try to sell textiles and wearing apparel that exceeds their U.S. quotas by transshipping the excess through another country that cannot fill its own quotas, senior Customs agent Thomas Gray told the House Commerce Committee's investigations panel.

Gray, who is based in Hong Kong, said textile products made in China are shipped to the United States under the quotas of Bangladesh, Macao and countries in the Middle East and South and Central America. Similarly, shipments of garments originating in Taiwan sometimes are labeled as coming from Japan, Singapore, the Philippines, South Africa, Panama and countries in the Middle East.

Gray said customs agents discovered Korea's transshipment of the polyester fabric through Japan six months ago and have been seizing illegally labeled cartons of the products ever since.

"They didn't even bother to repack it," said a somewhat nonplused subcommittee Chairman John D. Dingell (D-Mich.). "They just lined out the country of origin. That indicates a certain supreme contempt for American enforcement."

Gray replied that that case showed unusually "sloppy" work. "They are very clever," he said.

Although he declined to put a precise dollar figure on the fraudulent playing with textile quotas, Gray said customs agents are currently investigating cases involving $2.5 billion of shipments. From last October to mid-July, Customs officials said they had seized $19.6 billion in illegally shipped textile products.

The increased level of seizures comes as the American textile industry is pressing the Reagan administration to tighten up even more on imports, which hit a record high of 4 billion square yards—an increase of 45 percent—during the first five months of this year. The United States' textile trade deficit totaled $6.2 billion in that period.

U.S. manufacturers and labor unions this week filed unfair trade cases against 11 countries—Panama, Colombia, Argentina, Indonesia, Malaysia, Peru, Portugal, Singapore, Sri Lanka, Thailand and Turkey—and said other complaints will be filed against Mexico and the Philippines

Running down the list of America's major textile suppliers in the Pacific Rim, Gray said:

Taiwan, the largest supplier of apparel to the United States, is likely to remain a problem as the quota system exists.

South Korea, which has just moved up as the No. 2 supplier, runs a gamut of fraudulent activities that includes transshipping textiles, counterfeiting of trademarks and brand name products, and misdirecting and undervaluing merchandise to evade customs duties. Korean transsipments go through Japan, the Middle East and Panama.

Hong Kong, the No. 3 supplier, cooperates better than any other country with U.S. authorities to prevent fraud. Nevertheless, with its booming textiles industry, it is "a primary source of transshipments."

China, the giant of the Pacific Rim that has emerged as the fourth-largest supplier of textiles to the United States, is known for transshipping its excess production through a number of countries.

Japan, No. 5 among major U.S. suppliers, serves as a transshipment point for products originating in Korea, Taiwan and Macao.

Singapore, which offers U.S. authorities "the lowest level of cooperation" in the Asian region, serves as a base for the transshipment of acrylic knit sweaters and cotton and synthetic jackets from Taiwan, and for other apparel from Malaysia and China.

Sri Lanka strictly monitors its own industry, so a "Made in Sri Lanka" label means it is the country of origin.

India, whose government "makes nice gestures but is not very cooperative with U.S. authorities," is a source of textiles transshipped through neighboring nations of Nepal, Bhutan and Bangladesh.

Bangladesh, with a new textile industry that first moved into the U.S. market in 1982, is increasing exports to get larger quotas, currently serves as a transshipment point for shorts and pants that are made in China.

Pakistan transships towels and similar products and poses problems as a source of undervalued and misdescribed goods.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations and a treaty message which were referred to the appropriate committees.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-719. A resolution adopted by the legislature of the State of Louisiana; to the Committee on Armed Services.

"HOUSE RESOLUTION No. 18

"Whereas, the people of the state of Louisiana are dedicated to the concept of world peace; and

"Whereas, the present trend toward mutually assured destruction characterized by the stockpiling of nuclear weapons by the United States and the Soviet Union is an ever present threat to world peace; and

"Whereas, there exists developing technology which in the future will provide for construction of a nonnuclear defense system to protect the United States against a nuclear first strike by the Soviet Union or any other hostile power; and

"Whereas, this system, commonly known as "High Frontier" technology, involves the use of satellites to intercept and destroy nuclear missiles targeted at the United States or at the territories of its allies; and

"Whereas, the use of such a system would not mean that the nuclear retaliatory capabilities of the United States would be abandoned or neglected; and

"Whereas, the United States can take the first step in efforts to assure world peace and mutual assured survival while continuing to protect its people from the threat of nuclear war through the use of "High Frontier" technology.

"Therefore, be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the Legislature of Louisiana that Congress is hereby memorialized to take the initial step toward achieving world peace and mutual assured survival by active pursuit of the concept of "High Frontier" technology as an effective means of eliminating the threat to world peace caused by the proliferation of nuclear weapons.

"Be it further resolved that copies of this Resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and to each member of the Louisiana Congressional delegation."

POM-720. A resolution adopted by the Senate of the State of Illinois; to the Committee on Armed Services.

"SENATE RESOLUTION No. 719

"Whereas, the Joliet Arsenal is a 26,000 acre federally owned facility which has a long history of providing substantial and significant contributions to America's national defense, both during times of war and peace; and

"Whereas, this vast resource, which is strategically located near two interstate highways systems, rail and water transportation systems, and major metropolitan areas, remains virtually idle, and reactivation of the Joliet Arsenal should be seriously considered; and

"Whereas, the maximum utilization of the Joliet Arsenal would not only be an efficient and tax-saving use of existing facilities, but would also be a clear demonstration of a federal capacity to respond to acute local needs by replacing hundreds of dispossessed jobs and easing, particularly in the Joliet area, oppressive unemployment of staggering proportions; and

"Whereas, the Arsenal Task Force has listed five priorities concerning the reactivation of the Arsenal: federal funds, starting in 1985, to upgrade the physical structure of the plant and to create jobs; support of 4 ammunitions production contracts that Honeywell is bidding for; transfer of 160 acres of land from the Army so the Joliet Regional Port District can develop a port authority; establishment of an ordinance training school, where military would train in the use of military equipment and ammunition; and production of high-powered explosives; and

"Whereas, the State of Illinois, which suffers a massive tax imbalance with Washington and a disproportionate share of the economic burden caused by the recent recession, hopes that it will receive a more equitable and commensurate share of federal economic stimulus as the Congress, along with the Department of Defense, concurs on the inherent and overwhelming advantages that the Joliet Arsenal offers; therefore, be it

"Resolved, by the Senate of the Eighty-Third General Assembly of the State of Illinois, That we hereby petition President Ronald Reagan, the United States Congress, Secretary of Defense Caspar Weinberger, and the Illinois Congressional Delegation to support all efforts to reactivate the Joliet Arsenal; and be it further

"Resolved, That a suitable copy of this preamble and resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, each member of the Illinois Congressional Delegation, and the Secretary of Defense."

POM-721. A resolution adopted by the Southeastern Regional Council of the National Association of Housing and Redevelopment Officials relating to public housing; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

POM-722. A resolution adopted by the Third Congress of the Federated States of Micronesia urging Congress to approve the compact of free association and its related agreements entered into between the government of the Federated States of Micronesia and Government of the United States of America; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

POM-723. A resolution adopted by the council of the county of Hawaii urging Congress to acknowledge the illegal and immoral actions of the United States in the overthrow of the kingdom of Hawaii and grant restitution for losses and damages suffered by native Hawaiians as a result of those actions; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

POM-724. A resolution adopted by the legislature of the State of Michigan; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

"RESOLUTION

"Whereas, United States Congressman Dale Kildee, along with a number of other Michigan congressional representatives, has recently introduced into Congress a bill which would designate 90,300 acres in three of our state's national forests as national wilderness areas. This designation will cut off any commercial use of this vast expanse of land and will highly restrict its use for recreational purposes. Moreover, it is over and above the wilderness areas already designated by Michigan state government in the Upper Peninsula; and

"Whereas, the multiple use of forest products is now the basis of the economy of the Upper Peninsula of Michigan. This proposed designation, then, will add to the unemployment problems in the State of Michigan and will restrict economic growth, particularly in the western end of the Upper Peninsula where welfare case loads and unemployment rank the highest in Michigan; and

"Whereas, additionally, there seems to be a widely-held misconception that the designation of forest lands as wilderness areas contributes to the tourism industry. Tourism in Michigan, however, is largely based on the use of forest lands, not on the restriction of them. Moreover, the wilderness area concept is not as conducive to good wildlife management as many believe. Well managed and maintained forests provide the cover, feed, and shelter which wildlife requires to exist; and

"Whereas, it would be far better if Congressman Kildee and the other sponsors of this ill-conceived legislation were to pay more attention to creating employment in their own districts rather than enacting legislation which would cause increased unemployment in the Upper Peninsula. Congressman Kildee, along with the supporters of this legislation, have never provided for the economic development of, and jobs in, Michigan's Upper Peninsula. Legislation to restrict the multiple use of these lands will only add to the misery and suffering of individuals who live in the Upper Peninsula; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate, That the members of the Michigan Legislature hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States not to create additional wilderness area in Michigan's Upper Peninsula; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and to the members of the Michigan congressional delegation."

POM-725. A joint resolution adopted by the legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 55

"Whereas, the Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum was originally completed in 1923 and dedicated to the American dead of World War I; and

"Whereas, the Coliseum was conceived and financed by local civic groups as a 75,000 seat multi-purpose stadium to serve the people of the Great Los Angeles Region; and

"Whereas, the Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum was partially reconstructed and enlarged to seat 101,574 spectators for the 1932 Summer Olympic Games of the Xth Olympiad, and has since witnessed many other significant sports, as well as political and historical events; and

"Whereas, the Coliseum was both originally designed and later redesigned by one of the pioneer architects of California, John Parkinson, with his son Donald B. Parkinson, whose many Los Angeles buildings of the early 20th Century are now nationally registered historical sites; and

"Whereas, the Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum was successfully nominated by The American Institute of Architects, and cosponsored by the Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum Commission and the University of Southern California, as California Registered Historical Landmark No. 960, and has been nominated and cosponsored by those organizations as a National Historic Landmark; and

"Whereas, the Coliseum will become the first Olympic stadium in the world to host two official modern Summer Olympic Games when the XXIIIrd Olympiad opens there on July 28, 1984; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California endorses the nomination of the Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum as a National Historic Landmark and memorializes the Secretary of the Interior to expeditiously make that designation in order that the dedication ceremonies may be held on the opening day of the XXIIIrd Olympiad in Los Angeles, July 28, 1984; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit a copy of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Secretary of the Interior, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-726. A concurrent resolution adopted by the legislature of the State of Louisiana; to the Committee on Finance.

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION No. 204

"Whereas, this nation has a responsibility to aid the less fortunate including the needy, deprived children who are as much a part of the future of this nation as are the children reared in a more economically stable environment; the elderly; and those who, due to physical, mental, or educational handicaps, economic conditions, or child care responsibilities, are unable to provide for themselves and their families; and

"Whereas, with so many people out of work and many of them exhausting unemployment benefits every day, programs such as Aid to Families with Dependent Children, General Assistance, Food Stamps, and programs for the medically needy become the last defense against utter destitution for families and individuals; and

"Whereas, the need to reduce the federal deficit should no longer be used to argue for further erosion of welfare programs, nor should states and localities, most of which are under serious financial strain themselves, be forced, through their own welfare programs, to compensate for a national economic policy that has largely been indifferent to unemployment and the misery we call poverty; and

"Whereas, since additional cuts in current welfare programs would be truly devastating but there is still a need for more assistance with available dollars, it is therefore critical that federal government begin seeking out innovative ways of dealing with these very grave problems, ways in which welfare dollars can be more effectively spent for the benefit of those in need; and

"Whereas, because statistics show that the State of Louisiana has a very high population of poor people; ranks near to the last among the fifty states in its AFDC flat grant amount, and has one of the highest infant mortality rates in the world (12.9%), the state would be an ideal environment for pilot programs for innovative welfare reform approaches instituted by the federal government.

"Therefore, be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the Legislature of Louisiana, the Senate thereof concurring, that the legislature does hereby urge and request the Congress of the United States to initiate and pursue innovative welfare reform programs, and also requests that the Louisiana congressional delegation aggressively pursue designation for Louisiana as a pilot state for appropriate new welfare reform approaches initiated by Congress.

"Be it further resolved that a copy of this Resolution be transmitted to the secretary of the United States Senate, the clerk of the United States House of Representatives, and to each member of the Louisiana congressional delegation."

POM-727. A resolution adopted by the City Council of Beaumont, TX, relating to Texas Highway 87; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

POM-728. A joint resolution adopted by the legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 51

"Whereas, the Environmental Protection Agency is currently considering the possibility of burning hazardous wastes in incinerator ships off California's coast; and

"Whereas, the legal jurisdiction and enforcement responsibility in international waters is unclear and, to date, no regulations for incineration of hazardous wastes at sea have been adopted; and

"Whereas, no substantial research has yet been completed on the potential short-term or cumulative long-term effects of this incineration proposal and neither have any risk assessments been completed; and

"Whereas, spills or leakages of raw waste from an incineration vessel could cause considerable adverse economic and environmental consequences; and

"Whereas, a hazardous waste spill could occur or hazardous wastes could be dumped in an emergency, releasing highly persistent, toxic compounds which would sink to the bottom of the ocean, contaminating the entire water column and the marine life therein; and

"Whereas, the practice of ocean incineration does not provide for complete destruction of any hazardous waste, thus allowing unburned materials or dangerous emissions to escape onto the microlayer of the ocean, poisoning organisms and fish and possibly moving up the food chain; and

"Whereas, hydrocholoric acid, which is sometimes released in the burning process, could contribute to the formation of acid fog and acid rain; and

"Whereas, the technical capability to incinerate hazardous waste remains unknown, including the ability to maintain a constant temperature of at least 2,400° F for long periods of time, and it would be difficult to monitor the technical burning process at sea; and

"Whereas, transporting the waste materials to incineration sites would also present risks of catastrophic damage to the marine and coastal environments; and

"Whereas, additional unknown and significant adverse effects may also exist but are not clear, due to the lack of information; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the President of the United States to direct the Environmental Protection Agency to stop considering any proposals to incinerate hazardous waste off California's coast, until valid and reliable scientific studies have proven that the environmental effects of this proposal would be negligible; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit a copy of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-729. A joint resolution adopted by the Ashland (Kentucky) Area Labor/Management Committee relating to the Fair Trade in Steel Act; to the Committee on Finance.

POM-730. A resolution adopted by the Michigan Council of Senior Citizens, Inc. relating to Medicare Funds; to the Committee on Finance.

POM-731. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Finance.

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 52

"Whereas, canned tuna imports have increased 128 percent in the past five years; and

"Whereas, between 1981 and 1983, tuna imports have increased about 73 percent; and

"Whereas, in 1983, imports gained 40 percent, and, so far in 1984, imports are increasing over 1983; and

"Whereas, since 1981, employment in the California tuna industry has declined 23 percent, and over 4,000 people have lost their jobs; and

"Whereas, between 1981 and 1982, the cannery processing capacity for tuna has declined over 16 percent, and over 20 percent of the vessels in the tuna fleet are idle or underutilized; and

"Whereas, the amount of tuna packed in water was aggressively promoted by domestic canners and has reached a majority of the present market, but the tariff rate on water-packed tuna is only 6 percent compared to the tariff rate of 35 percent on oil-packed tuna, which has created a tariff loophole through which foreign packers in 1983 imported into the domestic market over 290 million cans of water-packed tuna; and

"Whereas, the California tuna industry has petitioned the United States International Trade Commission for relief from the increasing flow of imported canned tuna in water from foreign packers; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature respectfully memorializes the President, the Congress, and the United States International Trade Commission to provide immediate relief to the tuna industry of California and this nation from the ever increasing flow of imported canned tuna in water by, among other methods, adjusting appropriate tariff rates; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the United States International Trade Commission, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-732. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Finance.

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 104

"Whereas, the federal Old Age, Survivors, and Disability Insurance program, established pursuant to Title 2 of the federal Social Security Act (42 USC Sec. 401 et seq.), was established in order to provide, among other persons, the elderly with an adequate income to meet basic needs and live in a dignified manner; and

"Whereas, persons who have a similar wage history receive greater old age benefits under this program if they reach age 62 during, or prior to, 1978, than if they reach age 62 after 1978; and

"Whereas, several bills have been introduced in the United States Congress to alleviate this disparity, including H.R. 4093, introduced by California Congressman Edward Roybal; and

"Whereas, it is clearly unjust to permit persons reaching age 62 after 1978 to continue receiving as much as $100 per month less in benefits than those persons with similar wage histories reaching that age during, or prior to, 1978; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature hereby memorializes the Congress and President of the United States to enact legislation equalizing the old age benefit levels received under the Social Security program by all persons with similar wage histories, regardless of the date when they become age 62, and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution shall be transmitted to the Chief Clerk of the Assembly to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and each Senator and Representative in the California congressional delegation."

POM-733. A joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of North Carolina; to the Committee on Finance.

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 825

"Whereas, changes in federal policy implemented in 1981 have led to the termination of thousands of North Carolinians formerly receiving Social Security disability benefits; and

"Whereas, over two-thirds of those who appealed their terminations were found to have been unlawfully denied benefits; and

"Whereas, North Carolina has placed a moratorium on terminations by a 1983 Executive Order which remains in place; and

"Whereas, much needed comprehensive reform legislation has been introduced and is being considered in both the United States Senate and House of Representatives; Now, therefore, Be it resolved by the Senate, the House of Representatives concurring:

"Section 1. The North Carolina General Assembly requests that the delegation to the United States Senate and House of Representatives from North Carolina use every available means to assure that meaningful reform legislation is passed to protect the rights of the disabled under both Title II and Title XVI of the Social Security Act.

"Sec. 2. The North Carolina General Assembly recommends that such reform legislation include:

"(1) A requirement that the Social Security Administration demonstrate a clear improvement in a claimant's medical condition before terminating disability benefits;

"(2) The continuation of a terminated claimant's benefits through appeal to the Appeals Council;

"(3) Improvements in Continuing Disability Review procedures;

"(4) A mandate to consider all available medical evidence in the consideration of both initial claims and terminations; and

"(5) A requirement that the Social Security Administration promulgate all disability standards in the form of regulations, subject to public notice and comment.

"Sec. 3. The North Carolina General Assembly urges that the President of the United States take all steps necessary to ensure passage of meaningful reform legislation regarding Title II and Title XVI of the Social Security Act.

"Sec. 4. The Secretary of State shall send a certified copy of this resolution to each member of the United States Senate and House of Representatives representing North Carolina, to the Secretary of the United States Senate and Clerk of the United States House of Representatives, and to the President of the United States.

"Sec. 5. This resolution is effective upon ratification.

"In the General Assembly read three times and ratified, this the 26th day fo June, 1984."

POM-734. A resolution adopted by the Pan-Macedonian Association of the United States and Canada relating to military aid to Turkey; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

POM-735. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION No. 61

"Whereas, on August 31, 1983, Soviet war planes shot down a Korean commercial airliner, killing United States Representative Larry McDonald of Georgia and two hundred sixty-eight other innocent citizens, thus demonstrating a barbaric and despicable use of military power without provocation; and

"Whereas, the Soviets have suppressed democratic movements in their client states including the use of armed forces in East Germany (1953), Hungary (1956), Czechoslovakia (1968), and Poland (1982); and

"Whereas, communist governments in approximately thiry countries have ruled for a combined total of nearly seven hundred years without a peaceful transition of democracy in any nation; and

"Whereas, of the twelve wars waged in 1982, ten involved Soviet-backed troops; and

"Whereas, the Soviets or their client states have destroyed free trade unions everywhere including, most recently, Solidarity in Poland and the free trade union in Nicaragua; and

"Whereas, the Soviet Union has continued to escalate development and deployment of its military forces; and

"Whereas, the Louisiana Legislature finds and declares that the Soviet Union is the greatest threat to peace, freedom, and democracy in the world today.

"Therefore, be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the Legislature of Louisiana, the Senate thereof concurring, that the Legislature of the state of Louisiana condemns aggression by the Soviet Union and urges the President and Congress of the United States, and Olympic Games officials to take appropriate action to oppose Soviet aggression and to take specific actions in regard to participation of the Soviet Union in the 1984 Olympic Games, including but not limited to:

"(1) That the International Olympic Committee request the Soviet Union to withdraw voluntarily from the 1984 Games to prevent any potential outside acts of violence and terrorism directed against the aggression of the Soviet Union that could injure or kill innocent athletes from any country, as well as Olympic spectators and disinterested American citizens and foreign visitors;

"(2) That the Congress, the President, and Olympic officials support the formation of a Human Rights Monitoring Committee composed of international human rights groups, to ensure compliance by all Olympic committees with the Helsinki Accords, the United Nations Protocol on Status of Refugees, and the U.N. Universal Declaration of Human Rights, to protect the human rights of Olympic participants, including rights of defection and political asylum;

"(3) That the President and the Congress prevent the approval of request by the Soviet Olympic Committee to land twenty-five Aeroflot planes, dock a cruise ship, or let Soviet journalists have unrestricted travel privilege during the Olympic Games, in order to prevent KGB agents and operatives from carrying out spy activities and electronic surveillance of U.S. defense capabilities;

"(4) That the United States Olympic Committee and the Los Angeles Olympic Organizing Committee institute the strictest drug testing procedures available to detect the use of all types of performance enhancement drugs, including somatropin (HGH, STH), by Olympic athletes, and to automatically disqualify any athletes discovered using such drugs;

"(5) That the United States Olympic Committee and the Los Angeles Olympic Organizing Committee not make any special accommodations, event location changes, or transportation arrangements for the Soviet Union or Eastern Bloc countries at pre-Olympic sporting events or at the Olympic Games which are not ordinarily provided to all Olympic participating countries, unless the requesting country pays in advance for any such approved arrangements;

"(6) That the International Olympic Committee, the United States Olympic Committee, and the Los Angeles Olympic Organizing Committee appoint Olympic referees and judges from all participating countries without showing preferential treatment or 'stacking' of referees and judges in favor of the Soviet Union and Eastern Bloc countries;

"(7) That the Los Angeles Olympic Organizing Committee renegotiate its unsigned contract with the Soviet-Eastern Bloc's Organization of International Radio and Television to ensure that these countries pay an equitable amount for their Olympic broadcast rights.

"BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that the Clerk of the Louisiana House of Representatives transmit copies of this Resolution to the President of the United States, to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives and the President of the United States Senate, to each Senator and Representative from Louisiana in the Congress of the United States, the International Olympic Committee, the United States Olympic Committee, and the Los Angeles Olympic Organizing Committee."

POM-736. A resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Maryland; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

"HOUSE BILL No. 1164

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of Maryland, That the Laws of Maryland read as follows:

ARTICLE—TRANSPORTATION

"(a) The Authority is authorized to establish and maintain a regular police force, to be known as the metro transit police, to provide protection for its patrons, personnel, and transit facilities. The metro transit police shall have the powers and duties and shall be subject to the limitations set forth in this section. It shall be composed of both uniformed and plainclothes personnel and shall be charged with the duty of enforcing the laws of the signatories, and the laws, ordinances and regulations of the political subdivisions thereof in the transit zone, and the rules and regulations of the Authority. The jurisdiction of the metro transit police shall be limited to all the transit facilities (including bus stops) owned, controlled or operated by the Authority, but this restriction shall not limit the power of the metro transit police to make arrests in the transit zone for violations committed upon, to or against such transit facilities committed from within or outside such transit facilities, while in hot or close pursuit or to execute traffic citations and criminal process in accordance with subsection (c) below. The members of the metro transit police shall have concurrent jurisdiction in the performance of their duties with the duly constituted law enforcement agencies of the signatories and of the political subdivisions thereof in which any transit facility of the Authority is located or in which the Authority operates any transit service. Nothing contained in this section shall either relieve any signatory or political subdivision or agency thereof from its duty to provide police, fire and other public safety service and protection, or limit, restrict or interfere with the jurisdiction of or the performance of duties by the existing police, fire and other public safety agencies. For purposes of this section, "bus stop" means that area within 150 feet of a metrobus bus stop sign, excluding the interior of any building not owned, controlled, or operated by the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority.

"(b)(1) Except as otherwise provided in this section, a member of the metro transit police shall have the same powers, including the power of arrest, and shall be subject to the same limitations, including regulatory limitations, in the performance of his duties as a member of the duly constituted police force of the political subdivision in which the metro transit police member is engaged in the performance of his duties. However, a member of the metro transit police is authorized to carry and use only such weapons, including handguns, as are issued by the Authority. . . .

(c) Members of the metro transit police shall have power to execute on the transit facilities owned, controlled, or operated by the Authority any traffic citation or any criminal process issued by any court of any signatory or of any political subdivision of a signatory, for any felony, misdemeanor or other offense against laws, ordinances, rules, or regulations of the Authority, or of the signatory or its political subdivision as specified in subsection (a). With respect to offenses committed upon, to, or against the transit facilities owned, controlled or operated by the Authority, the metro transit policy shall have power to execute criminal process within the transit zone.

(d) Upon the apprehension or arrest of any person by a member of the metro transit police pursuant to the provisions of subsection (b), the arresting officer, as required by the law of the place of arrest, shall either issue a summons or a citation against the person, or book or deliver the person to the duly constituted judicial officer of the signatory or political subdivision where the arrest is made, for disposition as required by law.

(e) The Authority shall have the power to adopt rules and regulations for the safe, convenient and orderly use of the transit facilities, including the payment and the manner of the payment of fares or charges therefor, the protection of the transit facilities, the control of traffic and parking upon the transit facilities, and the safety and protection of the riding public. In the event that any such rules and regulations contravene the laws, ordinances or regulations or police operational rules of a signatory or any political subdivision thereof which are existing or subsequently enacted, these laws, ordinances or regulations of the signatory or the political subdivision shall apply and the conflicting rule or regulation, or portion thereof, of the Authority shall be void within the jurisdiction of that signatory or political subdivision. In all other respects, the rules and regulations of the Authority shall be uniform throughout the transit zone. The rules and regulations adopted by WMATA will be adopted by the board following public hearings held in accordance with § 15 supra and then shall be published by the political subdivisions of the signatories in the same manner as their respective local ordinances are published. Judges and clerks of the several courts having jurisdiction in the signatories and their political subdivisions shall have the authority to impose, collect, and enforce penalties for failure to pay fines for violation of such rules and regulations in the same manner as fines are imposed, collected, and enforced in the respective signatories or political subdivisions. Any person violating any rule or regulation of the Authority shall be subject to arrest and, upon conviction by a court of competent jurisdiction, shall pay a fine of not more than $250 and costs, and, upon further order of the court, shall reimburse WMATA for any loss or damage resulting from the violation.

(f) With respect to members of the metro transit police, the Authority shall

(1) Establish classifications based on the nature and scope of duties, and fix and provide for their qualifications, appointment, removal, tenure, term, compensation, pension and retirement benefits;

(2) Provide for their training and, for this purpose, the Authority may enter into contracts or agreements with any public or private organization engaged in police training, and this training and the qualifications of the uniformed and plainclothes personnel shall at least equal the requirements of each signatory and of the political subdivisions therein in the transit zone for their personnel performing comparable duties; and

(3) Prescribe distinctive uniforms to be worn.

(g) The Authority shall have the power to enter into agreements with the signatories, the political subdivisions thereof in the transit zone and public safety agencies located therein, including those of the federal government, for the delineation of the functions and responsibilities of the metro transit police and other duly constituted police, fire and other public safety agencies, and for mutual assistance.

(h) Before entering upon the duties of office, each member of the metro transit police shall take or subscribe to an oath or affirmation, before a person authorized to administer oaths, faithfully to perform the duties of that office.

SECTION 2. And be it further enacted, That this Act shall take effect July 1, 1984.

POM-737. A resolution adopted by the International Institute of Municipal Clerks relating to registration and polling places used in federal election be accessible to the handicapped and elderly persons; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

POM-738. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana: to the Committee on the Judiciary.

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION No. 49

"Whereas, the Ninety-Fifth Congress of the United States of America at the second session, in both houses, by a constitutional majority of two-thirds thereof, adopted the following proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States of America in the following words, to wit:

"JOINT RESOLUTION

"Proposing an amendment to the Constitution to provide for representation of the District of Columbia in the Congress.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission to Congress:

"ARTICLE —

"Section 1. For purpose of representation in the Congress, election of the President and Vice President, and Article V of this Constitution, the District constituting the seat of government of the United States shall be treated as though it were a State.

"Section 2. The exercise of the rights and powers conferred under this article shall be by the people of the District constituting the seat of government, and as shall be provided by the Congress.

"Section 3. The twenty-third article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

"Section 4. This article shall be inoperative, unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission."

"Therefore, be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the Legislature of Louisiana, the Senate thereof concurring, that the Legislature of the state of Louisiana does hereby ratify the foregoing proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America.

"Be it further resolved that certified copies of this Resolution shall be forwarded to the administration of General Services, Washington, D.C., and to the president of the Senate and the speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States."

POM-739. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 134

"Whereas, the Congress of the United States has designated July 20, 1984, as National POW/MIA Recognition Day; and

"Whereas, the Governor has designated the week of July 15 to 20, 1984, as POW/MIA Week; and

"Whereas, the National League of Families of American Prisoners and Missing in Southeast Asia is continuing its efforts for the return of its members' husbands, sons, and brothers; and

"Whereas, the Viet Vet House from its inception has a primary mandate that, ". . . the Vietnam War ends when the dying at home stops, the nightmares are laid to rest, the legacy of physical and emotional concerns are addressed, the 2,500 POW/MIAs are accounted for, and the business of living is gotten on with pride, honor, and dignity for all . . ."; and

"Whereas, the National League of Families of American Prisoners and Missing in Southeast Asia will be coordinating a national balloon release together with other veterans groups and agencies on July 20, 1984, and the Viet Vet House will be the local sponsor for the National League of Families in Sacramento; and

"Whereas, at 1 p.m. on July 20, 1984, the Viet Vet House will release 2,238 red, white, and blue balloons and 250 gold balloons from the west steps of the State Capitol to represent the 2,488 men still unaccounted for in Southeast Asia; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of California proclaims July 20, 1984, as a special day of recognition for the 250 California POW/MIAs still held unaccounted for by the countries of Laos, Kampuchea, and Vietnam and a day of national remembrance for the 2,488 men still missing; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Legislature supports the federal government's efforts to expedite the recovery and return of the remains of dead POW/MIAs currently being held by the governments of Laos, Kampuchea, and Vietnam, and to secure the release of all POW/MIAs still alive and held by those governments; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States, to the Secretary of State, to the governments of Laos, Kampuchea, and Vietnam, to the National League of Families of American Prisoners and Missing in Southeast Asia, and to the Viet Vet House."

POM-740. Joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 108

"Whereas, in 1983, UCLA graduate Peter Franklin was the first quadriplegic admitted to a California medical school; and

"Whereas, he was subjected to four months of struggle with the State Department of Rehabilitation which initially refused to grant him the financial aid needed by him to attend medical school; and

"Whereas, the state department initially urged Franklin to seek a career as a research assistant which it deemed a more fitting form of entry level employment; and

"Whereas, there currently is no existing, uniform federal definition of 'entry level employment'; and

"Whereas, the absence of such a definition allows state and federal assistance sources for education, rehabilitation, and vocational training to push entry level support to the lowest possible level, which tends to discourage individuals with disabilities from seeking their highest potential; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California encourages persons with disabilities to seek their highest potential at all times despite physical and social obstacles; and be it further

"Resolved, That when state and federal assistance for education, rehabilitation, and vocational training to persons with disabilities is predicated on entry level employment, that that employment be defined on the basis of an assessment of the individual's skills, aptitude, and abilities in order to assist and encourage the individual in reaching his or her highest potential; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the President, the Congress of the United States, the Department of Education and the Commissioner of Rehabilitation Services to define "entry level employment" as it pertains to persons with disabilities seeking state and federal assistance for education, rehabilitation, and vocational training, and to promulgate regulations to ensure the uniform application of this definition throughout the United States so that it will serve to motivate individuals with disabilities to seek their highest potential; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States, the Department of Education, and the Commissioner of Rehabilitation Services."

POM-741. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Veterans Affairs.

"ASSEMBLY JOINT RESOLUTION No. 68

"Whereas, the California Department Commanders Veterans Council unanimously agreed that a new national cemetery should be established by the United States near San Luis Dam near the City of Los Banos, California; and

"Whereas, this proposal has been concurred with by the American Legion Department of California, the Council of Administration of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the State of California, and the national and state bodies of the American G.I. Forum of the United States; and

"Whereas, a public-spirited citizen is willing to donate, deed, and dedicate approximately 350 acres of land adjacent to the San Luis Reservoir for a national cemetery; and

"Whereas, the San Luis site is adjacent to a California state park, assuring the site will not be overrun with commercial or residential development; is located in the center of the state, with major highways giving easy accessibility to the site; is in reasonable proximity to eight commercial airports; is located a reasonable distance to four military installations, and is readily accessible to California veterans, as well as more than two million veterans living in the 10 other western states; and

"Whereas, the United States Department of the Interior, Bureau of Reclamation, has 2,000 acre-feet of water available for use by the national cemetery from the San Luis Dam, now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact legislation to establish a national cemetery near San Luis Dam near the City of Los Banos, California; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Chief Clerk of the Assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-742. A resolution adopted by the Senate of the State of Pennsylvania; to the Committee on Veterans Affairs.

"RESOLUTION

"Whereas, time spent in military service gives veterans an opportunity to gain technical skills, experience and good work habits that are transferable to the civilian job market; and

"Whereas, veterans continue to have higher unemployment and remain out of work longer than other groups, despite the need for well-trained employees in growth industries and in occupations requiring technological skills; and

"Whereas, the Emergency Veterans' Job Training Act of 1983, was enacted to help America's business community build more capable, productive workforces by reimbursing employers for hiring and training eligible Korean Conflict and Vietnam-era veterans; and

"Whereas, when the Emergency Veterans' Job Training Act of 1983 is fully implemented, it will represent a major and positive step toward helping the American business community fill the jobs being created by new technology and an expanding economy; and

"Whereas, providing jobless veterans with new opportunities for permanent, private-sector employment is one of the greatest tributes we can pay to individuals who served well and sacrificed much during difficult periods in our Nation's history; therefore be it

"Resolved, that the Senate of Pennsylvania designate the month of June, 1984, as "Hire a Vet Month," in recognition of the cooperation among the Department of Labor, the Veterans' Administration and the Nation's business community in developing employment and training opportunities for our veterans; and be it further

"Resolved, that copies of this resolution be transmitted to the presiding officers of each house of Congress and to each member of Congress from Pennsylvania."

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. MELCHER (for himself, and Mr. DECONCINI):

S. 2879. A bill to provide for cooperation between the Secretary of the Interior and Indian tribes with respect to the regulation of coal mining operations on Indian reservation lands and the acquisition and reclamation of abandoned mines on such land, and for other purposes; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

INDIAN COAL MINING REGULATORY ACT OF 1984

● Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977, called for a special study by the Secretary of the Interior in consultation with Indian tribes for strip mining coal on their own lands. The study included "proposed legislation designed to allow Indian tribes to elect to assume full regulatory authority over the administration and enforcement of regulations of surface mining of coal on Indian lands." This requirement in section 710 of the act was completed over a year ago.

After reviewing the Secretary's study, I am today introducing legislation to implement Indian regulation of surface coal mining operations and activities on Indian lands. As much as possible this bill is adapted to place Indian tribes that have now or will have in the future coal strip mine operations on their own land to have the same rights or to be in the same position as the States with the option to run their own reclamation program. If the tribes do not exercise that option of running an approved reclamation program, then the Secretary of the Interior will be in charge of the program as required in the 1977 Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act.

I believe this bill is a constructive opportunity for Indian tribes in the management of their own coal resources and will meet their needs and properly safeguard their interests and their lands.●

MAINE MIA MEDAL AWARDS

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, tomorrow afternoon in Augusta, ME, a ceremony will take place that will extend to the families of our men still missing in Southeast Asia the honor and the recognition of their Nation for their sacrifice and their courage.

The distinguished former Secretary of State, Ed Muskie, will host a ceremony at which special commemorative medals will be presented to representatives of 10 Maine families whose sons, brothers, and husbands vanished in Southeast Asia.

The bitterness and division that rent our Nation over the Vietnam war is fading from the national memory today, as it should. But we should not allow the memory of our missing men to fade.

The families of MIA's and POW's have worked steadfastly and for many years to make sure that our memory of their men remains alive and that our efforts to discover their fate remain untiring.

The families of the missing have been the conscience of the Nation on this issue. Their dedication to that effort, as well as their sacrifice, are honored by the commemorative medals which Congress authorized last year.

The 19 men of Maine who never returned from Vietnam were boys born and raised in every part of our State—from Presque Isle to Portland. They were career officers and enlisted men alike. And all, officers and men, gave honorable service when their Nation called.

They and their families paid a high price through that service. They are owed no less than the heartfelt thanks of all Americans, and the honor that any Nation must give to those who run the ultimate risk in behalf of all.

I ask that the names and hometowns of these men appear in the RECORD following my remarks. They are men whose sacrifice we should honor and whose families deserve our respect for their fortitude and spirit.

The material follows:

NAMES AND FAMILY HOME TOWN

Air Force: Maj. George H. Jourdenais, Presque Isle; Col. Herbert O. Brennan, Damariscotta; Sgt. Edward J. Darcy, Gorham; and Lt. Col. Paul E. Getchell, Portland.

Army: Sgt. John H.R. Brooks, Peru; and Sgt. Richard C. Dority, Dover-Foxcroft.

Marines: Sgt. Peter G. Vlahakos, Auburn.

Navy: LCDR Robert S. Graustein, Fryeburg; Lt. Malcolm A. Avore, Hallowell; Lt. Terence H. Hanley, Pittston; and EM2 Joseph T. Musetti, Mt. Desert.●

FOUR GOOD REASONS FOR NATO

● Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I submit for the RECORD an article entitled "Four Good Reasons for Nato," written by David Abshire, U.S. Ambassador to NATO.

The article follows:

FOUR GOOD REASONS FOR NATO

The Times' superb series on the 35th anniversary of the Atlantic alliance is striking for its recurrent emphasis on sustaining public support as the key to Nato's future. Critical to that support is the continued perception of the legitimacy—political, military and moral—of the alliance and its strategy.

Ethics and nuclear weapons have become one of the most vibrant issues of our day. The outcome of that debate touches the future of the alliance, for the public must be convinced of the moral legitimacy if Nato's support is to be sustained.

The maturation of a new generation unscarred by the tragedies of two world wars, with the emergence of new currents of thought and opinion, is bringing Nato to a moral crossroads. There is, however, confusion over the germ "moral" that has made Nato advocates hesitant to enter the fray. On one side stand many political activists, some in the peace movements, who proclaim certain absolute moral positions and insist on their morality to the exclusion of all other factors. On the other side are active men of affairs who also view moral values as absolute but impractical—something postulated by clergy or educators, but not applicable to real world choices.

I say a plague on both their houses. Absolutism of either kind is not appropriate. Those who would take one issue—such as medium range missile deployment—and look at it out of context are too simplistic. Those who would moralize about absolute peace without ever studying the problems of achieving real peace, or considering the threats to peace or the conduct of a potential adversary, are doing little to advance the cause of peace.

Equally, those who believe moral considerations have no place in their decisions will not take long to discover that their cynicism is not shared and their policies not supported.

The great theologians have known that absolutism doesn't work and that in the lives of nations, as distinguished from the lives of men, clear moral choice is more difficult because it is so much more ambiguous. This dilemma was identified by the Protestant theologian Reinhold Niebuhr in the very title of his classic book, Moral Man and Immoral Society, St. Augustine of Hippo argued that until the city of God appeared, it was one's duty to further the city of man.

In foreign and security policy, only partial solutions are possible; one must constantly strike unsatisfactory balances—between compromise and security, between order and progress. That is the challenge Nato faces.

The two world wars and the immediate post-war experience that fostered Nato's birth conjured four new horsemen of the apocalypse: fears of nuclear war, of worldwide conventional war, of blackmail and coercion, and of human tyranny and bondage. Hiroshima, the Somme, Munich, Auschwitz embodies these spectres. The moral imperative became the prevention of their happening again. Nato must confront not just one of these evils but all four.

Each of these phantoms threatens the Judeo-Christian, multifaceted concept of peace which unfortunately has gone largely unaddressed by many in the "peace" movements and others in the debate. This notion of "peace" is an integrated balance of two traditional concepts—one reflected in the Hebrew word shalom and the other in the Latin word pax. Shalom implies a sense of peace that relates to an individual's wholeness and health, security and prosperity in their fullest sense. Pax, on the other hand, connotes the peace of the ordered political community that makes living together possible. It has to do with order and stability.

The classical concept of peace, then, implies much more than the absence of war and the avoidance of war, more than a determination simply not to fight. It focuses on the creation of conditions in which individuals and societies can flourish and in which there are recognized limitations on the use of force.

Peace is a dynamic process in which we must be constantly and positively engaged. It is a multifaceted concept, encompassing both the individual and society. The only legitimate peace policy is one that neither sacrifices freedom of the individual for the order of the state, nor ignores the threat to the state because it is consumed by the personal comfort of the people.

Because the threat to peace is multifaceted, absolute solutions will not work. They address only one dimension of the threat; they secure only one facet of the peace. Some people, for example, have suggested unilateral disarmament as the absolute solution. Such a policy may achieve our relief from the threat of nuclear or conventional war, but would it really relieve us from the threat of tyranny?

Our problem in securing a just defence—and the basic moral ambiguity we must confront—is that all of our options are unattractive; there is no good choice. All involve some element of moral risk and the possibility of pain and suffering.

If moral absolutes are inappropriate, what does a just defence mean? St. Augustine defined some criteria as proportionality—that particular means must be in proper relation to desired ends. A second element is proper motivation. Just defence must also be adaptable to the world's constantly changing conditions that might generate new threats or reconfigure old ones. Therefore, just defence must be flexible.

I believe that the current Nato strategy of deterrence meets these criteria. Reinforcing deterrence is the best path for ensuring the peace.

On the military side, reinforcing deterrence requires reducing the nuclear risk by improving Nato's conventional capabilities, thereby making flexible response truly flexible. Flexible response remains a good strategy—one of proportionality and legitimacy.

Nato's role, however, goes beyond the purely military. When Nato, in 1979, committed itself to the two-track approach, it recognized that arms control efforts must parallel military ones. Moreover, the Nato charter stresses that economic progress and economic cooperation are essential to achieve the individual and national well-being inherent in our concept of peace.

Until now, we have been talking about pax and just defence. Let us turn to shalom. Part of shalom relates to the dignity of the individual. Nato is a unique alliance of democracies. Since its creation, four states have joined. They did so not just because it was a way to enhance their security, but because they recognized and wanted to be associated with the values for which Nato stand. They wanted it to be known that their people, too, enjoy the freedom and justice that Nato secures.

Few people realize the role of the alliance as the coordinating centre for western positions on the Helsinki accords and the problems of human rights. The West's achievements at Madrid and its efforts at the follow up meeting in Stockholm have been possible only because of individual member nations' commitment to Nato's shared values and their steadfast cohesion during negotiations.

Finally, Nato has been unrelenting in its efforts to develop a contructive relationship with its potential adversaries. The legitimate pursuit of peace demands positive engagement, and Nato members have recognized that a posture of unremitting hostility toward the Soviet Union and its allies will not be productive in the long run. The alliance is currently exploring how best to define a long-term realistic approach to the East that avoids the ups and downs of false detente but that also diminishes tensions and mutual suspicions.

Nato's goal is the deterrence of any war whether nuclear or conventional. The Atlantic alliance was created in the wake of the excesses of a world at war and gave hope that conflict would no longer be the final arbiter in the settlement of disputes between nations. The alliance may not be perfect, but it is unparalleled in its values and in its dedication to peace. Indeed, it has legitimacy and a strong moral basis. It surely provides the best possible means for sustaining the public consensus and securing a true peace.●

THE DEPORTATION OF MICHAEL O'ROURKE

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I have cosponsored S. 2375 which would postpone the deportation of Michael O'Rourke for 6 months. Since Senator SPECTER introduced this bill in February, Mr. O'Rourke has returned to Ireland.

I have cosponsored this measure because I share Senator SPECTER's concern about the possibility that Mr. O'Rourke may have been denied the due process of law in his case. My cosponsorship of this bill is not intended to reflect support for Mr. O'Rourke's alleged activities in Ireland or reflect on what should or should not have been the final disposition in his deportation case before Immigration and Naturalization Service Administrative Law Judge Hupp.

Senator SPECTER's intent in introducing S. 2357 was to provide a vehicle for the Senate Judiciary Committee to hold hearings on allegations of possible wrongdoing in Mr. O'Rourke's case. These hearings are scheduled for July 30. It is my hope that all questions of impropriety relative to Mr. O'Rourke's case will be thoroughly aired and adequately answered in these hearings.●

H.R. 5798—TREASURY, POSTAL SERVICE APPROPRIATIONS

● Mr. MATTINGLY. Mr. President, on Wednesday, July 25, I was absent during the rollcall vote on final passage of the Treasury appropriations bill for fiscal year 1985 because I was in Atlanta taking part in a welcoming ceremony for the President of the United States. Had I been present for that vote, I would have voted "aye."

As a member of the Treasury Appropriations Subcommittee, I am very familiar with the efforts of its distinguished chairman, Senator ABDNOR and its ranking member, Senator DECONCINI. I commend my able colleagues and leaders on the subcommittee for their diligence and for the labor which they have expended on this legislation. They and the very able majority and minority subcommittee staff deserve special commendation in view of the fact that this is the first Treasury Appropriations bill to pass the Senate since 1979.

The discretionary spending authorized by this bill is right on target with the allocation approved by the full Appropriations Committee. The legislation strikes an appropriate balance between filling the legitimate budget needs of the agencies within its jurisdiction and yet is mindful of the important need to restrain the growth of Federal spending.

I hope that this example of fiscal restraint is followed as we prepare to consider the remaining appropriation bills.●

SUMMIT CONFERENCE ON CYPRUS

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, the situation in Cyrpus threatens the security of the United States, the integrity of the NATO alliance, and the safety and welfare of the people of Cyprus. In view of the dangers represented by the continuing illegal Turkish occupation of northern Cyprus, I urge President Reagan to take the lead in convening a summit conference of the affected nations. We need dramatic action to prevent the further unraveling of the key Western security relationship in the Eastern Mediterranean. A summit conference, on the magnitude of the Camp David summit which produced great progress in Israeli-Egyptian relations, would constitute a major U.S. contribution to the resolution of the Cyprus problem.

Ten years ago, on July 20, 1974, Turkey invaded the Republic of Cyprus. That action made a mockery of the treaties, charters and international laws that make possible peaceful coexistence among nations.

On March 28, 1984, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee marked up authorizing legislation for foreign military assistance. A key issue in the markup debate was discussion of U.S. frustrations over Turkey's continued occupation of one-third of the island of Cyprus. A bipartisan group of Senators expressed serious concern over the continuing presence of 20,000 Turkish troops on Cyprus soil, Turkish expenditures of over $200 million a year to support an illegal presence in Cyprus while continuing to ask for increased U.S. military assistance, and the bad faith that has been shown by the leadership in Ankara and its protege, Mr. Rauf Denktash in occupied Cyprus.

In an effort to facilitate the negotiation process, Senator BIDEN and I, with the strong support of Chairman PERCY, introduced an amendment to the military assistance authorization for Turkey. This amendment conditioned $216 million in grant military assistance upon Presidential certification that the deserted, formerly Greek-Cypriot city of Famagusta-Varosha had been returned to the Government of Cyprus for resettlement of refugees. The amendment also cut foreign military sales credits and guarantees for Turkey by $25 million.

We cannot forget that over 200,000 Greek Cypriots are still displaced, unable to return to their homes. Nearly 2,000 Cypriots were needlessly killed, and the survivors are experiencing a cultural death, as every trace of Cypriot life and customs are systematically replaced with Turkish standards. Turkey and the world must know that America does not support, especially with money and arms, human rights violations, wanton invasions or oppressive regimes anywhere in the world.

I urge my distinguished colleagues to renew our commitment to a democratic Cyprus and the initiation of a fair and peaceful solution to the conflicts in that nation. My wish is that there will not be a need to commemorate this day with sadness again.

This 10th anniversary is an excellent opportunity for the United States to strengthen the southeastern flank of NATO by enacting legislation supporting good faith negotiations for the reunification of the sovereign nation of Cyprus. It is also an opportune time for the United States to organize a summit conference on Cyprus.●

THE CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF ST. MICHAEL'S UKRAINIAN CATHOLIC CHURCH

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, the year 1984 marks the centennial celebration of St. Michael's Ukrainian Catholic Church in Shenandoah, PA.

St. Michael's Ukrainian Catholic Church, founded in 1884, was the first Greek Catholic Parish in America. The ancestors of St. Michael's parishioners came to this great Nation from Eastern Europe between 1860 and 1870, with the hope of finding a better way of life. Upon their arrival, they first settled in Massachusetts and Vermont; some years later they settled in Pennslyvania, which was, and remains, the home of many Ukrainians.

Joseph Zoliak was the first immigrant to settle in the Shenandoah area of Pennsylvania—the present home of St. Michael's. The first settlers wanted a church of their own where they could worship in their "mother tongue" according to their own rites and beliefs. Their prayers were answered on October 24, 1884, when the Reverend John Walainsky was appointed as the first Greek Catholic priest in America. His first service was held on December 18, 1884, at Kern Hall in Shenandoah. By 1885, the newly settled immigrants were able to purchase two buildings on the north side of Centre Street in Shenandoah. Father Walainsky blessed the first Greek Catholic Church on this site on November 21, 1886. During the following years, the congregation grew rapidly, and soon there was a need for a larger church. In 1907, a plot of ground on Oak and Chestnut Streets in Shenandoah was purchased. One year later, the church and rectory were built, and the first Liturgy was celebrated on Palm Sunday in 1909.

Recently, the parishioners of St. Michael's have been forced to rebuild their house of worship, because on the morning of April 7, 1980, the church and its rectory, with all of their priceless antiques, religious art, and icons, were completely destroyed by fire. After this devastating fire, the present pastor, Father John Bura, along with the parishioners, made immediate preparations to transform the church hall on West Central Street to an interim church. In August 1982, construction of the present church was started, and on November 27, 1983, the blessing of the cornerstone and the first Liturgy were held at the new St. Michael's.

Today, 100 years later, St. Michael's remains the place of worship where the faithful parishioners can honor God in their own way.

On this 100th anniversary of St. Michael's Ukrainian Catholic Church, I am honored to extend my sincere congratulations and best wishes to my Ukrainian-American friends and fellow Pennsylvanians. I thank you for making Shenandoah, PA, your home.●

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Morning business is closed.

HYDROELECTRIC POWERPLANTS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the pending business.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

Metzenbaum Amendment No. 3419 to the House amendment to S. 268, an act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate, and maintain hydroelectric powerplants at various existing water projects, and for other purposes.

Mr. HECHT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada is recognized.

Mr. HECHT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HECHT. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays in connection with the amendment I have pending at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 3424

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Ohio (Mr. METZENBAUM) proposes an amendment numbered 3424 to amendment numbered 3419.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the pending amendment No. 3419, add: The appropriate committees of Congress are requested to conduct a full review of Federal policies affecting the price of electricity generated by the Hoover Dam Project, and to report their findings on or before July 1, 1986.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I think we should understand what the situation is on the floor at the moment.

Last evening, I sent to the desk an amendment, in connection with which I have asked for the yeas and nays, which was intended to cover the matters that were addressed by my distinguished colleague from California, who pointed out all the reasons why we need other matters that are in the bill having to do with upgrading of the Hoover Dam.

The Senator from Ohio made it clear when he addressed this body yesterday that my issue or my concerns were not with those provisions. As a matter of fact, I think they were written as provided in the House bill, and I support them. They provide for the payment in full of the costs of the upgrading, and I think that is appropriate, and I certainly do not want to stand in the way of that.

There are two other parts to the bill that I want to talk about. One has to do with the matter of allocation. Who gets the power? At the present time, certain residents of California and the people in the States of Nevada and Arizona have the opportunity to buy the power, and no one else.

As a matter of fact, it was rather interesting to me yesterday when the former mayor of San Diego took the floor to indicate his support for this measure. I have in my hand an editorial from the San Diego Union, which comes to exactly the contrary position, because the people of San Diego are being discriminated against. That editorial, which I will see fit to read at a later point, makes it very clear that they feel that they are getting the short end of the stick, while the favored few who are provided for in this bill are able to purchase the power.

Who can purchase the power now? The Metropolitan Water District of Southern California, the city of Los Angeles, the Southern California Edison Co., the city of Glendale, the city of Pasadena, the city of Burbank, the Arizona Power Authority, the Colorado River Commission of Nevada, and the United States for Boulder City.

That has to do with the power that is presently being generated. It is obvious that if you are not one of those favored few, you do not get those benefits.

Mr. President, I am not here on the floor to challenge that allocation, although I may return at a later point and offer an amendment to permit San Diego to be included, because I certainly would not want to deprive a fine community such as San Diego of the right to buy power in the same manner as the other people of California are purchasing it. As a matter of fact, it is not at all unlikely that at some point such an amendment will be offered.

However, let me come back to my amendment at this time, because that is the point I wish to emphasize to my colleagues. All we say here is that, notwithstanding any other provision, all provisions of this bill shall become effective upon the date of enactment. Then we have a proviso, and there is only one proviso: Provided, however, that no section of this bill on the Boulder Canyon Project Act of 1928 regarding the price of power generated at Hoover Dam shall be effective after May 31, 1987—which, I should point, is the date that is presently in the law. So all we are saying is that you can have everything else in the bill, except the pricing, and we do not believe that we ought to lock in the pricing for 30 years.

Before the debate on this bill concludes, I will point out that in one of the prominent publications of this country, it is pointed out that under this legislation, the people who have the privilege of buying the power will be paying the same rate for power from the Hoover Dam in the year 2017 that people were paying in the year 1937.

How absurd can you get? Inflation between 1937 and 2017 will have gone sky high. The costs have been escalating. It is fair to say that this bill does provide that the users will pay for the cost of operation and maintenance. But in spite of that, they will be paying at the same rate in the year 2017 as they were paying in 1937.

Some of my colleagues saw fit yesterday to vote against my proposed amendment, and I should like to discuss with them what they are doing to their own communities. What they are doing to their own communities is saying, "Look, it's all right for the United States to make power available for a half-cent for a kilowatt hour while the rest of the country pays a rate 13 times that amount, or 6.5 cents per kilowatt hour."

It is fair to say that not every community pays the same—some are higher, some lower. But the average rate, according to the Congressional Research Service, is 6.5 cents per kilowatt hour.

How can you possibly justify permitting people to buy power for a half-cent per kilowatt hour? This I want to say to some of my colleagues who have seen industry leave their communities and go to Nevada and go to Arizona and go to California because power can be bought in those areas for a half cent or one-thirteenth the rate that local industry has to pay. What possible justification can you have with respect to that kind of discrimination against the individual who buys power for his or her own home, or how can you justify it to your local chamber of commerce when they tell you that XYZ Co., is going to Nevada or Arizona or California because they can buy power there so much cheaper and that is a major factor in the cost of their doing business? What logical reason? How could you answer that? I submit to my colleagues that there is no way to answer that question.

It is an unfair discriminatory practice that is being jammed through the Senate. When I say "jammed through," let me point out what I am saying. A cloture motion was filed in connection with this matter approximately 4 hours after the debate started on it; 4 hours after. Nobody said anything about a filibuster. But, no, we have to get this bill through. I do not know why. The whole issue does not become a reality until May 31, 1987. We have more than enough time to deal with it before then. But, no, we have to jam it through.

Is it because it is an election year? Is it because certain special Members of this body are demanding that this legislation be passed?

I for one do not know, nor do I really care, because I believe it is the responsibility of the Senate to defeat this proposal, and I would hope that instead of defeating the bill, which I am not asking you to do, that you would see fit to adopt the amendment that I have pending as well as the second-degree amendment which would in effect provide nothing more than that the appropriate committees of Congress under the second-degree amendment are requested to conduct a full review of Federal policies affecting the price of electricity generated by the Hoover Dam project and to report their findings on or before July 1, 1986.

What could be more reasonable? The first part of the amendment provides that you can have the entire bill except for the pricing; the second part merely provides that the appropriate committees of Congress will study the issue and report back to Congress their findings before July 1, 1986, which would give Congress between July 1, 1986 and May 31, 1987 to deal with the issue.

The Senator from Ohio has attempted to present this matter in a reasonable way. It is not a political matter, except for the fact that the effort is being made to jam it through. But absent that I would be the first to recognize that there are prominent members of my party and prominent members of the other party who support this legislation as well as prominent members of both parties who oppose it.

The San Francisco Chronicle, a conservative paper, serving that community and a major factor in California, had an editorial on this subject and I would like to share the contents of that editorial. In fact, there are three papers in California that have editorialized on this subject. And I want to point out that they go further than the Senator from Ohio is advocating. They go to the point of having the power auctioned. I am not standing here proposing that. I am merely saying let us see what the fair rates should be that are to be charged.

The San Francisco Chronicle editorial entitled "South vs. North On Hoover Power":

A bill that reeks of a musty agreement made in years long past allocating power generated by water from the Hoover Dam comes before the House of Representatives for action this week. Since it has to do with water and with cut-rate power, it is heavily favored by certain southern California interests. But it will affect us here in the North, too. It seems to us there is no reason to perpetuate the truly outmoded ways the measure embodies.

This situation has been laid out in elegant and penetrating fashion by writer Harold Gilliam in the Sunday columns of this newspaper. His view deserves reemphasis. the old contract provisions permit Hoover Power to be sold at far below the market price. The original purpose of the cheap energy was to promote growth in southern California, "perhaps a valid goal half a century ago," as Gilliam said, "but one that is scarcely tenable now that the region has grown to the point of strangulation."

The measure now before Congress extends the old contract as if the past 50 years had never happened. It constitutes a munificent benefit for the original contractors and those who were in on the ground floor like the metropolitan water district of southern California, or "MET", which used Hoover energy to pump Colorado River water to southern California.

Not surprisingly, some California utilities, like San Diego Gas and Electric, that were not in the original deal, say they would like to make a handsome bid for some Hoover power.

What strikes home is that the "MET" will be getting the right to pump more northern California water south by using cheap energy from Hoover. Thus, the Federal Government will be in effect subsidizing the draining of northern California to further the growth of a population-bloated southland.

This shocking measure has been approved by the Senate and has log-rolling momentum in the House.

And then it goes on to refer to Representative BARBARA BOXER's efforts in the House and that they support it.

I want to point out that I am not at that point where I support the auctioning off of the power. I do think that we might consider whether or not we want to make the power available to San Diego because I would be curious to know how the people from California feel about why some parts of California should be favored and others not.

Let me point out, this is a Federal dam having to do with a Federal river, built by Federal taxpayers' dollars; the region has leased that facility for 50 years. It paid for construction of the dam through utility rates under terms of the lease. Now they want to renew the lease on a Federal facility and the question before us is how much should the Government charge the customers for the power generated from this dam under a new lease.

I stand here on the floor and tell you I do not know the answer. I am not sure of the answer. But I believe that Congress would be irresponsible if we did not make some determination in connection with this subject.

Let me point out again if the people in these three States and the industry and the private utilities in these three States can buy power at one-thirteenth the going rate, then every Senator in this body can look forward to more and more industry leaving his or her State and moving to this area where they can buy this power at such a reduced rate.

We have a $200 billion deficit and I am not saying how much we ought to be getting from this facility. In one editorial it was pointed out this we will lose $6 billion by reason of the passage of this bill. Other sources have indicated we would lose $3.5 billion and that over a relatively short period of time.

But why, why should we be selling power to some specially favored people in this country from a federally built facility at rates so low that they provide unfair competition for the rest of the States in this country.

I do not understand how some of my colleagues who did not vote with me yesterday could explain to their constituents this kind of special privilege, this kind of favoritism that would come about if this measure is enacted without the amendment that I have proposed.

The San Diego Union newspaper addressed itself to this issue and they talked about the power giveaway. They wrote the editorial on April 13 of this year in which they said:

The Hoover Dam may be a monument to modern engineering, but contracts negotiated 50 years ago to cover the sale of its hydroelectric power are a monument to wasteful energy policy. The House of Representatives will vote soon on extending the contracts for another 30 years. The bill should be defeated.

A Federal Government so starved for funds that its deficits are threatening the economic recovery is selling power from the Hoover Dam at giveaway prices. The loss to the Government could amount to as much as $6 billion during the next decade.

Hoover Dam power is being sold for about a half cent per kilowatt hour, compared with the price range of 2 to 7 cents for electricity purchased elsewhere in the Southwest. Underpricing electricity to such an extent discourages conservation and is patently unfair to utility customers, including San Diegans who do not happen to be served by one of the utilities eligible to buy the power.

As a privately owned utility, San Diego Gas & Electric Co. stands at the end of the line among prospective purchasers of Hoover Dam power. Government agencies and publicly owned utilities have first call on it, and because they are eager to buy all the bargain power they can get, there is no chance S.D.G.&E.'s number will ever come up.

House Resolution 4275, due for a vote soon, would perpetuate this discriminatory state of affairs. The House should reject the measure and instead instruct the Western Area Power Administration to auction Hoover Dam power to competitive bidders when the present contracts expire in 1987. S.D.G.&E. could then bid for power that could be brought to San Diego via the link to the East now being built.

The Government does not make sweetheart deals with companies that want to produce oil, gas, and minerals from public lands. It opens these resources to production through leases awarded on the basis of competitive bids. The Hoover Dam and its output of electric power should receive the same treatment. Let the market determine the value of its energy, and let the country as a whole benefit from the revenue the Hoover Dam can earn.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. KASTEN]. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HECHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HECHT. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has offered another dilatory amendment to this legislation. It is not realistic to suggest that 15 million electric ratepayers should invest another $77 million in Hoover Dam if they cannot be assured of the price for that power beyond 1988.

I ask my colleagues: would any of you support legislation calling for the construction of a dam, or a bridge, or a highway, or a sewer treatment plant, that required 100 percent non-Federal financing but did not specify what the price for their use of the facility would be after it was completed? Of course not.

What the Senator from Ohio is really getting at is this: he thinks the Federal Government should earn a profit on the sale of power from Hoover Dam. He professes concern about the size of the Federal deficit.

Let me remind my colleagues that the improvements authorized under S. 268 will be entirely financed by the power users. This is the largest Federal hydro project in history to be financed by non-Federal funds. It will not increase the size of the deficit one bit.

The gist of his arguments are: he wants the Federal Government to earn a profit on the sale of Hoover power. Do any of my colleagues really support this concept? Do we want to earn a profit on power sold by the other Federal power marketing agencies? Federal power is sold at cost in 35 States across this land—I repeat, 35 States across this land.

Do we want to earn a profit on our investment in the Interstate Highway System? How about the lock and canal systems operated by the Corps of Engineers? How about flood control, sewer treatment, or public housing? Why shouldn't the Federal Government earn a profit on every dime it spends on improving the infrastructure of this great country? Let us ask ourselves these questions. The Government's profit in these investments should only be measured by the improved quality of life it brings our citizens and taxpayers.

Again, I urge my colleagues to support the enactment of this bill. Let us get on with the business of the Senate. S. 268 is a good bill, a sound bill, a bill that has been passed once by this body and the House of Representatives. It is too late to go back to the drawing board, particularly the Senator from Ohio's drawing board. I urge the defeat of his amendment.

I would like to respond to the statement by the Senator from Ohio that power rates from Hoover Dam will be the same in the year 2017 as it was in 1937.

This is totally untrue. The price for Hoover power is calculated in such a way that the ratepayers will reimburse the Federal Government for the capital costs it has invested in the construction and upkeep of the dam. The price also reflects the cost of operation and maintenance of the dam.

This price changes every year. It is true that the cost of constructing Hoover Dam will be fully repaid in 1987. It cost $160 million to build the dam in 1937. However, many other investments have been made since 1937. Dams do not last forever. Parts get old and need to be replaced. Today's price and the post-1987 price will reflect the cost of these more recent investments. This bill, for example, provides for an additional $77 million of investment in Hoover Dam.

Just this year, Hoover rates were raised roughly 30 percent to cover the increased cost of operation and maintenance. Rates will go up again before 1987, probably by another 30 percent. Finally, this legislation will require that rates go up even higher—by another 30 to 50 percent. So it is absurd to say that the rate is the same today as it was in 1937.

The Senator from Ohio implies that power rates in the Southwest are dirt-cheap. This is not true.

The average price of power in Nevada—of which the Hoover power is only a small part—is roughly 6 cents per kilowatt hour. Southern California's power rates are some of the highest in the Nation, over 8 cents. These rates are comparable—and in many cases higher—than they are in the State of Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I have to say to my good friend and colleague from Las Vegas that I am afraid he has not read my amendment because if he had read my amendment, he would certainly be in no position to say that it is dilatory, because dilatory means that it is just a stall, that it has no meaning, that it is just fun and games.

My amendment totally obviates and negates the entire impact of the speech that my colleague just made. My colleague talked about the improvements being financed by the users. I am not taking issue with that.

If you read my amendment, you will find that I will accept that part of your legislation. That part of your legislation is fine with me, and that is exactly what I am trying to say. We are talking about two separate subjects. And if you paid attention to what I had written in the amendment and my opening remarks, I say very clearly that, notwithstanding any other provision, all provisions of this bill shall become effective upon date of enactment. That takes care of all the upgrading. That is the point to which you were speaking, and I have here provided for that. And the only thing that the proviso refers to has to do with the price of power generated by the Hoover Dam as is, the old part of the Hoover Dam.

So I just point out to the Senator that he is addressing himself to the question of the improvements, and we are not in disagreement. I am in favor of the people of that area paying for the improvements. I think that is a good part of the bill. So my amendment specifically covers that. Therefore, I cannot for the life of me understand how the Senator could rise to the floor and say I am giving you 80 percent or 90 percent of your total package, and that the amendment is dilatory. If anything, it is concessionary. It is giving the Senator that which he wants—the opportunity to make the improvements.

With respect to the matter of what are the fair rates they are after, I am not saying anything there that the Senator can find any fault with. The Senator is trying to say that the rates should be locked in for 30 years. I am saying that does not make good economic sense. It does not make good policy. And it is an unreasonable approach.

In Business Week magazine of April 16, 1984, they have an article headlined "Why Hoover Dam's 'Dirt Cheap' Power May Stay in the Hands of a Few." They then have a little box in the story which tells the story totally. It says, "The new contract will keep the average base price of Hoover power at 1937 prices until 2017."

Can the Senator tell me any reason why the people of this country should be selling power to the casinos located in Nevada at prices that were set in 1937 when nobody even thought the casinos were going to be built? And I would guess that somehow, if they scrimped, saved, turned down the lights a bit, and did everything else to economize, those casinos would be able to afford a price higher than a half a cent per kilowatt hour.

Maybe they changed the odds. Maybe they do something else. Maybe they do not cover the tables with the green felt as often. But there is not any logical reason for the rest of the country to subsidize those casinos in their purchase of power, nor any more reason for the rest of the country to subsidize the privately owned utility companies, or any other utility company, or the people of those three States to the disadvantage of the rest of the Nation.

The Business Week article states it well. They start off with a little box indicating at the very beginning—

For sale: More than 1,300 megawatts of hydroelectric power. Priced unbelievably low. Plenty of room for growth. Contact Western Area Power Administration, c/o Hoover Dam.

End of the box.

Business Week then goes on to say:

That sort of advertisement would draw plenty of responses if it were placed in newspapers across the West. But WAPA, as the Federal power marketing agency is known, need not bother. The Reagan administration and the States of California, Arizona, and Nevada are about to reach an agreement that will continue to restrict the towering dam's prodigious output to municipal and other public power systems until 2017. The average price of the Federal power, an incredible 0.3 cents per kilowatthour about the same as the public systems have been paying for 47 years, and only 3.5 of the wholesale cost of commercially generated electricity in the region.

Electricity from the dam, which straddles the Colorado River along the Arizona-Nevada border, "is dirt cheap power—that's all there is to it," says Ronald K. Greenhalgh. WAPA's Assistant Administrator. The Agency's clients—who serve 10 million consumers—are pleased. "For the next 30 years, the present Hoover Dam customers will know exactly what they are getting. God and weather permitting," says Edward Weinberg, whose law firm of Duncan, Weinberg & Miller represents public power systems in Nevada . . .

Environmentalists, meanwhile, say that maintaining WAPA's bargain rates will only encourage consumption—and thus force utilities into unnecessary construction of fossil-fuel or nuclear generating plants when demand outstrips Hoover's supply. "Underpricing of Hoover Dam's power," says Thomas J. Graff, an environmental defense fund attorney, "will lead to a waste of energy." Adds Peter F. Cowhey, a political scientist at the University of California at San Diego and a member of the city's energy advisory board: "The Federal Government is undermining the growth of a rational interstate power system by distorting the pricing system."

Opponents of the Hoover power agreement also charge that the Federal Government is shortchanging itself. "What they should have done is to offer the power on an openbidding basis," says Cowhey. Indeed the difference between Hoover's current selling costs and commercial rates will amount to $7 billion between 1990 and 1997 alone says Attorney Graff. . . .

Under terms of the agreement between California, Nevada and Arizona, the average base price of Hoover power will remain at 0.3 cents per kilowatt per hour although surcharges levied to pay for several water projects will raise the average for some customers to close to 0.8 cents. Still, Hoover power will be an undeniable bargain. The Los Angeles Water & Power Department which expects to obtain 8 percent of its needs from Hoover this year at a cost of 0.2 cents per kilowatt per hour estimates that it would cost $40 million to replace that power with electricity generated from oil, natural gas or other fuels. . . .

At the same time, the issue of Federal power sales is coming under scrutiny nationwide. Through its five power-marketing administrations which manage some $75 billion in Federal investment, the Energy Department acts as a wholesaler for about 6 percent of all the electricity generated in the U.S. The President's private sector survey on cost control—popularly known as the Grace Commission—has recommended the "defederalization" of power marketing through sales of the systems to private entities. The panel has also backed more rapid recovery of Government spending on power projects, and claims that application of "sound business principles" would yield a $390 million-a-year windfall for Washington.

I would like to add parenthetically at this point that everybody, here, including the President of the United States, talks about the 2,450 suggestions that were made by the Grace Commission. And everybody talks about the fact that we have to do business in a more businesslike way as a government. Well, the buck stops here. The ball is in your court. That is what this issue is all about. Should the Federal Government favor some few people in this country to the disadvantage of the Federal Treasury and give away power at one-thirteenth the average paid by the rest of the people in this country, or should this Congress accept its responsibility as was provided in the legislation 50 years ago for us to deal with the issue.

We are not dealing with the issue. We are running away from the issue, if we just renew this contract for another 30-year term.

The Business Week article says that the changes that the Grace Commission was talking about are not likely to occur soon. They go on to say, despite its free-market leanings, the Reagan administration is unwilling to tangle with the public power lobby in Washington or with Western water and power interests.

The administration can count votes just like everybody else, observes Attorney Weinberg. As long as the water and power lobbies retain their strong voice, power projects like Hoover will be among the great bargains well into the 21st century.

Mr. President, the issue is before us. I would like my colleagues who are interested in this subject to know that the Senator from Ohio, with respect to whom an attempt is being made to shut down debate, is not trying to drag this matter out an unnecessarily long time. I will very shortly indicate that I am prepared to bring this matter to a vote in connection with my amendment. So if anyone in the Senate wishes to be heard on the issue, I do not want to cut them off, but I do believe that this body ought to move forward. It has much business on its agenda. I am prepared to move forward with the second vote in connection with this matter within a period of less than 24 hours.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for a quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, there are not many Members on the floor of the Senate at this moment, but there seems to be some confusion between the amendment that I offered yesterday and the amendment that I am offering today.

When this issue was before the Senate yesterday, it was indicated that the Consumer Federation of America was against the amendment. Frankly, that concerned me, because I yield to no Member of this body in having a better record with that body, being a strong advocate for consumers in this country.

So I take the floor at this time and I hope that my colleagues whose squawkboxes are on will take note of what I am about to say.

The Consumer Federation of America does have a position in opposition to market-based price fixing. They were opposed to the Boxer amendment.

The Senator from Ohio has made it clear on several occasions that I am not on the floor to suggest, and have not suggested, that we go to the point of the Boxer amendment with respect to market price costs.

With respect to my amendment yesterday and my amendment today, the Consumer Federation of America has no position. They have taken no position for it nor have they taken a position in opposition.

Since I know so many of my colleagues are concerned about their record as being friends of the American consumer, and properly so, I thought the RECORD ought to be set straight that the Consumer Federation of America had no position with respect to the amendment I offered yesterday, either for or against, and they have no position with respect to the amendment which is pending.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I listened with interest to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio with respect to the position of the Consumer Federation of America on the pricing formula for electricity that may come from a Federal installation, in this case specifically the Hoover Dam.

I do not know what the position of the Consumer Federation of America is. I do note for the RECORD at this time that the statement before the Senate with respect to what their position was came from the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. CRAN-STON]. I note that he is not on the floor at this time, and whatever comment he would like to make with respect to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio will have to be his.

Mr. METZENBAUM. The Senator from Ohio certainly was not imputing the integrity or claiming any misrepresentation on the part of the Senator from California. I think it was logical for him to say that they did oppose the Boxer amendment, which is a fact. But I felt it important that we clarify they are not for or against yesterday's amendment or today's.

Mr. McCLURE. I say to the Senator from Ohio that I have no knowledge whether they are or are not. I do not know whether the Senator from Ohio is correctly stating their position, or Senator CRANSTON is, or if indeed there is an ambiguity.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I advise my colleagues that I just spoke with Mr. Steven Brobach, who is the executive director of that organization.

Mr. McCLURE. All I am trying to say is I have no personal knowledge of their position. I do not know whether the Senator from Ohio is correct or the Senator from California is correct. But since the Senator from California who made the statement is not on the floor, I thought it appropriate to at least note his absence from the floor and his inability to respond at this time.

I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CLOTURE MOTION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I send a cloture motion to the desk and ask that it be stated by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The cloture motion, having been presented under rule XXII, the Chair directs the clerk to read the motion.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provisions of Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on the Baker motion to concur in the House amendments to S. 268, the Hoover Powerplant Act of 1984.

Senators Howard Baker, Ted Stevens, Chic Hecht, Daniel J. Evans, Bob Kasten, Pete Wilson, Barry Goldwater, Jake Garn, John Tower, James Abdnor, Jeremiah Denton, John P. East, Paul Trible, Roger W. Jepsen, Malcolm Wallop, Mark Andrews, Steve Symms, and James A. McClure.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, the vote on this measure will occur on Tuesday under the rules unless other arrangements are made or unless cloture is invoked on Monday on the vote pursuant to the first cloture motion which was filed.

Mr. President, I know of no further debate on this measure today and if any Senator seeks recognition for that purpose I will yield the floor. Otherwise, I am going to put the Senate in a period for the transaction of routine morning business.

ANTITRUST/R&D

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, will the majority leader be good enough to yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. METZENBAUM. This is on a totally different subject.

The majority leader has indicated at some point he wishes to bring up the R&D bill. The Senator from Ohio has had some differences on it. We are in agreement now.

I only wish to get the majority leader's thinking as to when he expects to bring that up.

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Ohio for bringing the matter up and also for working out the complex details of the arrangement that I understand has now been agreed to by those who have signified a major interest in the bill, especially the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. President, it is my intention to ask the Senate to turn to that measure on Monday. It is my hope we can do it in a very brief time, perhaps even by unanimous consent. But it is the intention of the leadership on this side to ask the Senate to turn to that bill on Monday.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator from Ohio.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past the hour of 4 p.m. in which Senators may speak for not more than 10 minutes each, with the exception of the two leaders, against whom no time limitation shall apply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDERS FOR MONDAY, JULY 30, 1984

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that if the Senate adjourns today, when it reconvenes on Monday, July 30, the reading of the Journal be dispensed with; that no resolutions come over under the rule; that the call of the calendar be dispensed with; and that following the recognition of the two leaders, under the standing order, there be a special order in favor of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] for not to exceed 15 minutes, to be followed by a period for the transaction of routine morning business of not more than 15 minutes in length in which Senators may speak for not more than 2 minutes each; and provided, further, that the morning hours be deemed to have expired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 4 P.M., MONDAY, JULY 30, 1984

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in adjournment until the hour of 4 p.m. on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there are a few matters that appear to be cleared for action by unanimous consent.

I ask the minority leader if he is prepared to proceed on some of them, and let me first identify Calendar Order No. 1068, which is Senate Joint Resolution 272.

Mr. BYRD. There is no objection.

ANNIVERSARY OF THE WARSAW UPRISING

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, in view of that, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate Calendar Order No. 1068.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BYRD. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S.J. Res. 272) recognizing the anniversaries of the Warsaw uprising and the Polish resistance to invasion of Poland during World War II.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution and preamble are as follows:

S.J. RES. 272

Whereas August 1, 1984, marks the fortieth anniversary of the Warsaw uprising, an event of major significance in the history of World War II:

Whereas on August 1, 1944, the Polish Home Army under the command of Tedeusz Bor-Komorowski rose up against the Nazis who had begun evacuating Warsaw in the face of the Soviet advance through Eastern Europe, held major portions of the city for sixty-three days against insuperable odds, and suffered extreme hardship, retribution, and personal sacrifice throughout a heroic engagement in which approximately two hundred and fifty thousand Poles were killed, wounded, or missing;

Whereas September 1, 1984, marks the forty-fifth anniversary of the invasion of Poland by the Army and Air Force of the Third Reich, which was followed just sixteen days later by the Soviet invasion from the East and the subsequent occupation of a zone populated by thirteen million Poles, these events having led to the development of a strong underground movement directed by the Polish Government in exile;

Whereas the three wartime leaders of the Polish Home Army, Lieutenant General Stefan Rowecki, murdered by the Gestapo in 1944, Lieutenant General Bor-Komorowski, imprisoned by the Nazis and died in London in 1966, and Major General Leopold Okulicki, imprisoned by the Soviets and perished in a Soviet jail in 1945, symbolize the supreme personal sacrifice and commitment to the cause of freedom and self-determination;

Whereas the spirit of Polish resistance to foreign oppression and domination is symbolized by these historic events and remains a vital element in the Polish national character as manifested by the emergence of the Solidarity Trade Union movement in 1980; and

Whereas, in prior years, the President has granted special recognition to these important days in Polish history, with particular regard to the crucial role of the Polish Home Army in the Allied war effort, and to the leaders of the Polish Home Army: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States joins in recognizing the anniversary of the Warsaw uprising, which stands as a poignant reminder to the world of the power of the human spirit over adversity, and the anniversary of the Polish resistance to the World War II invasion of Poland and the leaders of that resistance, which symbolizes the currently continuing struggle of the Polish people and freedom loving people everywhere in the preservation of their liberties and in fulfillment of their national aspirations.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

CONDEMNING THE CLOSING OF ABC COLOR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, may I say to the minority leader I am prepared now to call up House Concurrent Resolution 331, which is Calendar Order No. 1070, if there is no objection.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there is no objection on this side.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate Calendar Order No. 1070.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the resolution by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 331) to condemn the closing of ABC Color, the only independent newspaper in Paraguay, and to urge the Government of Paraguay to permit the reopening of that newspaper and to guarantee freedom of the press.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the concurrent resolution.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I join my colleagues in support of this resolution condemning the Paraguayan Government's closing of the newspaper ABC Color. Last March, in a blatant attack against Paraguay's only independent newspaper, agents of the 30-year-old regime of President Alfredo Stroessner jailed its brave publisher, Aldo Zuccolillo, closed down the newspaper, ransacked its offices, and threw its 400 employees out of work. A brave radio station that protested the closing was itself closed for 30 days.

I understand that General Stroessner is perplexed that the closing of a newspaper has aroused such criticism around the world. Indeed, the closing has raised the ire of the Department of State, the Inter-American Press Association, the American Society of Newspaper Editors and the Newspaper Guild, and now a bipartisan assemblage of Members of the House and Senate. Perhaps, the closing will serve a positive purpose. Perhaps it will awaken the Paraguayan Government to the fact that the movement within that country for a more open and democratic society is supported by a great body of international public opinion. A free press is essential to the achievement of that free society.

I fervently hope that the Government of Paraguay heeds the call from all of those concerned as well as from this resolution which urges it to permit the reopening of ABC Color and to guarantee freedom of the press.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, ABC Color was a popular, independent newspaper in Paraguay for 15 years before the government of General Alfredo Stroessner ordered it to be closed last March 22. The government alleged the newspaper was subverting public order. At first thought, the silencing of this paper in the remote reaches of the Southern Hemisphere may not seem important to us. Yet, the closing of ABC Color has generated editorial comment in major newspapers across the United States. All urge that this paper be allowed to resume publication.

I have asked that House Concurrent Resolution 331 be brought up today under unanimous-consent agreement. This resolution, approved by the House of Representatives on June 29, condemns the closing of ABC Color and urges the Government of Paraguay to permit the reopening of that newspaper and guarantee freedom of the press. In approving this resolution, we would be joining the administration, as well as the House of Repesentatives, in voicing our Government's opposition to the closing of ABC Color. U.S. Ambassador Arthur H. Davis has repeatedly expressed the U.S. concern, and the State Department has informed Paraguayan Government officials that the closing of ABC Color will continue to be an important issue between us.

Approval of this resolution by the Senate would give timely assistance to other efforts on hehalf of ABC Color. President Stroessner agreed to meet on June 22 with a delegation from the Inter-American Press Association. The meeting was described as cordial. Attached to my statement is an account of the interview with President Stroessner which was written by one of the IAPA participants, Edward Seaton of Seaton Publications, Manhattan, KS. At that time President Stroessner did not close the door on further consideration of the ABC Color issue, leading the delegation to hope that arrangements might be made whereby the paper could resume publication.

Mr. President, the great majority of Senators represent a State which is linked in a special relationship with an individual country in the Caribbean region, Central or South America. Under the well-known Partners of the Americas Program, Kansas has long enjoyed a very active friendship with its partner, Paraguay. This October, Partners of the Americas, a people-to-people program created under the Alliance for Progress, celebrates its 20th anniversary of hard work and accomplishments by the 54 partnerships.

Due to Kansas' partnership with Paraguay, we take a special interest in ABC Color, and I have been pleased to work in the Senate toward approval of House Concurrent Resolution 331. I ask unanimous consent that a few recent editorials on ABC Color be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, members of the journalistic community take quite seriously the obligation to support their colleagues in other countries where freedom of the press is denied or under siege. This commitment is sorely needed and sets a high standard for other professions that are concerned about human rights and democratic institutions. I hope that journalists will continue to be actively involved in the battle for freedom of the press throughout the hemisphere.

EXHIBIT 1

[From the Manhattan (KS) Mercury, July 1, 1984]

(By Edward Seaton, Publisher)

Meet A. Zuccolillo: Uncompromising, determined, courageous. A newspaper publisher forbidden to roll his press in Kansas' sisterland to the south, Paraguay.

Now, say hello to A. Stroessner: Tough, bold, cunning. The longest ruling dictator in Latin America—and one of the most durable in the world—who three months ago shut down Paraguay's leading daily, Zuccolillo's ABC Color.

These two strikingly similar personalities are locked in a struggle of power and principle that is gaining worldwide attention and last week brought this writer face-to-face with both of them.

The executive committee of the Inter American Press Association (IAPA) was mounting an on-site campaign in behalf of Aldo Zuccolillo's newspaper and as the committee's vice chairman I was the nominal leader of the 16-member delegation. The committee chairman was unable to participate.

The case has more than passing interest to Kansans because Paraguay is matched with Kansas in the Partners of the Americas program. One of the newspaper's editor-reporters, Ricardo Caballero Aquino, is a K-State graduate. Its most illustrious writer, Alcibiades Gonzalez Delvalle—known as the Jack Anderson of Paraguay—visited Manhattan in 1980. He currently is banned by law from the practice of journalism in Paraguay.

Most assessments we heard were pessimistic. Reopening the newspaper, we were told, was a dead issue in Paraguay. Zuccolillo had pushed too far in his struggle for an independent newspaper. His paper had more circulation than the other three dailies put together, it was monopolizing advertising, was disrupting national life, and was even in violation of the constitution. Despite Zuccolillo's appearing to be a virulent anti-communist to outsiders, the government party branded him a subversive.

Our only hope, we concluded, was to change the mind of President Alfredo Stroessner himself. We therefore went to a great deal of trouble to arrange a meeting with him personally. But upon departure from home had no response. An official at the Paraguayan embassy in Washington told us the president had never been known to reply to requests for meetings made by cable from abroad. A personal visit to the presidency would be necessary, he said. We were apprehensive. We could see ourselves in Asuncion being told we should have asked earlier for the interview. But upon arrival, we made the formal request in person.

To our delight, the response was positive. We would be permitted interviews with President Stroessner and other high-ranking figures in the government. We immediately sat down with Zuccolillo to map out strategy. Most interviews with Stroessner turn into a monologue by the President, we were told, so we drafted a three-page letter to present to him as insurance that our message would not be lost. Our delegation, which included five Americans, two Brazilians, two Nicaraguans, five Argentines, an exiled Cuban and a Mexican—all representing daily newspapers—listened intently as Zuccolillo reminded us of the two recent stints in jail he'd endured as Stroessner pressured him before deciding finally to close the newspaper. We determined we should not dwell with the president on restoring press freedom to Paraguay, since even before ABC's closing freedom of the press as other non-communist countries know it did not exist. In fact, Stroessner has controlled his fiefdom with martial law by renewing every 90 days (for 30 years!) a suspension of civil liberties. We would push a re-opening of the newspaper and the peoples' right to information, we determined, and avoid a confrontation on civil liberties.

Meanwhile—unknown to us—the president's political party, the Colorados, were papering the city with posters and banners attacking our organization. They had previously launched vicious attacks over the party radio station. We woke the next morning to a view outside our hotel of three-feet high red banners with large white letters stretching across the major downtown streets. Perhaps the most telling of them was the one that said, "Primero La Ley. Despues La S.I.P." (First the law. Then the Inter American Press Association.) In other words, law and order comes ahead of civil liberties in Paraguay.

The posters were everywhere:

"Free Press, Yes
"Libertinism, No
"Fatherland, Yes
"I.A.P.A., No"

or

"The I.A.P.A. Does Not Defend
"Freedom of the Press
"It Only Defends the "Interests of Owners."

The scene was set. Our group divided up according to assignments. Three met with the Minister of Justice. Three carried our message to the Interior Minister, head of domestic security. Others interviewed the local bishop and made calls on the pro-government newspapers and broadcasters. My assignment, along with the president of IAPA, Horacio Aguirre, was to meet with Stroessner himself.

Our experience, later recounted with front-page color photos and stories in all three government-oriented dailies, began with a flourish. Greeted at the palace gate by the president's secretary of information, we were ushered into a session with the heads of each branch of the military. Also present was the minister of justice, who earlier had seen our colleagues. His message was that the publisher himself, Zuccolillo, had not actually asked the government to re-open the paper. Later, we realized this was an invitation to negotiate the re-opening, with perhaps the key trading stock being Zuccolillo's resignation as editor and publisher.

Ten minutes into the conversation an aide invited us into the president's office, which was lined on one side by still and television photojournalists. The shutters popped and we shook hands with Don Alfredo Stroessner, one of the world's most hated, yet misunderstood, chiefs of state.

The president then ushered us into a huge conference room, probably the cabinet chamber, adjoining his office. We asked the information secretary, who joined us at the end of the mammoth table as the only other participant, how long we would have with the president. He did not answer. We hoped for the best and began the discussion of the re-opening of a newspaper.

The conversation was cordial and without acrimony. At 71, Stroessner is a husky six-footer who appears the picture of health. He lives unostentatiously and is known to rise before dawn for a workday that often runs from 4:30 a.m. to midnight. Despite his reputation abroad, in Paraguay he appears genuinely popular and apparently often can be seen driving about unaccompanied by bodyguards.

There are reasons for this, of course. Growth the past decade has averaged nearly 10 per cent per year, due largely to a massive hydroelectric dam project financed by Brazil. Asuncion is prosperous, much more so than I expected. It's not Buenos Aires or Montevideo, but it's far more prosperous than Managua or Port-au-Prince, Haiti. The tragic poverty so evident to travelers to Mexico, for example, is not seen even in the countryside. Interestingly, the most miserable housing on the 900 miles of roadway between Asuncion and Montevideo, Uruguay, is just across the border in Argentina, Latin America's most developed country.

But while to many of his countrymen Stroessner is a benevolent dictator and author of prosperity, others—like Zuccolillo and Gonzalez Delvalle—have seen the dark side, which can include widespread arrests without charge, exile, torture and even death. Since seizing power in a coup d'etat in 1954, General Stroessner has maintained a balance between coercion and tolerance. So long as it does not become unruly or threatening, opposition is tolerated within the facade of a republican system with an elected congress and re-election every fifth year of Stroessner himself as president. Martial law persists, however, through periods of relative liberalization that alternate unpredictably with crackdowns.

The closing March 22 of ABC Color seems to mark such a reversal. Earlier this year, at the urging of the new, popular president of Argentina, Raul Alfonsin, Stroesner permitted most of the exiled opposition living in Argentina to return home. It was ABC's coverage of their activities and comments, he told us, that led him to close the newspaper. The "irregular opposition" have a right to their own newspaper, he said, but Zuccolillo was providing them one free. We countered these statements with responses about the value of an independent source of news for economic, political and social development. We pointed out that in a democracy information and criticism should not be confused with subversion.

We also spoke of Paraguay's image in the Western democracies and explained that many foreign governments had hoped the return of the opposition signalled a permanent liberalization. We alluded to aid that would come to Paraguay if world opinion of his regime improved. This point, we believe, may be especially significant in view of the end of the construction phase of the hydroelectric project with Brazil. Stroessner now has hopes of a similar project with Argentina.

The president spoke with pride of Paraguay's prosperity. He described the stability he'd brought to the country after decades of a revolving-door presidency. He talked of Nicaragua, where his friend Anastasio Somoza fell to the Sandinista revolution. Somoza later took refuge in Paraguay but was assassinated on an Asuncion street by Sandinista-hired gunmen. The attitude of our Nicaraguan colleagues, who now oppose the Sandinistas, interested him.

Our conversations evolved to nearly an hour's length, so finally we asked the general what we could tell our 1,200 member publications throughout the hemisphere about the future of ABC Color. He hedged. He alluded to the obstacle of the constitutional suit brough by Zuccolillo despite his earlier agreeing with us that, regardless of how the suit came out, reopening the paper rests in the hands of the executive. In the end, he said neither yes nor no. He left the door open to a reappearance of ABC.

We were not satisfied, but we were encouraged. We resolved to continue the campaign. Since returning home, we have solicited editorials of support from many of America's major dailies, which will be appearing in the next week. We arranged for more pressure from Argentina, and we are mailing a request for support to all our 1,200 member publications in both North and South America.

Stroessner has the power, we have only principle. We marshal our forces in the court of international opinion, which is our only battlefield. Our only weapon is public arousal.

We look forward to the next issue of ABC Color. We know only one thing it will contain. Zuccolillo told a university audience of more than a thousand persons the evening of our interview he'd already written the lead editorial for the next edition. He said it was too long to read, so he'd just give the title:

"Como siempre."

("As always.")

MR. STROESSNER: LET ABC REOPEN

It's to Paraguayan strongman Alfredo Stroessner's credit that he at least met with representatives of the Inter American Press Association regarding the government's closure of ABC Color, a leading Asuncion daily. Now he should take the logical next step, and allow what had been Paraguay's only independent newspaper to reopen.

The recent IAPA mission was led by Edward Seaton, publisher of the Manhattan Mercury and vice chairman of the IAPA executive committee. He and Horacio Aguirre of Diario Las Americas in Miami, IAPA president, met with Mr. Stroessner for about an hour. While the president wouldn't give a firm answer, he "left the door open," according to Mr. Seaton.

"Stroessner has the power, we have only principle," Mr. Seaton wrote in a Sunday full-page article. "We marshall our forces in the court of international opinion, which is our only battlefield. Our only weapon is public arousal."

The depth of that arousal can be seen from the support Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-KS, has received for her attempts to persuade Secretary of State George Shultz to intervene with Mr. Stroessner on ABC's behalf. A letter to Mr. Shultz signed by nine other senators—including Sen. Bob Dole, R-KS—said, "Permitting ABC Color to reopen would demonstrate to members of Congress and to the American people that his government agrees with this fundamental principle (of a free press)."

For the people of Kansas, it would do even more. It would demonstrate to the citizenry of Paraguay's "sister state," under the Partners of the Americas program, that the government of Paraguay will be sensitive, and responsive, to Kansans' feelings.

President Stroessner has much to gain and little to lose by exercising his executive powers to order ABC's reopening. He should do so and, in the process, enhance his country's image immeasurably among the free nations of the world.

PARAGUAY: POISON ON THE PRESS

(By Jim Hampton, Editor)

Just last month, Gen. Alfredo Stroessner marked his 30th anniversary as president of Paraguay. Two months earlier, he showed once again how he has kept his choke-hold on power longer than any other dictator now in office.

General Stroessner tolerates just enough dissent to make dissent both remarkable and dangerous in Paraguay. Witness the travails of ABC Color, the only independent newspaper in Asuncion, Paraguay's capital.

Publisher Aldo Zuccolillo, a self-made millionaire in other endeavors, started ABC Color 16 years ago. His motive, he told an interviewer last year, was the "I am a successful man, and I thought my people needed a newspaper that would tell the truth." He knew nothing about newspapering, so he taught himself, then his staff.

Both learned their lessons well—too well, by General Stroessner's lights. ABC Color is by any standard a good newspaper, covering both domestic and foreign affairs objectively. The Paraguayan people, thirsty for credible news coverage in a dictatorship, obviously trust ABC Color. By 1983 its circulation was 90,000 copies daily, averaging 60 to 70 pages each.

Since March 22, ABC Color's circulation has been zero, however. On that day, on a flimsy and illegal pretext, the Stroessner regime closed ABC Color. Despite entreaties from various press organizations, the U.S. State Department and the U.S. embassy in Asuncion, and a bipartisan group in Congress, the newspaper remains closed.

Six days before the interior ministry closed this paper, the Paraguayan police arrested Mr. Zuccolillo. He was jailed incommunicado for a week, never formally charged as Paraguayan law requires. Instead, the Stroessner government accused him of "subverting public order," of "disrespect for the authorities," and—sin of sins!—of being "ill-bred." After his release from jail, he was kept temporarily under house arrest, enforced by armed guards.

His offense: ABC Color had covered meetings of opposition groups and published their leaders' statements. Never mind that ABC Color simply was doing its job: reporting a news event objectively. General Stroessner closed his iron fist around ABC Color.

While police cordoned off ABC Color's offices, others accompanied by a judge searched desks and file cabinets in the newsroom. They assertedly were searching for "subversive material," and naturally they found items that fit their definition of "subversive." They carted off about 250 documents and articles to examine them.

Another independent voice in Asuncion, Radio Nanduti, had the temerity to protest the closing of ABC Color. That set General Stroessner's iron fingers to twitching. His minions suspended the station's broadcasting license for 30 days after its owner invited listeners to tell of government corruption on a call-in program. Further, Radio Nanduti's owner pointedly was reminded of "the convenience" of his "ceasing to worry about the ABC case."

ABC Color's closing threw 400 employees out of work. All told, it severely affected some 2,000 families dependent on the newspaper's paychecks or orders. Mr. Zuccolillo, now free from jail but hardly free otherwise, has been trying to place his workers in other jobs. He has had only minimal success.

This was the courageous publisher's worst encounter with the Stroessner regime, but not the first. Mr. Zuccolillo, his leading political columnist, and a reporter were jailed last summer. Again their offense was simply reporting and commenting on events, including governmental corruption and inefficiency.

Nor is that the Stroessner regime's only method of suppressing ABC Color. General Stroessner has used effectively the dictator's favorite technique of denying feisty newspapers newsprint on which to publish. By this strangulation, General Stroessner shrank ABC Color's average-size issue by half and its circulation by a third, to 60,000.

The Inter American Press Association's (IAPA) executive committee is scheduled to convene in Asuncion on June 22. These editors hope to meet with General Stroessner and to persuade him to permit ABC Color to resume publication.

They'd have a better chance of succeeding if other nations would join the United States in protesting this intolerable suppression of an independent, responsible newspaper. Better still, Congress should adopt a resolution, introduced by Rep. Tony P. Hall, Democrat of Ohio, to cut off all U.S. security assistance to Paraguay unless this repression ceases.

After his first jailing, last year, Mr. Zuccolillo told an American editor that "imprisonment by this regime is a medal." He now has two "medals." Unless Congress and other governments in the hemisphere join the IAPA in pressing General Stroessner to let up, another "medal"—or worse—for Mr. Zuccolillo is inevitable.

MUZZLED—IN PARAGUAY

For most of his 30 years in power, nobody paid much attention to Gen. Alfredo Stroessner, leader of the dusty fiefdom of Paraguay. But change beckons there, and General Stroessner seems perplexed by the attention he's now getting. He insists the country is free—just as his Constitution says—and can't understand why foreigners are fussing about his closing of an allegedly subversive newspaper.

Here's why. ABC Color is at once Paraguay's leading newspaper and its conscience. Its owner and editor, Aldo Zuccolillo, has been brave enough to publish responsibly documented reports about corruption and human rights abuses. That he could do so, despite official harassment, showed that even a closed society can have windows of hope.

Last March, after ABC Color interviewed a returning political exile, it was closed on charges of "endangering the peace of the republic and the stability of its institutions." Mr. Zuccolillo was held without charges for a week and then briefly placed under house arrest. Since the paper's closing, he has paid its staff from his pocket.

Journalists elsewhere took up his cause. Where the notably moderate Inter-American Press Association sent representatives to Asunción, they were greeted by hostile demonstrators and invective of the state radio: "The pestilence of their mercenary presence does not please us." Nonetheless, President Stroessner received the delegation, and gave the impression that ABC Color just might be allowed to resume publication.

That would certainly begin to change Paraguay's reputation for political primitivism. Nothing that ABC Color might publish could damage President Stroessner as much as its continued silence. Mr. Zuccolillo's robust independence was the best advertisement for Paraguay. His real offense has been to take literally the fine language about press freedom in his country's Constitution. Muzzling him has demonstrated the fraudulence of its guarantees.

PRESS CRACKDOWN IN PARAGUAY

President Alfredo Stroessner has run Paraguay with an iron hand for so long—30 years—that suppression has become a habit, even when his own self-interest cannot justify it.

For years, Paraguay was a recluse among nations, known mainly, if at all, for poverty and the harboring of former Nazis. As long as Gen. Stroessner could ship his opponents off to a sympathetic country like Argentina, which had a military dictatorship of its own, he had little to fear at home. He could allow a critical newspaper like ABC Color to continue publishing, albeit with some harassment, and cite it as evidence that Paraguay's press was free. What harm could a free press do with nobody on hand to support?

Last fall the Argentine voters threw out their military government, and the new president asked Gen. Stroessner to take back his exiles. Since Paraguay is counting on sharing the benefits of a giant hydroelectric plant planned by Argentina on the border, the general yielded with the vague proviso that his opponents not engage in politics.

ABC Color began printing interviews and otherwise promoting the views of the dissidents: On March 22, accusing the paper of publishing "seditious opinions" and being a "spokesman for irregular political groups," the government suspended the paper indefinitely and put its publisher, Aldo Zuccolillo, in jail for a week.

Ironically, Gen. Stroessner probably has less to fear politically now than at many times in the past. A big hydroelectric plant at Itaipu on the Brazilian border has improved the country's economy and the Argentine project should add to the comforts of progress. Opposition to the government, though apparent in some liberal and academic circles, does not seem to be widespread.

Last week Gen. Stroessner was visited by a delegation from the Inter American Press Association. The message was realistic: "Sure," it said in effect, "the matter is technically in the courts. But you control the courts and in the end, the decision is yours. You say you believe in freedom of the press. You can prove it by letting ABC Color reopen."

Gen. Stroessner didn't say yes or no. But he is going on 72, an age when political bosses begin to think about how history will remember them. He has little to lose, and if he really wants to be remembered as the man who brought Paraguay out of the dark ages, now is a good time to show that he accepts the free press as part of the age of enlightenment.

[From the Washington Post, June 21, 1984]

PARAGUAY'S EMBATTLED PRESS

Paraguay is one of those police states of the right that attempted to combine firm control of the political process and a limited leeway for the press. Thus has President Alfredo Stroessner managed over his 30 years of harsh and often vile one-man rule to maintain his power even while allowing some citizens to let off a bit of steam. The press is almost the only such outlet under a regime that otherwise relies on a range of sanctions extending to the threat of torture. In this tricky space the newspaper ABC Color has operated with a widely admired courage and flair. Its independent publisher. Aldo Zuccolillo, has regularly courted official rage and recrimination by pushing beyond the officially sanctioned limits on newspaper fare.

Last March 22, President Stroessner went beyond harassment and intimidation and closed ABC Color, ransacking the newspaper's offices and throwing its 100 employes out of work. The dated report was the usual official claptrap: subverting public order, serving as a mouth piece to political groups lacking official standing, disrespect for the authorities—code terms for what ought to be considered the normal practice of political journalism. As if that were not enough, the interior minister added that Mr. Zuccolillo is "ill bred." A radio station that protested the closing was itself suspended for 30 days.

The State Department and various American public figures and press organizations have protested the action against ABC Color, but the paper remains closed. The Inter American Press Organization is currently holding a meeting of its executive board in Asuncion in order to bring additional pressure to bear. President Stroessner should understand that he is isolating Paraguay from all decent opinion in the hemisphere. The journalists of ABC Color deserve to know they have the firm respect of their colleagues everywhere.

A FREE PRESS IN PARAGUAY

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I compliment the Senator from Kansas for her leadership in sponsoring this resolution. I believe that adoption of this resolution by the U.S. Senate would send a powerful message to the dictatorship of General Alfredo Stroessner.

General Stroessner's regime is perhaps best known as being the longest surviving dictatorship in the Americas. Stroessner has ruled his country with an iron hand since the 1950's and has shown little willingness to open up the political process in Paraguay. The single significant exception to this overall climate of repression in Paraguay was ABC Color, the only independent newspaper within that country. On March 22, General Stroessner apparently decided that ABC Color was showing a little bit too much independence for its own good. So, he ordered the paper's closure and had his subordinates vandalize ABC Color's offices. The paper's editor, Aldo Zuccolillo, was threatened and subsequently jailed by the Paraguayan authorities. After his release, Mr. Zuccolillo petitioned to have ABC Color's closure declared unconstitutional and to have the paper reopened. On June 28, unfortunately and not surprisingly, the Paraguayan Supreme Court dismissed Mr. Zuccolillo's petition. So, ABC Color remains silent.

Despite its silence, ABC Color has not been forgotten by those throughout the Americas who believe in freedom of the press. The Inter-American Press Association has recognized the importance of this case by sending a delegation of important journalists that included the Association's President, Horacio Aguirre of Miami's Diario Las Americas and Pedro Chamorro of Managua's embattled La Prensa. I also commend Ambassador Arthur Davis and the American Embassy staff in Asuncion for their efforts to communicate the importance of human rights and a free press to various Paraguayan officials as well as to convey American concerns about the closure of ABC Color.

Mr. President, it is my hope that this resolution, which passed the House on June 29, would be quickly approved by my colleagues in the Senate. The passage of this resolution would remind General Stroessner that a free press is an integral part of a democratic and constitutional society. By permitting ABC Color to begin publishing again and by restoring freedom of the press, General Stroessner would show that constitutionalism still counts for something in Paraguay. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter from Ambassador Arthur Davis to me be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EMBASSY OF THE
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Asunción, Paraguay, July 6, 1984.

Hon. DAVE DURENBERGER,
United States Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DURENBERGER: I wish to thank you for your recent letter to Secretary of State George Shultz expressing your concern over the shutting down of Paraguay's most important independent newspaper, ABC COLOR. Your letter helped underscore to the Paraguayan Government the importance which we in the United States attach to freedom of the press. I can assure you that your concerns were conveyed to the highest authorities. The translated copy of your letter I delivered to the Foreign Ministry was passed on to and read by senior officials.

We in the Embassy have explained to the Paraguayan Government that a pattern of violations of human rights and press freedom inevitably would place limits on the kind of relationship which the United States could maintain with Paraguay. Since the closure of ABC COLOR on March 22, I repeatedly have tried to make clear to Paraguayan officials that the action would be seen in the United States as a major step backwards. I have urged the Paraguayan Government to weigh carefully the enduring, negative impact which the paper's closure would undoubtedly have upon our bilateral relations.

I would like to be able to assure you that our collective efforts have carried the day and that ABC COLOR is again publishing. Unfortunately, that is not the case. On June 28 the Paraguayan Supreme Court unsurprisingly dismissed ABC COLOR's effort to have the closure declared unconstitutional. Although many within the Paraguayan Government assert that the case of ABC COLOR is closed, as far as this Embassy is concerned, we are not persuaded that the door is irrevocably shut.

Please be assured that this Embassy will continue to emphasize to President Stroessner and other Paraguayan leaders the strong support in the United States for the reopening of ABC COLOR. I hope that we can count on your continued interest in the fate of ABC COLOR.

Sincerely,

ARTHUR H. DAVIS,
Ambassador.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I rise to add my voice in support of House Concurrent Resolution 331, which condemns the closing of the only independent newspaper in Paraguay, ABC Color. That continued act of suppression by the Stroessner dictatorship must not be ignored. This resolution, which was called up by unanimous consent in the House and passed by voice vote, urges that ABC Color be allowed to reopen. We should support it.

In recent months, there have been a few positive signs in Latin America, most notably in Argentina where the first civilian government in a long time has begun the painful work of binding up that nation's wounds. But in neighboring Paraguay, new wounds are being opened, and the old ones are festering anew.

Earlier this year, General Alfredo Stroessner marked his 30th year as President of Paraguay. His rule has been notable primarily for the poverty and oppression he has brought upon the people of Paraguay, while at the same time offering it up as a haven for Nazi fugitives.

In such an environment, we can all applaud the bravery and integrity of Paraguay's leading journalist, Aldo Zuccolillo, who has persistently endeavoured to secure greater freedom for the press in Paraguay, despite, Stroessner's heavy hand and the personal risks involved. Zuccolillo's newspaper, ABC Color, has been the proverbial breath of fresh air in the suffocating atmosphere fostered by the Stroessner dictatorship. The rules are strict, to be sure. When they are broken—by ABC Color or anyone else—retribution is swift and sure. Aldo Zuccolillo was jailed last summer, and again this spring. His newspaper has been denied newsprint. Others who have taken up the cause of a free press have been pointedly reminded where power lies in Paraguay. But Aldo Zuccolillo and his valiant staff still had the courage to print as much of the truth as they could. On March 22 of this year, General Stroessner decided he had seen enough.

On March 22, 1984, ABC Color was indefinitely closed by order of Paraguay's Interior Minister, and its premises searched. The Stroessner regime has kept it closed, despite protests from the U.S. Embassy, the Inter-American Press Association, and indeed, people of good will everywhere.

The Reagan administration has been outspoken in promoting its theory that "authoritarian" regimes, such as that in Paraguay, have the tendency to evolve into democratic governments. Clearly, the people of Paraguay are still waiting. Perhaps this administration is willing to wait patiently for the Stroessner regime to reform itself. But I am not, ABC Color is not, and neither should the U.S. Senate. I strongly support House Concurrent Resolution 331, and I urge my colleagues to pass it unanimously.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 331) was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

CORRECTION IN ENROLLMENT OF H.R. 559

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, may I say to the minority leader that I propose next to ask consent to correct the enrollment of H.R. 559 and to adopt a concurrent resolution to that effect if there is no objection.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, there is no objection.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, then I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate House Concurrent Resolution 340.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. ABDNOR]. The clerk will state the resolution by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 340) to correct technical errors in the enrollment of the bill H.R. 559.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was considered and agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 577—JUDICIARY COMMITTEE DISCHARGED FROM FURTHER CONSIDERATION AND ORDERED PLACED ON THE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I propose now to discharge the Judiciary Committee from further consideration of House Joint Resolution 577, designating August 1984 as "Polish American Heritage Month," and to place that item on the calendar, if the minority leader does not object.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there is no objection.

Mr. BAKER. I make that request, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER TO HOLD H.R. 5890 AT THE DESK

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I believe this matter has been cleared, and I will state it for the consideration of the minority leader.

I ask unanimous consent that H.R. 5890, the commission relating to the Martin Luther King holiday, be held at the desk until the close of business on Monday, July 30, 1984.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, there is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE EXECUTIVE CALENDAR

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I inquire of the minority leader if there is any portion of today's Executive Calendar he would be in a position to clear.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, this side is ready to proceed on the military nominations, and I have just so indicated to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the minority leader. We did indeed confer privately just a moment ago.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session for the purpose of considering the military nominations beginning with and including Calendar Order No. 908, under the Air Force, and including all of the nominations placed on the Secretary's desk, which are nominations in the Air Force, Army, and Navy.

Mr. President, I am advised that there is a military appeals judge that perhaps may be cleared, as well. That is Calendar Order No. 709 and I include that in the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Walter T. Cox III, of South Carolina, to be a judge of the U.S. Court of Military Appeals.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, it is a pleasure for me to recommend Judge Walter T. Cox III to the Senate for confirmation as President Reagan's nominee to be a member of the U.S. Court of Military Appeals. Judge Cox is a native and resident of Anderson, S.C. A graduate of Clemson University in 1964, he later earned his law degree at the University of South Carolina School of Law from which he was graduated first in his class in 1967.

He served in the U.S. Army as an officer in the Judge Advocate General Corps. He was a partner in a South Carolina law firm for a number of years and has extensive trial experience in both civil and criminal cases.

In 1978, Judge Cox was elected as a resident judge of the 10th judicial circuit in South Carolina. He has experience as an acting associate judge of the South Carolina Supreme Court and is active in various bar associations.

I am particularly proud that the President has chosen a distinguished citizen, attorney, and jurist from South Carolina for the important position of judge on the Court of Military Appeals. Judge Cox has excelled in all that he has undertaken and he is the type of person who has demonstrated intellect, judicial temperament, and leadership. These qualities will enable him to serve with distinction as a member of this Federal court.

During his confirmation hearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee, Judge Cox demonstrated a detailed and in-depth knowledge of the Uniform Code of Military Justice and its relationship in maintaining good order and discipline in the military services. The Senate Armed Services Committee was unanimous in its recommendation to the Senate that Judge Cox be confirmed as a member of the U.S. Court of Military Appeals.

Mr. President, I urge all of my colleagues to join me in a unanimous confirmation of Judge Walter T. Cox III, to be a member of the U.S. Court of Military Appeals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

AIR FORCE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Lt. Gen. George M. Browning, Jr., for appointment to the grade of lieutenant general on the retired list pursuant to the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 1370.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Maj. Gen. Casper T. Spangrud, under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 601, to be assigned to a position of importance and responsibility designated by the President under title 10, United States Code, section 601.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Gen. Wilbur L. Creech for appointment to the grade of general on the retired list pursuant to the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 1370.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Gen. Jerome F. O'Malley under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 601, to be reassigned to a position of importance and responsibility designated by the President under title 10, United States Code, section 601.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

NAVY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Rear Adm. Thomas E. Flynn, under the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 5148(b), to be assigned as Judge Advocate General of the Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

NOMINATIONS PLACED ON THE SECRETARY'S DESK

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Air Force, Army, and Navy, placed on the Secretary's desk.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nominations be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are considered and confirmed en bloc.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the nominations were confirmed.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of these nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to legislative session

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, that completes my business. We have provided for time for the transaction of routine morning business until 4 p.m. this afternoon. It is my understanding that perhaps the minority leader has matters he wishes to take up at this time.

Mr. President, in the past we have, for the convenience of Senators so that they may be fully aware of the floor situation as we proceed in morning business and to hear another presentation by the distinguished minority leader on the history of the Senate, that no business be transacted except the presentation of that speech by the Senator from West Virginia, the minority leader, and that at the conclusion of his speech the Chair automatically place the Senate in adjournment pursuant to the order previously entered.

Mr. President, I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there will be no votes today and no business transacted today with the exception now of the presentation of and remarks of the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader for his courtesy on this occasion as on all previous occasions with respect to making provision for me to make a statement during morning business without a time limitation thereon up to the hour of 4 p.m. today.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Chair for the patience of the present Presiding Officer. I regret that I have imposed upon the Chair by the delay which has ensued.

Mr. President, this is the 69th speech that I have made on the subject of the U.S. Senate. The title of today's speech is "The Senate And

The Great Debate Over Foreign Policy, 1919-1941."

THE UNITED STATES SENATE

THE SENATE AND THE GREAT DEBATE OVER FOREIGN POLICY, 1919-1941

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, Marines landing in the Caribbean and Central America . . . United States opposition to Sandinistas in Nicaragua . . . a presidential representative sent to mediate between opposing forces in Central America . . . a United States senator standing in this chamber and denouncing attempts to "browbeat and whip a little country like Nicaragua. . . ." [1] It all sounds very familiar. However, I am not talking about recent events, but about a debate which took place in the Senate some sixty years ago. Reviewing these events, and their similarity to our times, I am reminded of the inscription on the National Archives Building: "What is Past is Prologue."

It has been a recurring theme of my addresses on the history of the United States Senate that we must become aware of our past in order to understand and deal with the present and plan for the future. This seems particularly true when dealing with foreign policy. Today I shall examine the Senate's role in foreign policy between the first and second World Wars, from the defeat of the Treaty of Versailles in 1919 to the declarations of war against Japan, Germany, and Italy in 1941. There occurred during these years a "great debate," not only in the Senate, but also in the Nation as a whole. On one side stood the Wilsonian internationalists, Democrats and moderate Republicans largely from the South and Northeast, who believed that the United States had responsibilities as a world leader that it could not shirk, and that the best way to exercise those responsibilities to ensure world peace was by cooperating through international organizations. In opposition stood the isolationists, who recalled George Washington's warning against entangling alliances, and who believed that multilateral ventures might jeopardize the Nation's security and independence.

As events unfurled, the isolationists lost the "great debate." The surprise attack on Pearl Harbor and American entry into the war discredited their position. In short order, most of the isolationists either left the Senate, through death, defeat, and retirement, or converted to internationalism. It would not be for another generation, until the Vietnam war, that people would begin to reexamine the isolationists and find at least a little merit in their concerns. Some scholars have suggested that even the terms isolationist and interventionist are misleading, and have suggested "unilateralist" and "multilateralist" as alternatives.[2]

For most of the two decades between the world wars, isolationism prevailed. Isolationists were particularly strong in the United States Senate, where they numbered among their ranks William E. Borah, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Hiram Johnson, Burton K. Wheeler, George Norris, Robert M. La Follette (senior and junior), Arthur Vandenberg, and Robert Taft. Most were Republicans representing mid-Western and far Western states. From 1919 to 1932, when the Republicans were in the majority, these isolationists held important committee chairmanships. After 1933, when the Democrats took control of the Senate, the isolationists lost their power base, but remained influential in the national debate over foreign policy.

The Senate's rejection of the Treaty of Versailles in 1919 ranked among the most momentous events in the history of this institution. In an earlier address I spoke of the political forces and reasons behind the treaty's defeat. Today I will be discussing the period of retreat and disillusionment that followed it. The election of 1920 had placed a United States senator, Warren G. Harding of Ohio, in the White House. Harding had conducted his campaign so ambiguously that it was possible for both supporters and opponents of the League of Nations to vote for him, contributing to his landslide victory. But in fact, Harding's election meant the final rejection of American participation in the League. Even presidential support for United States membership in the World Court came to nothing. After the war, the United States slipped into a mood of self-centered isolationism. The Nation erected high-tariff walls around itself, and held its struggling allies accountable for paying their war debts. Such economic nationalism was extremely short-sighted at a time when the United States had become the leading commercial and financial nation, industrial producer, exporter and importer, and creditor in the world—and it would prove self-defeating as well.

As president, Warren Harding expected to maintain strong ties with his former colleagues in Congress. But Harding, too, like Woodrow Wilson, found that Congress had a mind of its own when it came to foreign policy. As early as December 1920, before Harding's inauguration, Senator William Borah introduced a resolution calling on the president to invite Great Britain and Japan to a conference to reduce their naval building programs. As Professor LeRoy Ashby has written in his study of Borah (The Spearless Leader), the senator masterfully struck a major chord of public opinion. "His disarmament suggestion appealed strongly to the traditional American distrust of military establishments, the desire for peace, and the perennial concern for lower taxes." [3] Some said that Borah's action was merely a publicity ploy to divert public blame for world affairs from the isolationists, and that he never believed Britain, France, and Japan would accept the invitation. But popular support and newspaper approval forced the Harding administration into taking up the proposal, and Britain and Japan agreed to meet in Washington to negotiate naval disarmament. At the Washington Naval Arms Disarmament Conference, held between November 1921 and February 1922, Senators Henry Cabot Lodge (R-MA) and Oscar W. Underwood (D-AL) served as delegates—in contrast to President Wilson's failure to include members of Congress in the Versailles delegation. However, Senator Borah was noticeably absent.

Harding's inclusion of senators in the negotiation proved a wise move, since he needed all the help he could get to win Senate ratification. The isolationists denounced the treaty as an alliance that committed the United States to Japanese aggression in the Far East. Senator A. Owsley Stanley of Kentucky labeled it a "baby" League of Nations. Senator Borah also cited similarities between the "Four Powers Pact" of the Washington conference and the rejected Treaty of Versailles. Speaking for the Harding administration, Senator Lodge denied any entanglements involved with the new pact. Democratic senators criticized the secrecy behind much of the negotiations, and Senator Gilbert Hitchcock introduced a resolution calling on the president to furnish the Senate with copies of all proceedings, records, negotiations, arguments, debates, discussions, and conversations among representatives of the four nations.[4] Ratification was given by the Senate easily, 67 to 27, with Senator Borah in the minority opposing it. The Washington Naval Conference produced mixed results. It limited the production of large warships, but allowed an arms race to continue in submarines, destroyers, and cruisers. It called for the status quo in the Far East, with each nation recognizing the others' territories there, but it left Japan in a position to threaten China. Nevertheless, the conference and the treaty were remarkable events which brought the United States back into the international scene just two years after the Senate rejected the Treaty of Versailles.

Mr. President, it seems only fitting at this point that I talk about a truly notable member of the United States

Footnotes at end of article.

Senate, William E. Borah of Idaho. He served as a senator from 1907 until his death in 1940, and even today his firm, jutting jaw, lion-like mane, and resolute stance can be observed in his statue, which stands in the corridor just outside this chamber. William E. Borah was born in 1865, in southern Illinois, into a large German-American family. We are told that his father was a stern Presbyterian who ruled over his family with a firm hand, and that young Borah experienced an unhappy childhood. Briefly he attended the Southern Illinois Academy in preparation for the ministry, but after discovering that was not his vocation he dropped out and joined a traveling Shakespearean company as an actor! His training in Shakespeare became evident years later when he spoke here on the Senate floor. But an actor's life was not to be Borah's, and his irate father caught up with the troop and dragged his son home. Young Borah then went to live with his sister in Kansas, where he completed high school and enrolled in the University of Kansas. His classmates recalled him as a loner with few intimate friends. A bout with tuberculosis forced Borah to leave the University, and he turned his attention to reading law in an attorney's office. Admitted to the bar in 1887, Borah decided there was not much future for a young lawyer in then economically-depressed Kansas. He boarded a train for a new life in Seattle, but he was so short of funds that he made it only as far as Boise, Idaho. There he stayed and there he built his career.

William Borah excelled as a criminal lawyer, often handling cases as a special prosecutor for the local district attorney. In 1897, as Professor William Leuchtenburg has noted, Borah "secured the conviction of 'Diamondfield Jack' Davis, a gunman for a cattle company, for the murder of two sheep herders, one of the milestones in the attempt to bring order out of the bloody range wars of the West." His fame in the courtroom led to his entry into politics, and by 1902 he was the recognized leader of the progressive wing of the Republican party in Idaho. His election to the Senate seemed certain in 1903, but his opponents allegedly purchased enough votes in the state legislature to defeat him. Finally, in January 1907, the state legislature elected him to the United States Senate. He almost did not make it to the Senate, however, for he was indicted for defrauding the government of timber lands in Idaho during a period when he served as counsel to a lumber company. The charges, however, had clearly been trumped up by Borah's political enemies, and he was promptly acquitted. The notoriety helped Borah escape the obscurity that was then the lot of most freshmen senators, and his tremendous eloquence also lifted him head and shoulders above his colleagues.[5]

Mary Borah, the senator's wife, was sitting in the Senate gallery on the day in 1908 when her husband rose to deliver his maiden address. "The day he was to speak I arrived at the Senate early in the morning and sat on the front row," she recalled.

Finally the 'morning business' was finished and I saw Billy push back his chair to rise, but a senator with a white beard was ahead of him and was given the floor. The senator was known for being long winded. To my surprise, after reading a letter from a constituent, he sat down. Billy rose. He stood there quietly for a while studying his audience. He began to talk in a low but easily audible voice, and then with gathering confidence. His colleagues looked at him curiously. Probably they were sizing him up. Usually when a senator speaks the other members thumb through the papers on their desks, or write, or study, or talk to each other in undertones. . . . But all the time he was marshalling his facts—as methodically as if presenting a case to a jury—they continued to listen. Then the galleries began to fill. By the time he was ready to draw his conclusions he was speaking to a crowded house, absolutely silent.

When he had finished, and fellow senators crowded around to congratulate him, Mrs. Borah slipped away in the crowd. "It would be easier when we were alone to tell him how proud I'd been," she said.[6]

Borah's influence in the Senate was felt from the start. While still a freshman he became chairman of the Education and Labor Committee, where he sponsored bills to create the Department of Labor and the Children's Bureau. He was also a leader in the fight to amend the Constitution to allow Federal income taxes and, as I have noted in an earlier address, direct election of senators. But it was the field of foreign policy with which Borah's name became most commonly associated. An intense nationalist, he stood among the chief opponents of Woodrow Wilson's internationalist program, and he joined Senator Henry Cabot Lodge as an "irreconcilable" against the Versailles Treaty and League of Nations. When Senator Lodge died in 1924, Borah succeeded him as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, a post which he held until the Democrats took control of the committee in 1933.

It seemed impossible to pick up a newspaper in the 1920's without reading a Borah pronouncement on some aspect of American policy. Herbert Hoover credited Borah with "a positive genius for newspaper publicity." Borah's practice of holding regular press conferences caused President Coolidge to comment that "Senator Borah is always in session." Reporters would congregate at his office about 3:00 p.m. each afternoon. Twenty or more journalists might crowd around his desk for a relaxed and informal discourse on a wide range of topics. At these sessions they could not quote him directly, but Borah's staff would frequently hand out his prepared statements on a particular subject. His press relations were the envy of other senators, and a source of exasperation for his political opponents. As one Massachusetts newspaper complained in 1930: "Borah this and Borah that, Borah here and there, Borah does and Borah doesn't—until you wish that Borah wasn't."[7]

Several American presidents might also have wished that "Borah wasn't," as the wiley senator frustrated their proposals. After Calvin Coolidge became president in 1923, he proposed United States membership in the World Court. It was hard to make an argument that participation in the court would lead to entangling alliances or impinge on the Nation's independence. But the hard core isolationists adamantly opposed the plan and did their best to sabotage it. Both political parties endorsed the World Court in their platforms in 1924, and the House passed a resolution favoring membership by the overwhelming vote of 303 to 28. Nevertheless, Senator Borah was not to be deterred. As chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Borah delayed the debate and attached five "reservations" to American participation. In January 1926, the Senate adopted the World Court proposal, with Borah's reservations, by a 76 to 17 margin. The League of Nations, however, would accept only four of the five reservations, and President Coolidge declared the American conditions rejected. The twenty-one member nations on the Court informed Coolidge that they were willing to negotiate, but the president responded: "I do not think the Senate would take favorable action on any such proposal, and unless the requirements of the Senate resolution are met by the other interested nations I can see no prospect of this country adhering to the Court."[8]

In a more positive sense, Borah's name was also linked with the 1920's movement to outlaw war. Always suspicious of international agreements, Borah was not an enthusiastic supporter of "Outlawry," as the movement was called, but his endorsement was critical to its success. Borah believed that European policies were leading to another war, no matter what the United States might try to do. But bending to an intense lobbying effort from anti-war groups, he continued to introduce Outlawry resolutions. After French Foreign Affairs Minister

Aristide Briand proposed a bilateral pact between France and the United States, Borah actively supported the proposal. In a meeting with Secretary of State Frank Kellogg, Borah convinced the administration to broaden the proposal to a multinational pact. The result was the Kellogg-Briand pact, in which sixty-two nations pledged never to resort to war and aggression. This "noble experiment," of course, lasted only a decade, until the world was once again plunged into war—which could not be so easily outlawed.[9]

Senator Borah also strenuously opposed American intervention in Nicaragua. During the administration of William Howard Taft the United States had replaced Great Britain as the major foreign power in Nicaragua. When a revolution erupted in that nation in 1912, the United States sent 2,600 troops to quell it. One hundred Marines were left behind to guard the United States legation, the beginning of a twenty-year occupation of Nicaragua.[10] The presence of American military forces in Nicaragua and other Central American and Caribbean nations seemed entirely indefensible to Senator Borah. In 1922 he observed that "The people of Nicaragua today are being exploited in shameless fashion by American corporations protected by United States Marines." In 1925 he declared "the invasion of Nicaragua was unnecessary and therefore unmoral." He asserted that the Monroe Doctrine "does not give to us the right . . . to invade territory, to tear down governments and set up others." [11]

In 1926, as a result of an insurrection led by General Augustino Sandino, the United States once again dispatched Marines to Nicaragua. Borah at first accepted the Coolidge administration's rationale that it had sent troops only to protect American lives in Nicaragua, but he became increasingly suspicious of the State Department's motives. In January 1927, after meeting with Secretary of State Kellogg, Borah announced his opposition to the administration's policies in Nicaragua. The survival of the regime there, he said, was due entirely to the "sheer force of foreign arms." This stance caused many Latin American leaders to send congratulations to the senator for his "brilliant defense in favor of sovereignty of all the nations of the earth, equal before the law," as the former president of Chile wrote. Borah then introduced a resolution calling for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to travel to Nicaragua and Mexico to hear testimony there. But administration supporters on the committee blocked his efforts. One newspaper suggested that if Senator Borah wanted to go to Nicaragua at government expense he should join the Marines! [12]

Despite Borah's protests, American Marines remained in Nicaragua until President Hoover withdrew them in 1933. The long years of American occupation had not left Nicaragua a stable or peaceful nation. General Sandino had promised to negotiate with the government once the Marines left, but on his departure from a meeting with the Nicaraguan president in 1934, Sandino was ambushed and assassinated by the Nicaraguan National Guard. The commander of the Guard who issued the orders of execution was General Anastasio Somoza, who shortly thereafter seized power in a civil war. For the next forty years Somoza and his two sons would rule Nicaragua, with the support of the United States, until the Sandinista victory in 1979.[13] Nicaragua, of course, remains very much in our minds today. We stand linked to our history in that region, and many members of the Senate will share the misgivings voiced by Senator Borah in the 1920's.

The image of American troops stationed in Nicaragua shatters the "isolationist" stereotype of the United States in the 1920's. American foreign policy in those years might better be described as nationalistic and "unilateralist." It was a decade that saw a concerted effort to stem the historical tide of immigration into the United States and to favor certain groups of immigrants over the rest. One of the first bills President Harding signed was the Emergency Quota Act of 1921, which set national quotas for immigrants, and which discriminated against those from southern and eastern Europe. The Immigration Act of 1924 was even more restrictive, cutting immigration from Italy, for example, by nine-tenths.

Congress and the administration of Warren Harding and Calvin Coolidge also continued to press America's wartime allies for repayment of their war debts. This forced the allies in turn to press Germany for reparations. The problem, of course, was that neither the allies nor the Germans had the means to make those payments, as they struggled to rebuild after the war. The war debts remained a problem until 1931, when President Herbert Hoover arranged a one-year moratorium on repayment, which led to the eventual forgiving of the debts.[14]

The Hoover administration, although it could claim many admirable policies, from the beginning of the "good neighbor" approach to Latin America to the war debt moratorium, also stumbled badly in foreign policy. Perhaps its most disastrous move was its support of the all-time high Smoot-Hawley Tariff, which triggered a wave of tariff retaliations against the United States and greatly depressed international trade. Senator Borah and other Western and mid-Western progressive and isolationist senators took the lead in attacking Smoot-Hawley. In general they stood in opposition to Hoover's programs.

Ironically, the Progressive Republicans voted more consistently with the new Democratic administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt than they had under twelve years of Republican presidents. In light of Roosevelt's later and monumental break with the isolationists, it is important to remember that many progressive/isolationists were attracted to Roosevelt, endorsed his candidacy over Hoover's, and supported the New Deal's early domestic and foreign policies. Democratic Senator Key Pittman of Nevada replaced William Borah as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, but Borah remained ranking Republican on the committee and continued to have a powerful voice in foreign affairs. Robert La Follette, Jr., George Norris, Gerald Nye, and other progressives also played important roles in the "great debate" of the 1930's.[15]

By 1933, when Roosevelt became president, the isolationists were fairly solid in their positions, formed over the past two decades. They had come to see American entry into the first World War as a great mistake, not to be repeated again. And they had formed strong ideas as to how American neutrality from European wars should be preserved. As Professor Wayne Cole has written in his recent study of Roosevelt and the Isolationists, the isolationists "did not oppose all American activity abroad, but they wanted to leave Americans free to determine for themselves when, where, how, and whether the United States should involve itself abroad. They did not want to be bound by prior commitments in alliances or international organizations. . . . They opposed any American efforts to police the world or to rebuild the world in an American image. . . . They urged legislation restraining the president, the military, big business, and financiers as they operated in foreign affairs." [16]

Against the isolationists now stood the most politically skillful of our twentieth century presidents, Franklin Delano Roosevelt. By 1933 Roosevelt also had formulated many ideas on America's role in the world. He was the legatee of two major traditions of the earlier Progressive Era. As a relative of President Theodore Roosevelt he accepted "Teddy's" view of a militarily strong America taking its place as a mediator of world affairs. As a former member of Woodrow Wilson's administration, he also believed in international cooperation through such organizations as the League of Nations and the World Court.

Roosevelt had run as the vice presidential candidate on the ill-fated Democratic ticket of 1920, supposedly the "great referendum" on American participation in the League, and he had clearly learned both from that defeat and Wilson's sad last years that a president can only lead when the people are willing to follow. A president must be a careful educator of public opinion, which is why Roosevelt often played a cautious and crafty game rather than leading bold frontal assaults on unpopular issues.[17] Franklin Roosevelt, as Professor Cole has aptly described him, was "intuitive rather than systematic, artful rather than scientific, and innovative rather then doctrinaire. He was highly flexible and shied away from rigid formulas or systems. He liked to play with ideas, to explore alternative approaches, without irrevocably committing himself to any single policy or approach. He was not troubled by inconsistencies. He had the emotional self-confidence and political realism that allowed him to abandon policies that did not work or methods that proved ineffective. He kept his options open."[18]

It is impossible to discuss or understand the nature of the great debate of the 1930's without mentioning the world forces involved. On March 5, 1933, the day after Roosevelt's inauguration, Adolph Hitler gained absolute power as dictator over Germany. At that same time, the Japanese had walked out of the League of Nations, rather than accept its sanctions. Fascism in Europe and Japanese aggression in the Far East were two persistent threats to world peace and to America's security in the 1930's. And yet, as William Leuchtenberg has noted, "this was a peril most Americans chose to ignore." The Depression was foremost in their minds, and they had long since abandoned any hope that the League could solve world problems. The Nation's chief concern about world affairs was to keep out of them. President Roosevelt, keenly aware of the prevailing public sentiment, had announced during his 1932 campaign that he opposed American entry into the League, but he had not abandoned his faith in Wilsonian internationalism.[19]

Shortly after becoming president, Roosevelt stressed the need for international economic cooperation, and sent delegates to a world economic conference in London. But as events progressed, the president became concerned that international agreements not tie his hands in dealing with the domestic economic crisis. The failure of the London conference was largely the result of Roosevelt's unwillingness to cooperate. In other areas the unwillingness to cooperate came from Congress. In the spring of 1933, Roosevelt considered working with the European powers on a collective security arrangement, coupled with a presidential declaration of an arms embargo against aggressors. In the Foreign Relations Committee, California Progressive Republican Senator Hiram Johnson proposed an amendment stipulating that any embargo must apply equally to all belligerents. Senator Pittman, chairman of the committee, told the president that the arms embargo could not pass without the Johnson amendment. Roosevelt let the matter drop.[20]

The isolationists had the public's ear. In January 1934 Senator Borah delivered a strong defense of isolationism to the Council on Foreign Relations, which was published in their prestigious journal, Foreign Affairs.[21] Even more public attention went to Borah's attack on munitions manufacturers, whom he called "international racketeers," and on whom many isolationists blamed the first World War and current war scares. Fortune magazine published "Arms and the Men," which was reprinted in condensed form in Reader's Digest, denouncing those who profited by war. The public outrage over this and other similar publications led to the creation in 1934 of a special Senate committee to investigate the munitions industry. One historian has described this committee as more of a court than a congressional investigation, hearing the case of "Peace-Loving and Moral People v. Manufacturers and Salesmen of Implements of War."

Chairing this special committee was 42-year-old Gerald P. Nye, a progressive Republican senator from North Dakota, and a staunch isolationist. Nye, who had introduced the resolution calling for the investigation, was elected to the chairmanship by other committee members, despite the Democratic majority in the Senate. This was a measure of their respect for the progressive-minded Nye—who had previously battled the policies of the Coolidge and Hoover administrations—and a recognition of his public identification with the issue. Also serving on the committee were Democrats Walter George, Bennett Champ Clark, Homer Bone, and James Pope, and Republicans Warren Barbour and Arthur Vandenberg. From the start, Senator Nye had very clear in his mind the ultimate purpose of the investigation. "I confidently predict that when the Senate investigation is over, we shall see that war and preparation for war is not a matter of national honor and national defense, but a matter of profit for few," he publicly declared. The hearings opened with great public fanfare on September 4, 1934, in the Senate Caucus Room. The committee held ninety-three hearings over the next two years, concentrating on the manufacturing and sale of munitions, activities of United States shipbuilders, and the economic circumstances of American entry into World War I, with the ultimate question being: who would profit by the Nation's entry into the "next war."

Despite an impressive array of witnesses, including Pierre Du Pont and J. P. Morgan, Jr., the Nye committee uncovered little evidence to prove its thesis. Yet, it reinforced popular sentiments that America had been lured into the Great War not over its neutrality rights or national security, but because of bankers' investments in the Allied nations, and munition makers' and shipbuilders' desire to sell their wares. It helped create the political climate that produced the neutrality legislation of the mid-1930's, although it failed to achieve its chief objectives of nationalizing the arms industry, and reducing profits in time of war.

The committee's reputation also suffered mightily by a tactical blunder on the part of its chairman, Senator Nye. During the hearings in January 1936, Nye claimed that President Wilson and Secretary of State Robert Lansing had "falsified" about their knowledge of secret treaties. Newspapers translated "falsified" to "lied," which led two devoted Wilsonians in the Senate to respond angrily. Senator Tom Connally of Texas denounced Nye's charge as "infamous." "Some checker-playing, beer-drinking, back room of some low house is the only place fit for the kind of language which the senator from North Dakota, the chairman of the committee, this senator who is going to lead us out toward peace, puts into the RECORD about a dead man, a great man, a good man, a man who when alive had the courage to meet his enemies face to face and eye to eye," shouted Connally on the Senate floor. The following day, Senator Nye stood to respond, defending his statement and refusing to apologize. The Senate chamber was packed. Every Democratic seat was filled, and many members of the House crowded in to observe the debate. The most emotional speech of the day came from Virginia's Senator Carter Glass, who had served as Secretary of the Treasury in the Wilson administration. Beating his fist upon his desk until he broke the skin and blood dripped from his knuckles, Glass denounced Nye for "dirtdaubing the sepulcher of Woodrow Wilson." As Democratic senators cheered and applauded, Glass concluded: "Now, Mr. President, lest I should infringe those rules which I always obey, perhaps I should better desist, because what I feel like saying here or anywhere else to the man who thus insults the memory of Woodrow Wilson is something which may not be spoken here, or printed in the newspapers, or uttered by a gentleman." Nye's blunder and Glass's indignant response sealed the doom of the Nye Munitions Investigation. The special committee had run out of money, and the Democratic majority in the Senate had no intention of providing a continuing forum for a Republican senator to attack one of their great leaders. A month later the committee brought its hearings to a close.[22]

Secretary of State Cordell Hull later claimed in his memoirs that the Nye committee "aroused an isolationist sentiment that was to tie the hands of the administration" in dealing with the rising tide of aggression in Europe and Asia. "The Nye committee hearings," he said, "furnished the isolationist springboard for the first Neutrality Act." [23] This act was the first of three pieces of neutrality legislation Congress enacted between 1935 and 1937 to avoid a repetition of the forces and influences that had swept the United States into the first World War. These bills demonstrated that while we must study the past, and understand the past, we can not legislate against it. Perhaps the neutrality acts of 1935, '36, and '37 might have prevented American entry into World War I, but they were helpless to prevent our entry into World War II.

The Italian invasion of Ethiopia in May 1935 set in motion the first neutrality bill. Senator Nye and Senator Clark offered legislation proposing an arms embargo to all belligerents, and wanted the Nye Committee to hold hearings. Senator Pittman and Senator Borah, chairman and ranking Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee, insisted that their committee held jurisdiction over the matter, causing the munitions committee members to back down. In the meantime, the State Department had drafted its own version of the proposed legislation, hoping to supplant the Nye-Clark proposals. In a "mad scramble" behind the scenes, a compromise was reached on a mandatory arms embargo. Senator Pittman drafted a resolution, but neither the Senator nor the President expected Congress to pass the bill before it adjourned. "It was designed largely to appease public opinion," Professor Cole suggests. Senate isolationists, however, were determined to bring the matter to a vote, and staged a filabuster to keep the Senate from adjourning.

The isolationists won their case. Pittman introduced the bill and the Senate passed it without debate. The measure then went to the House, which also passed it quickly. Some internationalists hoped that the President would veto the act, but in spite of his objections, Roosevelt approved it. When he signed the bill, Roosevelt warned that its "inflexible provisions might drag us into war instead of keeping us out." Nevertheless, the arms embargo, and provisions that prohibited Americans from traveling on belligerent ships, was now law.[24] Between the aggressor and the victim in Ethiopia, the United States would not choose sides. That we were willing to close our eyes to the Italian invasion certainly was not lost upon the Italians, Germans, and Japanese as they planned their expansionist policies.

In 1936 Roosevelt hoped to amend the neutrality law to apply the arms embargo only against aggressors, but the measure stood no chance of passage. The neutrality act of 1936 extended the earlier law for another year, adding a loan ban to the arms embargo. Again events outside the United States shaped American policy. In July 1936 a bloody civil war broke out in Spain, with Germany and Italy supporting the military rebels and the Soviet Union backing the government forces. Again the United States remained neutral.

By 1937 the Roosevelt administration decided there was no way it could shape neutrality legislation in Congress, given the prevailing moods, and no new proposals. Senator Pittman, however, introduced his own sweeping, permanent neutrality bill. This bill would not only continue provisions of past neutrality legislation, but would add cash-and-carry requirements that belligerents pay for all American goods and ship them on their own vessels. Even this measure failed to satisfy isolationists like William Borah and Hiram Johnson, who voted against the bill in committee. But on March 3 the Senate passed the Neutrality Act of 1937 by a 63 to 6 margin, again with Borah and Johnson voting in the minority.[25]

Although members of the Senate and House had marched in step to produce legislation to keep the United States out of war in Europe, they began to feel dissention in their own ranks concerning the war clouds in Asia. Senator George Norris of Nebraska, who was proud of his vote against American entry into World War I, and who had supported each of the neutrality bills, was dismayed over Japan's ruthless and militaristic behavior in China. In July 1937, when Japanese planes sank the American ship Panay—by a surprise attack on a Sunday morning, by the way—Senator Norris called Japan "an outlaw nation." Japanese aggression caused Norris to begin to alter his views about neutrality, as his biographer Richard Lowitt has noted. "It is a terrible thing," Norris wrote, "to realize we live in a world in which we must arm ourselves in order to preserve our safety." [26]

On October 5, 1937, President Roosevelt responded to events in Asia and Europe in an address in Chicago—then the very center of mid-Western isolationsim. Roosevelt noted that as law, order, and justice were being wiped away around the world, no one should imagine that America would be spared. There could be "no escape through mere isolation or neutrality." He called for peace-loving nations to "quarantine" aggressors. "America hates war," he concluded. "America hopes for peace. Therefore, America actively engages in the search for peace." The speech brought forth a storm of protest. Senator Nye feared the president was trying to police the world. "We reach now a condition on all fours with that prevailing just before our plunge into the European war in 1917," he declared. Some isolationist congressmen called for Roosevelt's impeachment. The Wall Street Journal proclaimed: "Stop Foreign Meddling; America Wants Peace." The president backed away from the controversy. "It's a terrible thing to look over your shoulder when you're trying to lead," he said privately, "and find no one there."[27]

The isolationists believed the United States should go to war only if first attacked. Senator Borah objected to "this running around over the world trying to placate every situation and adjust every controversy." It was "not the business of democracy," he cautioned. Fear that somehow the president would drag the United States unwillingly into war, and that the majority in Congress would capitulate, spurred a movement for a constitutional amendment. Congressman Louis Ludlow of Indiana, a former Washington newspaper correspondent with a sense for public opinion, proposed an amendment requiring a national referendum before Congress could declare war (except in case of attack). Public opinion showed that almost three-quarters of the American public favored the Ludlow amendment, and its narrow defeat in the House of Representatives was probably attributable to the nervousness of many members following the Japanese attack on the Panay.[28]

As the world situation grew tenser, the Roosevelt administration moved tentatively toward a more internationalist stance, while the isolationists intensified their efforts. As so often happens in a debate, the arguments became more extreme as the lines became more firmly drawn. An air of unreality surrounded some of the isolationists' arguments, best illustrated in an interview which Senator Borah gave in 1938. "The United States is getting worked up over the prospect of war. I'm not," he told a reporter. "You are a young man as compared to me and neither of us will live to see the day when the United States is invaded. With the Atlantic on one side and the vast Pacific on the other we are safe. It would be folly, from a military standpoint, for another country to try to invade us and they know it." Borah was right in calling it folly, and in saying he would not live to see an attack, but tragically wrong in thinking another country would not try it, as Pearl Harbor proved three years later.[29]

Regardless of the debate in America, the movement toward world war progressed ominously. In March 1936 Germany reoccupied the Rhineland in violation of the Versailles Treaty. In November of that year, Germany, Italy, and Japan formed a military alliance. In September 1938 Hitler threatened to invade Czechoslovakia, until British and French leaders flew to Munich to appease him. In August 1939, Hitler's Germany signed a nonaggression pact with Stalin's Russia. Realizing that war was imminent, President Roosevelt lobbyied with key senators for repeal of the arms embargo. But his appeals were rebuffed. "Well, Captain, we may as well face the facts," Roosevelt's crusty vice president, John Nance Garner told him. "You haven't got the votes, and that's all there is to it." On September 1, 1939, Germany invaded Poland. This time, no longer willing to appease Hitler's insatiable appetite, Britain and France declared war. The Second World War had begun. President Roosevelt proclaimed a limited national emergency and put the Neutrality Act of 1937 into effect. "This Nation will remain a neutral nation," he said in a radio address, "but I cannot ask that every American remain neutral in thought as well." [30]

President Roosevelt called Congress back into special session to repeal the arms embargo, to aid victims of aggression, and to allow belligerent nations—in effect the Allied nations—to purchase American munitions on a "cash-and-carry" basis. This policy, he insisted, would aid the Allies without drawing the United States into the war. The isolationists vehemently disagreed. Public opinion polls showed deep-felt American support for the British and French against the Germans, but the same polls also showed the great majority of Americans wanted their country to stay out of the war. Senator Borah broadcast a radio address to the Nation insisting that neutrality was possible, and that American involvement in the war was not inevitable. Borah denounced the repeal of the arms embargo, but President Roosevelt had lined up the 1936 Republican presidential and vice presidential candidates, Alfred M. Landon and Frank Knox, to issue statements supporting the repeal, immediately after Borah's broadcast. And so the war for public opinion raged.[31]

Events in Europe and Roosevelt's shrewd and careful leadership began to shift the tide. Isolationists like Ohio's Senator Robert Taft, Vermont's Warren Austin, New Jersey's Warren Barbour, and Nebraska's George Norris, slowly came around to the president's position on repeal. "If we repeal it, we are helping England and France," Senator Norris wrote to one of his constituents. "If we fail to repeal it, we will be helping Hitler and his allies. American neutrality is an impossibility." After six weeks of debate, on October 27 the Senate repealed the arms embargo by a vote of 63 to 39. The House followed a week later, and the president signed the Neutrality Act of 1939.[32]

As events of history moved irrepressively past them, the isolationists lost their most eloquent voice. On January 16, 1940, Senator William Borah collapsed at his Washington apartment, lapsed into a coma, and died there three days later. The day before his collapse, Borah had led the opposition to the nomination of Roosevelt's new Secretary of the Navy, Charles Edison. His last words on the Senate floor, in this last losing battle, were in ringing defense of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. "When the time comes, as please God, I am sure it will," Borah had declared, "that the oppressed people of the world begin to fight their way back to civilization and away from the frightful 'isms' which engulf them in misery and slavery, they will look to this Bill of Rights as embodying their hopes and ideals." Less than a week after Borah uttered those words, his funeral was held in the Senate chamber. Every desk was occupied except for the one at which he sat for thirty-three years. The president, the cabinet, and the supreme court joined the Congress in mourning this towering figure. There was no eulogy. No one could match Borah's eloquence. After the service, the Senate chamber was opened and thousands filed past in silent tribute, before William Borah made his last trip back to Idaho.[33]

Death spared Senator Borah the agony of witnessing his hopes dashed and his policies defeated. The spring of 1940 brought the end of the "phoney war" in Europe and the beginning of the terrible German blitzkreig. On April 9, German troops invaded Denmark and Norway. On May 10, Germany marched into the Netherlands and Belgium. By the end of May, Britain was evacuating its troops from the European continent at Dunkirk. By June 5, Germany had launched its invasion of France, and by June 16 German troops were in Paris. Defeated France signed its armistice, and the Vichy government was established under Marshal Petain. That summer the German Luftwaffe carried out intensive air raids on Britain.

President Roosevelt saw Great Britain as America's last line of defense in Europe. If Britain fell to Hitler's military might, then the security of the United States would be in grave jeopardy. With Britain standing alone, the president sought some way to provide aid without inflaming American public opinion. In May 1940 Prime Minister Winston Churchill asked Roosevelt for the "loan of forty or fifty of your older destroyers" to reinforce the Royal Navy in the English Channel. Roosevelt, however, doubted he could get such a request passed in Congress. That June the Senate amended a Naval appropriations bill to prohibit the president from sending military material to belligerent nations unless his chief military officers certified it was not essential to American defense. With Congress in no mood to authorize a sale, Roosevelt decided to act on his own, under his authority as commander-in-chief. After consulting with his cabinet and congressional leaders, Roosevelt announced, on September 4, a destroyers-for-bases deal, by which the United States would transfer fifty overage destroyers to Britain in return for Britain's leases on naval and air bases in Newfoundland, Bermuda, and the Caribbean. Thirty years later, senators opposed to American involvement in the Vietnam war often cited the destroyers-for-bases as a usurpation of the Senate's treaty powers. Professor Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., in his study of The Imperial Presidency, has defended Roosevelt's decision, and compared it to Lincoln's response to the firing on Fort Sumter. "To have tried to get destroyers to Britain by the treaty route," Schlesinger wrote, "was an alternative only for those who did not want Britain to get destroyers at all. Congress, by voting money to build the bases, soon gave the deal its implicit sanction."[34]

The day after Roosevelt announced his destroyers-for-bases deal, isolationists announced the formation of the America First Committee, which grew out of an anti-war organization founded by students at Yale University. (Among these isolationist students, I find it interesting to note, were such later internationalists as former President Gerald Ford, R. Sargeant Shriver, Justice Potter Stewart, and Yale President Kingman Brewster—how we regret the folly of our youth!) [35] During the next fifteen months, the America First Committee, with such spokesmen as Senator Gerald Nye and Burton Wheeler, and aviator Charles Linbergh, became the chief force for stimulating public opinion against the president's aid-short-of-war program. Roosevelt, however, was quite equal to the fight, as he proved that November by winning an unprecedented third term to the presidency over an attractive Republican candidate, Wendell Willkie. Also opposed to the America Firsters was an internationalsit organization, the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, chaired by the journalist William Allen White. Thus, the lines were set for the last debate between isolationism and internationalism.

On December 29, 1940, President Roosevelt broadcast one of his fireside chats to the American people. With his reelection battle won, the president moved to create a coherent American policy toward the war in Europe and to line up public support behind that policy. "If Great Britain goes down," Roosevelt told his audience, "the Axis powers will control the continents of Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia, and the high seas." The Americas would then "be living at the point of a gun." The Nation could not escape this danger by "crawling into bed and pulling the covers over our heads," he warned. The president's proposal, which he presented to Congress in his state of the union message the following week, was a Lend-Lease plan. Since the British had run out of funds to purchase war material from the United States, Lend-Lease would permit the president to sell, transfer, exchange, or lease military supplies to any nation whose defense he declared vital to the security of the United States.

Roosevelt's proposal launched what Professor Wayne Cole, author of a monumental study of this period, has called "the most spirited and important debates in the history of American foreign affairs." Gone from the debate were such figures as Key Pittman and William Borah, who had both died in 1940. Leading the president's fight in the Senate was the new chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Walter George and Senate Democratic leader Alban Barkley. Against them stood Senators Nye, Wheeler, Johnson, and other isolationists. The most prominent citizen to testify against Roosevelt's plan was Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh, "Lucky Lindy," the popular aviator. A complete victory by either side in the European war would destroy Western civilization, Lindbergh told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Lindbergh believed American Lend-Lease would only prolong the war and undermine efforts for a negotiated peace. The United States, he declared, could not "police the world."

Despite this spirited opposition, President Roosevelt had the votes. On March 8 the Senate approved H.R. 1776—and the choice of that historically significant number was quite deliberate—by a vote of 60 to 31. Senator George Norris, completing his odyssey from isolationist to internationalist, cast his vote for Lend-Lease. President Roosevelt was delighted. The great debate over Lend-Lease, he said, "was not limited to the halls of Congress. It was argued in every newspaper, on every wave length, over every cracker barrel in all the land; and it was finally settled and decided by the American people themselves." [36]

Mr. President, there were so many signficant events in the foreign policy of the United States during 1940 that I can only briefly list them here. The Battle of the Atlantic was raging, with American vessels convoying British supply ships during the spring of 1940, and the sinking by a German submarine of the United States merchant ship Robin Moor. Germany invaded Egypt, Greece, and Yugoslavia in March and April, and then launched its inexplicable invasion of the Soviet Union on June 22. The war had made Russia, Britain, and eventually the United States, allies against the Germans. Also in June 1941, American scientists began secretly working on the development of the atomic bomb, which would later influence so fatefully the course of the war and of humanity. In July the Japanese occupied Indochina, causing President Roosevelt to freeze all Japanese credit in the United States, and ending trade between the two countries. Previously the President had embargoed all sales of scrap iron and steel to Japan, as an attempt to halt their military expansion throughout Asia.

In August President Roosevelt met with Prime Minister Winston Churchill on board the British battleship Prince of Wales off the coast of Newfoundland. There they issued the "Atlantic Charter," renouncing territorial aggrandizement, supporting the right of people to choose their own form of government, maintaining their belief in freedom of the seas, and calling for a permanent peace organization. The nations which signed the Atlantic Charter made up the Allies who would fight the Axis and eventually form the United Nations. On August 12 the House of Representatives by a single vote approved the extension of the Army draft. In October German submarines torpedoed the United States destroyer Kearny and the destroyer Reuben James. In response the Senate on November 7, 1941 voted to repeal much of the Neutrality Act of 1939, thereby permitting the United States merchant vessels to be armed, and allowing them to carry goods into belligerent ports.

Meanwhile, the Japanese had demanded that the United States lift its freeze on Japanese credits and resume full trade between the two nations. American military officials, having broken the Japanese code, became convinced that war was imminent, and believed Japan would strike in the Philippines and Southeast Asia. Isolationists viewed these developments with grave concern, certain that the president was somehow trying to prevoke a war with Germany over Atlantic shipping or trying to get into the war "by the back door" with Japan. Roosevelt at the same time moved forward to protect what he saw as America's interests, defense, and security.[37]

Sunday, December 7, 1941, the "great debate" over American foreign policy came to an end. Senator Gerald P. Nye was addressing an America First rally at Soldiers and Sailors Memorial Hall in Pittsburgh. Twenty-five hundred people were crowded into the hall to hear Nye, Senator David Reed, and other isolationists make their case. As Senator Nye was speaking, a note was laid on the podium before him, announcing that Japan had declared war on the United States. Flustered and uncertain whether to believe the report, Senator Nye kept on speaking. He completed his address and then told his audience of reports that Japanese planes had bombed the American naval base at Pearl Harbor in Hawaii. That was the last meeting of the America First Committee. When reporters questioned the senator afterwards he replied: "If Japan attacked, there is nothing left for Congress to do but declare war." [38] That night, Roosevelt summoned leaders of Congress and members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to the White House. Isolationists like California Senator Hiram Johnson walked silently past the crowd of reporters outside the executive offices. The next day, Congress voted a declaration of war against Japan—with only Congresswoman Jeannette Rankin voting no, as she had done against American entry into World War I. Days later Germany and Italy also declared war on the United States and we were fully immersed in the global conflict.

Pearl Harbor exploded Senator Borah's prediction that the United States was safe from military attack, and it discredited the isolationists' claim that the United States could stay neutral in a world at war. Defeat and death removed most of the isolationists from the Senate in the next few years. Senators Nye, Wheeler, La Follette, and Norris were not returned to office. Senators Vandenberg and Austin converted to internationalism. Senator Taft held to his principles and remained in the Senate, but his identification with isolationism denied him the election to the presidency he so avidly sought. As the United States entered a decade of war, both hot and cold, the debate over foreign policy was muted and a bi-partisan or nonpartisan stance adopted. "Politics stops at the water's edge, became the watchword of the 1940s. Twenty years of political debate ended in a beautiful Hawaiian harbor, marred by the burning hulls of a fleet of American battleships.

We remember December 7, 1941 as a day of infamy. We mourn the hundreds of American servicemen who died at Pearl Harbor, and the thousands who gave their lives in the war that followed. We might also mourn the abrupt ending of the debate over American foreign policy. While history proved President Roosevelt and his followers more correct than their isolationist opponents, it also buried for decades the warnings of the isolationists that the United States should not aspire to police the world, nor should it intervene at will in the affairs of other nations in this hemisphere or elsewhere. Subsequent events, which will be the subject of other addresses in my continuing series on the history of the United States Senate, demonstrated that some validity existed in the arguments on both sides of that great debate.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that notes to the speech "The Senate And The Great Debate" be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the notes were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROGRAM

(The following statement occurred earlier and is printed at this point by unanimous consent.)

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, when the Senate completes its business today it will stand in adjournment until the hour of 4 p.m. on Monday next. After the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, there will be one special order to be followed by a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business.

At the close of the time for the transaction of routine morning business, the Senate will resume consideration of the unfinished business, which will be the Hoover Dam bill. A cloture motion has been filed against further debate on the motion to concur in the House amendments on that measure. The vote will occur, under the provisions of rule XXII, 1 hour after the Senate convenes after the establishment of a live quorum pursuant to the provisions of rule XXII.

Mr. President, it is also anticipated that during the course of the day the Senate will be asked to turn to the consideration of the antitrust R&D bill which I believe has been cleared now for action either by unanimous consent or under a very brief period for debate.

Mr. President, I do not anticipate Monday will be a very late day, but the schedule is uncertain, given the complexity of the situation. I urge Senators to consider that next week and the following week may be irregular in view of the necessity to crowd a great deal of legislative work into a very short period of time.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 4 P.M. ON MONDAY, JULY 30, 1984

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate stands adjourned.

Thereupon, at 2:49 p.m., the Senate adjourned until Monday, July 30, 1984, at 4 p.m.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Those who trust in the Lord are like Mount Zion, which cannot be moved, but abides forever.—Psalm 125:1.

We thank You, O God, for those values that give meaning to our lives. With all the pressures that seek people's attention and the tensions and conflicts of the day, help us to see more clearly the spiritual values that are our heritage and guide. May we not lose the vision of the goals of righteousness and honor, of justice and understanding, of peace and good will, that are a part of the divine image within us.

In Your name, we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following dates the President approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the House of the following titles:

H.R. 29. An act to recognize the organization known as the Polish Legion of American Veterans, U.S.A.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2303) "An act to revise and extend the Alcohol and Drug Abuse and Mental Health Services block grant," agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. HATCH, Mrs. HAWKINS, Mr. QUAYLE, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. MATSUNAGA, and Mr. RIEGLE to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that pursuant to the provisions of Senate Concurrent Resolution 122, 98th Congress, the Vice President appoints Mr. BAKER, Mr. MATHIAS, and Mr. FORD as members, on the part of the Senate, of the Joint Congressional Committee on Inaugural Ceremonies.

PLAYING POLITICS WITH SOCIAL SECURITY

(Mr. PICKLE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, there has been little or no public analysis of President Reagan's proposal that Congress change the law to allow for a Social Security cost-of-living adjustment next year if the CPI is below 3 percent.

The White House realized that it is very likely that a COLA will not be triggered this year and that announcement will come approximately 1 week before the November election. And if that COLA is not triggered under current law, Mr. Reagan is afraid that he would get the blame for it.

In order to head off that possibility, Mr. Reagan has asked Congress to bale him out of what might be a sticky political situation by changing the current law. He took this action over 60 days in advance of the triggering date. It was a blatant political move.

Yet, I guess it is a smooth political move on his part. Regardless of whether you support or oppose granting the cost-of-living increase, I think that Congress should not rush to immediately jump on the President's COLA bandwagon. Judging by the Senators actions last night, it looks like the stampede has started.

But, good election year politics is not always responsible public policy.

I am well aware of the politics of this matter and I know that it is likely that this proposal will be adopted. But in doing so we should be fully aware of what we are doing. Eliminating the trigger as done by the Senate last night will result in a tax increase next year by raising the FICA base. It will result in changes in a number of other formulas including an increase in Medicare part B premiums for the elderly.

This is not a simple matter. It deserves some analysis and we should be honest with the American people about what we are doing and why we are doing it. I will have more to say on this matter later.

THE BKK LANDFILL

(Mr. TORRES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, EPA Administrator William Ruckelshaus has been invited to testify before an emergency congressional hearing and tell us the truth about the BKK landfill. The BKK landfill is located in a densely populated city in my district.

Mr. Ruckelshaus will be testifying before an energy subcommittee that I sit on. I will be asking the Administrator why he has refused to close the BKK landfill even though 21 families have been evacuated from their homes due to cancer causing vinyl chloride levels as high as 99 times the acceptable standards.

Yesterday a letter was delivered to the Administrator signed by 21 of my southern California colleagues asking that the BKK be closed immediately.

Mr. Speaker, this is not an economic issue. Mr. Speaker, this is not a political issue. Mr. Speaker, this is a health issue.

Before more families are evacuated or a far more terrible tragedy occurs, I believe that Mr. Ruckelshaus should enforce the law and immediately close the BKK landfill.

ADMINISTRATION POLICY: BAIL OUT FAILING BANK BUT SELL PROFITABLE RAILROAD

(Mr. FLORIO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration announced yesterday its bailout of the Continental Illinois Bank, one of the Nation's largest. This bailout could cost the taxpayers several billion dollars.

Indeed, the bailout represents a flip-flop by administration officials. Earlier, Treasury Secretary Regan had criticized the effort. But in the final analysis, the administration showed where its true loyalty was—to big business rather than the taxpayers.

At the same time that the administration was rushing to bail out this failing bank, it was proceeding quickly in its attempts to sell Conrail, which is projected to earn $500 million this year. Thus, the administration's policy becomes clear—bail out failing companies but quickly sell profitable companies. Any competent businessman would tell you that approach is wrong. Clearly, the administration does not know how to run a business. The real losers in this game are the taxpayers.

WHERE DID WE LOSE JOBS IN THIS COUNTRY?

(Mr. CAMPBELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, yesterday it came to my attention through the Freedom of Information Act that in 1980 the Carter-Mondale administration gave a secret letter to the People's Republic of China, guaranteeing them that they would essentially hold them harmless for any additional textile imports that came into this country outside of the bilateral agreements, and essentially giving them privileges that were not negotiated under the agreements that they had negotiated in their bilateral negotiations.

This resulted in a doubling of textile imports from the People's Republic of China, and the displacement of hundreds of thousands of American jobs. I have taken a special order today; I will read this letter into the RECORD, and I will have a lot more to say about it this afternoon. The public should know where we lost some of the jobs in this country.

BUREAUCRATIC INSENSITIVITY

(Mr. PARRIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, last evening when I and thousands of other residents tried to return to northern Virginia, we found that the traffic on the bridges over the Potomac River was once more gridlocked. I submit to you this morning, Mr. Speaker, that in another incredible example of bureaucratic insensitivity, and a failure to properly coordinate among Government units, we find a situation that dramatically affects the lives of real people in the real world. That situation is that the two major river-crossing bridges in the Washington metropolitan area serving northern Virginia are severely restricted to vehicle traffic at the same time which is creating enormous problems for commuters.

The 14th Street Bridge administered and maintained by the District of Columbia will have substantially reduced capacity for 4½ months because of needed resurfacing and safety improvements. The Woodrow Wilson Bridge administered by the State of Maryland is receiving minor repairs of the resurfacing that was done last year. But in a totally insensitive way, both of them have been scheduled all at the same time, and travel back and forth across the Potomac River is seriously impeded.

I have talked to and written the Governor of Maryland suggesting that he exercise his prerogative to defer the minor repairs on the Woodrow Wilson Bridge until we get the 14th Street Bridge repairs completed and thereby restore some kind of semblance of reason to the movement of traffic in the Nation's Capital. To do less for our frustrated and beleaguered citizens is unthinkable.

I fully realize that the State of Maryland did not set out deliberately to thwart efforts of commuters to travel to and from work.

But the result is just the same as if it did. And the entire situation could have been avoided, and still can be corrected, if Maryland officials exercise a little commonsense.

I am told that the repairs to the Wilson Bridge are minor, and that delaying them will not pose any safety hazard.

Let us hope that Maryland agrees to call off its repair crews until the 14th Street Bridge redecking is completed this fall.

STAND UP FOR AMERICAN CONSUMERS

(Mr. TAUKE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TAUKE. Mr. Speaker, today I call to the attention of my colleagues a recent action by the Canadian Government regarding the price of Canadian natural gas which is exported to the United States. During our July recess, our neighbor to the north relaxed its rigid uniform border price for natural gas requiring that all gas sold outside its borders be sold at the uniform price of $4.40. Under this new policy, this gas should fall to approximately $3.10 per mcf.

Beginning November 1, 1984, American consumers will be permitted to negotiate a competitive price from Canadian natural gas producers within certain restrictions. Specifically, the negotiated price must still be above a certain floor amount, which will be tied to the wholesale price of gas in Toronto, and the producers of natural gas will have to satisfy Canada's National Energy Board that the negotiated price is at least equal to the price of alternative fuels in the United States and that the negotiated price will "enhance the economic return to Canada compared with the current system." However, the Canadian Government will allow spot sales of gas at prices below the floor price.

I commend the Canadian Government for this change in its pricing policy. It is a dramatic step, and it should result in lower gas prices for American consumers. Though Canada only supplies about 4 percent of the U.S. demand for gas, this new policy should force U.S. companies into lowering their prices to stay competitive.

However, several more steps are needed to reduce the unjustifiably high price of natural gas which consumers are paying today. We need to move the natural gas legislation out of the Rules Committee and on to the floor for debate. I repeat my challenge, Mr. Speaker, for you to stand up against special interest groups and to stand up for American consumers by permitting the House to debate this legislation.

GET FDIC OUT OF THE BANKING BUSINESS

(Mr. PAUL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PAUL. Mr. Speaker, the announcement yesterday by the Chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation that his Agency would take an 80-percent equity interest in Continental Illinois Corp., in exchange for $4.5 billion in bad loans is a blatant abuse of that Agency's charter and a slap in the face of this Congress. The FDIC is supposed to insure depositors of banks up to $100,000—it has no statutory authority to preserve and protect bank holding companies.

There was some loose talk yesterday—scare words—by Chairman Isaac about 2,100 other banks that would fail if Continental Bank had to close. That's a lot of nonsense. Of course they won't give us any specific facts about this supposed problem. It looks like the profits of the entire banking industry are being protected by this scheme.

The FDIC has carried its policy of "purchases and assumptions" too far. Since it couldn't find a merger partner for Continental, it has entered the banking business itself with the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago's money.

What happened yesterday is that $3.5 billion, which was lent to Continental Illinois Bank by the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago has been used to finance the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation's takeover of the bank holding company. The scheme is complex enough—with two classes of preferred stock, stock options for the present shareholders, a dummy corporation to hold all the outstanding common shares of Continental—to bedazzle the likes of Fisk and Gould, the high-rolling swindlers of the 1860's.

This Congress should address this issue immediately. An amendment must be included in any banking legislation we pass to require the FDIC to pay off all depositors of Continental Bank up to $100,000—and not a penny more. We must insist that the FDIC obey the letter and spirit of the laws Congress writes. The purpose of deposit insurance is to protect bank customers, not bank holding companies.

The FDIC claims taxpayers' money was not used. That's a distinction without a difference, because the Federal Reserve's printing press was used instead. The Federal Deposit Insurance Fund is financed by mandatory fees collected from banks. A mandatory fee is no different from a tax on the industry. Sure, the billion dollars below book value the FDIC is paying for the bad loans, and the shares of preferred stock, might yield a speculative profit for the Fund in a few years—but by what right does the Agency gamble and speculate with its trust fund?

How can this Congress seriously consider the banking legislation reported less than 1 month ago by my committee, changing statutory regulations on bank holding companies, when the FDIC announces to the world that there are no substantive differences between chartered banks and their holding companies. The whole idea of deregulating the financial services industry becomes a joke. The FDIC has just exploited the biggest loophole in banking law ever conceived.

NO PERSONAL ATTACKS FROM REPUBLICAN PARTY

(Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this morning in the Washington Post, one of the members of the Democratic ticket, and our colleague, GERALDINE FERRARO, suggest that the campaign would be dirty and personal from the Republican point of view. That inaccuracy cannot be allowed to stand. There are questions, legitimate questions being asked by the press. There are no and will be no personal attacks by the Republican Party.

In a platform that 30 times called the current President of the United States reckless, putting a nation on the brink of war. A Democratic leadership that has been more partisan and more personal in its criticism than ever before, it seems unusual, unique and all together without fact to blame the other side for what has already occurred from the majority.

We will discuss the issues because that is what the American people deserve and want.

THOMAS JEFFERSON WOULD BE PROUD

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, in the Washington Post this morning there is an article explaining what we did yesterday on the school prayer issue. That article contains this rather incredible statement, and I quote:

> Most lawmakers said the approved amendment codifies the existing situation which allows students silently to exercise their right to freedom of speech.

Thomas Jefferson would certainly be proud of us.

HUNGER RELIEF ACT OF 1984

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 517 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 5151.

□ 1018

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5151) to alleviate hunger in the United States by strengthening Federal nutrition programs, with Mr. TORRES in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DE LA GARZA] will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DE LA GARZA].

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5151, the Hunger Relief Act of 1984.

In response to the short title of the bill, it has been asked, "Does hunger really exist in the United States today?" I wish the answer were different, but it is very clearly "Yes." While an improving economy has resulted in a reduced level of unemployment, there are many areas of the country and many groups of our citizens that have not benefited from this improvement.

The Subcommittee on Domestic Marketing, Consumer Relations, and Nutrition of our committee, under the outstanding leadership of its chairman, LEON PANETTA, and BILL EMERSON, the ranking minority member, has held hearings over the length and breadth of this land. The hearings disclosed a tremendous need for food assistance on the part of those segments of our people whom economic recovery has simply passed by.

On-site visits, and testimony by representatives of the U.S. Conference of Mayors, State and local governments, operators of soup kitchens and food pantries, and others dramatically portrayed the increased demand for emergency food assistance in many parts of the country. The President's Task Force on Food Assistance also examined this problem. Their findings are perhaps best illustrated by their lengthy list of recommendations for addressing the situation they found to exist. Many of those recommendations are implemented in H.R. 5151.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Agriculture has worked diligently on this legislation. The bill, as reported, is quite different from H.R. 5151 as introduced. Provisions relating to the child nutrition and elderly feeding programs that fall within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Education and Labor have been deleted. And many other modifications were made. The result is a moderate but meaningful bill—one that goes far toward ensuring that the needy among us have access to a decent diet.

The bill enjoys remarkably broad bipartisan support among members of the Agriculture Committee. There is a significant difference of opinion among our members as to only two provisions. There is, therefore, broad agreement among committee members as to steps that should be taken to ensure that the Food Stamp Program continues to be an effective and compassionate nationwide response to the food needs of the less fortunate in this land of plenty.

I will summarize the recommendations of the President's Task Force to which the bill responds. The Task Force recommended that benefits under the program be restored to a level that represents the full cost of the so-called Thifty Food Plan, a low-cost dietary plan developed by the Department of Agriculture. Under current law, through fiscal year 1985, program benefits represent only 99 percent of the cost of the plan. The bill would, for fiscal year 1985, put into place the Task Force recommendation. For fiscal year 1986, it would increase the benefits to represent 101 percent of the cost of the Thrifty Food Plan. For subsequent years, it would return the benefit level to 100 percent of the cost of the plan. But it would recomend a study of the basis for the program benefits, as now determined, to be completed so that the Congress may have its findings in hand for consideration in reauthorizing the program in 1985.

The President's Task Force also recommended that households, all of whose members receive assistance under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children or the Supplemental Security Income Programs, be made categorically eligible for food stamps. The bill accomplishes this objective.

The Task Force further urged an increase in work incentives for those who participate in food assistance programs. H.R. 5151 responds to this recommendation. It increases from 18 percent to 20 percent the amount of a household's earned income that is deducted in calculating the household's net income for program purposes. Thus, the concept of work incentives is furthered.

The President's Task Force also recommended updating the assets or resources eligibility standards of the program. Consistent with Task Force recommendations, the bill would, effective April 1, 1985, increase the assets eligibility standard for the elderly from $3,000 to $3,500, and for other households from $1,500 to $2,250. It also exempts from counting for program purposes property directly related to the maintenance or use of a vehicle that does not count as an asset for program purposes because it produces income—a taxi or truck, for example—or is used to transport a handicapped person. This provision was included to eliminate confusion that has arisen in the past as to the appropriate treatment of property of this nature—such as lots on which vehicles are parked and maintenance equipment for such vehicles—in calculating the value of household assets.

Further, the bill would increase from $4,500 to $5,500 the threshold above which the value of "nonexempt" household vehicles used for continuing or obtaining employment, or for other household purposes, is counted in computing the amount of a household's assets for program purposes. For example, if such a car is worth $6,000, $1,500 is now counted in this computation. The $4,500 threshold for counting vehicle value has not been increased since 1977, notwithstanding a better than 90-percent increase in the cost of used cars over that period. I would add, however, that the modification in the vehicle value threshold was the subject of some disagreement within our committee. Some members believe that the present $4,500 threshold should be maintained.

With respect to other aspects of the program, the President's Task Force recommended that State agencies that operate the program implement procedures for staggering their issuance of stamps throughout the entire month, and keep food stamp offices open during evening and weekend hours to better serve recipients, particularly those who work. The bill also addresses these recommendations. And the Task Force recommended that the homeless not be excluded from participation in the program merely because they have no fixed address. While current provisions of law do not exclude the homeless from the program, H.R. 5151 contains provisions making it explicitly clear that the homeless are eligible to participate if they qualify under the regular eligibility standards of the program. Although the bill requires that State agencies insure that methods for certifying the homeless limit program participation to eligible households, it is not the committee's intent that State agencies apply to the homeless extraordinary certification measures not applicable to other households seeking to participate in the program. For example, the homeless should receive expedited service under the same circumstances that apply in the case of other applicants.

In addition, the bill would make other modifications in the legislation governing the program. It would restore to the State agencies the option of using a variety of procedures for calculating household income for program purposes. Under present law, the State agencies are required to employ what is referred to as "retrospective budgeting," together with monthly reporting, for certain households. This procedure entails, for these households, a monthly report of their circumstances and a determination of their income—and thus their program benefits—on the basis of their reports, which reflect income in the preceding month.

A majority of the State agencies have strongly objected to this mandatory process because, among other reasons, it is said, first, to impose an undue burden upon participants to submit, and upon the State agencies to handle, a huge volume of reports on a monthly basis, and second, not to be cost-effective.

The provisions of the bill are designed to give State agencies a broad choice in fashioning the procedures to be used to determine household income. Under the bill, the State agencies may require households to report monthly or at less frequent intervals. But, in this regard, no change would be made in the statutory requirement that households not required to submit monthly or other periodic reports must report to the State agency any changes in household income or other circumstances necessary for accurate eligibility and benefit determination. The State agency would also be free to choose whether or to what extent it would utilize retrospective budgeting.

In connection with this provision, I would note that the bill requires that the State agencies use "prospective accounting" for households upon their application for the program. This provision essentially reflects current regulations governing the program. It provides that when households enter the program, ordinarily because of a change in their household status, they will not, during their beginning period of program participation, experience the hardship that application of "retrospective budgeting" could well impose upon them.

While the bill would give the States a great deal of flexibility in these program matters, it would, on the other hand, effective beginning with fiscal 1986, make the States liable to the Federal Government for the full value of all excess coupons issued during a fiscal year attributable to State administrative error rates exceeding 5 percent. This change would continue the 5 percent administrative error rate standard and that becomes effective under current law on October 1, 1984, but it would impose, beginning in fiscal year 1986, more stringent sanctions than exist under current law for States that fail to meet the 5-percent standard.

The provision of the bill giving the States an option on "monthly reporting/retrospective budgeting" was the subject of some disagreement within the committee. Some members believe that the monthly reporting requirements that are a customary element of retrospective accounting instill a useful discipline into the program. However, the view of most of the committee, a view with which I concur, is that available information does not establish the efficacy of these requirements and that the combination of State option on these procedures, together with more stringent sanctions for State agency error, is most likely to achieve the desired error rate reduction.

Further, the bill requires the Secretary of Agriculture to take certain steps to enhance the effectiveness of measures designed to ascertain the nutritional status of low-income households. It requires the Department of Agriculture to include in its food consumption surveys a representative sample of low-income households and requires, to the extent practicable, that it collect information on food and other household expenditures. It also authorizes additional funds that would be used by the cooperative extension services in the States in expanding their programs for providing food, consumer, and nutrition education to low-income households.

Other features of the bill include revising the definition of "disabled" to include several categories of persons whose disabilities are equivalent to those of the disabled now included in the act. This would make available to similarly situated disabled persons certain special considerations under the program.

H.R. 5151 would also increase the current ceiling on the combined deduction for dependent care and excess shelter expenses in a manner that would more adequately recognize the heavy expense borne by many food stamp households, particularly in connection with child care costs incurred by those who work, and to a degree relieve the "heat or eat" dilemma faced by many low-income individuals.

The bill would also implement measures to insure that the program is effectively carried out on an emergency basis in areas suffering from disasters by requiring the Secretary to dispatch members of his "Disaster Task Force" to affected areas. The objective here is to be sure that State and local food stamp offices are familiar with the program's special provisions for emergency situations.

H.R. 5151 would require that State agencies use improved tools for verifying household income that have been made available under provisions of law recently enacted by Congress involving access to tax return information on unearned income. And it would strengthen the job search program carried out by State agencies under which certain program participants who are required to register for work are also required to participate in certain job search activities. State agencies would have the latitude to shape their job search programs in what they believe is the most effective manner. H.R. 5151 would allow them to exempt from the program categories of household members whose participation would be impracticable, and to exempt individual household members—or to suspend application of program requirements to such members—because personal circumstances make their participation impracticable. Thus, the bill contemplates that State agencies will target their job search activities on that segment of the caseload required to register for work that will most likely benefit from such activities.

In related matters, the bill establishes a 4-year pilot food assistance program for the rural areas of Alaska where, because of unique characteristics of remoteness of small populations and other factors, operation of the food stamp program is not practicable. The bill gives the State and the Secretary a great deal of flexibility in fashioning a program to meet the truly extraordinary conditions present in Alaska's rural areas.

The provisions of the bill establishing a pilot food assistance program for the rural areas of Alaska include a requirement that the basis for the funding for the program for the fiscal year 1986 is the amount that would have been expended to carry out the regular food stamp program in such areas during that fiscal year. While this base is subject to adjustment, as provided in the bill, I wish to make very clear that this base is to reflect the value of the enhanced program benefits for rural Alaska that were required by Public Law 97-98, approved on December 22, 1981.

H.R. 5151, as originally introduced, contained a directive requiring the Secretary forthwith to issue regulations implementing the statutory provision enacted in 1981. Before committee markup of the bill was completed, the Secretary finally issued such regulations. Therefore, the committee deleted this directive during its consideration of the bill. In view of these developments, the committee, in prescribing the basic funding level for the pilot food assistance program for rural Alaska for fiscal year 1986, understood that the level will, of necessity, reflect the special allotment levels that the Secretary's new regulations belatedly have put into effect. Even though I believe the legislative language requires this result, I emphasize the point to eliminate any possible misunderstanding as to what the bill contemplates.

The bill would also prohibit banks and other financial institutions from assessing fees or charges for redeeming coupons for food stores that participate in the program if those stores present those coupons generally in a manner that conforms with the requirements placed upon financial institutions in presenting coupons to the Federal Reserve banks. And it would expand the Commodity Supplemental Food Program, under which food assistance is now provided to certain women, infants, and children, to permit program operators to include the elderly among program beneficiaries, so long as doing so will not diminish assistance to women, infants, and children.

Mr. Chairman, the provisions of H.R. 5151 do not provide the degree of additional assistance that some believe should be made available to our needy. However, the bill does adopt realistic measures to target its enhanced benefits in a manner recommended by many who are concerned with problems of the hungry, including the President's Task Force on Food Assistance. It recognizes the budgetary realities with which we are faced and, in my judgment, represents a judicious and balanced approach, given the various competing influences under which we must legislate. I would add that the costs associated with the bill, as modified by our committee, fall within the spending target of the budget resolution passed by the House. For these reasons, the great majority of the provisions of the bill enjoyed broad bipartisan support in the Committee on Agriculture. I ask Members to give H.R. 5151 the enthusiastic support I believe it merits.

Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

Mr. PANETTA. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5151, the Hunger Relief Act of 1984. The bill, I think, is a constructive and responsible effort to address one of the most serious issues facing the country today; that is, domestic hunger. Just as the issue of hunger is not a partisan issue, but rather a national issue, so this bill is not a partisan bill, but a bipartisan effort to try to respond to the needs of those who are hungry.

The ranking member of our subcommittee, BILL EMERSON, and I have worked hard to try and resolve our differences and present to the body a bipartisan effort, and that is contained in H.R. 5151. I thank him for his efforts and his cooperation.

□ 1020

My gratitude also goes to Chairman DE LA GARZA and to the ranking minority member of the full committee, ED MADIGAN, for their help and their cooperation, and also special thanks to JIM JEFFORDS for the help that he provided in initiating H.R. 5151.

We deal with an issue that concerns us all from a moral point of view because we feel it is important and a duty in this country to feed the hungry; from a national point of view because we are a rich Nation, the No. 1 agricultural producer in the world, and it is indeed a national shame to have those who are hungry in a land as wealthy as ours; from a health point of view because a lack of adequate nutrition impacts on the health of the elderly, on the expectant mother, on the newborn child; from an education point of view because the lack of proper nutrition impacts on the quality of education that can be provided to a hungry child; and from a cost point of view because we know that for every dollar we spend on providing good nutrition we save up to $3 or more in health care costs and in the loss of good education.

So dealing with the hunger issue in our society makes good sense. Yet there are many, many Americans, some in high places, who would question the extent of hunger in our society. Frankly, I think that the question is legitimate. It is legitimate because many Americans do not know what the other side of America is like. They do not go to soup kitchens, they do not go to food pantries on a daily basis, they do not go to the food stamp office.

So the problem is that people do not see on a daily basis the issue of hunger up close. That is another side of America. It is the side that we see in places like Harlem or the Bronx, or on the South Side of Chicago, or in South Miami Beach, or in Appalachia, or in East Los Angeles, or in the Tenderloin area of San Francisco where the Select Committee Task Force on Domestic Hunger was just a few days ago.

We have been there. The Subcommittee on Nutrition has been there—a number of hearings throughout this country. The Task Force on Domestic Hunger of the Select Committee has been there. The President's Commission has been there. The mayors' task forces, the Governors' task forces, the GAO, religious leaders, the Salvation Army, United Way. They have all been there.

Ask all of them who have been there and have seen this issue up close, and time and time and time again it is the same story. There are more and more Americans who are seeking out food assistance. Soup kitchens, wherever you go, whether it is rural or whether it is urban America, soup kitchens that were serving maybe 50 or 60 transients a few years ago are now serving 500, 600, 700 people. In San Francisco just last week one group that was serving 4,000 a month is now serving 25,000 a month.

This is an issue that involves not just transients any more, but it involves families and children and the unemployed and the elderly. Many do not qualify for benefits. Many have benefits that run out. They are waiting in lines for food, for cheese, for butter, for a bag of groceries. They are ashamed, they are depressed. They have been bypassed by the recovery and bypassed by society.

They are the result, really, of a recession, of unemployment, of jobs that are gone, and of reduced benefits, all of those factors contributing to what we are seeing in the country today.

No one disputes these facts. The issue is no longer whether or not there is hunger in our society; the issue is what are we going to do about it?

The Congress has, on a bipartisan basis, been responsive to this problem. We passed resolutions last year overwhelmingly to try to hold the level of nutrition, of benefits that are provided in existing nutrition programs. We passed a commodity distribution program to try to provide some help to the soup kitchens and the food pantries with regard to the commodities that we have in storage. We, as a body, adopted the Select Committee on Hunger, established it so that it could take a stronger and more firm look at the problems of both domestic hunger as well as hunger abroad.

But we urgently need steps right now to deal with the urgent problems that are being faced in trying to provide relief to the most needy. In approaching this issue, BILL EMERSON and I had several guidelines that we tried to follow.

One is that we understood that this bill is not going to solve all the hunger problems in this country. We understand that. We will have a reauthorization bill next year as part of the farm bill, and many of the issues that many people are concerned about will have to be looked at closely at that time.

We did feel we had to address the most crucial problems as identified by the subcommittee, as identified by the mayors' groups, the GAO, and most particularly as identified by the President's Task Force on Hunger.

Third, we wanted to keep the cost within the budget resolution. We recognize the problems of the deficit. We recognize that we want to hold spending down in a number of areas, so it was our goal to keep whatever cost this bill would involve within those established by the budget resolution and adopted by the House, and this bill is well within those targets.

There are four key areas we wanted to address, that we think are most important. One is the area of increasing work incentives. The pressing problems that we see out there, the individuals who are there, the most common thread that ties all of them together is that they do not want to be there. They do not want to be there. They are not there because it is great to be in a soup kitchen. Believe me, anyone who has gone there knows how depressing it is. They want to get out of there. They want to get a job. They want to be able to work.

The problem is that over the last few years, the main thrust of the changes that have taken place have created a disincentive for people who want to work, because as soon as they get into a working poor job they lose many of their benefits and then they are forced to go back into the lines.

We want to encourage people to work, so for that reason we restored the deduction for earned income from 18 to 20 percent. We have expanded the Job Search Program and the training requirements that are part of this program to make sure that people get every chance to try to find a job and get off of food stamps.

We have also increased the deduction to try to cover child care expenses so that working mothers can indeed be able to find jobs and keep them.

Second, we wanted to increase the adequacy and accessibility to the benefits provided. Everyone has pointed this out. The President's Task Force has made it clear that we had to provide some modest increase in benefits. What we have seen is that by the third week of every month the benefits often run out. The President's Task Force identified the Thrifty Food Plan, which is the basis on which we established the benefit, as needing to be increased from 99 to 100 percent of the cost of that plan, and we have done that in this bill. We have followed the President's task force's recommendations.

We have increased the shelter deduction because of the increased cost of housing and utilities. We have updated the assets limitations which in many instances have not been updated since 1971 so that we would be able to accommodate those who truly need this kind of assistance. We have allowed certain handicapped to qualify. We have authorized commodity assistance for the elderly so that they would get that benefit, and we have provided these benefits to the homeless, which is an increasing problem in the country.

Third, we have improved nutrition education and hunger surveillance. What we have found continually is that when these benefits are provided, they are not accompanied with adequate nutrition information as to what is important to buy. So we have included in here assistance to try to improve nutrition education, and we ask the U.S. Department of Agriculture to perform a better surveillance in the country as to who is hungry.

Fourth, we have improved the administration and the accountability of the program. We understand that that has to be continued. We have not reversed one bit of legislation that has been targeted as fraud, waste, and abuse, and we have indeed improved it as part of this bill because we think it is important to do that. If we are going to have this kind of program, it ought to be run efficiently and effectively, both for the taxpayers' purposes and the beneficiaries' purposes. We now utilize information from the IRS in terms of unearned income to make sure we are checking those figures.

We provide for categorical eligibility for AFDC and SSI. We have this tremendous amount of paperwork in which people have to go to one group for one kind of assistance and to another group for another kind of assistance. It is crazy. If they qualify for AFDC, if they qualify for SSI, then they automatically meet the qualifications that are needed in terms of the food stamp program.

We eliminate the mandate with regard to monthly reporting. We find there is a tremendous overload of redtape at the local administration level, and one of the reasons for it is the monthly reporting requirement. What we do is leave that to be optional to the States. If they want to use it, fine; if they do not, that decision is up to them.

We also provide for increased penalties for those States that do not get their error rates below 5 percent because we think it is important to keep sending the message out to the States to keep those error rates down.

In conclusion, my views and, I think, the views of my colleagues on the Nutrition Subcommittee are that we have formed a carefully structured compromise. It is not going to solve all the problems of hunger—God knows we know that—but it is a positive step in trying to assist those who are in the greatest need.

If this passes, it will do more to provide help to the hungry than anything we have passed in the last 3 years. This is the basic program, the food stamp program, that deals with the hungry in the country, make no mistake about it. Passing this legislation will do more in one blow than anything else we have done in the last 3 to 4 years.

We target at the needs that have been identified by the President's Task Force. We recognize that. This is not something which reverses what we have done in the past. It targets at the needs that everyone agrees need to be met at the present time.

So please, let us not delay on this legislation. It is easy to talk about the hungry. We all love to talk about the real problems wherever we go, but the real challenge is to do something, and H.R. 5151 is doing something about the problem.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5151, the Hunger Relief Act of 1984. This bill is a constructive and responsible effort to address one of the most serious issues facing this country today—domestic hunger. It comes to the floor today with widespread bipartisan support. I am grateful for the assistance of Chairman DE LA GARZA, the ranking minority member of the agriculture committee, Mr. MADIGAN, and the ranking minority member of the Nutrition Subcommittee, Mr. EMERSON, in forging this balanced package. Special thanks are also due Mr. JEFFORDS for his help in formulating H.R. 5151, as introduced.

In my capacities as both chairman of the Nutrition Subcommittee of the House Agriculture Committee and as chairman of the task force on domestic hunger of the House Select Committee on Hunger, I have seen the domestic hunger problem firsthand. As I have stated so many times before, the existence of hunger in this country, and especially to the degree it now exists, is a national shame.

Over the past 16 months, the nutrition subcommittee has conducted extensive hearings in Washington and around the country that leave no doubt that there has been a significant increase in the number of Americans who have difficulty feeding themselves from month to month. Witness after credible witness—including big city mayors from both political parties, religious leaders, United Way representatives, State welfare administrators, business leaders and others—have described a dramatic growth in the demand for emergency food assistance. These findings have been confirmed by reports of the U.S. Conference of Mayors, the General Accounting Office, the Citizens Commission on Hunger in New England, and many others, including the President's task force on food assistance.

In addition, our subcommittee has heard testimony from doctors, nurses, and other health professionals citing a growing body of evidence that links the current hunger problem with significant health problems—such as improper growth rates in children. I suspect that even more evidence along these lines will emerge from a series of hearings scheduled for this summer by the select committee on hunger.

Our subcommittee hearings this year and other reports also indicate that, despite the current improvement in the economy, the hunger problem is not abating. Testimony in Miami and Chicago this past March and recent surveys by the U.S. Conference of Mayors and the United Way indicate that emergency food aid demand in 1984 is likely to be as high or higher than in 1983, and shows no signs of slowing in 1985. It would appear that those most in need are among the last to reap the benefits of economic recovery.

Unfortunately, there are many persons in our society who will gain little relief even if the economy continues to improve. Those who cannot work—elderly and disabled persons, certain single parents with children—and those who already work but whose earnings leave them far below the poverty line, are helped little, if at all, by lowered unemployment. They are reliant upon the social safety net, which has been significantly damaged by recent reductions in most programs serving the poor. Even if continued economic recovery reduces the total number of Americans in need, these people would continue to face a serious hunger problem.

It was to address this concern that I, along with Mr. JEFFORDS and many others, introduced H.R. 5151 on March 15, 1984. As introduced, H.R. 5151 was designed to strengthen the various Federal feeding programs—school lunch, WIC, elderly feeding, food stamps—that had been credited with virtually eliminating hunger in America by the late 1970's. The bill, as reported, has been modified to accommodate the split jurisdiction of House committees over feeding programs and to bring the bill's cost within the spending targets assumed in the fiscal year 1985 House-passed budget resolution. Although the portions of H.R. 5151 relating to child nutrition and elderly feeding have been dropped, virtually the same child nutrition and elderly feeding proposals are working their way through Congress in separate bills (H.R. 7 and H.R. 4785, respectively).

However, even if all of these bills were to be approved by Congress and signed by the President, much would be left to be done. These bills would only achieve what I call a "down payment" on hunger. They would be constructive and helpful, but not put an end to the problem. Next year, I intend to pursue the unfinished agenda of H.R. 5151, as introduced. Issues of priority concern to me include basing food stamp benefits on a more adequate standard and providing for a separate deduction for dependent care expenses. Also, as H.R. 5151 now requires, I believe that a thorough review of the food stamp quality control system, and the sanctions based upon it, is necessary.

THE PRESIDENT'S TASK FORCE

As reported, H.R. 5151 includes many specific recommendations of the President's task force on food assistance. By raising the current assets limitations and basing benefits on 100 percent of the thrifty food plan in fiscal year 1985, the bill adopts the task force's most central recommendations to improve the adequacy and accessibility of the food stamp program. Other specific task force recommendations relating to the eligibility of the homeless, categorical eligibility, the staggering of coupon issuance, the hours of operation of food stamp offices, error rate sanctions, and nutrition surveillance are included in the bill.

In regard to the homeless, H.R. 5151 attempts to balance their need for assistance with the need to maintain maximum program accountability. Thus, while the eligibility of the homeless is clarified, State agencies must take steps to assure that only those eligible for assistance are provided benefits. In providing benefits on an expedited or regular basis, food stamp offices would be expected to generally check the eligibility factors that are checked for other applicants. The intent of the bill is to make it no tougher and no easier for the homeless to gain eligibility than for other persons.

H.R. 5151 also addresses areas that the task force identified as problem areas, but on which it made no specific recommendations. The task force acknowledged that rapidly increasing energy costs now consume a disproportionate share of the budgets of low-income persons. The bill addresses this issue by raising the ceiling on the excess shelter/dependent care deduction. The bill would also increase work incentives, another concern of the task force, by restoring the earned income deduction from 18 percent to 20 percent, and by increasing the funding and flexibility provided to the States in conducting job search and job search training programs. Increasing the excess shelter/dependent care deduction also increases work incentives for those who incur child care costs.

JOB SEARCH

The job search provision is an important component of the bill. It is my hope that H.R. 5151 will result in a greater number of positive efforts to prepare and place food stamp recipients in unsubsidized employment. The increased funding provided under this bill (from about $31 million to $50 million) for job search and job search training programs should enable wider utilization of innovative approaches, such as job finding clubs.

Importantly, States would be afforded great flexibility, consistent with fundamental client protections, in determining what persons are subject to job search requirements and what those requirements are. States could decide, for instance, to focus on those work registrants for whom they believe the job search program would be most successful and limit the scope of job search accordingly. Or a State could operate a job search program of wide application that provides fewer services to clients. In each instance, I hope that States would make their choices according to what works. I, too, often hear that current work registration and job search procedures are little more than an exercise in paper shuffling. I hope that States will move to more meaningful programs.

In providing States flexibility to design job search programs, H.R. 5151 also strengthens client protections. Job search requirements would be of limited duration—ordinarily 2 months a year—and participants would be reimbursed—up to $25 a month—for actual out-of-pocket expenses they incur in meeting them. The penalty for failure to comply with job search requirements would be specified (disqualification of the entire household for 2 months), although the bill makes clear that all participants must be given the opportunity to cure their disqualifications and have the right to return to the program once such cure is effectuated. Under H.R. 5151, persons who fail to meet the work requirements of other programs—such as AFDC—would not be penalized unless the violated work requirement was comparable to a food stamp work requirement and the other program has made a final determination that a violation has occurred.

MONTHLY REPORTING AND RETROSPECTIVE BUDGETING [MRRB]

By making monthly reporting and retrospective budgeting optional, H.R. 5151 would take an important step toward improving food stamp program management, and, in some instances, combating hunger. H.R. 5151 would make clear that States are free to choose whether to utilize monthly reporting, periodic reporting, or a system whereby clients report changes as they occur. Similarly, States could choose whether to utilize prospective or retrospective budgeting. Under H.R. 5151, States would be free to mix and match reporting systems and accounting periods as they see fit.

Of course, should a State choose to utilize MRRB, the same limitations on its use and the same client protections provided in current law and regulations would apply; for example, certain households, such as the elderly and migrants, would be exempt from MRRB. Also, retrospective budgeting could not be utilized when determining initial eligibility.

Virtually every State and local welfare department favors a State option on MRRB. They believe that Federal officials are in no position to judge whether and to what extent MRRB is advisable in a given State. Especially since early pilot tests of MRRB show that MRRB can result in the disqualification of needy, eligible persons, I believe we should refrain from mandating this cumbersome and costly administrative procedure nationwide.

CONCLUSION

As I stated earlier, H.R. 5151 is a bill worthy of widespread bipartisan support. It would provide additional benefits where they are most needed, make the food stamp program more accessible to the "new poor," increase work incentives, and improve program administration.

This bill is a carefully structured package, and as is the case for all compromises, is not totally satisfactory in all aspects for all parties. However it is, in my view, indisputably a positive step for those who are concerned about fighting hunger in this country. And I am greatly heartened that we have been able to move this bill forward in a spirit of bipartisan cooperation.

FOOD STAMP FACTS,[1] JULY 23, 1984

(1) WHO RECEIVES FOOD STAMPS?

As of May 1984, 21.2 million people in about 7 million households receive food stamps.

70 percent of all households are headed by women.

60 percent of all participants are either very young, very old, or disabled.

58 percent of all households have children and these households receive almost 80 percent of all benefits.

About 47 percent of all participants are children.

About 20 percent of all households contain one or more elderly persons. Almost 90 percent of these households are elderly persons living alone or with one other person, who is usually elderly.

18 percent of all households have earners.

46 percent of all household heads are white, 37 percent are black, and about 10 percent are Hispanic.

(2) HOW POOR ARE FOOD STAMP PARTICIPANTS?

The average gross income of all households is $356 a month or $4,272 a year. Average net income is $205 a month or $2,460 a year.

95 percent of all households have gross incomes below the poverty line and they receive 98 percent of all benefits. (When food stamp benefits are included, 92 percent of all households have gross incomes below the poverty line.)

42 percent of all households have gross incomes below one half of the poverty line and they receive 59 percent of all benefits.

76 percent of all households own no countable assets; 97 percent own assets of $500 or less; 99.7 percent own assets of $1,500 or less.

(3) WHAT LEVEL OF BENEFITS IS PROVIDED?

The average benefit is about $37.60 per person per month, or about 42 cents per person per meal.

The maximum benefit is about 70 cents per person per meal.

8 percent of all households receive the $10 minimum benefit. Of these households, 77 percent have an elderly member. One person households at the minimum benefit receive 11 cents per person per meal.

RECENT LEGISLATIVE ACTIONS TO COMBAT ERROR, FRAUD AND ABUSE IN THE FOOD STAMP PROGRAM

1983—PUBLIC LAW 98-204

Permitted states utilizing monthly reporting to conduct face to face recertifications more often than every six months.

Broadened the ability of states to cross-check information from other programs in verifying the eligibility and payment levels of food stamp participants.

Enhanced the ability of states to target the use of monthly reporting and retrospective budgeting on participants for whom it would be the most cost-effective.

1982—PUBLIC LAW 97-253

States were granted increased means by which to collect fraud and nonfraud overissuances. As an incentive for increased state activity in this area, states were authorized to retain 50 percent of fraud recoveries and 25 percent of nonfraud recoveries.

Substantial penalties were established for states that fail to meet stringent error rate goals. States failing to reach a 5 percent error rate by FY 1985 would lose part or all of their administrative funding. Financial incentives were established for states with error rates below 5 percent.

The maximum civil money penalty for retail stores violating the Food Stamp Act was raised from $5,000 to $10,000 and the program disqualification periods for stores violating the Act was increased.

The Secretary was authorized to require a bond to be posted by stores previously disqualified or subjected to a civil penalty for Food Stamp Act violations or trafficking coupons.

Households that experience a loss of income resulting from a penalty imposed for intentional failure to comply with a Federal, State, or local welfare law were prohibited from having an increase in food stamp beneifts due to a loss of that income.

The Secretary was authorized to restrict the number of households that could be served by an authorized representative.

1981—PUBLIC LAW 97-98

States were made strictly liable for any losses in the handling and issuing of food stamps, including losses involving failure of coupon issuers to comply with prescibed requirements.

The Comptroller General of the United States was provided access to applicant and recipient records and to records relating to retail and wholesale food concerns, for audit and examination purposes.

State agencies were required (earlier law provided option to States) to utilize wage data collected by the Social Security Administration and State unemployment compensation agencies for the purpose of verifying the earnings of food stamp recipients.

Households were required to furnish the Social Security numbers of all household members in order to become eligible to participate in the program.

Retail stores participating in the program were required to display a sign providing information on how persons may report observed cases of food stamp abuse.

Food stamp applications were required to contain notices to applicants the information they provided would be subject to verification and that if any material part of the information were incorrect food stamps might be denied and criminal prosecution might result.

Local, State, and Federal law enforcement officials were provided access to information furnished by applicants for the purpose of investigating alleged violations of the Food Stamp Act.

Prison sentences were required for the second and subsequent convictions for violations of the Act or program regulations. Courts were authorized to suspend any convicted violator from the program for up to 18 months, in addition to any regular disqualification period under the Act. Further, courts could permit work approved by the courts as restitution for losses incurred by the violation.

Additional powers were granted to persons within the Department of Agriculture's Office of Inspector General who conduct investigations of felony criminal violations of the Act.

1981—PUBLIC LAW 97-35

Applicants and recipients who misrepresent their circumstances were subjected to the same disqualification periods and penalties as those who commit fraud.

Recipients found to have committed fraud or misrepresentation by either a court or an administrative hearing were disqualified for a period of 6 months for the first offense; 12 months for the second offense; and permanently for the third offense.

Households receiving an overissuance of food stamps due to an error or mistake (rather than because of misrepresentation or fraud) would have their benefits lowered in subsequent months to recoup the overissuance.

State agencies were provided additional incentive to more aggressively pursue collection efforts by being able to retain 25 percent of all non-fraud and non-misrepresentation overissuances recovered.

1980—PUBLIC LAW 96-249

States were provided an incentive to reduce error rates. The current 50 percent Federal matching rate for State administrative costs was increased to 65 percent for States with error rates below 5 percent; 60 percent for States with error rates between 5 and 8 percent; and 55 percent for States which lower their error rates at least 25 percent from the preceding year.

An error rate sanction system was established whereby States that fail to reduce error rates below specified targets were liable for the cost of all errors above such targets.

Seventy-five percent Federal funding was provided to the States for costs incurred in developing and installing computer systems to reduce errors and to allow for computer matching.

States were authorized to conduct computer wage matching of information supplied by applicants and recipients against all available Social Security wage and benefit data and information in the files of State unemployment compensation agencies.

State agencies' authority for verification of household information was expanded to allow for development of error-prone profiles as a basis for mandatory verification requirements.

Certified households were required to present photo identification cards when exchanging food stamp authorization cards for food stamps in those areas in which the Secretary, in consultation with the Inspector General, finds that such a procedure would help protect the integrity of the program.

Food stamp certification personnel who determine, on the basis of information furnished by a household, that a member of the household is an illegal alien were required to report that information to the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

The Secretary was authorized to confiscate cash or goods used in food stamp trafficking.

States were allowed to use retrospective accounting and periodic reporting procedures to reduce error rates in those States that can implement these systems in a cost-effective manner.

1979—PUBLIC LAW 96-58

Applicants were required to provide Social Security numbers.

Individuals disqualified from program participation for fraud were prohibited from reentering the program after the disqualification period had been served unless they arranged to repay the amount fraudulently obtained.

As an incentive to intensify anti-fraud activity, States were allowed to retain 50 percent of the funds recovered as a result of their fraud investigations and prosecutions.

1977—PUBLIC LAW 95-113

Persons found to have committed fraud were disqualified from participation for 3-27 months.

States were encouraged to investigate and prosecute fraud by an increase in Federal cost-sharing for such activities from 50 to 75 percent.

Elimination of the purchase requirement eliminated vendor fraud related to the handling of the participants' cash payments.

Persons who knowingly transferred assets in order to become eligible for food stamps were declared ineligible to receive them for up to one year.

Persons who refused to cooperate with program officials by denying requested data needed to determine their eligibility, or to complete quality control reviews, were denied or terminated from the program.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5151, the Hunger Relief Act of 1984. In my role as the ranking minority member on the Domestic Marketing, Consumer Relations and Nutrition Subcommittee I have worked closely with the gentleman from California, Mr. PANETTA, chairman of the subcommittee. We have traveled across the country, holding hearings, visiting soup kitchens, welfare offices, and food distribution centers. Our subcommittee looked into the problems of hunger and food assistance programs and evaluated efforts to address the issue at all levels of government and within the private sector.

We found that the lengthy recession and unemployment have caused suffering—no one disputes this. There are very positive signs that the economy is turning around—but while that occurs there are people in need and receiving assistance from Federal programs, their own community, and the private sector.

The Food Stamp Program is the major food assistance program operated by the Federal Government and is the program through which food aid is best delivered. Over 22 million people—1 in 10—receive assistance through this program. Through this program and others such as the school lunch program over 95 million meals per day are subsidized by the Federal Government and millions of pounds of cheese, butter, and other surplus commodities are ordered by States to distribute to their needy people.

This year almost $19.5 billion will be spent on food assistance programs by the Federal Government. An increase since 1980 when the amount spent was $13.8 billion.

Community organizations and churches also help and in 1982, according to the publication "Giving U.S.A.," an estimated $60.39 billion was donated to hundreds of thousands of charitable organizations, institutions, and agencies—many of which help feed the needy in America.

In addition, last year the gentleman from California and I worked closely together on a bill that expanded the kinds of surplus commodities that can be distributed to needy people, extended the surplus distribution program for 2 years and authorized administrative funding to be paid for the actual costs of storing, transporting, handling, and distributing these surplus commodities. The gentleman from California and I worked very closely on this legislation and we agreed that it is not designed to take the place of the food assistance programs I mentioned previously. However, because of high unemployment rates—still felt in parts of the country—the past recession and the fact that surplus commodities are being stored by the Federal Government, I believe these surplus commodities should be made available to people in need.

Under that legislation passed by the Congress and the initiatives of the Department of Agriculture a total of 1 billion pounds of staple foods—such as cheese, butter, rice, and flour—have been distributed for use by individual households. Since July 1983 over 107 million pounds of canned foods—chicken, beef, tuna, pears, and sweet potatoes—have been distributed for use by these households.

All this is in addition to the 1.8 billion pounds of surplus food that is distributed each year to schools, nursing homes, hospitals, elderly feeding centers, and other charitable institutions.

The gentleman from California and I recognized that hunger in America and solutions to the problem must be offered in a bipartisan manner. As I mentioned earlier our subcommittee has studied the hunger issue on this basis. As a result of that effort the surplus commodity distribution program was extended for 2 years. We worked together on that piece of legislation—just as we worked together during the 97th Congress to achieve some necessary reforms in this program.

As a result of our efforts we have this bill before us today. H.R. 5151—the Hunger Relief Act—was designed to address in a responsible manner, the problems our subcommittee heard of and saw in our hearings. I believe we have accomplished this.

Our subcommittee incorporated in H.R. 5151, the recommendations of the President's Task Force on Food Assistance, other groups assessing the needs within their communities and organizations involved in feeding and helping poor people.

H.R. 5151 makes changes in the law in several broad areas. I would like to discuss several of the provisions of the bill before us today.

PROGRAM BENEFITS

H.R. 5151 increases program benefits and improves the operation of the Food Stamp Program.

The regular annual adjustment of the thrifty food plan, which is the basis for the food stamp benefits, will be based on 100 percent of this thrifty food plan—as opposed to the 99 percent now provided for October 1984. The President's task force recommended this action. The task force described a concern that many households cannot tolerate any reduction in purchasing power—no matter how small—and recommended that food stamp benefits be raised by increasing the full allotment to equal 100 percent of the thrifty food plan. The program will return to its stated goal of providing the purchasing power necessary to buy a basic nutritionally adequate diet as measured by the cost of the food plan.

Additionally the October 1, 1985, adjustment to the thrifty food plan will be based on 101 percent of the benefit level. The 1-year increase in benefits is intended to provide additional meals for needy Americans while the food benefit levels of the Food Stamp Program are reviewed.

It makes sense that we look at the methods of calculating benefit levels for the poor—so that many items such as the needs of the elderly, cost of food in rural areas, the quality of diets, and other factors can be thoroughly reviewed.

As most Members know the actual benefit an individual or a family can receive is based on a determination that 30 cents of each dollar is spent on food by an average household. Therefore, an average family of four with a new monthly income of $500 would be expected to spend $150 on food. The thrifty food plan for a family of four currently is $253. The food stamp benefit is the difference between the thrifty food plan ($253) and the amount expected to be spent on food ($150) or $103. This is supplied in cash by the household.

Therefore most food stamp participants do not receive the full level of benefits since the elimination of the purchase requirement in the 1977 act. They are expected to put up some of their money for the purchase of food. The food stamp purchase requirement was eliminated in order to improve access to the program and allow more needy people to participate. That goal was accomplished.

However, one of the byproducts of the elimination of the purchase requirement was that for most participants, food stamp benefits will not last for the entire month. Eighty percent of food stamp participants receive partial benefits and at the end of the month—or depending on household income they will run out of benefits and must use their own funds to buy food. This is an important facet of the Food Stamp Program and when critics charge that the program doesn't work because people run out of stamps, they are either ill informed as to the program itself or misleading the public.

The definition of who is considered to be disabled and thereby qualified for additional benefits is expanded in H.R. 5151. Certain veterans, persons receiving railroad retirement benefits and certain individuals receiving supplemental benefits because of blindness or a disability will now be included in the definition of disability. All persons must demonstrate that they are at least as disabled as those receiving permanent and total disability in the SSI and Social Security programs.

The food stamp resource limitations are increased from $1,500 to $2,250 for most households and from $3,000 to $3,500 for households containing elderly persons. This was a specific recommendation of the President's task force. The task force emphasized in its report, that many "new poor" households which have lost income due to unemployment in the past recession do not qualify for food stamps because they own too many assets. In addition, because of the lag between application for assistance and actual enrollment in the program, households living off their assets may get close to complete depletion of assets before they fall into eligibility level and benefits begin. These households should be given greater access to the food stamp system. Raising the asset limit will help accomplish this.

H.R. 5151 also contains a recommendation of the task force and the gentleman from California that the threshold value of a vehicle be raised to $5,500. I disagree with this provision and will support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri to retain the present law.

Several of the deductions allowable in the Food Stamp Program are increased. The earned income deduction is increased from 18 to 20 percent of earnings. This deduction is provided to cover a person's expenses that are necessitated by employment such as taxes, uniforms, and transportation. The President's task force, while not specifically recommending this change, did emphasize the importance of increasing work incentives in the program. One way to accomplish this is to increase the work related expense deduction.

The task force believed that Federal programs should be designed to maximize incentives for individuals to participate in the workplace and that participants in Federal assistance programs should be encouraged to obtain the skills and experience that only a job can provide. These same people should not be encouraged to become dependent on assistance on a long-term basis. Eligibility for food stamp benefits should be designed to encourage work.

Also the dependent care shelter deduction is increased from $125 per month to $155 per month—a 25-percent increase in this deduction. This deduction is primarily utilized by households with high shelter costs, although working households use the deduction for dependent care costs.

Currently food stamp households receive a deduction for excess shelter costs to the extent they exceed 50 percent of net income. Raising the deduction to $155 would result in benefit increases for households with the high shelter and utility costs and for some who have dependent care costs. Up to $25 more a month in dependent care costs could be deducted by those who incur them. This results not only in increased work incentives but also greater flexibility for those who must pay for dependent care in order to work.

The Commodity Supplemental Food Program [CSFP] is expanded to allow administrators of this program to provide supplemental food to the elderly, under regulations set by the Secretary. The 1981 farm bill authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to begin elderly feeding pilot projects to test distribution of commodities as a way to help elderly poor persons. Funds were made available for pilot projects, beginning in September 1982, in Detroit, MI, and Des Moines, IA, and beginning December 1982, in New Orleans, LA.

The 2-year demonstration projects have provided necessary monthly food packages to low income senior citizens. H.R. 5151 provides that CSFP can, at the option of local program operators, be extended to elderly persons, provided that such extension does not deny commodities to eligible women, infants, and children. Local programs would be able to serve elderly persons only to the extent they can be served within the caseload authorized for any fiscal year set by USDA.

H.R. 5151 will also ensure that individuals without a fixed home address are eligible for participation in the Food Stamp Program. The President's task force included this provision among its recommendations to improve the Food Stamp Program. It was reported to the task force that 19 States required an individual to have a fixed household address in order to be eligible for food stamps. The task force believed it unfair that States arbitrarily eliminate the homeless from this major national entitlement program.

While our committee recognizes the need to ensure the homeless are not denied benefits solely due to a lack of a fixed address, it must be emphasized that States take care that all food stamp eligibility factors are met before benefits are made available to such applicants. States may have used the fixed address as a means to protect against multiple participation of households in the food stamp program. I want to make sure that while the absence of a fixed address does not preclude food stamp eligibility, neither does it relieve the State of its responsibility to protect against abuse of the Food Stamp Program.

WORK INCENTIVES

The second precept of H.R. 5151 is to increase work incentives within the Food Stamp Program. I have mentioned two of them previously. They are the increase in the work expense deduction from 18 to 20 percent of earnings and the increase in the shelter/dependent care deduction from $125 per month to $155 per month. The latter increase can enable households containing a working person and a dependent—for example, a child or an elderly parent in need of care—to pay for these home care expenses covered by this deduction.

The major work incentive contained in this bill is the provision concerning job search. H.R. 5151 authorizes $50 million per year to provide basic funding for job search programs, including job search training and support activities. This funding will be used with the goal in mind to aid food stamp participants to find and keep jobs. It is my hope that States will design innovative programs—such as job finding clubs, training in techniques of how to find and keep a job and how to interview for a job. The chairman of the subcommittee and I visited such an activity in San Diego, CA, and we were impressed with the quality of the programs there. It was evident to me that some food stamp participants need basic skills training in a short term approach to help them find jobs—jobs in the private sector. H.R. 5151 can provide States with the means to accomplish this.

The job search provision contained in H.R. 5151 also:

First, provides 50-percent Federal match for State job search costs exceeding the $50 million authorization—including a 50-percent match for the up to $25 per month work expenses allowed for participants meeting job search requirements;

Second, allow States flexibility in the design of job search requirements, including determining those who would be subject to these requirements—based on the broad category of those now subject to work registration requirements;

Third, requires the Secretary of Agriculture to report to the Congress by April 1, 1987, on these State programs and to measure the success of such participants in getting and keeping jobs; and Fourth, establishes a disqualification period of 60 days for a household in which a member fails to meet job search requirements. Once these requirements are satisified the household can be eligible for reinstatement to the Food Stamp Program.

I am pleased this provision of H.R. 5151 will provide States with the necessary flexibility to design required job programs, with the result being jobs for food stamp participants.

PROGRAM ACCOUNTABILITY

The third area of H.R. 5151 concerns increases in program accountability. As Members know States carry the responsibility to administer the Food Stamp Program, based on Federal laws and regulations. There are many areas of the Food Stamp Program in which States have limited flexibility. States commonly request more similarity among the various programs aimed at helping poor people. H.R. 5151 provides for one change to accomplish this.

In this bill we simplify the application procedures for the Food Stamp Program by providing for categorical eligibility for all AFDC and SSI households.

This was a recommendation of the President's Task Force, which heard many complaints that the application procedures for the Food Stamp Program were too complex and time consuming. State program administrators argued that initial program complexity, combined with the many changes that have been made subsequently in the program are the reasons why payment error rates are at their present unacceptably high levels.

Under the provisions of the bill, food stamp benefits would still be calculated using food stamp rules. Additionally, language has been included that would ensure that any AFDC and SSI household that loses its eligibility for those programs would not lose its food stamp eligibility without a determination under food stamp rules that the household fails to meet food stamp eligibility standards.

A second part of the increase in program accountability contained in H.R. 1551 concerns the requirement that States request and use the information on unearned income available from the Internal Revenue Service [IRS], typically reported on 1099 forms. This would complement existing requirements for obtaining and using earned income information and further assist States in verifying both recipient income and assets.

Recent experiments with bank matching have indicated that information on unearned income may be a valuable new verification tool. Such unearned income information is best used to identify cases that warrant further investigation and requires State agencies to target this information on those uses that are most likely to identify and prevent ineligibility and improper food stamp benefits.

Protections are included to require independent verification, which would include verification of the actual amount involved and an evaluation of whether the household has access to it, including a determination of when the household has or had access to the income or asset identified.

The final area of program accountability concerns sanctions and State error rates. H.R. 5151 retains the provisions in the act now requiring States to reduce the error rates to 7 percent by 1984 and to 5 percent by 1985. Fiscal sanctions remain unchanged until 1986. Effective with the States' performance for fiscal year 1986 and thereafter, for those States not achieving the 5-percent goal, the penalty will be based on the dollar equivalent of overpayment and payments to ineligible households over and above the 5-percent tolerance level. Collection of the sanction for any fiscal year would occur only after the actual error rate for the fiscal year is determined after the end of the year. The "dollar-for-dollar," over the 5-percent tolerance level, liability would apply beginning with fiscal year 1986 and will not reduce or be taken from household food stamp benefits.

States not reaching the 5-percent goal will be required to repay the Federal Government in 1987. As I said before, food stamp benefits will not and cannot be reduced to recover States sanctions. I know there are those who are concerned that States may reduce other benefits or services in order to pay food stamp sanctions. Any Governor who would decide to lower benefits or services to the citizens of his or her State in order to recover these repayments based on errors made in the Food Stamp Program will be invited to discuss the reasons before our subcommittee. To me it is unconscionable that such a practice would take place.

We took this action because error rates in the Food Stamp Program, while reduced over the past 2 years, are still excessive. The funding for the program comes mainly from the Federal Treasury with 100 percent of benefit costs and 50 percent of the administrative costs paid by the Federal Government. However, States are responsible for the day-to-day administration of the Food Stamp Program.

I recognize that the efficient operation of the program depends on cooperation between the Federal Government and the States and that multiple program changes over the past years have resulted in a program that has known little stability. Nevertheless, many States have done exceptional jobs in running efficient programs and have achieved significant reductions in the rates of error. Others have not. Whether this diversity relates to States placing higher priorities on the administration of other assistance programs, complexities within a State, or other reasons is not known. What is known is that food stamp error rates are too high—$900 million over the course of a year was issued to participants who were either ineligible or received too many food stamp benefits.

H.R. 5151 also requires the Secretary to report, on April 1, 1985, to the Congress on, first, the effect that the current law on error rate goals, fiscal sanctions and incentives has had on State food stamp error rates, and second, the statistical methods utilized by the Department to calculate State error rates, including the rational for using these methods.

Please be assured that I am steadfast in my resolve to retain the sanctions in H.R. 5151. However I also want to assure that quality control error rates provide an accurate measure of each State's performance and one that provides a performance measure comparable to the quality control error rates of the other States.

Also we intend to review the sufficiency of the quality control system as a measure of State performance. Remember, the quality of program administration, especially in terms of client service, cannot be measured in error rates alone. Total measurement of States' performance in administering the Food Stamp Program will be subject to review during this review of the fiscal sanction system.

NUTRITION EDUCATION AND MONITORING

The final broad area contained in H.R. 5151 is that of nutrition education and monitoring.

The committee recognized that the effective use of the funds authorized for the Food Stamp Program depends to some degree upon the food choices made by those participating in the program. Therefore we attempted to ensure, to the extent possible, that low-income households have access to programs enabling them to maximize their food dollars and improve their diets. In order to accomplish this, H.R. 5151 authorizes funding to the Department of Agriculture which, through the Extension Service, will make funds available to the State Cooperative Extension Services to expand their food, nutrition, and consumer services for low-income households.

The committee authorizes funding for the Cooperative Extension Services because they operate nutritional education programs, at least one of which—Expanded Food and Nutrition Education Program—is aimed at the population that is most likely to rely on the Food Stamp Program. It is this group that should benefit from the increased services. Since the committee wishes that effective food, nutrition, and consumer education services be extended to the greatest number of low-income persons practicable, H.R. 5151 expands the service of the organization already responsible for reaching this population.

Additionally, the Secretary of Agriculture is required, in conducting the Department of Agriculture's continuing survey of food intakes of individuals and any nationwide food consumption survey, to include a sample that is representative of low-income individuals and, to the extent practicable, the collection of information of food and other household expenditures by such individuals, to the extent practicable, continue to maintain the nutrient data base established by the Department of Agriculture, and encourage research by the public and private sectors on effective standards, methodologies, and technologies for accurate assessment of the nutritional and dietary status of individuals.

Other important provisions of H.R. 5151 include the following:

First, States are required to assess the need to keep food stamp offices open during evening and weekend hours. The President's task force was concerned that the Federal programs tend to discourage people from working and felt programs should be designed so that recipients will generally be better off if they choose to work. If working people cannot easily participate in the program, the work incentives built into the program will be reduced. The work incentives of the program will be more effective if recipients who are employed can have access to the system during nonworking hours.

Second, State agencies are permitted to use a method that allows coupon benefits to be issued over the period of the entire month, as long as benefits are not delayed during any implementation procedure. The President's task force found that States may distribute food stamps any time within the first 14 days of a month. In many areas food stamps are sent out on the first of the month. The task force was concerned with the possibility that such phased delivery of stamps can lead to two problems. First, it may allow merchants in areas where food stamps are commonly used to discriminate against food stamp recipients either by assigning higher markups to perishable goods at the beginning of the month, or by having fewer sales at the beginning of the month. Second, demands on private food assistance programs surge at the end of the month when household budgets tend to run short.

Allowing States to stagger the delivery of food stamps will eliminate the potential for merchants to raise their prices in phase with food stamp deliveries and it will help reduce the demands on private food assistance programs toward the end of the month. Staggering has recently been instituted in a few States and counties. The President's task force recommended that it become nationwide, and H.R. 5151 allows this to occur.

Third, banks and other financial institutions are prohibited from charging retail food stores for the cost of depositing food stamps, as long as the food stamps are submitted to the banks in a manner consistent with Federal Reserve bank requirements. I have been concerned for some time about the growing practice of banks charging retail food stores for the deposit of food stamps. The subcommittee received testimony that the current practice of bank charges could result in charges to food stores of up to $156 million per year, should all banks charge the highest fee. H.R. 5151 corrects this practice, and with the committee's concern that food stamp participants have access to food stores of their choice, reduces the charge that grocery stores may drop out of the program because of these bank fees.

Fourth, a pilot food assistance program for the poor is established in rural Alaska for the fiscal years 1986 through 1989. Because of the unique conditions of rural Alaska, in which approximately 2,900 food stamp households are scattered over 500,000 square miles, H.R. 5151 authorizes this pilot program in which noncash food assistance benefits will be provided to needy rural Alaskans. Funding for this pilot program will be based on the level of funding anticipated for 1986 and will cover 100 percent of the benefit costs and 50 percent of the administrative costs of the program. Funding will be adjusted to reflect changes in food prices and participation. The design of the program by the State of Alaska will reflect the needs of the rural participants.

I believe H.R. 5151 is a good bill, one that I hope all Members can enthusiastically support. The chairman of the subcommittee and I worked together on this bill and I wish to thank him for his cooperation. He, as always, has been fair and has attempted to accommodate the minority views whenever possible. We have fashioned a good bill. However, we have agreed to disagree on two areas—monthly reporting and retrospective budgeting and the threshold value of a car. Amendments will be offered that will, I believe, improve H.R. 5151 and save almost $200 million over a 3-year period.

I also wish to thank the ranking minority member of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MADIGAN]. His guidance has been invaluable.

I urge all Members to support this bill. It is one that increases food stamp benefits, strengthens work incentives, improves program accountability, and provides additional nutrition education for low-income families.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. LELAND], the chairman of the Select Committee on Hunger.

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] for his undying concern about the problem of hunger and malnutrition in America. Under his leadership this Congress has been ever aware of the very increasing problems of hunger and has brought to this body today a solution to the various and sundry problems that we realize.

I would like to also commend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON] for his diligence and his work in cooperating and working with and in joining with the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] in bringing this matter to the Congress, because, indeed, it represents an opportunity for all of us.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Hunger Relief Act of 1984. Earlier this year, I joined over 60 of our colleagues in sponsoring H.R. 5151. My endorsement of this bill was prompted by my conviction that the unacceptably high rate of poverty-related hunger in this country demanded a response.

I chair the House Select Committee on Hunger. Last month we conducted hearings in Greenwood, MI, on the issue of the effectiveness and accessibility of Federal food programs. On Monday of this week, we conducted similar hearings in San Francisco. Statements from our witnesses repeatedly told of households running out of food stamp benefits before the end of the month. We heard over and over again about the growing numbers of people visiting food pantries and soup kitchens because their food stamp allotments for the month did not last and there was not enough food left in the house to prepare decent, nutritious meals. These people are hurting.

The Congressional Budget Office has reported that between fiscal years 1982 and 1985, the Food Stamp Program has been reduced by roughly $7 billion. I would like to focus for a moment on who is participating in this program and who is affected by benefit reductions.

A study released by the U.S. Department of Agriculture just last month—"Characteristics of Food Stamp Households: August 1982"—reported that 95 percent of the households participating in the Food Stamp Program had gross incomes below the poverty line; 42 percent of the participating households had gross incomes below one-half of the poverty line. More than 47 percent of all participants in the program were children, and close to 8 percent of the participants were elderly.

These are vulnerable groups of people who are reliant upon food stamp benefits to augment their food buying power and improve their nutritional status.

Much has been said about the allegedly large sums being spent on food stamps. Too little has been said about unmet needs. For example, the number of persons who fell into poverty between 1981 and 1982 was 2,576,000; yet, the food stamp benefit rolls increased by only 134,000.

I believe that the bill before us today is one small step in providing badly needed help to people in poverty who need support in improving their nutritional status. It is not a cure-all for hunger problems in our Nation, but it is a vital first step. It does demonstrate that this body is serious about moving forward with efforts to alleviate hunger here at home.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that we should confirm our commitment to improving the availability of nutritious food to those who live in poverty. Benefit restorations embodied in H.R. 5151 will enable us to do so. I am going to support this bill and I encourage my colleagues who are serious about increasing inadequate food stamp benefits for those who live in poverty to join me.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the distinguished gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. ROUKEMA], the ranking minority member of the Select Committee on Hunger.

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5151, the Hunger Relief Act of 1984. As the ranking minority member of the Select Committee on Hunger, I am pleased to be able to add my voice in support of a bill which makes a contribution toward solving the problem of hunger in this country.

First, I would like to commend my colleagues on the Agriculture Committee who have done an outstanding job in developing the provisions of this truly bipartisan bill. Members on both sides of the aisle can be proud of this bill. I wish to thank the chairman of the Subcommittee on Domestic Marketing, Consumer Relations, and Nutrition, LEON PANETTA, and the ranking minority member, BILL EMERSON, for their efforts in bringing this bill to the floor. We all serve together on the Select Committee on Hunger, and I know how committed they are to promoting policies which will alleviate the problems of hunger and malnutrition. Over the course of 16 months their subcommittee held hearings across the country to determine the extent of the hunger problem and to gather extensive evidence. This legislation makes many constructive changes in the Food Stamp Program, the major food assistance program for the low income, elderly and disabled population of our country.

As we consider this bill, we do so mindful of the paradox that exists in this country—the overabundance of our Nation's resources and our oversupply, as contrasted to the fact that there are people in the United States who suffer from hunger. This "paradox of hunger," as I refer to it, is a situation which continues to elude and frustrate us. Surely, as we stand here today to consider how we can make food available through the Food Stamp Program, we must ask, why in fact we should even have hungry people at all?

The Hunger Relief Act of 1984 addresses a fact that we as legislators cannot avoid or deny. There are hungry people in the United States, people who do not have adequate diets and need Government assistance of some kind in order to get a decent meal. Americans are now feeling better about themselves and their prospects for the future. We have recovered from a recession, employment is up, and inflation is down. However, the stark fact remains that 21 million people in this country utilize the Food Stamp Program to meet their daily nutritional needs, and participation in this program to date does not reflect these changes in the economy. In short, about 1 out of every 10 Americans depend in some way on this program.

I speak with first hand knowledge about the importance of this program because of the work which our select committee has done thus far in examining the overall problems of hunger here at home and abroad. We have now visited two vastly different places in this country. Greenwood, MS, and San Francisco, CA, observing the problems of hunger from both a rural and an urban perspective. In each of these cities the need for the Food Stamp Program was forcefully made clear to us. We heard how this program has become a necessity of daily life of many Americans, who rely on them to provide the basics. We were also made aware of their importance when they run out before the end of the month.

This widespread reliance on the Food Stamp Program should also be viewed in the context of economic changes that have taken place in this country. It is clear that increasing numbers of people are taking advantage of private food assistance programs, many of whom are part of a group that has been called the "New Poor." On our trip to San Francisco just a few days ago, we heard from the two large church feeding programs how much an increase there had been in the numbers of people coming for meals. A 1983 GAO report had this to say about the changing types of Americans who now seek food assistance:

> No longer are food centers serving only their traditional clientele of the chronically poor, derelicts, alcoholics, and mentally ill persons who typically live on the streets and who most probably will be in need no matter what happens in the economy. Today, many organizations report that a mounting number of "new poor" are contributing to the increasing numbers seeking assistance at many emergency shelters and food centers. This breed of "new poor" is made up of individuals who were employed and perhaps financially stable just a short time ago.

Clearly, the benefits of the Food Stamp Program do reach beyond traditional recipients. In fact, the Food Stamp Program is really this country's major line of defense in the effort to combat hunger and malnutrition for Americans. This point was made in the report of the President's task force on food assistance, many of whose recommendations for program changes are adopted in this bill.

This bill increases the accessibility and adequacy of food benefits, as recommended by the President's task force. It affirms that the homeless may receive benefits if they are otherwise eligible; bases food benefits on 100 percent of the USDA's minimally adequate diet, the thrifty food plan, rather than 99 percent as under current law; and updates monetary limitations to reflect current prices. These provisions will ensure that those who are needy will receive the benefits to which they are entitled.

We should also consider the fiscal aspects of this bill. I point out that the House-passed budget resolution, House Concurrent Resolution 280, allows for the new spending authority contained in H.R. 5151. Quite apart from humanitarian considerations, the long-term costs of hunger, such as increased health-care costs and loss of productivity, far exceed the costs of this legislation.

There are other aspects of H.R. 5151 which deserve mention. Program accountability and administration will also be improved by this legislation. In order to ensure that Federal dollars are not lost to fraud, waste, and abuse, the penalties on States with overpayment error rates in excess of 5 percent will be increased and States will be required to utilize information from the IRS on the unearned income of food stamp recipients. The increased penalties for State error rates will save over $200 million during fiscal years 1987–89, and the use of IRS information will save almost another $200 million during fiscal years 1986–89. Administration of the program will be improved by providing categorical eligibility for SSI and AFDC recipients. States will save on administrative expenses by not having to certify those recipients twice—once for the SSI or AFDC programs and once for food stamps.

H.R. 5151 also increases work incentives for Food Stamp Program recipients in a number of its provisions. It raises the amount of earned income from 18- to 20-percent deducted from a household's income when determining eligibility and benefits. This ensures that the working poor do not lose benefits to which they are entitled because they are employed. In addition, it clarifies that States must operate Job search programs and provides greater flexibility and funding to States to assure they have more effective job search programs. Furthermore, it increases the deduction that certain working households can take to cover child care expenses which will help working parents. Another provision requires States to evaluate the need for evening and weekend hours at food stamp offices so that working beneficiaries need not take time off from work in order to apply for benefits.

Nutrition education and hunger surveillance will also be improved by H.R. 5151. It will provide $30 million during fiscal years 1985–88 to State cooperative extension services to increase nutrition education activities for low-income households. This will help low-income households get more nutrition per food dollar. Another provision will require USDA, out of current funding levels, to survey a representative sample of low-income households in conducting various food consumption surveys. We do need more data on the population served by Federal food programs.

It is clear that passage of H.R. 5151 will contribute greatly to our efforts to eliminate hunger in the United States. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to vote for the Hunger Relief Act of 1984.

□ 1100

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in hearty support of H.R. 5151, the Hunger Relief Act of 1984. This bill, reported out of the Agriculture Committee with bipartisan support is a responsive yet reasonable approach to reducing hunger in our country.

During the past few years, Congress has been deeply concerned by the increased accounts of hunger within the United States. This increase has been, in part, due to the recent recession and high unemployment. But more than that, it is a result of changes and cuts in our Federal hunger and nutrition programs called for by the current administration.

In the 1960's, America declared the elimination of hunger a top priority. With the development of food assistance programs we made good progress. Accounts and occurrences of nutrition related diseases dropped across the country. However, the United States has lost ground in this battle in the 1980's.

The budget reductions which have occurred in our food assistance programs over the past few years have come at an inopportune time. In my congressional district in California, the unemployment rate in 1983 was over 10 percent; the average unemployment rate for the first half of 1984 was over 9 percent. Many of these people are "newly unemployed," having lost their work due to plant closings and the changing workplace. This winter, the Kaiser Steel plant in Fontana, which in its prime had employed close to 6,000 workers, closed its doors. This is just one example of responsible and hard working citizens who through no fault of their own must find new employment. This has not been an easy task, and many are finding it difficult to put food on the table while seeking new employment.

It is time that Congress reaffirm the high priority we have placed on reducing hunger by taking action. H.R. 5151 does just that. This legislation represents a carefully developed bipartisan compromise, consistent with the spending targets in the House-passed budget resolution for fiscal year 1985, while addressing areas and programs identified as those most needing attention. This legislative proposal incorporates many of the recommendations developed by the President's Task Force on Food Assistance and recommendations from other hunger related organizations. H.R. 5151 improves our programs in four basic areas.

This legislation would increase work incentives by restoring the deduction allowed for earned income from 18 to 20 percent, clarifying that States must operate job search programs, providing greater flexibility and funding to States to encourage more effective job search programs, and increasing the deduction that certain households can take to cover child care expenses. Adequacy and accessibility of food benefits would be improved by basing food stamp benefits more closely on the full cost of the thrifty food plan, increasing the deduction allowed for those with excessive shelter costs, and updating the assets limitations to reflect inflation. Other provisions include expanding special treatment afforded disabled persons in the Food Stamp Program, expanding commodity assistance to certain low-income elderly persons, and allowing the homeless to receive food stamp benefits.

This legislation would improve program administration and accountability by requiring States to use information from the Internal Revenue Service [IRS] on unearned income of food stamp recipients, providing categorical eligibility for Aid to Families with Dependent Children [AFDC] and Supplemental Security Income [SSI] recipients, and increasing the penalties assessed on States with overpayment error rates in excess of 5 percent. Finally, this bill would improve nutrition education and hunger surveillance by providing funds to State cooperative extension offices to increase nutrition education activities for low income households, and by requiring the Department of Agriculture [USDA] to survey a representative sample of low income households when conducting various food consumption surveys.

One method Congress has taken to reduce the cost of our food assistance programs in recent years has been to tighten eligibility requirements. Many of the country's new hungry are those who lost their jobs during the recent recession. This new subgroup has exhausted their unemployment benefits, but have been unable to find new jobs due to the changing job market. Often they have little or no income, but have too many assets to be eligible for Government assistance. I understand that my colleague from California, Mr. PANETTA, will be introducing an amendment which would set the value of certain automobiles which may be excluded from house hold assets in determining eligibility at $4,500 for April 1985, increasing the allowable value to $5,500 by 1987. I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we are all aware of the unemployment and resulting difficulties that many in our districts face. We can no longer continue to reduce eligibility limits and cut food programs, and expect our Federal hunger programs to represent a solid safety net. We must mend some of the holes which we have worn in this net in recent years. H.R. 5151 is a reasonable and respected bipartisan compromise. I encourage my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to carefully consider this legislation and oppose any amendment which would reduce its effectiveness.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to make one other comment about a related matter. Congress has before it in both the Agriculture Committee and the Committee on Science and Technology another piece of legislation which would seek to made similar improvements in our nutrition, research, and monitoring programs.

The subcommittee of the Science Committee, on which I sit, reported that bill out earlier this week. It is my belief that the Committee on Agriculture would take similar action. It is a possibility that we can bring this legislation to the floor in the near future.

That bill, aimed at focusing our nutrition research and monitoring efforts more effectively would be an important complement to the bill that we are considering today and at such time as it may be brought to the floor, I would commend it to the attention of my colleagues.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time I have remaining?

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is advised that he has 8 minutes remaining.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS].

Mr. DE LA GARZA. I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JEFFORDS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee chairman and the ranking member.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 5151.

Two years ago, when we began the 98th session, we did so concerned about the hunger in our land. We spoke of doing something to alleviate that hunger, which is nothing short of a national disgrace in our land of plenty.

Now is the time to deliver something more than words. Let's give our overwhelming approval to this legislation. Let's go home to our constituents, at this, almost the close of the 98th session, and tell them that we have done more about this issue than just talk, that we have acted to make sure that the truly needy do not go hungry.

We may not have acted quickly, but we have acted deliberately. The chairman and ranking Republican on the Nutrition Subcommittee, Mr. PANETTA and Mr. EMERSON, have done a thorough job on this bill. I do not agree with all they have done, but I cannot fault the thoughtful and deliberate fashion in which they have approached this issue and crafted this legislation.

There are a vast array of proposals for improving the food stamp program. The subcommittee and committee has sifted through these proposals in an effort to target aid where it is needed most. I am pleased that this bill incorporates several recommendations of the President's Task Force on Food Assistance.

For example, the bill adopts the task force's recommendation to raise the limit on the allowable value of an automobile, from the current $4,500, set in 1977, to $5,500. I want to point out to my colleagues that this figure is the fair market value of the car and not the equity value. In other words, we are not necessarily talking about an asset that can be liquidated to purchase food, either financially or practically.

There will be a lot of horror stories told about cars. But they are not typical. A poor family will not go out and buy a high-priced car. It cannot afford one, and could not finance one. The families who will benefit by this provision will be those who have recently lost their jobs and income, and are now forced to rely on food stamps. It strikes me as counterproductive to force these people to sell their automobiles, perhaps at a loss, thus depriving them of a means of finding work and resulting in no gain to the Federal Government.

The bill also makes reforms not contained in the task force's recommendations, but equally, if not more, important. The program's work incentives, shelter deduction, and State administrative flexibility are greatly improved. And the bill's nutritional monitoring may give us the information we need to further refine and coordinate our efforts.

Make no mistake about it, the Food Stamp Program is the backbone of our Federal feeding efforts. It is supplemented by special feeding programs and commodity distribution, but the latter especially is an imperfect and uncertain means of meeting Americans' nutritional needs. A tremendous amount of commodities have been distributed recently, but we neither can nor should count on this distribution to take the place of food stamps. Government stocks of surplus dairy products are declining, and will very likely be in short supply in a year's time. Given the likely decrease in the distribution of cheese, butter, and powdered milk, I think it is especially appropriate that we should be moving forward with this legislation at this time.

Mr. Chairman, my colleagues may have received a letter from the Office of Management and Budget which raises a number of questions about this bill. The criticisms outlined in this letter are unfounded. H.R. 5151 is not "a substantial retreat from toward the status quo ante of 1980," nor does it "reverse the 1981 Gramm-Latta Reconciliation Act reforms." It is a modest bill, which makes some significant reforms but all with an eye toward the budget.

The facts about the bill are as follows:

In dollar terms, the bill restores only about one-seventh of the large reductions made in the Food Stamp Program in 1981 and 1982. The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that legislative action in 1981 and 1982 reduced fiscal year 1985 food stamp spending by $2.06 billion. This bill raises fiscal year 1985 food stamp spending by $305 million—leaving over 85 percent of the original savings still in place.

Most of the major provisions in the bill come from the President's own Task Force on Food Assistance. The task force reported in January that it found hunger to be a "real and significant problem throughout our Nation." The task force recommended a number of modest food stamp increases to deal with this important problem. Those recommendations form the core of this bill.

In no way does this bill open the door to fraud, abuse, or error. Not a single one of the numerous antifraud or antiabuse provisions passed in 1979, 1980, 1981, or 1982 is repealed in this bill. In fact, the bill contains further toughening measures—substantially increasing fiscal penalties in States with error rates over 5 percent and tightening job search requirements.

The Office of Management and Budget has made several claims which I believe merit some clarification.

First, it has stated that the bill "would direct benefit increases to the highest income program beneficiaries."

This is not correct. The overwhelming bulk of the benefit increases would go to families living in poverty.

Just last month, USDA issued the results of a national food stamp survey which found that 95 percent of all food stamp households have gross incomes below the poverty line. The survey found that only 5 percent of recipients are above the poverty line and that they receive only 2 percent of program benefits. The facts are that no "high income" beneficiaries are left in the program. Households with gross incomes above 130 percent of the poverty line and net incomes above 100 percent of the poverty line are ineligible—such households were terminated under Gramm-Latta provisions that were enacted in 1981 and that are not changed or repealed by this bill.

The increased benefits in this bill come from provisions that are aimed to help poor families make it through the month without running out of food. The bill does not aid high income families or allow them into the program.

The OMB letter specifically claims that a provision to raise the earned income disregard from 18 percent to 20 percent of earnings expands benefits for "the highest income beneficiaries." In fact, this provision provides a very modest increase for all low income working families on the program, a group that was disproportionately affected by the 1981 changes and that is by and large quite poor. The survey USDA issued last month showed that working families on food stamps have average gross incomes of just $6,500 a year—for an average family of 3.7 persons. This is several thousand dollars below the poverty line for families of three or four persons. Even for households at the poverty line, this provision provides a benefit increase of just $5 a month, hardly an overgenerous windfall.

The OMB letter also mistakenly states that the work expenses of poor families have not risen—as a percentage of income—in recent years. A report issued by the Joint Committee on Taxation in April, however, shows that Federal tax burdens for families at the poverty line have more than doubled over the last 6 years as a percentage of income. This is one of the reasons this provision is needed.

Second, OMB argues that the bill increases the food stamp program's asset limit to a point higher than in most other public assistance programs.

In fact, $2,250 is the assets limit in SSI, a fact noted by the President's task force when it called on the administration and the Congress to raise the limit to $2,250 in food stamps as well. Food stamps has many households of four or more persons—and should not have lower assets limit for such households than SSI has for a household of two.

In recommending that the current food stamp assets limit be raised, the President's Task Force noted that the current limit had been set in 1971 and never adjusted since despite inflation. The task force also found that legitimately needy households—particularly the unemployed—were being kept out of the program because the current limits had been eroded by inflation and were now too low. The increase recommended by the task force—and reflected in H.R. 5151—offsets less than one-third of the impact of inflation since 1971.

Third, OMB alleges that the bill would eliminate retrospective accounting and monthly reporting. This, too, is not correct. In 1981, Congress mandated that all States utilize monthly reporting and retrospective budgeting systems in the hopes this would reduce errors in the program. Since 1981, results from four major federally funded demonstration projects on monthly reporting and retrospective budgeting have become available. The result of these projects—which HHS and USDA spend some millions of dollars to conduct—show that contrary to earlier hopes, these systems do not save money and do not reduce errors but but do increase paperwork and administrative costs and do adversely affect some needy recipients. Over 30 States have asked the Congress to make use of these systems a State option rather than a mandatory Federal requirement, so that States can use the systems where they would be cost-effective, but dispense with them where they would not be.

H.R. 5151 adopts the States' suggestion. It does not eliminate use of monthly reporting and retrospective budgeting. Rather, it makes use of these systems a State option. Since other provisions of the bill would increase penalties on States for errors over 5 percent, the combined effect would be to intensify pressure on States to reduce error rates while giving them more flexibility to find the most effective management mechanisms to get the error rates down.

Fourth, OMB argues that the food stamp program has grown and adequately serves those in need. It points out that benefit payments rose 43 percent from 1980 to 1983.

Regarding the increase in benefit costs, OMB fails to say that all of the increase was due to inflation and unemployment. Unemployment averaged 6.8 percent in 1980 but soared to 10.1 percent in 1983. USDA itself noted last year that each 1 percent in unemployment adds 1 million persons to the program. In addition, Bureau of Labor Statistics data show that food prices were 15 percent higher in 1983 than in 1980. This accounts for the increase from 1980 to 1983.

Moreover, since 1983, food stamp costs have fallen. Costs in 1984 are several hundred million below 1983 levels—and OMB and CBO project that costs will drop further in 1985.

Finally, a major CBO study last year found that when inflation and unemployment are taken into account, food stamp spending has actually been reduced. CBO estimates that the cuts resulting from the 1981 and 1982 budget reductions amount to $2 billion in fiscal year 1984 and to $2.1 billion in fiscal year 1985.

Fifth, OMB points out that the program rose from $550 million a year in fiscal 1970 to $8.7 billion in fiscal year 1980, due to a fivefold expansion in eligibility.

In fact, income limits were lowered in 1977 and 1980, and national eligibility limits were actually more restrictive in 1980 than in 1970. The "fivefold expansion in eligibility" simply never occurred. Program costs did grow significantly, but this was for other reasons:

Food stamps was not yet a national program in 1970. Over 1,300 counties had no program in 1970—they all had instituted a program by 1980. In addition, Puerto Rico was not in the program in 1970, but had a very large program by 1980, Puerto Rico was subsequently removed from the program in 1982.

Food prices more than doubled from 1970 to 1980.

Unemployment rose in 1980 and was well above 1970 levels.

AFDC households (which constitute 40 percent of the food stamp caseload) were poorer in 1980 than in 1970 and consequently qualified for higher food stamp benefits. Both HHS and the Congressional Research Service have reported that AFDC benefits, adjusted for inflation, fell nearly 30 percent from 1970 to 1980.

And finally, OMB claims that while food price inflation rose by only 15 percent (from 1980 to 1983), average food stamp benefits per person rose by 25 percent.

This is misleading. The fact is that no families had their benefits raised more than inflation. Nearly all households in the program actually had their benefits reduced to some degree by legislative actions taken in 1981 and 1982.

It is true that average household benefits went up faster than inflation—although OMB conveniently stops its comparison in 1983. By mid-1984, inflation had almost caught up with average food stamp benefits. But this was not because of any food stamp benefit increases—rather it was simply because food stamp households became much poorer from 1980 to 1983 and therefore qualified for larger benefits, on average. USDA's own food stamp surveys show that the income of food stamp households dropped significantly during this period, after adjusting for inflation. Just from 1980 to 1982, the proportion of food stamp households with incomes below half the poverty line rose from 49 to 59 percent. Part of this was due to budget cuts in other programs such as AFDC. These reductions lowered households' incomes and thereby pushed up their food stamp allotments. However, since every $10 lost in another program resulted in only a $3 increase in food stamps, these households still ended up poorer—and, in many cases, with less total resources for food. The increase in average food stamp benefits masks this fact of increased hardship.

In addition, the 1981 budget cuts eliminated from the food stamp program households with gross incomes over 130 percent of the poverty line. Since these households received smaller-than-average benefits, their removal from the program made the average benefit go up. This statistical change in the average benefit did not bring with it any actual increases in benefits for poorer households, however.

Mr. Chairman, this is a good bill. I ask my colleagues, on both sides of the aisle, to give it their overwhelming support.

Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5151, the Hunger Relief Act of 1984. I want to compliment the gentleman from California, the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Domestic Marketing, Consumer Relations, and Nutrition, Mr. PANETTA, for both introducing the bill and bringing it before the House in such a prompt and caring manner. I also want to thank Chairman DE LA GARZA and Mr. EMERSON, ranking Republican on the subcommittee.

This bill is not a giveaway, nor is it a waste of limited Federal dollars. It is merely a recognition of the fact of inflation.

I want to take a few moments to speak with my colleagues about a provision of this bill. Section 114 of this bill authorizes local agencies administering the Commodity Supplemental Food Program, at their discretion, to provide supplemental commodities to low-income elderly persons who may be eligible for such assistance. This provision is the culmination of efforts that have stretched over the past 4 years to provide nutritious food packages to senior citizens who are in need of assistance. The food assistance goes to senior citizens who are finding it difficult to obtain an adequate diet given their own economic condition, and the frustrations that they find with the existing structure of assistance programs. But even more importantly, this program, will provide a food package designed for the nutrition needs of senior citizens, with recognition for special dietary concerns, something no other feeding program does.

As part of the 1981 farm bill, the House Agriculture Committee was good enough to authorize the establishment of pilot sites for this program. The original sites were Detroit, MI, and Des Moines, IA. The list was later expanded to include New Orleans, LA.

These pilot sites have operated for 2 years now, and the response has been fantastic. Many participants who were interviewed about their experiences with the program, thought that it was among the best things that had ever happened to them. They found that it provided them with a better sense of self-sufficiency. While socialization is important for all of us, we all must remember that there are times when we all like to be in our own homes with a wholesome meal, especially on those days when weather and transportation make it most difficult for people to get to congregate meal sites, or to make the multiple trips necessary to get food stamps and then to get the food.

This program has operated at the lowest cost level of any Federal feeding program. The pilot sites are currently operating it at a little over $10 per person per month. There are over 12,000 people on the waiting list of the Detroit program. New Orleans has increased the size of its program dramatically in recent months.

Mr. Chairman, we are trying to help people who are probably unable to help themselves. Let me describe some of the people served by this program: five out of six people on the program are women; one-third of the participants are age 75 or older; 40 percent are on food stamps; 34 percent are on medicaid; 60 percent live alone; 60 percent are on Social Security; 18 percent are on both Social Security and SSI; 75 percent have a monthly income of less than $400; 55 percent suffer from high blood pressure; 66 percent have arthritis; 37 percent have heart disease; and 22 percent have diabetes.

Certainly this group is not one which can claim an easy life.

Section 114 in this bill addresses this problem in a compassionate, tested, and accepted way. The food items purchased using USDA's bulk buying power will help needy people in a way they accept.

The fiscal 1985 agricultural appropriations bill adopted by the House well over 1 month ago provides some funds which would allow for a modest expansion of the senior citizen program, although at the time of our action, all we could do was safeguard the continued availability of this program for Detroit, Des Moines, and New Orleans, so that no senior citizen who is being served on September 30 need to worry about the program being discontinued on October 1. USDA told us at our hearings that these three cities could continue to operate so long as their funding lasted, and we provided more funds for these programs to continue.

Mr. Chairman, I know that there is no comparable provision in the bill currently in the other body. I know that USDA officials are not supportive of this program because they flatly refuse to consider new programs, unless they are consolidations of existing programs. The fact is that the current mix of programs, for whatever reason, is not providing sufficient assistance for a critical portion of our needy population. These people cannot afford to wait for us to make up our minds about how to reinvent the wheel. They need food now. I do not want to be melodramatic about it, but in the experience of one of the pilot program operators, Focus: HOPE in Detroit, MI, when they call to let someone on the waiting list know that a space is available, they sometimes learn that the person died while waiting to hear.

I urge my colleagues to support this bill, and the ability of senior citizens to obtain nutritious food packages as part of the Commodity Supplemental Food Program.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Hunger Relief Act of 1984. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

In response to rising concern about hunger in America, President Reagan, the Subcommittee on Domestic Marketing, Consumer Relations, and Nutrition, and various organizations initiated studies on its extent. Each one of the reports reflect that the problem of hunger is real, and action needs to be taken. I commend the subcommittee for taking the data and recommendations from these reports and incorporating them into the Hunger Relief Act. Most of the provisions in the bill are either specific recommendations of, or address concerns raised by, the President's Task Force on Food Assistance.

The bill would care for the hungry by increasing accessibility to food benefits. At the same time, it would increase work incentives to encourage food stamp recipients to become participants in the economic recovery. It would continue the fight against fraud and abuse by increasing program accountability. It would help recipients use their benefits more efficiently by increasing nutrition education. The bill also addresses the unique difficulties Alaska has in administering the Food Stamp Program in its rural areas.

We have a moral obligation to help alleviate the problem of hunger and we have the responsibility to keep spending within budget constraints. The estimated cost of the bill is within spending targets established by the House-passed budget resolution for fiscal year 1985.

In my district, the State of Alaska, hunger in the remote areas is compounded by the fact that the current Food Stamp Program is not effectively helping the needy. Alaska has constantly struggled with the administration of the Food Stamp Program because unique geographical, cultural, and language and cost-of-living difference make it almost inoperable in the rural areas. The 9,040 food stamp recipients in rural Alaska are scattered throughout 200 remote villages contained in an area equivalent to the combined areas of California, Texas, New York, Maryland, and West Virginia. Most of these villages are accessible only by air or water. There are nearly 20 unrecorded languages as well as vast cultural differences between Eskimos, Indians, and Aleuts.

Because of these situations, the household definition, monthly reporting, and retrospective budgeting are difficult to apply in rural Alaska. The current definition of household assumes a nuclear family living together year round. However, the reality of life in most of the remote Alaska villages is communal living with families dispersing or migrating for seasonal hunting and fishing. Monthly reporting and retrospective budgeting requirements are difficult to adhere to due to uncertain mail service, transportation difficulties, and language differences.

Typically, we associate shelter costs in rural areas to be lower than those in urban areas. This is not the case in rural Alaska where housing is limited and utility costs are extremely high. Similarly, the cost of vehicles in rural Alaska are far higher than the cost in more accessible areas. The current cost ceiling on shelter and the inclusion of vehicles, snow machines, and boats—all of which are used primarily for subsistence activities—in resource determination, are extremely detrimental to rural Alaska food stamp households. This bill recognizes and addresses the incompatibility of Alaska's unique circumstances and current Food Stamp Program requirements through the inclusion of the Rural Alaska Nutritional Assistance Program in this bill.

The Rural Alaska Nutritional Assistance Program is designed to allow the State maximum flexibility in administering the program to rural Alaska food stamp recipients. Under the bill, the State of Alaska would develop a plan to administer the program tailoring program requirements and benefits to cultural, geographical, language, and cost-of-living differentials.

The bill is designed as a no-cost bill. Alaska would be provided from funds authorized for the Food Stamp Program a funding amount equal to the amount that would have been spent by the Department of Agriculture for operation of the Food Stamp Program in rural Alaska. The limited funding that the State will receive will insure efficient operation of the program without the need for excess regulation.

The bill states that the program meet "such reasonable requirements as the Secretary must, by regulation, prescribe for the purpose of assuring that assistance is provided to needy persons in the rural areas of the State." For the success of the program, it is intended that the current food stamp requirements cited previously the household definition, monthly reporting and retrospective budgeting procedures, the shelter cost ceiling, and what must be included in resource determination—not be required.

The Secretary shall approve or disapprove the State plan and oversee the accounting and the security of the program. In the event the Secretary disapproves the plan or the implementation of a plan, he can deny or withhold payments. Denial and withholding should be used as a last resort and only until the State complies. Denial should be used when there are major violations and withholding for lesser violations.

The flexibility afforded to the State of Alaska through this pilot project, will result in better service to Alaska's needy in rural Alaska.

Again, I commend the work of my colleagues on the subcommittee for their dedication to addressing the problem of hunger in America. The bill is a carefully drafted bipartisan compromise, one which we can all support.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, to conclude the debate this morning, I cannot express enough appreciation to the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. EMERSON], the ranking member, and the members of the subcommittee for the diligence, and the dedicated responsible and yet compassionate way in which they have addressed this issue.

I think that we bring to the House, as hopefully the House will agree, and as is the norm for our Committee on Agriculture, responsible legislation with as much bipartisan support as is possible and, yet, with respect for individual philosophy and individual concerns. We have worked diligently to bring this legislation to the floor.

As we proceed next week, I would hope that we will receive the support of the House.

I would like to make one point, Mr. Chairman, as we deal with hunger, malnutrition, with scarcity, with lack of nutrition for many of our citizens—it never has been the fault of the farmer. It is not because of any fault of the producers in the United States of America. The food has been there.

The problem has been unemployment, underemployment, perhaps transportation, and distribution. But never the fault of the farmer. The people of the United States have the best quality food, for the lowest amount of disposable income per family, of any people in the world. The major problem is low income for many people or underemployment. But any hunger that exists is not the fault of the farmer who, by and large, produces—unfortunately, more often than not—at a return that is below what it costs him to produce.

So we are addressing an issue that is not in any way the fault of the farmer. It is due to something that went wrong in some other area.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DE LA GARZA. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY].

Mr. FOLEY. I thank the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I just take this time to rise in strong support of this legislation and to compliment the chairman of the full committee, the chairman of the subcommittee, and the subcommittee leadership on the other side of the aisle in bringing this legislation to the floor.

I hope and expect that it will have overwhelming support from the membership.

● Mr. CHAPPIE. Mr. Chairman, I signed the supplemental views in the report accompanying H.R. 5151 for the reason, among others, that it expresses the hope that the costs of this bill can be reduced during its consideration on the floor and that refers to a commitment made by the chairman of the Subcommittee on Domestic Marketing, Consumer Relations and Nutrition that "* * * the spending levels set by the first concurrent budget resolution, yet to be adopted by the Congress, would not be exceeded by the cost of H.R. 5151."

With respect to the opportunities for cutting the costs of this bill, I am on record as supporting amendments offered in full committee by my colleagues, Mr. COLEMAN and Mr. EMERSON that in my opinion would have made this bill more acceptable to those of us in this body concerned about the size of the Federal Government deficits this Nation faces in fiscal years 1985 through 1987.

I commend my colleagues on the committee who expended considerable effort to reduce the costs of this bill from those estimated for the Food Stamp Program portions of the bill at the time of its introduction. It was substantially improved in committee, but there are further opportunities for improving on the costs of this bill that I urge my colleagues in the House to support when they are offered on the floor today.

Turning next to the commitment not to exceed the spending levels set by the first concurrent budget resolution this issue has caused me some concern because of what I perceive as some ambiguity as it appeared to me based upon my reading of House Report No. 98-645 (Part 1, pp. 29-30) accompanying House Concurrent Resolution 282, the first concurrent resolution on the budget—fiscal year 1985.

It is noted that on page 29 of such report (H. Rept. No. 98-645, Part 1) there is created what has been referred to by some as a "pay-as-you-go pool" to provide real increases in domestic spending in fiscal years 1985 through 1987:

Although overall spending limits are necessary to achieve steady deficit reduction, there are some high priority Federal responsibilities which will require increases above the 3.5 percent limit. The recommendation therefore, allows a real increase for certain low-income programs, such as nutrition, food stamps, health, training, higher education for needy students including historically black colleges, and elementary and secondary education programs for handicapped and disadvantaged students. This would add $2.85 billion over three years to the non-defense discretionary program category. This addition results in a net savings in non-defense discretionary programs of $4.60 billion over three years.

The recommendation assumes a pay-as-you-go amendment which includes financing the real increases for these programs through an offsetting revenue increase.

The total amounts available for non-defense discretionary programs under the recommendation will be available for the Appropriations Committee to allocate among the individual non-defense discretionary programs.

Meanwhile, the Food Stamp Act of 1977 and the Agriculture and Food Act of 1981 capped Food Stamp Program authorizations for a number of years and it is assumed that the language in the Budget Committee Report (H. Rept. No. 98-645, Part 1, page 30) listing the Food Stamp Program as one of the fully funded entitlements was inadvertent and in error.

I would urge my colleagues in the House to insure during the consideration of H.R. 5151 on the floor that the additional costs provided in the bill continue to come within the capped authorizations and be scored as discretionary spending and that the spending limitations for fiscal years 1985 through 1987 comply strictly with the first concurrent budget resolution for fiscal year 1985 adopted by the Congress.

Having referred to the Food Stamp Act of 1977, I should caution my colleagues in the House that in June of 1977 the report (H. Rept. No. 95-464) accompanying H.R. 7940 hailed that bill, that ultimately went to conference and became law, as the reform solution to the Food Stamp Program for the foreseeable future:

The new Administration gave very high priority to food stamp reform, and early in this session the Administration forwarded a proposed bill to the Congress. The Subcommitte on Domestic Marketing, Consumer Relations, and Nutrition promptly held hearings and reported an improved and strengthened bill to the full Committee. The full Committee has now completed action on the most comprehensive reform of the food stamp program since its inception as a pilot program in 1961.

A. REFORM OBJECTIVES

The Committee bill is a tightly inter-related package of provisions that accomplishes several major objectives:

1. To tighten program administration and reduce fraud and abuse.

2. To eliminate the non-needy from the program so that those who do not need food stamps do not get them.

3. To facilitate the participation of the needy so that those who do need stamps do get them.

4. To hold program costs close to current program levels.

5. To simplify administration.

6. To minimize the loss of benefits to current needy participants.

It is important to emphasize that legislation to accomplish those objectives in no way depends on subsequent welfare reform proposals. The food stamp program needs to be reformed, and it should be reformed regardless of the direction of welfare reform. The changes adopted by the Committee are needed to improve the effectiveness of this program and to correct current deficiencies.

The minority views in that report unfortunately correctly characterized and forecast that legislation as "deform" not "reform:"

The new "income stamp" program set forth in this bill takes a giant step backward from, food stamp reform. H.R. 7940 in fact deforms, not reforms, USDA's largest program which has been riddled with abuse, error, and fraud.

We contend that the minimum standards of true reform, should include an improved system of dignified food aid to poor people, a cost reduction for taxpayers, administrative simplification, restored program integrity and public confidence that benefits will go only to those recipients who are truly in need.

This bill unfortunately repeals all the major restraints of the existing Food Stamp Act, replaces the 1964 statute with a host of new administrative complexities, does little to change benefits to controversial recipients, substantially increases the public's burden of paying for it, reduces the amount of money that poor people will spend on food, and sharply cuts farm income.

I mention the foregoing because in 1977 the Congressional Budget Office [CBO] provided the following cost estimate (H. Rept. No. 95-464 p. 464) for the Food Stamp Act of 1977:

What really happened after the so-called reform Food Stamp Act of 1977 was enacted that eliminated the purchase requirement, and so forth, can be seen from the following table constructed from information provided by the U.S. Department of Agriculture on obligations since 1977:

Based upon my concern for the miscalculations by CBO on the cost of the major rewrite of food stamp legislation in 1977, I requested the ranking member of the Budget Committee to obtain certain information on the cost of H.R. 5151 compared with spending limitations of the House-passed budget resolution.

I insert this exchange of correspondence in the RECORD because I believe it is revealing about: First, the lack of budgetary limits on food stamp spending; and second, the fact that CBO acknowledges that the cost estimate for H.R. 5151 "are based on economic and technical assumptions that are uncertain":

COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET,
Washington, DC, May 14, 1984.

RUDOLPH G. PENNER,
Director, Congressional Budget Office.

DEAR RUDY: Congressman Gene Chappie has expressed concern over the food stamp authorization in H.R. 5151. Under the House passed budget resolution for FY 1985, certain discretionary accounts were subject to a "modified freeze" allowing 3.5% nominal growth in non-defense discretionary programs. Certain programs, however, were exempt from that freeze. On page 29 of the Report of H. Con. Res. 282, the food stamp program is listed as one of the low income programs exempted, and to which the Appropriations Committee would have the flexibility to add extra money. In toto, these exempted programs are not to receive more than $2.85 billion.

However, on page 30 of the report, the food stamp program is again listed as an entitlement program, exempt from the entitlement freeze, and assumed to be fully funded over the next three years.

Apparently, the food stamp provisions in H.R. 5151 would raise the authorization for the program approximately $900 million over the baseline levels for FY 1985-1987. I would like you to calculate the total authorization and outlay levels for the food stamp program under H.R. 5151, and the resulting annual growth in the program over FY 1984 estimated spending. In addition, I would like you to calculate what the spending totals would be for the food stamp program if the program were included in the 3.5% discretionary cap.

Furthermore, under the 1981 Omnibus Reconciliation Act, food stamp authorizations were capped. I would like to know if H.R. 5151 continues to cap spending, and if so, at what limits. If spending is capped, is H.R. 5151 scored as a discretionary program, and does it comply with the spending limitations of the House passed budget resolution? If the bill allows the food stamp program to technically become an entitlement program, is it permitted to spend more than the amount assumed in the budget resolution? Finally, I would like to know, in CBO's opinion, what would be the responsibility of the Appropriations Committee in funding this program under H.R. 5151.

Due to the expedited schedule for authorizations, H.R. 5151 is expected to be considered by the House shortly. I would therefore, appreciate a response as soon as possible.

Sincerely,

DELBERT L. LATTA.

CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE,
Washington, DC, May 16, 1984.

Hon. DELBERT L. LATTA,
Ranking Minority Member, Committee on the Budget, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: This is in response to your letter of May 14 concerning the food stamp authorization under H.R. 5151.

You asked about total authorization and outlay levels for the food stamp program under H.R. 5151 and the resulting annual growth in the program over fiscal year 1984 estimated spending. These estimates are shown below.

[By fiscal year, in millions of dollars]

	1984	1985	1986	1987
Baseline food stamp levels:
Estimated authorization	12,076	11,788	12,635	13,066
Estimated outlays	12,119	11,792	12,626	13,062
Estimated change from H.R. 5151:
Estimated authorization	0	306	458	228
Estimated outlays	0	305	457	227
Total assuming H.R. 5151:
Estimated authorization	12,076	12,094	13,093	13,294
Estimated outlays	12,119	12,097	13,083	13,289

Assuming H.R. 5151, the estimated annual rate of growth of outlays between fiscal year 1984 and fiscal year 1987 is 3.1 percent. It should be noted that given spending to date in fiscal year 1984, the current CBO estimate may understate total 1984 food stamp spending. In addition, the 1985 through 1987 estimates are based on economic and technical assumptions that are uncertain. Food price increases through March 1984 indicate a larger increase in food stamp levels for October 1984 than has been assumed in the baseline estimates.

You also asked us to calculate what spending totals would be for the food stamp program if the program grew at 3.5 percent per year from 1984 to 1987. These estimates are shown below.

[By fiscal year, in millions of dollars]

	1984	1985	1986	1987
Food stamp spending assuming a 3.5 percent growth rate from 1984 through 1987:
Authorization	12,076	12,499	12,936	13,389
Outlays	12,119	12,486	12,931	13,384

You asked about caps on food stamp authorizations in the 1981 Omnibus Reconciliation Act. The only authorization cap relating to food stamps in the 1981 Omnibus Reconciliation Act was a $825 million limit on nutrition assistance to Puerto Rico. The Omnibus Reconciliation Act of 1982, however, set authorization limits of $12,874, $13,145, and $13,933 million in fiscal years 1983, 1984, and 1985, respectively. H.R. 5151 does not alter the authorization limits for fiscal years 1984 and 1985. The food stamp program is currently not authorized beyond fiscal year 1985.

You asked how spending in H.R. 5151 compares with the spending limitations of the House passed budget resolution. Since the resolution does not set limits by individual programs or accounts, but rather addresses overall spending limits, we are unable to compare the resolution totals for food stamps alone to spending under H.R. 5151.

Finally, you asked about the scoring of H.R. 5151 and the responsibility of the Appropriations Committee in funding this program. Currently, food stamp spending is considered discretionary for scorekeeping purposes by the House and Senate Budget and Appropriations Committees. H.R. 5151 does not alter the discretionary nature of the spending. For this reason, CBO does not score food stamp spending until appropriations are made for the program.

Attached for your information is a copy of our cost estimate for H.R. 5151, as ordered reported by the Committee on Agriculture.

Sincerely,

RUDOLPH G. PENNER,
Director.

After the enactment of the "Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981", Public Law 97-35, the table above indicates that the cost of the Food Stamp Program stabilized (during the period of fiscal year 1981-84) while handling increased demands on the program during the recent recession.

Statistics now clearly indicate that a strong recovery is underway. Why must we now reverse and repeal the only effectiveness that has ever been introduced into the Food Stamp Program—the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981.

At a time when everyone in this body is wringing their hands about Federal deficits, why must we address yesterdays problems by adding to the deficit with new spending added to existing programs?

The Director of the Office of Management and Budget sees the need to keep spending under control, and as noted in the copy of his letter reprinted below, states unequivocally that he will recommend to the President that "he disapprove it", should it reach the President's desk. I would join Mr. Stockman in urging that the Gramm-Latta repealers be eliminated from this bill.

OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET,
Washington, DC, July 24, 1984.

DEAR REPUBLICAN MEMBER: When the Foods Stamp Amendments of 1984, H.R. 5151, come to the floor, you will have the opportunity to make a clearcut choice in favor of spending restraint.

The need to keep spending under control has never been clearer. Yet the Agriculture Committee's proposed Food Stamp add-ons would:

Repeal important reforms achieved in the 1981 Gramm-Latta reconciliation bill,

Expand Food Stamp spending by $1.1 billion over the next three years; and Direct benefit increases to the highest-income program beneficiaries.

Repeal of hard-won reforms: In 1981, the Congress finally responded to the pleas of its constituents to do something about the abuses plaguing the Food Stamp program. Through a variety of changes, such as insisting on using actual, rather than "projected" income to determine eligibility, the 1981 Reconciliation Act had the effect of restricting eligibility to those whose need was greatest.

Despite these changes, the 1981-1982 recession showed that the "safety net" character of the Food Stamp program remained intact. As needs rose, participation rose from 19.3 million to 21.6 million, and benefit payments rose by 43% between 1980 and 1983. In fact, while food price inflation rose by only 15% during that period, average Food Stamp benefits per person rose by 25%. By any reasonable measure, current Food Stamp rules are providing generous support to low-income families nationwide.

The Committee, however, proposes to ignore this successful history, and recommends a substantial retreat toward the status quo ante of 1980. The Committee bill would:

Eliminate retrospective accounting, going back to the pre-German-Latta system where benefit levels and eligibility determinations are based on the claimaint's prediction about what his next-month's income is likely to be;

Raising income disregards back to the pre-Gramm-Latta 20% level, expanding benefits for the highest-income beneficiaries with earnings.

Increase the asset limits to $2,250. Since these asset limits don't apply to the value of a home, personal belongings, or an automobile, it would mean that families with substantial cash in the bank could nevertheless qualify for substantial Food Stamp benefits.

We can't return to the abuses of the past: In all, the Committee's bill is an open invitation to return to the program abuses of the 1970's, when the Food Stamp program rose from $550 million a year in FY 1970 to $8.7 billion in FY 1980, due to a five-fold expansion in eligibility.

The impetus for the 1981 reforms came from constituents fed up with Food Stamp program abuses. Quite apart from the obvious fiscal threat, it would be totally irresponsible to surrender the 1981 reforms.

For this reason, were H.R. 5151 to reach the President's desk in its present form, I would recommend that he disapprove it.

I hope you will do everything in your power to amend this legislation to eliminate the Gramm-Latta repealers. If this effort fails, I urge you to join the Administration in opposing the bill on final passage.

Sincerely,

DAVID A. STOCKMAN.

H.R. 5151—FOOD STAMP ADD-ONS

1. The Administration strongly opposes enactment of H.R. 5151:

H.R. 5151 creates massive new spending at a time when both houses of Congress are working to bring the deficit under control. The bill would cost $311 million in FY 85 and $1.1 billion in FY 85-87 relative to current services.

The bill would reverse the 1981 Gramm-Latta Reconciliation Act reforms of Food Stamps which targeted assistance on the neediest households.

If the bill were to reach the President's desk, it could not be recommended for approval in its present form.

2. The bill repeals several 1981 reforms:

H.R. 5151 would eliminate the current requirement for Food Stamp monthly reporting and retrospective accounting.

Households with frequent income changes would no longer be required to report actual income but would instead make uncertain predictions of future income.

Monthly reporting in essence is already optional since USDA has permitted States to target the procedure on only 25% of the most error-prone caseload to assure its cost-effectiveness.

The bill would reverse the 1981 reform which reduced the earned income deducation from 20 to 18%.

Congress initially reduced the deduction because of evidence that work expenses represented only 15% of earned income. More recent information shows little change in this ratio.

3. Other provisions in H.R. 5151 reverse our 1981 efforts to target assistance more directly to a household's needs.

The bill provides for allotment increases over and above the current annual inflation adjustments. These unjustified add-ons would cost $485 million over three years.

The bill increases the Food Stamp program's asset limit to $2,250—higher than the limit in most other public assistance programs. For example, the current AFDC asset limit is $1,000. A recent GAO report urged that the asset tests of these two programs be made more comparable to simplify administration.

The current assets limits are not burdensom especially since a family's house, most of its cars and its personal belongings are exempt.

4. Current law already provides ample assistance to households in need:

Since 1980, Federal food program spending has increased by 38%—from $14 billion in 1980 to $19.4 billion in 1983.

This Administration has initiated the direct distribution of free USDA surplus commodities to needy housholds at a cost of over $1 billion a year.

There has been dramatic growth in the Food Stamp program since 1980. Food Stamp spending rose 43% between 1980 and 1983 while participation increased from 19.3 million to 21.6 million during that same time period.

Average Food Stamp benefits per person have increased by 25% since 1980 while food inflation has increased only 15%.●

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in strong support of H.R. 5151, the Hunger Relief Act of 1984. If passed, this legislation would bring long-overdue reform to the Food Stamp Program.

The proposed increase in the shelter allowance is particularly welcome. This figure has not been adjusted since 1975, although the cost of housing has soared during that time. As a result, two-thirds of the welfare recipients in New York State now pay more in rent than they receive in grants. Money that these needy families could have spent on food or clothing goes instead to their landlords.

H.R. 5151 would raise the shelter allowance from the present $125 a month to $155 a month. Over 338,000 households in New York City alone would benefit from this change.

Mr. Chairman, this bill also covers a segment of our population that is, unfortunately, growing—a group that is often overlooked when public-assistance legislation is drafted. I am speaking about the homeless, whose problems go beyond a meager shelter allowance or an insistent landlord. Each day is another ordeal for them, as they fight hunger, rejection, the weather, and perhaps their own delirium.

For the homeless, food stamps are critical. Their very survival may hinge on them. The homeless have heretofore been excluded from the program solely because they have no permanent address. The group most needing our support and compassion has, by their very definition, been barred from receiving our help. The homeless have thus been forced to rely on the efforts of voluntary, religious, and municipal agencies, fostering a dependency that further demeans and discourages them. They must eat what they're told, when they're told, and where they're told.

Think of the misery of the family that has fallen on hard times. The unemployed parents now have to line up their children to get fed, in a dreary processional of ragged, sullen, and sometimes surly people. Does this environment promote self-reliance or family togetherness, values which the Reagan administration pretends to champion?

The Hunger Relief Act, which the President typically opposes, would help reverse this alarming trend. If the homeless were able to obtain food aid directly and individually, without waiting for intermediaries to respond, they could devote more of their time and energy to finding a job and a permanent place of shelter. The bill provides food stamps precisely in this just manner, so long as applicants meet all the other eligibility requirements.

In the past, Mr. Chairman, the lack of a fixed address has in some States prevented the homeless from qualifying for the program. This regulation was based on the assumption that there was no way of getting the stamps into the right hands, and that fraud would be rampant. But social service and advocacy groups know better. For years, they have argued that shelters or churches could serve as distribution centers. I am happy that the distinguished members of the Agriculture Committee have seen the wisdom and integrity of this arrangement. I trust that the rest of the House will join in the wisdom of their judgment.

For the poor, food stamps are the first line—often the only line—of defense against hunger. Food stamps also represent the best and most comprehensive effort of the Federal Government to stave off malnutrition. Why should a child be denied these benefits merely because the parent happens to be homeless? Is that child, that family, any less needy than the poor persons lucky enough to have a roof over their heads? Of course not.

I therefore urge my colleagues to join me in enthusiastically voting for H.R. 5151, the Hunger Relief Act of 1984.

Thank you. ●

● Mr. SUNIA. Mr. Chairman, I am proud to join my fellow colleagues in the Pacific region in support of H.R. 5151, the Hunger Relief Act of 1984.

Provisions for the Food Stamp Program serve a worthy cause to the needy and low-income households, to the elderly and disabled, to recipients of Aid to Families with Dependent Children and SSI, with coupons redeemable for food. Food stamps supplement the food-purchasing power of these low-income households in order to ensure that they are able to afford a nutritionally adequate low-cost diet, as determined by the Agriculture Department's thrifty food plan.

This program would also permit the homeless to receive the benefits. Allowances are also made for those recipients who are employed or face high housing and utility costs, and increases the value of assets that food stamp recipients are allowed to hold. More so, this piece of legislation would require that States implement expanded job search requirements.

Poverty and hunger in the United States have increased. This brings the need and demand for emergency food assistance. It not only covers the traditionally considered poor, but also those who have just recently become unemployed. These individuals often face the problem of having little or no income but too many assets to be eligible for assistance from the government.

America and its territories promote freedom, equality, and opportunity, and I believe that no American should experience hunger in this land of plenty.●

● Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Chairman, the bill which we are considering today, H.R. 5151 attempts to balance the benefit needs of food stamp recipients with the desire to maintain a cost effective system. On the one hand, I think we all agree that assisting the truly needy is worthy and that we can be proud of the Food Stamp Program in this regard. However, on the other hand, I think most of us also agree that, to the greatest extent possible, we should guarantee that the funds allocated to this program are well monitored and responsibly managed.

The burden of recordkeeping, quality control, and general administration of the Food Stamp Program falls on the States. The States are required under the Food Stamp Act to have quality control systems to identify the types of errors being made and to quantify the losses attributable to each type. This has been required since fiscal 1981, with error rate results compiled and reported for 6-month periods. Payments to ineligible persons are monitored to provide information for devising corrective actions to reduce erroneously issued benefits. They also serve as the basis for establishing State or Federal financial liability for excessively erroneous payments.

Managers in private industry have long employed quality control systems to help assure that services meet certain standards. This systematic means to assist businesses, if applied to the Food Stamp Program, should help State and local administrators monitor and control the accuracy of payments to program clients. I know the State of Illinois is grateful for the quality control program. The Department of Agriculture's Food and Nutrition Service uses a corrective action process to encourage States to solve program problems. The States are required to make reviews to identify problems in State and local operations and to develop and implement corrective plans. This involves setting target dates and measuring changes in overissuances or payments to ineligible persons. Among the major problems have been certification errors in determining eligibility and benefits.

Holding States accountable for their Food Stamp Program deficiencies has made States put more emphasis on carrying out corrective actions. The prospect of losing some Federal funds has prompted some top level State and local officials to give increased attention to improving their programs. Perhaps even more of an incentive, according to a GAO report of May 30, 1984, has been the adverse publicity which accompanies any sanctions issued against States for high error rates.

H.R. 5151 increases the sanctions against States for error in determining and distributing benefit payments. Currently, States are sanctioned at 5 percent of their federally funded administrative costs for each percentage point their rate exceeds 9 percent for fiscal 1983, 7 percent for fiscal 1984, and 5 percent for fiscal 1985. This bill provides that sanctions would be based on total issuances rather than administrative costs, making States liable for the full value of overissued food stamp benefits beyond a 5-percent error threshhold. States have justifiably opposed this measure, since it could more than double the average financial penalty States would have to pay for errors after fiscal year 1985. Although I think this is a severe measure, it is a strong statement of congressional concern about quality control in the Food Stamp Program.

Nonetheless, if we are sincerely concerned about assurances that the benefits of this program reach the truly needy, the use of penalties will solve only part of the problem. What really needs to be addressed is the quality control mechanism. And, as the recent GAO report points out, each State has its own set of problems and corrective action plans must be designed to address the particular set of circumstances for each particular State. Therefore, the Federal regulations must allow a wide range of options in solving their overpayment problems.

I believe that provision in this bill which makes mandatory reporting and retrospective accounting optional is necessary in light of these stringent error rate requirements. Too frequently States are charged with not caring how they handle Federal money. And, the adverse publicity which accompanies even one finding of fraud in the food stamp program deepens this perception. Perhaps some States are sloppy with Federal funds; perhaps some of them don't have the necessary information and management systems to adequately monitor this program.

But most of the States have made great progress over the past 3 years. Illinois has improved its error rate by 40 percent and the agency-caused budgeting errors dropped 75 percent.

However, Illinois has indicated that monthly reporting and retrospective budgeting does not help quality control. Results from a demonstration project showed that payment error rates were about the same in both the conventional and monthly reporting groups, contrary to expectations. Unfortunately, the current law makes monthly reporting mandatory, even though in Illinois they found that it led to increased costs due to accompanying paperwork and it was less responsible to recipient needs.

If we are going to penalize the States for errors, we should allow them to choose the tools which will help them to bring down their error rates. This bill will permit States to determine whether or not monthly reporting and retrospective budgeting will decrease overissuances. Any attempt to remove this section of the legislation will just make it harder for States to provide the best service possible to food stamp recipients. Rather than increasing the regulations binding the administration of this program, the Federal Government must improve its quality control assistance efforts. States don't need more requirements, they need assistance with quality control reviews, access to better information processing equipment, fraud detection systems, and worker education.

During the Agriculture Committee markup of this bill, Members discussed this problem at length. I think there was a general concensus that the quality control system could be improved and that the error rate calculations have not been adequately defined. Therefore, the committee approved an amendment I offered to H.R. 5151, which requires a report from the Secretary by April 1, 1985, about the quality control system effectiveness and the methods used for calculating the error rates. I have received assurances from the chairman of the subcommittee, the author of this bill, that prior to reauthorization of the Food Stamp Program next year, we will gather information from the States, the Federal Government, and other involved parties as to the efficacy of the current quality control system. He has agreed to further debate about the error rate system, and I think that any actions taken next year will be based on the best information possible.

But, for now we need to pass H.R. 5151. This bill will increase the benefits by changing the formula for the cost of the thrifty food plan. It streamlines the eligibility process by making households with AFDC or SSI recipients automatically eligible. It raises the deductions for earned income as a work incentive. It repeals mandatory monthly reporting and retrospective accounting.

The Food Stamp Program operation is vital. The program has continued to provide food assistance to the Nation's needy since it was established by the

31-059 O-87-46 (Pt. 15)

Food Stamp Act in 1984. I think we have suffered some set backs in this program over the past few years, but this bill helps to overcome some of these deficiencies. I agree that there are some problems, especially in regards to sanctions against States, but I also think that these will be successfully addressed at another time.

This is a bipartisan effort; let's keep it intact.●

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5151, the Hunger Relief Act of 1984. This is a limited attempt by this body to respond to the alarming presence of poverty and hunger in the United States. This legislation seeks to address one of the cities in our midst, a city of hunger and desperation such as described by Gov. Mario Cuomo of New York in his depiction of our Nation as a "Tale of Two Cities."

H.R. 5151, most importantly, would increase benefits for food stamp recipients by basing maximum benefits in fiscal year 1985 on 100 percent of the Thrifty Food Program. Benefits would subsequently be based on 101 percent of the Thrifty Food Program in fiscal year 1986, returning to 100 percent of the Thrifty Food Program in fiscal year 1987. This benefit increase is a response to the cruel budget cuts contained in the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1982 which reduced food stamp benefits in fiscal year 1982 through fiscal year 1985 by holding benefits to 99 percent of the Agriculture Department's thrifty food plan.

This measure also expands eligibility to include the many homeless who meet other eligibility standards required to receive food stamps. Additionally, the Hunger Relief Act provides for automatic coverage for recipients of Aid to Families With Dependent Children and recipients of SSI.

Mr. Chairman, we need to pass this bill if our Government is to pass the moral test in terms of how it affects the young, the elderly, the handicapped, and the needy. Relief organizations in the District of Columbia continue to indicate to me that hunger is getting worse.

The Congress in reducing the Food Stamp Program made a mistake. More than 1 million beneficiaries lost their eligibility when we reduced the Food Stamp Program by 13 percent in the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1982.

The Food Stamp Program, as it is presently constituted, based on the inadequate Thrifty Food Program, barely provides subsistence or affected families. The Hunger Relief Act is a small beginning in the long walk we will have to take if we are to really have one Nation and not a continuing "Tale of Two Cities."

I urge my colleagues to pass H.R. 5151.●

● Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 5151, the Hunger Relief Act of 1984. The legislation has been reported to the floor with bipartisan support and I share the distinguished chairman's view that this bill is a responsive and responsible approach to addressing the problem of hunger in the United States.

Once again, the country is indebted to the leadership of Chairman DE LA GARZA, Subcommittee Chairman LEON PANETTA and the distinguished ranking minority member, BILL EMERSON, of Mr. PANETTA'S Subcommittee on Domestic Marketing, Consumer Relations and Nutrition.

On the national level, this legislation recognizes that the problem of hunger is a continuing one and the national Food Stamp Program must constantly be modified and tightened to meet changing national needs. The legislation before us takes steps to increase work incentives for food program participants, helps provide for adequate food program benefits and increases nutrition education efforts.

As Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico, I endorse this legislation.

I wish to point out, however, that Puerto Rico has a separate nutritional assistance block grant to meet our island's nutritional needs. Our island program was continued at the close of the first session of the 98th Congress under the terms of a fixed block grant which, unlike the provisions in the legislation before us, does not have a cost-of-living or inflationary increase to meet the higher costs of living and annually adjust our level block grant.

I believe this is a problem that the U.S. Congress should address at some future point. But, at the same time, I commend the gentlemen who once again have exercised their leadership and continuing diligence in reporting this responsible compromise to the House floor to help citizens of the U.S. mainland.

The less affluent in this country, and those who count on the Food Stamp Program as the most visible Federal presence in helping provide families adequate nourishment, once again have had their needs met by the provisions of H.R. 5151.

I urge its prompt and speedy passage.●

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

□ 1117

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. BROWN of California] having assumed the chair, Mr. TORRES, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that the Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5151) to alleviate hunger in the United States by strengthening Federal nutrition programs, had come to no resolution thereon.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just considered, H.R. 5151.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. LOEFFLER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. LOEFFLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for this 1 minute in order to ascertain the schedule for the remainder of the week and for next week.

I am happy to yield to the distinguished majority whip, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FOLEY], for whatever information he might be able to bring to us.

Mr. FOLEY. I thank the acting Republican leader for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, this concludes the business for today and for the week.

It will be my intention shortly to ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourn today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

At that time, the House will meet at noon and consider under suspension of the rules nine bills.

Prior to that there will be a special District Calendar, permission for which has already been granted.

The bills under suspension of the rules are:

H.R. 5946, Conservation Service Report Act of 1984; House Resolution 555, Senate of House disapproving the appointment of Ms. Burford as Chairman of NOAA; H.R. 6013, Small Business Act amendments; H.R. 5799, employment security for veterans in certain Civil Service positions; H.R. 5846, Crime Fine Enforcement Act of 1984; H.R. 5910, to amend title 18, United States Code, regarding contraband in prisons; H.R. 5872, Financial Bribery and Fraud Act of 1984; H.R. 5526, to amend title 18, United States Code, regarding escape from custody resulting from civil commitment; and H.R. 5919, Foreign Evidence Rules Amendment Act of 1984.

□ 1120

Any votes ordered on suspensions considered on Monday will be postponed until the last item of legislative business on Tuesday, July 31.

In addition, on Monday, July 30, the House will consider H.R. 3987, to improve the preservation and management of Federal records, an open rule, and 1 hour of general debate only will be completed on Monday. The rule has already been adopted.

On Tuesday, July 31, the House will meet at noon. No bills are currently listed on the Suspension Calendar but, as I said, votes that have been postponed from Monday will be taken at the end of the legislative day.

The House will consider H.R. 5983, Interior Appropriations Act, 1985; we will complete consideration of H.R. 5151, the bill on which we have had debate today; H.R. 5290, the Compassionate Pain Relief Act.

It was announced yesterday by the chairman of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct that he will bring up on Tuesday a privileged resolution in the matter of Representative HANSEN.

On Wednesday, August 1, the House will meet at 10 a.m. and consider the Labor-HHS appropriations for fiscal year 1985; the supplemental appropriations bill; and H.R. 3987, to improve the preservation and management of Federal records, completing consideration.

On Thursday and the balance of the week the House will meet at 10 a.m. and will consider H.R. 5399, the intelligence authorizations, a modified open rule with 1 hour of debate; H.R. 5921, the Transportation appropriations for fiscal year 1985; H.R. 5244, the Department of Energy civilian research authorizations for fiscal years 1985, 1986, and 1987, an open rule, with 1 hour of debate, the rules already having been adopted; H.R. 5602, the health professions and services amendments, an open rule with 1 hour of debate; and H.R. 5585, the Railroad Safety Act, subject to a rule being granted.

Mr. LOEFFLER. I wonder if the distinguished majority whip might give us some further enlightenment as to what point in the day on Tuesday the leadership believes the privileged resolution coming out of the Ethics Committee might be before the House.

Mr. FOLEY. I am not able to advise the gentleman on the precise time of day. The position of the leadership with respect to resolutions of this kind from the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct is that are privileged, and the chairman will be recognized at any time he seeks recognition for the purpose of bringing up this resolution.

The chairman made the statement that he would seek recognition on Tuesday, but I am not aware at what time during the day he may do so.

Mr. LOEFFLER. But from the standpoint of the schedule, there is no question that the privileged resolution will come before this body on Tuesday next?

Mr. FOLEY. Yes. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STOKES], made that announcement in the House yesterday.

Mr. LOEFFLER. I wonder if the distinguished majority whip might give us any idea if in fact we will have votes on Friday next, or if we might find ourselves in the same position that we find ourselves in on this Friday.

Mr. FOLEY. I am not sure what the intention will be regarding Friday. I think that if we complete the schedule by Thursday we will probably not meet on Friday next or we may have a session with a similar schedule as the session today. But it is a rather heavy schedule, and I think Members at this time should plan on a Friday session next week.

Mr. LOEFFLER. According to what the distinguished majority whip has brought to us today, it is then my understanding that on Tuesday, once we complete all legislative business, which means whatever we get through, the privileged resolution, the Interior appropriations bill, the Hunger Relief Act, the Compassionate Pain Relief Act, it will be at that time that we will then have the votes on whatever suspensions may require recorded votes which will roll over to Tuesday from Monday's debate; is that correct?

Mr. FOLEY. That is correct. And any suspensions that could possibly be scheduled for Tuesday.

Mr. LOEFFLER. And we would have votes at an earlier time on other legislative matters, such as the Interior appropriations bill, the Hunger Relief Act, the Compassionate Pain Relief Act?

Mr. FOLEY. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LOEFFLER. I thank the distinguished majority whip.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY, JULY 30, 1984

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at noon on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. TORRES]. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule be dispensed with on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

THE 1983 ANNUAL REPORTS ON ACTIVITIES OF DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES, AND OCCUPATIONAL SAFETY AND HEALTH REVIEW COMMISSION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of today, Friday, July 27, 1984.)

THE TEXTILE INDUSTRY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. CAMPBELL] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I took this time today, while the House is empty, just to read into the RECORD and to let the American people know something that has come to my attention that is extremely important.

One of the most important things that the American people can have is confidence in their Government. I represent an area of the country that manufactures textiles. In the textile industry there has been a loss of jobs for the last several years that has threatened to disrupt the entire industry. There has been an awful lot of discussion about what to do about it and what was the cause of it. Today it has come to my attention that in 1980 the Government of the United States, under the Carter-Mondale administration, entered into a secret agreement with the People's Republic of China on textiles. The result of that secret agreement, which was not a part of the public bilateral agreement, was that the amount of textiles coming into the United States from China tripled in the 3-year period. That displaced about 100,000 American workers from their jobs.

We had to find out about this agreement by using the Freedom of Information Act to force it from the State Department, and it was not until this week, an effort was started to find out about it, after we heard about it 7 or 8 months ago, that in fact the secret letter was given to us, the secret letter was sent to Mr. Roboz, who is the chairman and chief executive officer of Stanwood Corp. And I would like to read that letter for the American people so that they might know what has happened to one of the industries because of secret agreements of the Carter-Mondale administration with Communist China to encourage trade. This letter is to the Ambassador of the People's Republic of China and it is from the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative, Mr. H. Reiter Webb, Jr., who at that time was the chief negotiator for textile matters for the Carter-Mondale administration.

□ 1130

It is technical in terms in many instances, but we should remember before I read it that China is neither a party to nor is entitled to any of the general protections that exist under the general agreements on tariffs and trade of the multifiber agreement, thereunder, which governs textile trade in this country.

As I read this letter, it becomes very clear what that administration tried to do, and as I get to the end of it, they even say that they are going to hold them harmless if in any circumstances they have to take an action against China.

The letter reads:

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: As agreed during the discussions leading to a bilateral textile trade agreement between our two nations, I wish to clarify the views and intentions of my government as regards implementation of paragraph 8 (the consultative mechanism) of the agreement.

That is the area of the agreement that can be used to stop illegal or subsidized or extra goods from coming in the country that disrupt our marketplace. The letter goes on:

Our two governments recognize that textile trade between our two countries has only recently been reestablished and that the prospects of the trade and the current status of trade between our two countries should be taken into account.

Accordingly, consultations as envisioned under the consultative mechanism of this agreement shall not be requested without reference to factors and criteria as contained in Annex A of the GATT Multi-Fiber Arrangement (MFA). A written statement will be supplied promptly which will include data similar to that contemplated in paragraphs 1 and 2 of Annex A of the Multi-Fiber Arrangement.

Hence, unless there are unforeseen circumstances to the contrary, the Government of the United States of America would not envision requesting consultations with the Government of the People's Republic of China on a category not already subject to a specific limit before imports from China in the category of categories concerned have reached the levels already established by comparable, important, capable suppliers.

Those that were in treaty agreement with us:

By this it is meant that the Government of the United States would use the consultation clause sparingly and would not request the Government of the People's Republic of China to limit its exports or categories concerned without having full regard both to the equitable treatment of the Government of the People's Republic of China as compared with other such suppliers of like textile and apparel products and, as appropriate, to the Government of the People's Republic of China's position as a new entrant to the United States' market, with respect to products not already subject to specific limits. Further, the Government of the United States of America will give full consideration to the factors indicated above.

It is also recognized that the established public policy of the Government of the United States of America is to provide as much information and opportunity as practicable for the growth and development of trade in textiles to all its bilateral agreement suppliers, consistent equally with the United States need to avoid disruption of its domestic market or the threat thereof. The Government of the People's Republic of China, therefore, has the assurances of the Government of the United States of America that resort to these consultation procedures shall be on a fair and equitable basis vis-a-vis other bilateral agreement suppliers, taking into account the position of the People's Republic of China as recognized above.

If recourse to the provisions of paragraph 8(c) would result in actual injury to production and marketing of textile products from China and/or would have actual impact on goods which have been or are about to be shipped, the Government of the United States will undertake to alleviate the adverse effects.

Now, that is a secret letter that an agreement given to the Chinese outside of the normal, bilateral negotiation which was public, which in essence gives them all the protections that we would have with any other trading party, and also, in the very end, essentially agrees to hold them harmless, if, in fact, we had to take any action.

The result of that was this: The result was that we doubled the amount of square yard equivalent coming from the People's Republic of China in 18 months, and darn near broke part of the textile industry in this country. It was only in late 1982 that we really began to issue the calls and tried to break this agreement, even though at that time we were not sure it existed.

As a matter of fact, in 1980 and 1981, under the Carter-Mondale administration they issued only six calls against all of the products from the People's Republic of China dealing with textiles. Since 1981, we have at this date issued some 44 calls against China trying to stop what had already taken place. But what has happened is that during this period of time, over 2 billion square yard equivalent have been shipped to this country. That is a disruption in the marketplace of almost 200,000 American jobs, because you lose about 100,000 American jobs for every billion square yards of imports.

That is an interesting figure when we stop and realize that an administration of this Government went into a secret agreement that caused a disruption in our domestic industry and the people of this country did not know about it even though they were losing their jobs.

That is of great concern to me. It is of so much concern to me that I have been involved in all of the negotiations trying to slow down some of the shipments and get some order in the trade. Not to put up a protectionist barrier, but to put up a fair trade situation so that we can in fact deal in an orderly manner.

I believe that we have made some progress, but I believe the damage was done so badly that we might never recover because of the actions of that last administration. The fact is that in the agreement that they negotiated and publicized, they only covered 36.3 percent of what China was shipping at that time. We have renegotiated that agreement, and we are now covering under agreement 77.7 percent of their products, but that is not enough yet. We have issued calls that now allow us to cover even more. The fact is that they had allowed this to take place and the tremendous surge to come into our marketplace and even though this administration froze the shipments, and then tried to negotiate a new agreement, the damage was done and the ability to undo was limited.

The people of the United States need to know exactly how that damage took place. I should hope that there will not be other secret agreements that disrupt the marketplace of the United States of America. We have to trade with other countries; we should trade with other countries. We should have as open and free and fair a trade as possible, but how in the world can you trade with a controlled society that pays its people about 21 cents an hour; that is run by the Government; that is subsidized by the Government, and then have your own Government, your own Government give to that government special privileges to throw the American people out of work. How can you call that free or fair trade? It is absolutely unconscionable. I hope that somehow out on the campaign trail, that Mr. Mondale talks about jobs in America, because I think it is time that we address some of the things that took place.

I hope that if there are other secret agreements, that we are able to uncover them, and I hope that when we do uncover them, that we will be able to undo some of them if they are causing the steel workers or the textile workers or any other workers in America to be thrown out of their jobs, not by fair or free trade, but by secret agreements with controlled societies paying slave wages. I do not think it is anything America can stand for.

TRIBUTE TO JOSEPH D. KEENAN, INTERNATIONAL SECRETARY-TREASURER EMERITUS OF THE INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF ELECTRICAL WORKERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Joseph Daniel Keenan, whose death on July 22, was a tremendous loss to the labor movement, the city of Chicago, and all people of our country.

Joseph Keenan's career as a labor official spanned over 70 years, and our country has truly lost one of its finest leaders, whose life was devoted to the betterment of the lives of all working people.

The eldest of eight children, Joseph Keenan was born on Chicago's Near West Side on November 5, 1895. At age 12, he left elementary school, to support his family when his father was injured in a work-related accident. Shortly thereafter, he was invited to join the Ladies Straw & Felt Hat Workers Union of the American Federation of Labor, and in 1914 Joseph Keenan joined Electricians' Local 134 in Chicago. He was elected inspector of the local in 1923, and served as its recording secretary from 1929 to 1954.

In 1931, Joseph Keenan was appointed as plant electrical engineer for the Metropolitan Sanitary District of Greater Chicago, and through his outstanding union activities, he gained the attention of officials of the Chicago Federation of Labor, where he was elected recording and corresponding secretary in 1937.

With the outbreak of World War II, Mr. Keenan came to Washington, and served our country with distinction as the American Federation of Labor's representative on the National Defense Advisory Committee. He eventually became the labor vice chairman of the War Production Board, where he played a crucial role in reaching agreements that helped to stabilize industrial relations in the construction industry, and to halt strikes and work stoppages, while arbitration agreements were being reached.

At the end of World War II, Joseph Keenan went to Europe to help reestablish the industries devastated from the war. The Army made him a brigadier general, and from 1945 to 1947, he toured Europe as an adviser to General Lucius D. Clay, the American military commander in post-war Germany, in order to rebuild the trade unions there. In 1947, he served as President Truman's special coordinator between labor and industry in the American zone in Germany.

From 1951 to 1954, Mr. Keenan served as the first secretary of the building and construction trades department of the American Federation of Labor, and became the international secretary of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in 1954, a post he held until 1976. He was the first director of the League of Political Education, the forerunner of COPE of the AFL-CIO, and as a vice president of the AFL-CIO for nearly four decades, he worked closely with George Meany, helping him to merge the two rival trade groups in 1962.

Mr. Keenan was a strong force in the Democratic Party, and was close friend and adviser of Chicago mayors, Democratic Presidents, and Presidential candidates. He played a key role in President Truman's upset victory over Governor Dewey in 1948, and he served as labor's campaign liaison with Presidents Kennedy and Johnson, and Presidential candidates, Hubert Humphrey, Henry Jackson, and George McGovern.

In addition to his career in labor, Joseph Keenan was active in many civic, religious, and community activities. He was a supporter of the Loyola Retreat Center, and CARR, a national Catholic research center. In 1974, he received an honorary doctorate from Catholic University, and in recognition of his many services to his church and country, Pope Paul VI bestowed upon him the Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice Award.

Joseph Keenan was a strong supporter of civil rights, and received the Civil Rights Award from the Anti-Defamation League. President Truman awarded him the Medal of Freedom and the Medal of Merit, because of his dedicated service to our country. He was a highly respected member of the community, and a leader of outstanding abilities, dedicated to the highest standards. His devotion to human improvement and human compassion, and his efforts on behalf of working people, will long be remembered.

Mrs. Annunzio and I extend our deepest sympathy to his wife, Jeffie, and the other members of his family who survive him.●

INTERIOR-ENERGY SUBSTITUTE FOR INDIAN HEALTH CARE IMPROVEMENT ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, on May 15, 1984, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and the Committee on Energy and Commerce favorably reported the bill, H.R. 4567, reauthorizing and amending the Indian Health Care Improvement Act. The Interior Committee reported the bill with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. The Energy Committee reported the bill with sundry amendments. As reported, the two committee versions were substantially different and generated considerable controversy.

In the interest of facilitating an early passage of this most important legislation, the two committees, after long negotiations, have arrived at a compromise substitute bill which incorporates the agreements resolving these differences. While I am not totally satisfied with all the provisions of this new substitute, I believe it is still very good legislation which will result in significant improvement in the health status of our Indian citizens. It is my intention to strongly support this new bill on the floor of the House through conference to enactment.

I have written to Chairman PEPPER of the Rules Committee requesting an early hearing on a rule for this bill which would make the new bill original text for purpose of consideration and amendment in the House. I hope that we can schedule this bill, which authorizes appropriations for fiscal year 1985, for early action in the House. At a later time, I will submit a statement more fully explaining the background and provisions of this compromise bill.

I am introducing this bill on behalf of Congressman WAXMAN, chairman of the Energy Subcommittee on Health and the Environment and on behalf of several of the original cosponsors of H.R. 4567. I would like to take this opportunity to commend Mr. WAXMAN and his subcommittee staff for their work on this legislation and the cooperation my committee has received in working out this compromise.

I would urge all members to support this new legislation.●

CONRAIL SALE RAISES QUESTIONS

(Mr. EDGAR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, along with 17 of our colleagues, I sent a letter yesterday to Chairman JIM FLORIO of the Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Transportation, Commerce, and Tourism, requesting a delay of at least 1 year in final congressional action on the sale of Conrail.

Conrail has become a tremendous success story since its sale was first proposed by Transportation Secretary Lewis 3 years ago. The railroad is expected to report profits of half a billion dollars this year. Yet the Department of Transportation is hurrying to sell the railroad. Announcement of a successful bid, originally scheduled for this fall, may occur as early as next week. Haste seems even less necessary in light of reports that an outside evaluation has found that Conrail's worth is approximately $800 million more than the current $1.2 billion asking price. Why, then, the rush to sell? Along with other Members, I believe that more time is needed before the sale to allow Congress, the States, and the public affected by the sale an opportunity to thoroughly examine the economic and public interest issues at stake.

Specifically, in yesterday's letter we called for increased information about:

The intentions of the current bidders toward future rail service to the Northeast-Midwest region;

The fate of service contracts currently in force;

The sale's effect on transportation competition in the region; and

The repair of "orphan bridges" and other neglected maintenance in the Conrail system.

We are not necessarily hostile to the sale of Conrail or to the efforts of the Department of Transportation. However, we do feel strongly that sale of Conrail, in which the Federal Government has invested so much, should not take place precipitously.

Mr. Speaker, at this point, I would like to enter into the RECORD the letter to Mr. FLORIO and a letter regarding the sale sent to Transportation Secretary Dole by Pennsylvania Gov. Dick Thornburgh. After examining these documents, I urge my colleagues to contact Chairman FLORIO to express their concern about this issue and join the call for reasoned, careful consideration of the Conrail sale. The letters follow:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, July 25, 1984.

Hon. JAMES J. FLORIO,
Chairman, House Energy and Commerce, Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation, and Tourism, Rayburn House Office Building.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is to inform you of the deep concern which we feel about the process which is now being followed by the U.S. Department of Transportation to sell the Consolidated Rail Corporation (Conrail). A number of questions have been raised about the sale procedure, and the public interest stakes are extremely high.

In this atmosphere we believe it is vitally important that Congress, the states, and the public affected by the proposed sale of Conrail be given an adequate opportunity to examine the proposed sale. Since your subcommittee will have primary legislative responsibility for examining the sale, we ask your support for a moratorium of at least one year on any final sale of Conrail. This period of time should afford us an opportunity to thoroughly examine the economic and public interest issues at stake in the Conrail sale.

The regional economy of the fifteen states currently served by Conrail's 14,200 track miles is vitally dependent on adequate rail transportation service. The future health of the economy of the Northeast-Midwest region is precarious. Our region is currently recovering from Depression-era levels of unemployment. The regional economy needs time to heal and recover, yet a change of Conrail ownership and service could require major economic adjustments and risk serious curtailment of rail service in the region.

The legislative calendar of the current session of Congress is too crowded with other important matters to allow careful, rational consideration of the issues raised by the Conrail sale before the November election. By deciding, at this point, that we will take at least a year to examine the sale, we give ourselves time to address the following points:

1. What are the intentions of the current bidders to purchase Conrail? What are the plans of these private sector corporations for future rail service for the Northeast-Midwest region? Despite the federal investment of approximately $7 billion to preserve regional rail service, we have no assurance that this service will be preserved following the sale of the railroad.

2. What will be the fate of service contracts in force today on Conrail lines? Will they be cancelled? Will rates increase? The shippers in our region need answers to these questions.

3. Will service patterns be the same after the sale? The Department of Transportation has announced that service patterns are one of the criteria being examined in their review of bids, but we do not know the weight given to this criterion which is the most vital to the future economic health of our region.

4. Are trackage rights of other carriers being protected? Will the sale foster transportation competition in the region or hamper competition? Again, these questions are vital to the future economic health of the Northeast and Midwest.

5. Will the prospective purchasers assume all of Conrail's contractual obligations?

6. What about the "orphan bridges" and other deferred and neglected infrastructure maintenance along the Conrail system? The federal government has made massive investments to improve this infrastructure already. Will these improvements be maintained and continued by a new owner or neglected as they have been in the past by previous private sector owners of the railroad?

The key issue which we must examine is whether the public interest and public investment in preserving rail service and economic progress in the Northeast-Midwest region will be enhanced or negated by the sale of Conrail to a private sector owner. We must determine whether preservation of economic progress in the region is the goal of the sale or merely subordinate to the amount of money being offered for the railroad or some other consideration. The process being followed by the Department of Transportation has effectively prevented Congress and the public from examining these issues related to the sale of Conrail thus far. We must take the initiative. We must clearly state our intention to examine these issues thoroughly in order to prevent a hasty and destructive auctioning off of the railroad.

Conrail management has performed admirably in recent years in making the government-owned system both profitable and valuable in providing a vital service to the regional economy. Businesses in our region can now depend on rail service, but a sale now is certain to bring uncertainty and risk the economic recovery of our region. We ask that any final decision on the sale be delayed in order to ensure careful examination of all the issues that have been raised.

Sincerely,

Jim Oberstar, Bob Edgar, Thomas M. Foglietta, Bob Borski, William J. Coyne, Richard Ottinger, Parren J. Mitchell, William D. Ford, Berkley Bedell, Louis Stokes, Jack Kemp, Frank Horton, James J. Howard, William H. Gray III, Bruce A. Morrison, Austin Murphey, Jim Moody, Don J. Pease.

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Harrisburg, July 16, 1984.

Hon. ELIZABETH HANFORD DOLE,
Secretary of Transportation, U.S. Department of Transportation, Washington, DC.

DEAR SECRETARY DOLE: I appreciate your efforts to keep me informed of your plans concerning the sale of Conrail, and wish to take this opportunity to convey some views which I regard as critical if Conrail is to be returned to the private sector at this time.

As you know, Conrail is vital to the economic well-being of Pennsylvania and the whole Northeastern region which it serves. Conrail is the key element in a revitalized Northeastern transportation system. Through its investment of millions of dollars in industrial development and equipment purchases and payment of local taxes, Conrail is also stimulating economic growth throughout the Northeast. Last year alone in Pennsylvania, Conrail accounted for nearly two-thirds of all Class I railroad mileage in the state and was responsible for:

Employment of over 15,000 workers including 4,500 workers at its corporate headquarters in Philadelphia.

Plant investment of nearly $1 billion as part of a major industrial development program which helped produce 34 new industries.

The purchase of $133 million worth of goods and services.

Track rehabilitation expenditures of nearly $67 million.

Payment of over $3.6 million in taxes to local governments.

Shipping for export over two million tons of coal through the Pier 124 complex in Philadelphia; this facility was recently expanded and modernized through an innovative partnership involving the Commonwealth and Conrail.

These significant contributions represent a great accomplishment by Conrail's management and workers in turning this once bankrupt railroad into a highly profitable venture.

While I indeed support the public interest criteria to guide any sale of Conrail which you set forth in your letter of April 20, 1984, I believe that Conrail's performance in meeting our economic and transportation needs must be the benchmark against which all private sector proposals are measured. Private bids should be evaluated on the basis of their potential to meet or exceed the performance of Conrail in Pennsylvania and the Northeast.

Conrail has pared its system and plant and workforce and has used the provisions of rail deregulation to maximum advantage in becoming flexible to changing market conditions, which has led to its current profitability. A decade of railroad reorganization has at last brought the Northeast a strong rail system on which business can depend. Pennsylvanians do not want to see this strength lost through a sale.

We are adamantly opposed to any sale of the federal interest in Conrail that could jeopardize the rail freight services and economic development initiatives which Conrail now provides to Pennsylvania and the entire Northeast along with the jobs which result from these efforts.

Accordingly, I urge your consideration of the following principles in your deliberations:

If Conrail is to be placed in the private sector, it must result in a strong railroad which will continue to enhance economic development and preserve jobs in the Northeast. This can be accomplished only if any buyer preserves service to the states and shippers as now provided by Conrail, and continues to promote vigorously industrial development within the region as Conrail is now doing.

The Federal Railroad Administration should not consider any sale other than one that maintains Conrail as a single entity. This is needed to preserve the existing Conrail mainline system and protect the public investment in its properties and rebuilt infrastructure which constitutes an important portion of the national transportation system. Railroads and shippers in all regions of the nation would be adversely affected by actions to dismember the Conrail system or defer its maintenance.

It would be far better for Conrail to remain under current management than to initiate a premature sale that would not serve Pennsylvania and the Northeast as well as the existing system or allow adequate time to fully assess the consequences.

It would be troubling indeed if a sale of Conrail at this time merely resulted in the turning of a quick profit by a purchaser selling the newly acquired Conrail properties rather than maintaining a strong rail carrier in the Northeast.

I am particularly concerned about the recommendation by CSX, one of the current bidders, that you permit the carving up of Conrail among various other railroads. This idea clearly runs counter to our fundamental need to preserve a strong carrier in the Northeast.

I urge you to evaluate the various offers based on the principles I have set forth regarding freight service, economic development and jobs. Moreover, there should be a clear intent on the part of the bidder to maintain and utilize the existing infrastructure, including the coal shipping facility at Pier 124, which is so vital to our economic interest.

Your efforts to involve the states in this process are highly commendable and greatly appreciated. As Governor of the state that could be most affected by the outcome of the deliberations on the sale of Conrail, I hope that we can continue to be heard as this process unfolds.

Sincerely,

DICK THORNBURGH,
Governor.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

Mr. NEAL (at the request of Mr. WRIGHT), for July 26 and 27, on account of illness.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

(The following Member (at the request of Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois) to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous material:)

Mr. CAMPBELL, for 60 minutes, today.

(The following Members at the request of Mr. FOLEY) to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material:)

Mr. ANNUNZIO, for 5 minutes, today.
Mr. GONZALEZ, for 60 minutes, today.
Mr. UDALL, for 5 minutes, today.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to revise and extend remarks was granted to:

Mr. TRAXLER, immediately following the remarks of Mr. JEFFORDS, today in the Committee of the Whole, on H.R. 5151.

(The following Members (at the request of Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois) and to including extraneous matter:)

Mr. FRENZEL.

(The following Members (at the request of Mr. FOLEY) and to include extraneous matter:)

Mr. WHEAT.
Mr. MRAZEK.
Mr. LEVINE of California.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 40 minutes a.m.), the House adjourned until Monday, July 30, 1984, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

3801. A letter from the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense (Comptroller, Administration), transmitting notification that the Department of the Air Force intends to exclude the "Examination of Records by Comptroller General" clause from contracts with the Omani government, pursuant to 10 U.S.C. 2313(c); to the Committee on Armed Services.

3802. A letter from the Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency, transmitting a report on price and availability estimates provided to foreign countries, and requests received for Letters of Offer for the quarter ending June 30, 1984, pursuant to AECA, section 28 (93 Stat. 708; 95 Stat. 1520; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

3803. A letter from the Chairman, Federal Election Commission, transmitting a copy of proposed regulations governing access to Public Disclosure Division documents, pursuant to Public Law 92-225, section 311(d) (93 Stat. 1354, 1362); to the Committee on House Administration.

3804. A letter from the U.S. Trade Representative, transmitting a report on the impact of U.S. implementation of the international Government Procurement Code on labor surplus areas, pursuant to 19 U.S.C. 2516(b), E.O. 12260, section 1-201; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3805. A letter from the Secretary of Energy, transmitting notification of a delay in submitting a final Mission Plan relating to the disposal of radioactive waste, pursuant to Public Law 97-425, section 301(b)(3); jointly, to the Committees on Energy and Commerce and Interior and Insular Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. MITCHELL: Committee on Small Business. H.R. 6013. A bill to amend the Small Business Act; with amendments (Rept. No. 98-914). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House in the State of the Union.

Mr. ALBOSTA: Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. H.R. 5799. A bill to amend title 5, United States Code, to establish certain requirements for the procurement by contract of certain services that are reserved for performance by preference eligibles in the competitive service; with amendments (Rept. No. 98-915). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House in the State of the Union.

Mr. WHITTEN: Committee on Appropriations. H.R. 6040. A bill making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 98-916). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House in the State of the Union.

SUBSEQUENT ACTION ON A BILL INITIALLY REFERRED UNDER TIME LIMITATION

Under clause 5 of rule X, the following action was taken by the Speaker:

Consideration of H.R. 5640 by the Committee on Public Works and Transportation extended for an additional period ending not later than July 31, 1984.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 5 of rule X and clause 4 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. UDALL (for himself, Mr. WAXMAN, Mr. MCNULTY, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. LUJAN, Mr. BEREUTER, Mr. YOUNG of Alaska, Mr. KILDEE, Mr. VENTO, and Mr. HUNTER):

H.R. 6039. A bill to reauthorize and amend the Indian Health Care Improvement Act, and for other purposes; jointly, to the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs and Energy and Commerce.

By Mr. RAHALL:

H.J. Res. 630. Joint resolution to designate the week beginning February 3, 1985, as "National School Guidance and Counseling Week"; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

ADDITIONAL SPONSORS

Under clause 4 of rule XXII, sponsors were added to public bills and resolutions as follows:

H.R. 4447: Mr. FORD of Tennessee and Mr. DASCHLE.
H.R. 4571: Mr. GREGG.
H.R. 4832: Mr. DYMALLY and Mr. PENNY.
H.R. 5140: Mrs. BOXER.
H.R. 5875: Mr. BATES.

H.R. 5893: Mr. FRENZEL, Mr. BEDELL, Mr. DOWDY of Mississippi, Ms. KAPTUR, Mr. MARTINEZ, and Mr. BERMAN.

H.J. Res. 580: Mr. FUQUA and Mr. CROCKETT.

H.J. Res. 589: Mr. CHANDLER, Mr. ECKART, Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. WAXMAN, Mr. ALBOSTA, Mr. SYNAR, Mr. WISE, Mr. WYLIE, Mr. SKEEN, Mr. O'BRIEN, Mr. SMITH of Iowa, Mr. CLAY, and Mr. MCDADE.

H. Con. Res. 325: Mr. KEMP, Mr. LEWIS of California, Mr. HANSEN of Utah, Mr. WHITEHURST, Mr. LAGOMARSINO, and Mr. BLILEY.

H. Res. 555: Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut, Mr. SYNAR, Mr. SMITH of Florida, Mr. LELAND, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. BRYANT, Mr. DOWNEY of New York, Mr. PANETTA, Mr. RODINO, Mr. HOWARD, Mr. TOWNS, Mr. CLARKE, Mr. FOGLIETTA, Mrs. JOHNSON, Mr. TRAXLER, Mr. LANTOS, Mr. ALBOSTA, Mr. BOSCO, Mr. CONYERS, Mr. HAWKINS, Mr. ORTIZ, Mrs. SCHROEDER, Mr. LEVINE of California, Mr. CARPER, Mr. PEPPER, Mr. BARNES, Mr. LAFALCE, Mr. MINETA, Mr. FUQUA, Mr. WEISS, Mr. WHEAT, Mr. ACKERMAN, Mr. AKAKA, Mr. BATES, Mr. BONIOR of Michigan, Mr. BEILENSON, Mr. MCHUGH, Mr. MARKEY, Mr. MATSUI, Mr. MAVROULES, Mr. OTTINGER, Mr. RATCHFORD, and Mr. WEAVER.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

400. By the SPEAKER: Petition of the National Association of State and Territorial Apprenticeship Directors, Loudonville, NY, relative to various resolutions adopted by the Eastern Seaboard Apprenticeship Conference delegates at their 40th annual convention in May; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

401. Also, petition of the National Association of State and Territorial Apprenticeship Directors, Loudonville, NY, relative to a resolution adopted by the 1984 Eastern Seaboard Apprenticeship Conference on Federal taxes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

FUNDING FOR THE B-1 BOMBER

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 27, 1984

● Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, the Baltimore Sun recently carried an editorial by Jeffrey Record, an expert on military reform issues, which made a compelling case for funding of the B-1 bomber.

In his article, Mr. Record explains clearly why production of the B-1 is needed to replace our obsolescent B-52 bombers as a strategic weapon as well as the role the B-1 would play in protecting U.S. interests in the Persian Gulf and other areas of the world.

I commend this insightful and informative article to my colleagues:

THE CASE FOR THE B-1

(By Jeffrey Record)

WASHINGTON.—Sometime next September, the first of 100 copies of the controversial B-1 bomber will roll off an assembly line in California. Cancelled by President Carter in 1977 but revived by the Reagan administration in 1981, the B-1 continues to draw fire from critics on the grounds that the bomber cannot carry out its principal mission—namely, penetrate the Soviet Union's heavily defended airspace and reach its targets in the middle of a nuclear war. Opponents of the plane have denounced it as a costly ($200 million apiece) white elephant and condemned it as poor alternative to the visionary follow-on "Stealth" bomber, an aircraft to be fabricated from revolutionary new materials which are supposed to render it invisible to Soviet radar.

The question of whether the B-1 can carry out its primary mission cannot be answered conclusively short of the definitive test of war. But there is as yet no compelling evidence that it can't. The effectiveness of Soviet air defenses has been exaggerated. Moreover, a number of features of the B-1, including its ability to fly very low at supersonic speeds, its modern electronic jamming and deception gear and its tiny radar cross section (about 1 percent that of the aging B-52), make it an extremely elusive target. On at least two occasions during the past decade, Korean commercial airliners possessing none of these attributes managed to wander around Soviet airspace for hours before finally being found and shot down.

Finally, the "Stealth" bomber, which is still on the drawing board, is neither a timely nor a legitimate alternative to the B-1. The "Stealth" is plagued by many, as yet unresolved, technological problems which, even if solved, could delay its introduction until long after the last B-52 died of old age—thus leaving the United States for a time without any bomber force at all.

The real case for the B-1, however, lies in the improbability that the plane, any more than its predecessor, the B-52, will ever be used in nuclear anger against the Soviet Union. The nuclear stalemate that has deterred war between the superpowers for the past quarter of a century is likely to persist. In all likelihood, there will be no need to employ the B-1 in its primary mission.

To put it another way, given the improbability of a nuclear war with the Soviet Union and the persistence of non-nuclear conflicts that have engaged, and threaten in the future to engage, the United States, the B-1's potential non-nuclear applications ought to command as much attention in weighing the real value of the plane as its claimed strategic attributes. Unfortunately, the debate over the B-1 has since its inception been based by supporters and critics alike largely on strategic criteria—this despite the fact that since the dawn of the nuclear age the United States has been involved exclusively in non-nuclear wars against opponents other than the Soviet Union. These wars, it should be noted, have employed so-called strategic bombers, from B-29s in Korea to B-52s in Vietnam, for non-nuclear missions.

Indeed, given America's myriad and far-flung security interests, it would be difficult to make a case for any long-range bomber costing $200 million that could not be effectively used in wars other than the single and highly improbable nuclear conflict the plane might be designed to deter. (A major argument against the "Stealth" is its comparative worthlessness in non-nuclear combat).

Fortunately, those who designed the B-1 designed an aircraft that could prove very useful in any number of conventional conflicts, especially conflicts in such difficult to reach places as the Persian Gulf and elsewhere in the Third World where the United States does not enjoy, as it does in Europe and Korea, secure military access in peacetime. For example, the unrefuelled range of the B-1, which is substantially greater than that of the B-52, permits it to strike targets in the Persian Gulf directly from the United States, thereby eliminating dependence on bases en route or in the area of hostilities.

No less impressive is what the B-1 can carry in the way of non-nuclear munitions; although the plane is smaller than the B-52, it can carry up to 128 500-pound conventional gravity bombs, compared to only 51 for the B-52. This means that relatively few B-1s would be needed to deliver devastating attacks on such targets as air bases, supply column bottlenecks and even exposed formations of tanks and mechanized infantry.

Additionally, the B-1's speed, again greater than that of the B-52, permits rapid responses to distant and unexpected violent crises. Although no substitute for carrier-based fighter bombers, the B-1, with its far longer range independence of aircraft carriers that might or might not be in the right place at the right time, is an ideal complement to a Rapid Deployment Force whose ability to get to the disputed ground in the Gulf first and with the most has yet to be demonstrated.

The range, payload and speed of the B-1 make it no less ideal for other non-strategic missions, such as maritime surveillance and fleet air defense. Capable of in-flight refueling and of carrying air-to-air and air-to-surface missiles, B-1s on maritime missions could provide U.S. naval forces additional reconnaissance and striking power that might be decisive in a violent show-down with the growing Soviet fleet.

All of this raises the question of whether 100 B-1s will be enough to provide adequate nuclear deterrence while at the same time fully exploiting the bomber's enormous non-strategic potential. It is worth noting that the Air Force originally sought to buy 244 of the bombers—and that the cost per plane beyond those now slated for purchase is expected to decline to less than $100 million.

To continue to treat the B-1 solely or even primarily as a means of deterring nuclear war is to focus on preventing the improbable at the expense of preparing for the likely.

WORLD MONEY SYSTEM

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 27, 1984

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, in response to one of the Wall Street Journal's typical editorials urging a return to a fixed exchange world money system, Mr. Gottfried Haberler of the American Enterprise Institute has written an interesting, and compelling rebuttal which was published in the Journal on July 25.

The Haberler letter, written with unusual clarity and simplicity, is self-explanatory. It puts the problem into the perspective of recent economic history, pointing out that in the Depression of the 1930's it was the rigidity of a fixed standard—gold—that caused the catastrophic contraction of world trade.

The net, net, net of the Haberler thesis is there is no substitute for fiscal discipline if the United States wishes a steady recovery, a stable dollar, and a low rate of inflation.

Quick fixes and magic wands work well for editorialists but not in the real economic world.

The article follows:

FLOATING RATES BUOY THE WORLD MONEY SYSTEM

I agree with you (editorial "Fix What Broke," July 11) that "the ideal international monetary arrangement would be one-money world" and that "a world money obviously remains visionary." I also agree that the Bretton Woods system "helped to bring about a generation of economic progress and order the world had seen seldom before." But the reason for its success was that it provided for orderly changes of exchange rates of which there were many before the system collapsed in the early 1970s.

I also agree that the Bretton Woods system was practically a dollar standard and that it got into trouble when inflation raised its ugly head in the U.S. That happened in the middle 1960s, when the Johnson administration financed the escalating war in Vietnam and the equally expensive Great Society programs by bank credit instead of by raising taxes. The crucial fact was that some countries, primarily West Germany, Japan and Switzerland, refused to accept the inflation that a fixed exchange rate with the dollar would have imposed on them. Thus, the dollar depreciated sharply vis-a-vis the currencies of the three countries. This is highlighted by the fact that even after its recent sharp rise the dollar is still well below what it was in 1970.

It is not true that floating caused world inflation. U.S. and world inflation forced floating on reluctant policymakers.

I agree that "the foreign exchange markets, threatening the collapse of the dollar, forced the Carter administration to reverse its policies with the appointment of Paul Volcker as Fed chairman." But I would add that this proves that floating has a strong disciplinary effect. Under floating a decline of the currency in the foreign exchange market is a strong inducement to tighten up—just as strong as, or perhaps stronger than, declining reserves under fixed exchanges.

Contrary to what you suggest, in the 1930s the trouble was not floating. In that deflationary period, it was the rigidity of the gold standard that caused the catastrophic contraction of world trade. The terrific deflation, in turn, was the consequence of horrendous policy mistakes, acts of omission and commission, on the part of the Fed.

Reflect what would happen under fixed exchanges in a situation like the present one, characterized by high interest rates and vigorous expansion in the U.S. which attract large capital flows from other parts of the world. The other industrial countries would suffer heavy losses of international reserves and would be put under a strong deflationary pressure. If the pressure cannot be released by changes in exchange rates, those countries would be driven to impose quotas on imports and exchange controls with catastrophic consequences for world trade. That is exactly what happened in the 1930s. Such a situation cannot be handled with fixed exchanges.

I therefore cannot agree that the time has come for another Bretton Woods conference "to fix what broke." The agreement in 1943 was possible because at that time the U.S. and the U.K. ran the show. Their plans were sufficiently close to reach an agreement on a joint proposal. This time around there are many industrial and semi-industrial countries with different views. For example, socialist France was one of the first to urge a new Bretton Woods conference. France's ideas are greatly different from ours. In addition there are the less developed countries which have organized themselves in very vocal pressure groups. It is inconceivable that such a heterogeneous assembly could reach an agreement even on a less controversial subject than setting up a new Bretton Woods type arrangement, let alone on restoration of the gold standard.

Time shouldn't be wasted on trying to set up a new Bretton Woods system let alone the gold standard. Floating is here to stay. But there are also areas of exchange stability. Many countries peg their currencies to the dollar and others to the D-mark or the yen.

It is imperative that the U.S. continue to keep inflation at bay and there is plenty to do for the IMF to help countries to put their financial house in order, to maintain equilibrium in their balance of payments without exchange controls either with floating rates or fixed rates if they choose to peg their currency to the dollar. We should concentrate on that job and not waste time and energy on utopian schemes.

CONSCIENCE VIGIL FOR SOVIET JEWRY

HON. ROBERT J. MRAZEK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 27, 1984

● Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, "The Congressional Call to Conscience Vigil for Soviet Jewry" reminds us all of the sufferings of so many men and women unable to determine their own destiny or to live with their families in the place of their choosing. I'd like to take this opportunity to extend my thanks to this year's chairman, the Honorable LAWRENCE COUGHLIN, for organizing this important demonstration of support for Soviet Jews.

At present, there are over 400,000 Soviet Jews who desperately want to emigrate but who are repeatedly denied their freedom. I wish to address my remarks to the case of Victor Brailovsky, a prisoner of conscience who, over the past dozen years, has weathered isolation, condemnation, ostracism, and repeated denials of the freedom he and his wife Irina so desperately need. The plight of Victor and Irina Brailovsky represents but one frustratingly sad story amidst vast numbers of fellow refuseniks imprisoned behind the intolerance of Soviet policy. Yet it is precisely the case of one or two which spurs us to feel the pain, respect the courage, and work for the freedom for all Soviet Jews.

Over the past several years I have personally corresponded with Victor and Irina Brailovsky. Their history, the cause of Victor's imprisonment, and the hardship of his 5-year sentence seem so alien to us as Americans. Yet since Victor and his wife Irina Brailovsky first applied for exist visas in 1972, the Soviet leadership has continually taken away any personal freedoms the Brailovskys could have as Soviet Jews. Both Victor and Irina have been continually denied exit visas due to the Government's allegation that Irina had had access to secret information as a computer scientist at Moscow University. Coupled with this, Victor was fired from his job, isolated from telephone and mail service, and put under constant KGB surveillance.

Despite avowed threats from the KGB, Victor continued to work against blatant discrimination and mistreatment by publishing a novel on the conditions of Soviet Jews. Victor was arrested for this, but not sentenced. In 1980, Victor was again arrested for his participation in an appeal to President Brezhnev demanding exit visas for all refuseniks—237 other refuseniks also signed the letter. This time, Victor was convicted and sentenced to 5 years of internal exile for what the Soviets labeled fabrications aimed at defaming the Soviet Union.

This past March, Victor returned to Moscow after serving his full 5-year term in isolation. He has been given permission to remain in Moscow and it has been suggested to him that he can obtain a job, but only on the condition that he have absolutely no contact with foreigners. Since Victor has a brother in Israel, and many concerned friends in the United States, this condition is unacceptable to him.

I have recently received a letter from a fellow New Yorker, Dr. German Shapiro, who has news of the Brailovskys from Moscow. Thankfully they are both in good physical health. However, I cannot duly emphasize the emotional strains a refusenik family must bear in face of constant harassment and social ostracism. The letter also conveys a sense of underlying fear for Victor, as he must find a job sometime this month or face arrest for parasitism. In addition, the Brailovskys' latest application for visas has been denied due to a mere technicality. This comes as very disturbing news, for it portrays a government bent on complicating the family's attempt to leave on any grounds.

Such a policy of restrictive emigration and active discrimination must not go unchallenged. While I appeal for Victor Brailovsky and his family, I am also speaking for the hundreds of thousands who yearn to leave the Soviet Union. As long as the voices of these brave men and women are silenced to the outside world, we in Congress must work even harder to improve their situation in the Soviet Union, and prospects for emigration.

The congressional show of support in this year's Call to Conscience Vigil exemplifies the great concern we in Congress have for the worsening situation in the Soviet Union. Our coordinated efforts will ensure that the Soviet leadership never underestimates the resolve of the American people to work for freedom in all countries. An appeal to human rights will not be heard however, if this administration and the Soviet leadership continues the current freeze of communication. We must call on both the President of the United States and the Secretary General of the Soviet Union to open dialog between our two countries so that our plea can be heard.●

CONCERN FOR FAMILY PLANNING

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 27, 1984

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring the following article, by Georgie Anne Geyer, to the attention of my colleagues. The article appeared in the Chicago Sun Times on June 26, 1984. The article discusses the U.S. position on population and development to be presented before the International Population Conference in Mexico City this August 6-13. Our delegation may take a position, unprecedented for the United States, against providing family planning services to certain less developed nations of the world. As a result of this new policy, possibly $100 million of the more than $200 million that now goes to family planning services in the less developed world would be curtailed. Mr. Speaker, Ms. Geyer has traveled the world over for the past 25 years, and is particularly an expert on Latin America. Her views of the realities we face are of great moment and should be reviewed by all who serve in this body.

The article follows:

IGNORANCE ABOUNDS IN POPULATION POSITION

(By Georgie Anne Geyer)

What factor, along with social injustice, is the cause of the peculiarly savage slaughter in El Salvador? It is its terrible population pressure, with El Salvador having as many people per square mile (500 plus) as does India.

Why is India building a 1,200-mile wall between its crowded state of Assam and Bangladesh? Because of Bangladesh's 80 million-plus people insanely crowded into 55,000 square miles.

Why is the Iran-Iraq war so particularly murderous, with probably one million killed on both sides in only 3½ years? Because the Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini is trying to wipe out a whole generation that knew the shah—and the ayatollah has 40 million people to do it with.

Finally, what is the Reagan administration's response to this real world out there? Well, have you visited Disneyland recently?

The special lobbies, one more graceless and inherently vicious than the other, are now getting busily into place to threaten the candidates before the election. The far right anti-birth control and anti-abortion lobbies are right in there, too.

At the behest of these groups, the White House is sending an ultra-conservative delegation to the important International Population Conference in Mexico City Aug. 6-13, a delegation that will take an unprecedented position for the United States against aiding population control in the world. Further, the new policy might go so far as to remove fully $100 million out of the more than $200 million that now goes to the countries of the world for population control.

We are faced with the unedifying spectacle of a Washington that has just passed an intelligent immigration bill, then going to Mexico and telling it and the world they should not control their population!

What we have here is a fearful ignorance about the world: an ignorance that equates the very genuineness of the marketplace in the economy to a similar imagined marketplace in the creation of human beings.

At heart, U.S. conservatives think that the same thing will happen in the Third World as happened in the industrialized world—in effect, that population density will naturally subside as people progress.

In countries like Mexico, when the children were kids in a rural hut, they were a private family matter. Today, those children are masses of young adults, roaming jobless, restless, impressionable and sometimes violence-prone as they seek something out of life. Now they are a public matter in the Mexicos of the world and what an irony that, now, as Mexico struggles to deal with its population, we will travel there to deny them the means.

What we are seeing all over the world is not a replay of the United States and Europe during those years of this century when birth rates declined naturally due to individual decisions; we are seeing the sheer new inability of systems to absorb.●

ACID RAIN

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 27, 1984

● Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, this week I received a letter from Mr. Curtis T. Price, executive secretary of the Pike County Chamber of Commerce regarding the acid rain dilemma facing our Nation. In my view, Mr. Price's remarks warrant the consideration of all Members of the House of Representatives:

PIKE COUNTY
CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Waverly, OH, July 23,1984.

Hon. BOB MCEWEN,
House Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. MCEWEN: I have been reading about sulfur dioxide (SO_2) emissions and the damage being done to trees and open waters in Pennsylvania, New York and the New England states. These emissions, it is charged, originate from coal burning in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois and perhaps some contiguous states. Some radical and expensive corrective measures are proposed.

I do not pretend to be an expert on this. From what I read perhaps no one is. It seems certain that we do not have adequate information on the basis of which to make judgments and decisions.

This soft coal burning has been going on all of my life (75 years) and only in the last couple of years has it been identified as an "Acid Rain" problem. Is it really a problem or is it just a bunch of loud mouth know-it-alls—or is it something in between.

I have some suspicions about this because I lived in the New York City metropolitan area for six years. I think I know "New Yorkers"—and I know something else.

I lived one block west of the Garden State Parkway and one block north of the New Jersey line. One day I got up on the ladder to paint some white siding. It was covered with a scum which had nothing to do with acid rain. It occurs to me that the scum may have some relationship to the problem we read about in Los Angeles.

All I am asking is that you go slow in placing blame and reaching decisions on solutions.

Yours very truly,

CURTIS T. PRICE,
Executive Secretary.

P.S. This letter was requested and authorized by a vote of our Board of Directors.●

TRIBUTE TO JOSEPH ANTON WALTERS

HON. ALAN WHEAT

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, July 27, 1984

● Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, today I want to congratulate and honor a distinguished veteran of World War II, Mr. Joseph Anton Walters, of Independence.

Recently, Mr. Walters was invested as a knight in the Order of Saint John of Jerusalem, Knights of Malta. The ceremony was celebrated at the Yacht Club in New York City and was presided over by his Excellency, Archbishop Lorenzo Michel de Valitch, an apostolic delegate from the Vatican, grand chancellor and heir to the rich traditions of this noble order.

Mr. Speaker, the history of the Knights of Malta is long and colorful. It is enough to note that the Knights of Malta undertake as their task the defense of Christian civilization, a dedication which involves courage and self-sacrifice, a dedication which involves courage and self-sacrifice. The order seeks out and invites into its membership men of science who are still sensible, soldiers who have not lost their humanity, teachers who still teach, and thinkers who have not lost their mental acuity. It invites to the order those who reject wealth without work, pleasure without morality, science without humanity, worship without sacrifice, and politics without principle.

Mr. Speaker, Joseph Walters is to be commended for being received into this distinguished Order of Knights. His fellow knights see in him a quality of resourcefulness and self-sufficiency that few men possess. These qualities were tested early in his life and have grown through the decades.

He was a lead scout in the 163d Regiment, 41st Infantry Divison in World War II. As a teenager, he was awarded a Bronze Star for Valor for his courageous actions on Biak Island, Netherlands East Indies and the Philippines Islands.

Mr. Walters was seriously wounded by grenade fragments while attacking an enemy position on Jolo Island, Sulu Archipelago during the fighting. However, he managed to guide three badly wounded soldiers to a battalion aid station a mile away from the fighting before he collapsed. His bravery earned him the Bronze Star for Valor.

"On numerous occasions," the citation reads:

He volunteered for dangerous missions of reconnaissance with combat patrols. As a lead scout, he displayed aggressiveness and exceptional courage which saved his comrades many casualties and many certain defeats. For much of the war, his comrades-at-arms considered him a one-man army.

The citation also credits him with killing 18 enemy troops, thereby saving the lives of many of his fellow soldiers. The citation concludes by saying that the "courageous actions of Joseph A. Walters has won him the praise of all men in his company and clearly distinguished him" above other men.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer my best wishes to a fellow Missourian and to a new Knight in the Order of the Knights of Malta, Joseph A. Walters.●

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Monday, July 30, 1984

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

We thank You, O Lord, for the diversities of cultures and traditions that are the heritage of our Nation. Help us, O Lord, to honor the variety of backgrounds of race or religion, of national origin, that form the mosaic of our country, teach us to respect each other and learn from each other, and above all else, may each of us celebrate that gift that we all share—our common creation and the presence of Your image in our very being. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment concurrent resolutions of the House of the following titles:

H. Con. Res. 331. Concurrent resolution to condemn the closing of ABC Color, the only independent newspaper in Paraguay, and to urge the Government of Paraguay to permit the reopening of that newspaper and to guarantee freedom of the press; and

H. Con. Res. 340. Concurrent resolution to correct technical errors in the enrollment of the bill H.R. 559.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

H.R. 2867. An act to amend the Solid Waste Disposal Act to authorize appropriations for the fiscal years 1984 through 1986, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 5798. An act making appropriations for the Treasury Department, the U.S. Postal Service, the Executive Office of the President, and certain independent agencies, for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H.R. 2867) entitled "An act to amend the Solid Waste Disposal Act to authorize appropriations for the fiscal years 1984 through 1986, and for other purposes," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. MITCHELL, and Mr. LAUTENBERG to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H.R. 5798) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Treasury Department, the U.S. Postal Service, the Executive Office of the President, and certain Independent Agencies, for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, and for other purposes," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. MATTINGLY, Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. DECONCINI, and Mr. STENNIS to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1668. An act to amend chapter 37 of title 31, United States Code, to authorize contracts retaining private counsel to furnish collection services in the case of indebtedness owed the United States; and

S.J. Res. 272. Joint resolution recognizing the anniversaries of the Warsaw uprising and the Polish resistance to invasion of Poland during World War II.

A "JOKE" ON THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

(Mr. RATCHFORD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RATCHFORD. Mr. Speaker, if Anne Gorsuch Burford considers the National Advisory Committee on Oceans and Atmosphere a "joke" and a "nothingburger," why doesn't the President withdraw her nomination? Americans don't feel that preserving our oceans is a "joke." And they certainly don't feel that protecting the atmosphere is a "nothingburger."

Fortunately, the American people feel strongly about the environment. And if the President really wants to show his concern for our environment, he shouldn't show it through another 3-day media extravaganza in a couple of national parks.

Instead, he should show his commitment by withdrawing this totally inappropriate nomination. If this appointment is carried out, I'm afraid the "joke" will be on the American people.

IN TRIBUTE TO MAJ. GEN. JAMES P. McCARTHY

(Mr. ALEXANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Maj. Gen. James P. McCarthy who recently departed as the Director of Legislative Liaison of the Office of the Secretary of the Air Force to become Director of Plans, Headquarters, Strategic Air Command, Offutt AFB, NE. Major General McCarthy's 20 months as Director of Legislative Liaison have been marked by his constant efforts to keep the Congress as completely and accurately informed as possible about Air Force activities. I am sure I echo the sentiments of all my colleagues when I thank him for his prompt and thorough response to my inquiries and for the many occasions when he provided valuable information which helped me understand and analyze the often-complex issues of aerospace defense. All Americans are fortunate to have a man of Major General McCarthy's stature and integrity in our Nation's service. I wish him farewell and success in his new position, confident that a vital portion of our Nation's strategic deterrence is being placed in capable hands.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5, rule I, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each motion to suspend the rules, and on each question of passing bills, on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

Such rollcall votes, if postponed, will be taken after legislative business on Tuesday, July 31, 1984.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. This is District of Columbia day. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA RETIRED JUDGE SERVICE ACT

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up the bill (H.R. 6007) to establish certain procedures regarding the judicial service of retired judges of D.C. courts, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 6007

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "District of Columbia Retired Judge Service Act".

SERVICE OF RETIRED JUDGES

SEC. 2. (a) Section 11-1504 of the District of Columbia Code is amended to read as follows:

"§ 11-1504. Services of Retired Judges

"(a)(1) A judge, retired for reasons other than disability, who has been favorably recommended and appointed as a senior judge, in accordance with subsection (b), may perform such judicial duties as such senior judge is assigned and willing and able to undertake. A senior judge shall be subject to reappointment every two years in accordance with subsection (b). Except as provided under this section, retired judges may not perform judicial duties in District of Columbia courts.

"(2) Within 180 days of the date of retirement, a judge may request recommendation from the District of Columbia Commission on Judicial Disabilities and Tenure (hereinafter in this section referred to as the "Commission") to be appointed as a senior judge in accordance with this section.

"(3) Retired judges actively serving on the date of enactment of this Act willing to continue to perform judicial duties shall request recommendation from the Commission to be appointed as senior judges within 180 days of the date of enactment of this Act in accordance with this section.

"(b)(1) A retired judge willing to perform judicial duties may request a recommendation as a senior judge from the Commission. Such judge shall submit to the Commission such information as the Commission considers necessary to a recommendation under this subsection.

"(2) The Commission shall submit a written report of its recommendations and findings to the appropriate chief judge and the judge requesting appointment within 180 days of the date of the request for recommendations. The Commission, under such criteria as it considers appropriate, shall make a favorable or unfavorable recommendation to the appropriate chief judge regarding an appointment as senior judge. The recommendation of the Commission shall be final.

"(3) The appropriate chief judge shall notify the Commission and the judge requesting appointment of such chief judge's decision regarding appointment within 30 days after receipt of the Commission's recommendations and findings. The decision of such chief judge regarding such appointment shall be final.

"(c) A judge may continue to perform judicial duties upon retirement, without appointment as a senior judge, until such judge's successor assumes office.

"(d) A retired judge, actively performing judicial duties as of the date of enactment of the District of Columbia Retired Judge Service Act, may continue to perform such judicial duties as he or she may be willing and able to assume, subject to the approval of the appropriate chief judge, for a period not to exceed one year from the date of enactment of such Act, without appointment as a senior judge.".

(b) Section 431(g) of the District of Columbia Self-Government and Governmental Reorganization Act is amended by inserting "and to make recommendations regarding the appointment of senior judges of the District of Columbia courts as provided in section 11-1504 of the District of Columbia Code" after "in section 432".

RETIREMENT BENEFITS FOR EXECUTIVE OFFICER OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURTS

SEC. 3. Section 11-1703(c) of title 11, District of Columbia Code, is amended by inserting ", including retirement benefits," after "compensation".

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 4. The provisions of this Act shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendments: Page 2, line 19, strike "this Act" and insert "the District of Columbia Retired Judge Service Act and".

Page 2, line 23, strike "this" and insert "such".

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin the consideration of this bill by first paying tribute and thanks to the distinguished gentleman from California, the subcommittee chairperson that brought this bill forward, and the gentleman from Virginia, the ranking minority member, who is also a coauthor of this particular piece of legislation.

You will hear from both of these gentlemen in some detail with respect to the bill, H.R. 6007. Suffice it to say at this point, in a brief summary, that the bill improves the method of using retired judges in the D.C. courts to relieve the case load of courts and contributes to the administration of justice in the District of Columbia.

Under H.R. 6007 if a retired judge is willing to serve, the D.C. Commission on Judicial Disabilities and Tenure evaluates his fitness to serve and recommends to the appropriate chief judge whether he should be appointed as a senior judge.

A second provision of the bill includes the executive of the courts under the judges' retirement system.

Mr. Speaker, with that very brief summary, I urge support for this bill and yield back the balance of my time.

□ 1210

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be here today to present H.R. 6007. This bill will establish a long overdue procedure for checking the capabilities and continued competency of retired judges who are called on to hear cases in the D.C. courts.

In the 14 years since the Court Reform Act of 1970 the case load of the D.C. courts has skyrocketed. This has mirrored the vast increase in civil litigation and a most undesirable increase in crime since that time. Unfortunately, just like in the rest of the Nation, the District courts have not been able to keep pace with the number of cases and there are long delays and backlogs.

The chief judges of the superior court and of the appeals court have taken a number of steps to improve the efficiency of their courts. They have also used a common method of dealing with an overloaded docket by asking retired judges to continue to serve the public interest by hearing cases. The District has been most fortunate that a number of retired judges, who have already performed much service to the community, have agreed to forgo a life of leisure and have continued to work. These retired judges have done a good job and they have aided in improving the efficiency of the District courts.

Up to now the service of retired judges has been an ad hoc procedure. It was instituted by necessity and it has been run by improvisation. The need, though less now than in the past, is still present. With that concept in mind, the members of the DC Subcommittee on Judiciary and Education began to work on creating a regular process for evaluating and selecting retired judges who desire to continue to hear cases in the District's courts. There was never any contention in this process and the subcommittee and its staff has worked in a true bipartisan spirit of cooperation.

Today you see the results of months of work embodied in the bill, H.R. 6007. This bill sets up a process and a procedure for retired judges to be evaluated before they can continue to actively participate in the administration of justice. Until now there was no evaluation of these judges.

The Disability and Tenure Review Commission is the body that is charged with reviewing sitting judges for physical and mental competency. This Commission also investigates complaints about sitting judges and it has the power to censure or remove judges who are found to be disabled or incompetent. The Tenure Commission is the logical group to determine whether a retired judge is capable of continuing to hear cases, and that is where H.R. 6007 places the responsibility.

The mandatory retirement age for D.C. judges is now 74. Since many judges do serve until this age it is reasonable to require men and women who serve past this age be examined regularly for continued competency. H.R. 6007 does this by requiring reexamination and reappointment every 2 years.

Our intent in writing this legislation was not to change the use of retired judges, but to regularize their screening and appointment. I believe that we have succeeded in meeting our goals. The chief judge of the appropriate court maintains his power of making the final determination and in selecting the cases that a retired or senior judge will hear. The utilization of senior judges is a common practice around the country and this bill does nothing to encourage or discourage a continuation of this practice.

When all factors are taken into consideration this is a neutral bill that deals only with efficiency and competency in the D.C. courts. I support this bill, the other minority members of the Committee on the District of Columbia support the bill and I urge its adoption.

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I join with the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS] in praising the work of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLILEY] on this particular piece of legislation, not only his support which made its presence here possible, but the refinement he did in amending the bill to make it acceptable to Members on both sides of the aisle in the committee.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is a product of our ongoing monitoring of judicial efficiency in the D.C. local court system. Moreover, it is a product of our subcommittee's work with various representatives of the D.C. legal community, particularly representatives of the distinguished Horsky Study Committee. The Horsky Committee was established by the D.C. Bar in 1978 to recommend improvements in the D.C. court system. In particular, I would like to thank the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLILEY] for contributing to the bipartisan sponsorship and spirit of this bill.

In the District of Columbia, retired judges may be appointed by the chief judge of the appropriate court to serve as a senior judge. The chief judge then assigns such senior judges a limited caseload. However, there is no formal review of these senior judges' fitness to serve, either upon appointment or thereafter. Therefore, a judge may continue to hear cases and be totally unfit for such service.

H.R. 6007 seeks to correct this longstanding concern. Under this bill, a retiring or retired judge must formally notify the D.C. Commission on Judicial Disabilities and Tenure and the appropriate chief judge of his or her desire to be considered for a senior judge appointment within 180 days of retirement.

The Commission then conducts an investigation of the judge's fitness to continue service as a senior judge and submits a recommendation to the appropriate chief judge based on that investigation. The chief judge then determines whether to make the appointment. The Tenure Commission will review the fitness of each retired senior judge every 2 years thereafter.

The bill also brings the Executive Office of the D.C. court into the judicial retirement program. The Court Reorganization Act of 1970 provided for judicial retirement benefits for the executive officer of the D.C. courts. However, the Office of the Comptroller General of the United States interpreted the pertinent provision to exclude the executive officer from the Judicial Retirement System. This is not what Congress intended. Section 3 of H.R. 6007 reflects original congressional intent.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is a small but necessary step toward improving efficiency and accountability of our local judiciary.

It is supported by the Mayor; chairman of the city council; the chief judge of the Superior and Appellate Courts of the District of Columbia; the Council on Court Excellence; and the Judicial Tenure and Disability Commission.

Moreover, it is reported to this body by a unanimous and bipartisan committee vote. Against this backdrop, I strongly encourage my colleagues to support H.R. 6007.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise in support of H.R. 6007, a bill that would empower the D.C. Commission on Judicial Disabilities and Tenure to evaluate a retired judge and, after reviewing relevant information, to recommend that such a judge be designated as having senior judge status. The recommendation would then be considered by the chief judge, who would determine whether or not appointment as a senior judge is appropriate. This process would be repeated every 2 years for retired judges.

This system or review and evaluation prior to allowing retired judges to hear cases is sound. Under the current system, a judge need only manifest an interest in continuing to serve, and he or she may. Qualifications or fitness are not now taken into account.

Judges make decisions which have far-reaching implications for the lives of individuals. We must insure that the physical and mental well-being of our senior judges conforms to the standards that we apply to our active judges. By so doing, we reduce the chances of irregular and unequal judicial decisions.

I urge the Members to support H.R. 6007 and to strike a blow for improved efficiency in our local court system.

□ 1220

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I would very briefly like to congratulate the committee on its work and say that I strongly support this bill. I think it ought to be passed. It has been long needed. I commend both the chairman of the full committee and the chairman of the subcommittee and the ranking minority Member, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLILEY].

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 6007 makes changes to the current provisions of the D.C. Code concerning the service of retired judges. These changes will insure that those individuals who have retired and wish to continue serving on the bench are able to do so, not only in the opinion of the chief judge of the court involved, but also in the opinion of the D.C. Commission on Judicial Disabilities and Tenure.

Under current law, any retired judge may be assigned active duties by the appropriate of chief judge of a local court. This procedure has been criticized by some as having the appearance of cronyism, although it would be difficult to back up such allegations with substance. In any event, the committee and the leadership of the local courts recognized the potential harm which could come from the existing procedure, and urged modifications.

H.R. 6007 would require that retired judges who wish to be assigned additional duties seek designation as a senior judge from the local Commission on Judicial Disabilities and Tenure. The Commission would make either a favorable or unfavorable recommendation to the appropriate chief judge. The chief judge would be able to select only those who have been favorably recommended.

Those retired judges already serving actively would be permitted to continue for not to exceed 1 year, after which such judge would be required to undergo review by the Commission. Finally, all retired judges would be required to seek reappointment every 2 years.

In short Mr. Speaker, H.R. 6007 would provide for initial and periodic review of retired judges seeking additional duties, and in so doing ensure that retired judges which are utilized are competent and able.

There is one other matter which H.R. 6007 addresses, and hopefully a long standing misinterpretation will be clarified in the process. Section 3 of this bill restates the original intent of Congress that the executive officer of the local courts be permitted to participate in the local Judicial Retirement Program. As noted in the report, an erroneous interpretation of the word "compensation" by the Comptroller General has led to the situation where the executive officer of the courts has been prevented from participation in this retirement program. That was not what Congress intended in the Court Reorganization Act of 1970, but to make it abundantly clear, this amendment would add the phrase "including retirement benefits" immediately after the word "compensation." Should the current individual wish this change to be retroactive to the initial date of appointment, the report notes that the appropriate amount of employee contribution must be made to the fund. Even if that is not done, the individual could begin participation on the effective date of this act.

Mr. Speaker, I know of no opposition to the provisions of H.R. 6007, and indeed there should be none. The bill makes very important inprovements, and I urge all of my colleagues to support it as a step toward making the local system of justice more efficient.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I would simply again like to reiterate my admiration for my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. DYMALLY], and my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLILEY], for their diligence with respect to the legislation presently being considered.

With that brief concluding set of remarks, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. BOUCHER]. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA JUDICIAL APPOINTMENT AUTHORITY ACT OF 1984

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up the bill (H.R. 5951) to change the appointment process for judges of District of Columbia courts, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

(C) in subparagraph (E)—

(i) by striking out "chief judge of the United States District Court" and inserting in lieu thereof "District of Columbia Courts Joint Committee on Judicial Administration"; and

(ii) by striking out "Federal" and inserting in lieu thereof "District of Columbia Court"; and

(D) by redesignating subparagraph (B), (C), (D), and (E) as subparagraphs (A), (B), (C), and (D), respectively.

CHANGES IN THE SMALL CLAIMS COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

SEC. 3. That section 1321 of title 11 of the District of Columbia Code is amended by striking out "$750" and inserting in lieu thereof "$2,000".

SEC. 4. The provisions of this Act shall take effect six months after enactment of this Act.

Mr. DELLUMS (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5951 makes three changes in the D.C. Code. First, it provides that local judges in the District of Columbia will be appointed and confirmed by the Mayor and Council rather than the President and Senate; second, H.R. 5951 changes the two local commissions that recommend and evaluate the judges and candidates for judgeship to remove Federal appointees and substitute local appointees; and third, the bill increases the jurisdiction of the small claims branch of the D.C. Superior Court from its present $750 to $2,000.

The changes in the law contained in H.R. 5951 are part of a progression over the past 15 years in which Congress has limited judges of Federal courts to strictly Federal business and left local matters to the local courts and local officials in the District of Columbia.

It is hard to believe now, but until Congress changed the law in 1968 the Federal judges of the U.S. District Court actually appointed the members of the school board for the public schools of Washington, DC. In 1968 the Federal judges were relieved of that local responsibility and the people now elect their board of education.

Two years later Congress limited the Federal court in the District to Federal felonies and created a purely local court called the Superior Court of the District of Columbia to handle local felonies, and created a second court—the D.C. Court of Appeals—to hear appeals from local cases, rather than the U.S. Court of Appeals as before.

These two local courts are the subject of H.R. 5951. Members of Congress familiar with the court system in their own States will recognize that the D.C. Superior Court handles the same types of cases as the county courts or municipal courts or State trial courts in your home State. These are not the types of cases that go to Federal court.

A few statistics illustrate the court system addressed in this bill. The D.C. Superior Court received 184,000 cases in 1983. The nine major categories of cases from the heaviest caseload to the lightest were as follows:

Landlord and tenant, 84,000.
Misdemeanors, 22,000.
Small claims, 21,000.
Civil actions, 15,000.
Felonies, 11,000.
Traffic, 10,000.
Domestic relations, 8,000.
Juvenile, 4,000.
Probate, 3,000.

There are 1,000 employees and over 60 judges and commissioners carrying out his local judicial responsibility. The court budget is $44 million, substantially provided by locally raised funds.

It is clear that we are talking about a court that handles local cases and typical minor matters that are the business of local judges everywhere—not Federal cases for a Federal judiciary with Presidential appointments subject to confirmation by the U.S. Senate.

It was to separate the Federal and local overlap that Congress created the D.C. Superior Court and Court of Appeals in 1970. The committee at that time was chaired by Congressman John McMillan. His committee report (91-907) stated:

> The fact is that the diversity of Federal and local interest has led to the jurisdictional disarray which presently exists * * * The Federal court has jurisdiction of local felonies and concurrent jurisdiction over local misdemeanors * * * The Federal court tries cases that would elsewhere be within the state system:

The 1970 committee report then states the intent of Congress:

> . . . The United States District Court for the District of Columbia will be on a par with other United States District Courts, exercising Federal jurisdiction only, and the Superior Court of the District of Columbia will have all purely local jurisdiction.

The legislative history of 14 years ago, which I have just quoted makes it clear that Congress intended to confine the Federal court to Federal matters an create local courts for local cases. H.R. 5951 completes that process.

In fact, the Home Rule bill as reported to the House Floor in 1973 contained judicial appointments and confirmation by the Mayor and Council. A House floor amendment prevented the change at that time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS] has expired. (By unanimous consent, Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, the principle of H.R. 5951 is what the Reagan administration calls the New Federalism. A year ago Treasury Department Officials stated the principle to our committee in a letter supporting the city's desire to use the private capital markets rather than continuing to borrow from the U.S. Treasury. The Treasury officials wrote:

> The administration strongly supports the efforts of the District of Columbia Government to manage its own financial needs.
> . . . . (O)ne of the major themes of the President's . . . budget is to reduce Federal involvement in matters more properly conducted by local governments.

Other examples of New Federalism for the District of Columbia are the transfer of R.F.K. Stadium from the U.S. Department of the Interior to the D.C. Government, and a reduced Federal role in operating St. Elizabeth's Hospital. Both of these have administration support.

It is clear that the trend is away from Presidential appointees doing the job that local officials should do. H.R. 5951 is an important step in that direction and deserves to be adopted by Congress.

I would finally conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by again congratulating my distinguished colleagues, first, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLILEY], who is the author of this terribly important and vital piece of information, and I would like to again thank the two coauthors of this legislation, the distingusihed gentleman from California [Mr. DYMALLY], and the distinguished gentleman from the District of Columbia [Mr. FAUNTROY].

□ 1230

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5951 is an important bill which directly meets the challenge of fairness and equity for the people of the District of Columbia. This bill is not new in concept and it merely validates and implements the decision made by the House and Senate committees in 1973 to have the Mayor of the District of Columbia nominate judges who serve on local courts.

The passage of this bill would make appointment of judges in the District of Columbia analogous to the procedure in the States. After all, you must understand that we are dealing here with local judges with local responsibilities and not with Federal judges. In any event there are safeguards in this bill that will ensure the quality of the nominees and the objectivily of the Nominations Commission.

The bill requires that the Mayor pick a nominee from a list of three names submitted by the Nominations Commission. This Commission has five members of which the Mayor only appoints one. This body is political neutral and is objective. The Mayor is constrained from nominating unqualified political friends by the requirement that his selections be from the approved list. This requirement is much more stringent than most of the Governors of legislatures are faced with in the States. We all know of many cases where States judges are appointed for their support of the Governor and not necessarily for their judicial competence. This will not be the case in the District of Columbia. The Nominations Commission is set up to insure quality judges. Therefore any argument that the Mayor will have too much power or that he may make a mockery of the selection process just does not hold up.

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives consideration today of H.R. 5951 represents a precious moment in the history of democracy in the District of Columbia. The legislation is consistent with Congress' granting and extending self-government to the citizens of the District of Columbia over the last 10 years.

The major question before us is whether the President or the mayor of the District of Columbia should select local appellate and superior court judges.

I ask my colleagues to think about this question, particularly in the context of the President appointing State and local judges in your own States and cities. Given the history of the District of Columbia government and its local court system, the question posed virtually answers itself. Like States, the local D.C. government should govern itself and should select its own judges.

In July 1970, pursuant to our article I power, Congress created the local court system by passing the District of Columbia Reform and Criminal Procedure Act. We expressly stated we were establishing the D.C. Superior Court and Court of Appeals analagous to State court systems.

I would add that because D.C. courts are article I and not article III courts, there is no constitutional prohibition against non-Presidential appointment, or specifically mayoral appointment of local judges.

In 1973, this Congress passed the Home Rule Act which established an executive and legislative branch of government on a local level. Citizens were given the right to elect a local government.

Although under this act self-government for the district was limited, we were proud of this legislative accomplishment. But we are prouder now. The D.C. court system has functioned as an independent and exemplary arm of the D.C. government for more than 12 years. The executive and legislative branches of the local government have been in place for nearly 10 years. The local government has in fact developed a great deal of experience and self-sufficiency and it is as sound, effective and as capable as any local government in this Nation.

With this background in mind and steadfast notions of democratic values, the answer to the question posed today must be consistent with Mr. Reagan's new Federalism: There is no logical, legal, or political basis for the President to appoint judges of District of Columbia or any other State or local court which is totally disconnected from the Federal judiciary. Hence, local judges should be selected through a local selection process.

The jurisdiction of the D.C. Superior and Appellate Court judges is limited to purely local matters. Should the President of the United States appoint State court judges to consider disputes regarding landlord and tenant, familial or small claims disputes in Pennsylvania, California, New York, or Virginia? Of course the answer is no.

I submit there is a clear analogy here. This Congress established the D.C. court system analagous to State court systems. The local court exercises the same relationship with the local government that State courts exercise with State governments. There are no fundamental distinctions except that the President appoints local judges.

H.R. 5951 seeks to remove this tension of inconsistency, nothing more, nothing less. It does not change the court's structure, power, or jurisdiction. The court remains the same.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5951 represents a bipartisan consensus statement from the House Committee on the District of Columbia to this august body. There is no longer a national basis for Presidential appointment of local judges to the D.C. court system. This should be a local responsibility.

I would like to thank the gentleman from Virginia for pioneering this bill and I strongly encourage Members of this body to support H.R. 5951.

Mr. McKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5951 is a long awaited measure which I would urge all of my colleagues to seriously consider. As a supporter of home rule of the District of Columbia, it is, in my opinion, long overdue.

In a nutshell, what H.R. 5951 does is localize the process of appointment of local judges. First, it removes the Federal representation on two commissions—the D.C. Judicial Nomination Commission and the D.C. Commission on Judicial Disabilities and Tenure. Next, it provides that the Mayor, not the President, select the nominee from the list of eligible candidates provided. And rather than have the Senate confirm the nominee, that function would be undertaken by the Council of the District of Columbia.

The bill does have one other purpose, that being an increase in the jurisdictional limit of the local small claims court from $750 to $2,000. This change will significantly reduce the number of cases which the local superior court civil division must consider as a result of an outdated dollar limit.

I do not intend to explain the details of this measure, but rather the principle which has generated the interest on our committee. When we passed the Home Rule Act in 1973, we did not include judicial autonomy as a final provision. We ended up with several conditions which basically retained control over the criminal code and the operation of local courts as a function of the Congress.

As part of that compromise, it was envisioned that there would be a gradual change toward real autonomy. For a period of 2 years, which was extended to 4 years, we prohibited the Council from enacting any changes in the local criminal code. They now have that authority. I think it is safe to say we envisioned a progression toward full autonomy, with each safeguard or compromise falling by the wayside as the local government exhibited the ability to govern itself.

Mr. Speaker, the time has come to make the next step in this progression toward judicial autonomy. Local judges should be the responsibility of the local government. There is no justification for retaining this authority in the President and the Senate of the United States of America.

This bill will not change the qualifications for individuals being considered for vacancies in the local courts. Candidates must still be U.S. citizens, active members of the local bar and practicing attorneys for 5 years or on the faculty of a law school in the District of Columbia for 5 years, or a Federal or D.C. government attorney, and residents of the District of Columbia. Nothing in this bill will diminish the requirements for consideration as a candidate. Only the entity making the final decision will change, and in my opinion, it will change for the better.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let me indicate to my colleagues that this measure does not in any way alter the relationship between the local government and the U.S. attorney's office for the District of Columbia. Prosecution will continue as it is currently conducted. The Federal interest will be protected through the office of the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this bill makes a modest and fully justifiable step toward the goal of achieving full home rule for the District of Columbia. It has the unanimous support of the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia from both sides of the aisle. And it should have the unanimous support of the membership of this body.

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of H.R. 5951, a bill which, in the true spirit of bipartisan cooperation, I am pleased to have cosponsored. I want to commend the bill's chief sponsor, my colleague on the committee on the District of Columbia, Mr. BLILEY, for introducing this measure.

Section two of this legislation basically restates the position of the district committee when we marked up the Home Rule Act a little more than a decade ago. Mayoral appointment of judges of the local courts was as logical and compelling then as it is today. The Senate version of the Home Rule Act included mayoral appointment of judges; the final House version did not. It mystifies me now as it mystified me then why this House ultimately supported an amendment to the Home Rule Act, striking mayoral appointment and replacing it with Presidential appointment, and why the House-Senate conference agreed to the House amendment.

The fact is, there is no good reason, no significant basis to inject the President into this purely local matter. On the other hand, there are many good reasons and a substantial basis to leave the selection of local judges to the local community, and that is what H.R. 5951 seeks to do.

There is no place in the United States where local judges are appointed by the President, except the District of Columbia. Some local judges are appointed by Governors, some by local legislatures, and some are elected by the people, but all owe their selection to a local entity.

It should be noted that local courts in the District of Columbia, like local courts everywhere, have jurisdiction over purely local matters. They hear divorces, landlord and tenant matters, probate cases, small claims, juvenile matters, some criminal and civil cases, traffic matters, and others. They do not however have jurisdiction over cases involving a Federal question or over cases involving citizens from different States and other diversity situations. District of Columbia local courts, like all other local courts, are limited in this regard.

Does it make sense therefore to require the President of the United States to appoint judges who must hear red light violations, $50 dog bite cases and alimony disputes? The response is obvious—there is no good reason, no significant basis.

I recall with great amazement the remarks of one Member during the debate on the Home Rule Act. He stated that—

(His) constituents deserve the kind of judges (in the District of Columbia) that would be appointed by the President rather than the kind of judges appointed by a mayor.

I challenge anyone in this Chamber to tell me how appointment by the President in some magical and mystical way insures top quality judges. The President has appointed many D.C. judges over the years. Some have been good and some have been less than good.

Embodied in H.R. 5951 is a provision which would keep the current system of screening judicial appointment candidates, thereby measurably improving the chances of getting the best qualified for the bench.

That provision, commonly referred to as the "Missouri plan" establishes an independent commission to select and nominate judicial candidates. The mayor could appoint judges only from the list of those submitted by the commission.

A second, independent commission would review the record of judges seeking reappointment at the end of their tenure. This commission's evaluation would place the judges in one of four categories. Only if a judge is determined by the commission to be merely "qualified" would the mayor have the power to reappoint.

The two commissions thus provide more than adequate insulation for the judiciary from political pressure.

It should be noted that at the time the Congress considered the Home Rule Act, a major overhaul of the local court system had just occurred under the 1970 Court Reorganization Act. Thus, at that time, one could at least rationalize the reluctance of some Members to make new changes in the judicial system on the heels of that overhaul. But we are now nearly a decade and a half removed from that overhaul, and change is appropriate.

The other operative provision of this bill, section 3, increases the jurisdictional limit of D.C. Small Claims Court from $750 to $2,000, bringing the limit more in line with similar courts in our region.

Mr. Speaker, appointment of local judges by the local executive is fundamental to our system. H.R. 5951 simply mainstreams the District of Columbia in this regard. It is worthy of our support and compelling in its simplicity, fairness, and justification. I urge this House, Republicans and Democrats alike, to follow the lead of the Committee on the District of Columbia and our distinguished colleague, Mr. BLILEY, and, with a strong, bipartisan vote, support this basic concept.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

CONSERVATION SERVICE REFORM ACT OF 1984

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 5946) to reform the Residential Conservation Service and to repeal the Commercial and Apartment Conservation Service, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 5946

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Conservation Service Reform Act of 1984".

TITLE I—RESIDENTIAL CONSERVATION SERVICE

SEC. 101. CHANGES IN CERTAIN PLAN REQUIREMENTS.

(a) INFORMATION REQUIREMENTS MADE APPLICABLE UNTIL JANUARY 1, 1990.—Sections 215(a) and (d) and 217(a)(1) of the National Energy Conservation Policy Act (relating to utility programs and home heating supplier programs) are amended by striking out "January 1, 1985" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "January 1, 1990".

(b) ELIMINATION OF REQUIREMENTS THAT PUBLIC UTILITIES ARRANGE FOR INSTALLATION OF SUGGESTED MEASURES AND FOR RELATED LOANS; ELIMINATION OF LISTING REQUIREMENTS.—

(1) UTILITY PROGRAMS.—Section 215(b) of such Act (relating to project manager requirements) is amended—

(A) by striking out "Each utility program shall include" through "procedures" and inserting in lieu thereof "Each utility program shall include procedures";

(B) by striking out "to" through "inspect" and inserting in lieu thereof "to inspect"; and

(C) by striking out "inspection;" and all that follows and inserting in lieu thereof "inspection.".

(2) HOME HEATING SUPPLIER PROGRAMS.—Section 217(a)(2) of such Act (relating to home heating supplier programs) is amended—

(A) by striking out "will—" through "inspect" and inserting in lieu thereof "will inspect"; and

(B) by striking out "installing, suggested measures;" and all that follows and inserting in lieu thereof "installing, suggested measures.".

(3) STATE PLANS.—Section 213(a) of such Act (relating to general plan requirements) is amended—

(A) by striking out paragraphs (2) and (3); and

(B) by redesignating paragraphs (4) through (9) as paragraphs (2) through (7), respectively.

(c) RULES.—Section 212(b)(2) of such Act (relating to rules of the Secretary) is amended by striking out subparagraphs (E) and (F) and inserting "and" at the end of subparagraph (C).

(d) EFFECT OF 1984 AMENDMENTS ON APPROVED PLANS.—Section 219 of such Act (relating to Federal standby authority) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) PLANS APPROVED BEFORE 1984 AMENDMENTS.—For purposes of this section, any residential energy conservation plan which was approved by the Secretary before the effective date of the Conservation Service Reform Act of 1984 shall be treated as an approved plan which is adequately implemented if such plan is adequately implemented in accordance with the requirements of this Act as amended by the Conservation Service Reform Act of 1984.".

(e) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) Paragraph (16) of section 210 of such Act is amended by striking out "215(b)(1)(A)" and inserting in lieu thereof "215(b)".

(2) Subparagraph (C) of section 212(b)(2) of such Act is amended by striking out "213(a)(4)" and inserting in lieu thereof "213(a)(2)".

(3) Subparagraph (A) of section 213(b)(2) of such Act is amended by striking out "215(b)(1)" and inserting in lieu thereof "215(b)".

(4) Subsection (b) of section 214 of such Act is amended by striking out "8" and inserting in lieu thereof "6".

(5) Section 215(a)(3) of such Act is amended by striking out "and the lists referred to in section 213(a)(2) and (3)".

(6) Subsection (d) of section 215 of such Act is amended by striking out ", the offer required under subsection (b)(1)(A)" and all that follows and by inserting in lieu thereof "and the offer required under subsection (b).".

(7) Section 215 of such Act is amended by striking out subsection (f) and by redesignating subsection (g) as subsection (f).

(8) Paragraph (1) of section 216(c) of such Act is amended by striking out subparagraph (A) and by redesignating subparagraphs (B) and (C) as subparagraphs (A) and (B), respectively.

(9) Subparagraph (C) of section 216(c)(2) of such Act is amended by striking out "on the lists referred to in section 213(a)(2)".

(f) STATUTORY CONSTRUCTION.—Nothing in the amendments made by subsections (b) through (e) shall prevent implementation of a plan or program pursuant to the National Energy Conservation Policy Act as in effect before the date of the enactment of this Act.

(g) EFFECTIVE DATE.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The amendments made by this section shall take effect 90 days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(2) RULES.—The Secretary of Energy shall, within the 90-day period referred to in paragraph (1), amend the rules promulgated under section 212 of the National Energy Conservation Policy Act to carry out the amendments made by this Act.

(3) SPECIAL REQUIREMENT FOR PLANS APPROVED BEFORE 1984 AMENDMENTS.—The Secretary of Energy shall, with respect to any residential energy conservation plan approved by the Secretary of Energy before the effective date (as described in paragraph (1)) of the amendments made by this section, require the appropriate official in charge of such plan to notify the Secretary of Energy, within 120 days of the date of enactment of this Act, that the amendments made by subsection (a) of this section shall be implemented for the duration of such plan.

SEC. 102. TIME LIMIT FOR ACTION ON APPLICATIONS FOR TEMPORARY PROGRAMS.

Any application for an exemption under section 218(a) of the National Energy Conservation Policy Act which is pending before the Secretary of Energy on the date of the enactment of this Act shall be deemed approved unless it is disapproved by the Secretary of Energy within 30 days after such date of enactment.

SEC. 103. ALTERNATIVE PLANS FOR RESIDENTIAL BUILDINGS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The National Energy Conservation Policy Act is amended by inserting the following new sections after section 225:

"SEC. 226. ALTERNATIVE STATE PLANS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—A Governor of any State or any State agency authorized to do so under State law may elect to formulate and certify an alternative State plan under this section.

"(b) CONSEQUENCES OF CERTIFICATION.—(1) Beginning with the date on which the certification of a plan is made with respect to a State under subsection (e) and ending with the date on which a plan is no longer in effect under this section with respect to such State—

"(A) sections 212(a) through (c)(3), 213 through 215, and sections 217 and 218 shall not apply with respect to—

"(i) regulated utilities in such State, and

"(ii) nonregulated utilities which are included in the plan;

"(B) section 219 shall apply to utilities described in subparagraph (A) only to the extent provided for in subsection (g); and

"(C) sections 212 through 219 shall apply to nonregulated utilities which are not included in the plan and which have not certified an alternative utility plan under section 227.

"(2) Except as provided in subsection (g), any State which certifies a plan under subsection (e) shall continue to have such plan in effect until the expiration of the 5-year period beginning on the date of such certification or until January 1, 1990, whichever occurs first.

"(c) FORMULATION OF PLAN.—In formulating any plan under this section, the Governor or State agency shall—

"(1) provide for advance notice to the public of proposed rulemaking for the purpose of formulating such plan;

"(2) publish a proposed rule on the content and implementation of the plan;

"(3) afford interested persons an opportunity to present oral and written comments on matters relating to such proposed rule; and

"(4) after taking such public comment into consideration, prescribe and make public a final rule setting forth the content and implementation of such plan.

"(d) CONTENT OF PLAN.—A plan certified pursuant to this section shall—

"(1) be designed to result in the dissemination of general energy conservation suggestions to all residential customers of utilities in the State;

"(2) be designed to result in—

"(A) specific energy conservation suggestions to each residential customer requesting such suggestions regarding the customer's residential building,

"(B) energy conservation improvements (which are included in such plan) to the customer's residential building, or

"(C) load management improvements (which are included in such plan) in the customer's residential building;

"(3) except as provided in subsection (k), for each year in which such plan is in effect, be designed to result in—

"(A)(i) in the case of a plan carried out solely by a State, benefits under paragraph (2) for a number of buildings equal to 5 percent or more of the residential buildings using natural gas or electric energy from utilities covered under section 211(a) in such State which did not, before such year, receive benefits under this Act (other than under paragraph (1) or section 227(d)(1)) or similar State law, and

"(ii) in the case of any other plan, benefits under paragraph (2) for a number of buildings equal to 5 percent or more of the residential buildings served by the utilities included in the plan which did not, before such year, receive benefits under this Act (other than paragraph (1) or section 227(d)(1)) or similar State law;

"(B) energy consumption reductions (as determined by the Governor by rule) of an average of 10 percent or more (as compared to the preceding year) in the residential buildings in such State which receive specific energy conservation suggestions or energy conservation improvements under paragraph (2) during the year for which the determination is made; and

"(C) maximum kilowatt demand reductions (as determined by the Governor by rule) of an average of 10 percent or more (as compared to the preceding year) in the residential buildings in such State which receive load management improvements under paragraph (2) during the year for which the determination is made;

"(4) be designed to benefit individuals, including but not limited to individuals with low or moderate incomes;

"(5) contain adequate procedures to assure that, if a public utility supplies or installs residential energy conservation measures, such actions shall be consistent with section 216 and prices and rates of interest charged shall be fair and reasonable;

"(6) contain adequate procedures for preventing unfair, deceptive, or anticompetitive acts or practices affecting commerce which relate to the implementation of such plan;

"(7) be carried out by the State, by utilities within the State, or a combination of both;

"(8) be consistent with the rules under section 212(b)(2)(D);

"(9) contain rules consistent with the rules under section 215(c);

"(10) contain provisions to assure that any person who alleges any injury resulting from a violation of any plan provision shall be entitled to redress pursuant to State law or under such procedures as may be established by the Governor or State agency prior to the date on which the plan is certified under subsection (e); and

"(11) contain provisions described in section 213(b)(2)(B).

"(e) CERTIFICATION.—(1) A Governor or State agency which elects to certify a plan under this section shall certify, pursuant to a form to be prescribed by the Secretary (except as provided by paragraph (2)) to the Secretary that the plan—

"(A) has been formulated in accordance with subsection (c); and

"(B) will be adequately implemented.

"(2) If a form is not made available by the Secretary within 90 days after the date of the enactment of this section, the Governor or State agency may make such certification on a form prescribed by such Governor or State agency.

"(3) Any certification under this subsection shall include a detailed explanation of the manner in which the contents of the plan will be implemented.

"(f) ANNUAL REPORT.—(1) The State shall submit an annual report to the Secretary, within 60 days after the end of the 1-year period to which the report relates, describing the implementation of the plan and the results thereof.

"(2) Such report shall include—

"(A) a statement of the number of buildings receiving benefits under subsection (d)(2),

"(B) a statement of the energy savings resulting from the plan, including a statement of average energy consumption reductions in the case of residential buildings which receive energy conservation suggestions or energy conservation improvements under subsection (d)(2), and a statement of average maximum kilowatt demand reductions in the case of residential buildings which receive load management improvements under subsection (d)(2),

"(C) a statement of the proportion of individuals with low and moderate incomes who receive benefits under subsection (d)(2),

"(D) a detailed description of the benefits provided under the plan, and

"(E) the names of the entities carrying out the plan.

"(g) ADMINISTRATIVE AND JUDICIAL ENFORCEMENT PROCEEDINGS.—(1) At any time more than 1 year after an alternative State plan has been certified under subsection (e) with respect to a State, any resident of such State may petition the Secretary to conduct a public hearing to determine if the alternative State plan has been adequately implemented. A copy of such petition shall be transmitted to the Governor or the appropriate State agency on the same date it is transmitted to the Secretary. The Secretary shall have 90 days after the date on which such petition is received to make a determination on the matter.

"(2) Except as provided in paragraph (3), if the Secretary determines that the alternative State plan has not been adequately implemented, the Secretary shall, within the 90-day period described in paragraph (1), initiate standby authority under section 219 with respect to such State. If the Secretary does not initiate the standby authority within the 90-day period, the resident may bring a de novo action in the appropriate United States district court—

"(A) against the Secretary (with the State having the right to intervene) to require the Secretary to implement standby authority under section 219, or

"(B) against the State to require the State to adequately implement the alternative State plan certified under subsection (e).

If the court finds that the State has failed to adequately implement such plan, it shall order the remedy requested by the plaintiff under subparagraph (A) or (B). If an individual prevails in an action under subparagraph (A), the court shall award such individual reasonable fees and expenses of attorneys and costs.

"(3) If a State which had an approved plan in effect under section 212 on the day before the date on which certification was made under this section informs the Secretary in writing, within 30 days after receiving a copy of the petition described in paragraph (1), that it will no longer implement a plan certified under this section and that it will implement the approved plan which was in effect in the State on the day before certification of the alternative plan under this section—

"(A) the determinations and actions described in paragraph (2) may not be carried out; and

"(B) sections 212 through 219 shall apply in such State except to the extent an alternative utility plan under section 227 is implemented in such State.

"(4)(A) A resident may not petition the Secretary under paragraph (1) and may not bring an action under paragraph (2) if such petition or action is based solely on a failure to reach the results described in paragraph (3) of subsection (d) or subsection (k).

"(B) A court may not make a finding that a State has failed to adequately implement a plan under paragraph (2) if such finding is based solely on a failure to reach the results described in paragraph (3) of subsection (d) or subsection (k).

"(h) COVERAGE.—A plan certified under this section shall not apply to utilities other than utilities covered under section 211(a).

"(i) INCLUSION OF NONREGULATED UTILITIES.—No nonregulated utility may be included in a plan by a Governor or State agency under this section unless such inclusion is authorized under State law or the nonregulated utility agrees to such inclusion.

"(j) UTILITIES WITH RETAIL SERVICE TERRITORIES IN MORE THAN 1 STATE.—For purposes of this section, any utility with a retail service territory (as defined in section 227(d)) in more than one State shall be considered to be a separate utility with respect to each State in which its retail service territory is located.

"(k) ALTERNATIVE STANDARDS.—(1) If—

"(A) the Governor or State agency which certifies a plan under this section finds—

"(i) with respect to the first year in which the alternative State plan is to be in effect, that residential customers will not be adequately informed of the availability of benefits under such plan, or

"(ii) with respect to any year in which the alternative State plan is to be in effect, that—

"(I) the number of residential buildings which have received benefits described in subsection (d)(2) (regardless of whether included in a plan) prior to such year is so large that the results described in subsection (d)(3) are unlikely to be reached in the absence of a finding under this subsection, or

"(II) such alternative State plan (or substantial portions thereof) will primarily benefit individuals with low or moderate incomes, and

"(B) such finding is made after interested persons are afforded an opportunity to present oral and written comments thereon (which, with respect to the first year in which an alternative State plan is to be in effect, may be in combination with the opportunity afforded under subsection (c)(3)), the results described in subsection (d)(3)(A) shall be applied to such year by substituting for '5 percent' a percentage (determined by such Governor or State agency) which is less than 5 percent and greater than or equal to 3 percent.

"(2) A finding under this subsection may not be made more frequently than once a year and each such finding shall be applicable to the implementation of an alternative State plan for a period, beginning on the date specified in such finding, not to exceed 12 months. Such period shall not begin before the date of such finding.

"(l) CLASSIFICATION AS LOAD MANAGEMENT IMPROVEMENT OR ENERGY CONSERVATION IMPROVEMENT.—For purposes of this section, in the case of a technique or installation which may be classified as either a load management improvement or an energy conservation improvement, the Governor, by rule, shall determine whether to treat such technique or installation as a load management improvement, an energy conservation improvement, or both.

"SEC. 227. ALTERNATIVE UTILITY PLANS.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—A regulated utility which is in a State in which an alternative State plan is not in effect under section 226 and a nonregulated utility which is not included in a plan submitted by a Governor or State agency as described in section 212(c) (if such inclusion is authorized under State law) or in a plan certified under section 226 may elect to certify an alternative utility plan under this section.

"(b) CONSEQUENCES OF CERTIFICATION.—(1) Beginning with the date on which the certification of a plan is made with respect to a utility under subsection (e) and ending with the date on which a plan is no longer in effect under this section with respect to such utility—

"(A) sections 212(a) through (c)(3), 213 through 215, and sections 217, 218, and 226 shall not apply with respect to such utility; and

"(B) section 219 shall apply to such utility only to the extent provided for in subsection (g).

"(2) Except as provided in subsection (g), any utility which certifies a plan under subsection (e) shall continue to have such plan in effect until the expiration of the 5-year period beginning on the day of such certification or until January 1, 1990, whichever occurs first.

"(c) FORMULATION OF PLAN.—The Governor or State agency authorized to do so under State law shall formulate a plan under this section on behalf of any regulated utility which has elected to certify a plan under this section. In formulating any plan under this section, the nonregulated utility or the Governor or State agency in the case of a regulated utility shall—

"(1) provide for advance notice to the public of such plan;

"(2) publish a description of the proposed content and implementation of the plan;

"(3) afford interested persons an opportunity to present oral and written comments on matters relating to such proposed plan; and

"(4) after taking such public comment into consideration, prescribe and make public the content and implementation of such plan.

"(d) CONTENT OF PLAN.—Any plan certified pursuant to this section shall—

"(1) be designed to result in the dissemination of general energy conservation suggestions to all residential customers of such utility;

"(2) be designed to result in—

"(A) specific energy conservation suggestions to each residential customer requesting such suggestions regarding the customer's residential building,

"(B) energy conservation improvements (which are included in such plan) to the customer's residential building, or

"(C) load management improvements (which are included in such plan) in the customer's residential building;

"(3) except as provided in subsection (j), for each year in which such plan is in effect and with respect to the retail service territory of the utility, be designed to result in—

"(A) benefits under paragraph (2) for a number of buildings equal to 5 percent or more of the residential buildings using natural gas or electric energy from such utility which did not, before such year, receive benefits under this Act (other than under paragraph (1) or section 226(d)(1)) or similar State law;

"(B) energy consumption reductions (as determined by the Governor by rule) of an average of 10 percent or more (as compared to the preceding year) in the residential buildings in such territory which receive specific energy conservation suggestions or energy conservation improvements under paragraph (2) during the year for which the determination is made; and

"(C) maximum kilowatt demand reductions (as determined by the Governor by rule) of an average of 10 percent or more (as compared to the preceding year) in the residential buildings in such territory which receive load management improvements under paragraph (2) during the year for which the determination is made;

"(4) be designed to benefit individuals including but not limited to individuals with low or moderate incomes;

"(5) contain adequate procedures to assure that, if a public utility supplies or installs residential energy conservation measures, such actions shall be consistent with section 216 and prices and rates of interest charged shall be fair and reasonable;

"(6) contain adequate procedures for preventing unfair, deceptive, or anticompetitive acts or practices affecting commerce which relate to the implementation of such plan;

"(7) be consistent with the rules under section 212(b)(2)(D);

"(8) contain rules consistent with the rules under section 215(c);

"(9) contain provisions to assure that any person who alleges any injury resulting from a violation of any plan provision shall be entitled to redress—

"(A) in the case of an alleged violation by a regulated utility, pursuant to State law or under such procedures as may be established by the Governor or State agency prior to the date on which the plan is certified under subsection (e), or

"(B) in the case of an alleged violation by a nonregulated utility, under such procedures as are established by the nonregulated utility prior to the date on which the plan is certified under subsection (e); and

"(10) contain provisions described in section 213(b)(2)(B).

For purposes of this subsection, the term 'retail service territory' means the territory in a State in which a utility makes retail sales to residential customers.

"(e) CERTIFICATION.—(1) A utility which elects to certify a plan under this section shall certify, pursuant to a form to be prescribed by the Secretary (except as provided by paragraph (2)), to the Secretary that the plan—

"(A) has been formulated in accordance with subsection (c); and

"(B) will be adequately implemented.

"(2) If a form is not made available to a utility by the Secretary within 90 days after the date of the enactment of this section, the utility may make such certification on a form prescribed by such utility.

"(3) Any certification under this subsection shall include a detailed explanation of the manner in which the contents of the plan will be implemented, and, in the case of a regulated utility, shall include a statement of support from the Governor or the State agency of the State concerned.

"(f) ANNUAL REPORT.—(1) The utility shall submit an annual report to the Secretary, within 60 days after the end of the 1-year period to which the report relates, describing the implementation of the plan and the results thereof.

"(2) Such report shall include—

"(A) a statement of the number of buildings receiving benefits under subsection (d)(2),

"(B) a statement of the energy savings resulting from the plan, including a statement of average energy consumption reductions in the case of residential buildings which receive energy conservation suggestions or energy conservation improvements under subsection (d)(2), and a statement of average maximum kilowatt demand reductions in the case of residential buildings which receive load management improvements under subsection (d)(2),

"(C) a statement of the proportion of individuals with low and moderate incomes who receive benefits under subsection (d)(2),

"(D) a detailed description of the benefits provided under the plan, and

"(E) the names of the entities carrying out the plan.

"(g) ADMINISTRATIVE AND JUDICIAL ENFORCEMENT PROCEEDINGS.—(1) At any time more than 1 year after an alternative utility plan has been certified under subsection (e) with respect to a utility, any residential customer of such utility may petition the Secretary to conduct a public hearing to determine if the alternative utility plan has been adequately implemented. A copy of such petition shall be transmitted to the utility on the same date it is transmitted to the Secretary. The Secretary shall have 90 days after the date on which such petition is received to make a determination on the matter.

"(2) Except as provided in paragraph (3), if the Secretary determines that the alternative utility plan has not been adequately implemented, the Secretary shall, within the 90-day period described in paragraph (1), initiate standby authority under section 219 with respect to the utility concerned. If the Secretary does not initiate such standby authority within such 90-day period, such customer may bring a de novo action in the appropriate United States district court—

"(A) against the Secretary (with the utility having the right to intervene) to require the Secretary to implement standby authority under section 219 with respect to such utility, or

"(B) against the utility to require the utility to adequately implement the alternative utility plan certified under subsection (e).

If the court finds that the utility has failed to adequately implement such plan, it shall order the remedy requested by the plaintiff under subparagraph (A) or (B). If an individual prevails in an action under subparagraph (A), the court shall award such individual reasonable fees and expenses of attorneys and costs.

"(3) If a utility which was within an approved State plan under section 212 on the day before the date on which certification was made under this section informs the Secretary in writing, within 30 days after receiving a copy of a petition described in paragraph (1), that it will no longer implement a plan certified under this section and that it will carry out a program in accordance with the State plan in effect under this part in the State—

"(A) the determinations and actions described in paragraph (2) may not be carried out; and

"(B) sections 212 through 219 shall apply to such utility unless it voluntarily or pursuant to State law becomes part of a State alternative plan implemented in the State under section 226.

"(4) For purposes of implementing section 219(a)(2) to a regulated utility as a result of this subsection, the term 'each regulated utility in the State' in such section shall be deemed to mean only the utility with respect to which action is taken under this subsection.

"(5)(A) A residential customer may not petition the Secretary under paragraph (1) and may not bring an action under paragraph (2) if such petition or action is based solely on a failure to reach the results described in paragraph (3) of subsection (d) or subsection (j).

"(B) A court may not make a finding that a utility has failed to adequately implement a plan under paragraph (2) if such finding is based solely on a failure to reach the results described in paragraph (3) of subsection (d) or subsection (j).

"(h) COVERAGE.—A plan certified under this section shall not apply to utilities other than utilities covered under section 211(a).

"(i) UTILITIES WITH RETAIL SERVICE TERRITORIES IN MORE THAN 1 STATE.—For purposes of this section, any utility with a retail service territory (as defined in subsection (d)) in more than one State shall be considered to be a separate utility with respect to each State in which its retail service territory is located.

"(j) ALTERNATIVE STANDARDS.—(1) If—

"(A) the Governor of a State which includes a retail service territory (as defined in subsection (d)) of a utility which certifies a plan under this section finds, for such retail service territory—

"(i) with respect to the first year in which the alternative utility plan is to be in effect, that residential customers will not be adequately informed of the availability of benefits under such plan, or

"(ii) with respect to any year in which the alternative utility plan is to be in effect, that—

"(I) the number of residential buildings which have received benefits described in subsection (d)(2) (regardless of whether included in a plan) prior to such year is so large that the requirements of subsection (d)(3) are unlikely to be met in the absence of a finding under this subsection, or

"(II) such alternative utility plan (or substantial portions thereof) will primarily benefit individuals with low or moderate incomes, and

"(B) such finding is made after interested persons are afforded an opportunity to present oral and written comments thereon (which, with respect to the first year in which an alternative utility plan is to be in effect, may be in combination with the opportunity afforded under subsection (c)(3)), the requirements of subsection (d)(3)(A) shall be applied to such retail service territory for such year by substituting for '5 percent' a percentage (determined by such Governor) which is less than 5 percent and greater than or equal to 3 percent.

"(2) A finding under this subsection may not be made more frequently than once a year and each such finding shall be applicable to the implementation of an alternative utility plan for a period, beginning on the date specified in such finding, not to exceed 12 months. Such period shall not begin before the date of such finding.

"(k) CLASSIFICATION AS LOAD MANAGEMENT IMPROVEMENT OR ENERGY CONSERVATION IMPROVEMENT.—For purposes of this section, in the case of a technique or installation which may be classified as either a load management improvement or an energy conservation improvement, the Governor, by rule, shall determine whether to treat such technique or installation as a load management improvement, an energy conservation improvement, or both.".

(b) TVA AUTHORITY.—Paragraph (4) of section 212(c) is amended by inserting ", section 210(21), section 226, or section 227" after "this section,".

(c) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—

(1) Subsection (e) of section 218 of such Act is amended by striking out the period at the end of the second sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "or a plan in effect under section 226 or section 227 which is applicable to such utility.".

(2) Subsection (a) of section 219 of such Act is amended by striking out "If" and inserting in lieu thereof "Except as provided in sections 226 and 227, if".

(3) Subsection (b) of section 219 of such Act is amended by striking out "If" and inserting in lieu thereof "Except as provided in sections 226 and 227, if".

(d) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of contents for such Act is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 225 the following new items:

"Sec. 226. Alternative State plans.
"Sec. 227. Alternative utility plans.".

SEC. 104. REPORTS AND DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 225 of the National Energy Conservation Policy Act (relating to FTC study and report submitted before January 1, 1982) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 225. REPORTS AND DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION.

"(a) GENERAL REPORT.—(1)(A) No later than January 1, 1986, the Secretary shall submit a report to the chairman of the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives and the chairman of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate relating to the operation of this part.

"(B) Not later than January 1 of every other year after 1986, the Secretary shall submit a report to the Chairman of the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives and the Chairman of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate relating to the operation of this part during the preceding 2-year period.

"(2) Each such report shall include—

"(A) a comparison of actual and predicted energy savings resulting from plans under this part,

"(B) identification of the most effective plans (or portions thereof),

"(C) an analysis, based on completed audits and other relevant data, of the energy saving potential of the installation of additional residential conservation measures, and

"(D) an analysis of economic, technical, behavioral, and other factors considered relevant to energy consumption by the Secretary.

Nothing in this paragraph shall require a survey of each residential building in which a residential energy conservation measure has been installed under this part.

"(b) SUMMARY OF ALTERNATIVE PLAN REPORTS.—No later than January 1, 1986, and no later than January 1 of each year thereafter, the Secretary shall submit a report to the Chairman of the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives and the Chairman of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate summarizing the annual reports the Secretary received under section 226(f) and section 227(f) during the 12-month period ending on the preceding July 1.

"(c) DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION.—(1)(A) The Secretary shall at least annually, in fiscal years beginning after September 30, 1984, disseminate to the States and public utilities information providing technical assistance (including assistance in making calculations under sections 226(d)(3)(B) and 227(d)(3)(B)) and relating to the most cost-effective energy conservation procedures and devices (including residential energy conservation measures) and the most successful plans (or portions thereof) under this part.

"(B) The Secretary shall make the information described in subparagraph (A) available to the public.

"(2) The Secretary shall conduct seminars in various regions of the United States to disseminate information described in paragraph (1).".

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of contents of such Act is amended by striking out the item relating to section 225 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 225. Reports and dissemination of information.".

SEC. 105. LOAD MANAGEMENT IMPROVEMENT DEFINED.

Section 210 of the National Energy Conservation Policy Act (relating to definitions) is amended by inserting after paragraph (20) the following new paragraph:

"(21) The term 'load management improvements' means—

"(A) as determined by the Secretary—

"(i) load management techniques (other than time-of-day or seasonal rates), and

"(ii) the installation of energy-efficient electric appliances or any other devices which reduce kilowatt demand, and

"(B) as determined by the Governor of a State, any other improvements in such State which are described in clause (i) or (ii) of subparagraph (A).".

SEC. 106. LIMITATION ON SUPPLY AND INSTALLATION BY PUBLIC UTILITIES.

(a) ADDITIONAL REQUIREMENTS FOR WAIVER.—Section 216(e) of the National Energy Conservation Policy Act (relating to waiver of prohibition against supply and installation of residential energy conservation measures by public utilities) is amended—

(1) by striking out "The" and inserting in lieu thereof "(1) The",

(2) by striking out "charged and" and inserting in lieu thereof "charged, there will be no unfair competitive advantages to the utility (with respect to competitors such as small businesses) in carrying out such activities, and", and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2) The Governor may not support the petition of a regulated utility under paragraph (1) before—

"(A) the Governor—

"(i) provides advance notice to the public of such waiver petition,

"(ii) affords interested persons an opportunity to present oral and written comments on the waiver petition, and

"(iii) makes the determinations and findings which the Secretary is required to make in order to grant a waiver under paragraph (1), and sets forth, in writing, such findings and the reasons for such determinations and findings; and

"(B) the utility makes all relevant documents and records requested by the Governor available to the Governor.".

(b) CONTRACTING EXEMPTION.—Subsection (c) of such section is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) This subsection shall not apply to the supply or installation of residential energy conservation measures other than specific measures which the Secretary determines—

"(A) were being installed or supplied by a public utility on the date of the enactment of the Conservation Service Reform Act of 1984, or

"(B) were broadly advertised on or before such date of enactment.".

(c) GENERAL EXEMPTION.—Subsection (d) of such section is amended—

(1) by striking out "The" and inserting in lieu thereof: "(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), the",

(2) by redesignating paragraphs (1) through (3) as subparagraphs (A) through (C), respectively, and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2) Effective July 1, 1986, subparagraphs (A) and (B) of paragraph (1) shall not apply to the supply or installation of residential energy conservation measures other than measures which the Secretary determines were being installed or supplied by a public utility during the 12-month period ending June 1, 1984.

"(3)(A) If any person requests review of an exemption under paragraph (1)(A) or (B) by the Governor of the State in which the exemption applies, and such request includes adequate documentation, the Governor shall review such exemption under subparagraph (B).

"(B) If, after notice and opportunity for a public hearing, the Governor determines that with respect to an activity which is the subject of a request under subparagraph (A)—

"(i) the utility is not charging fair and reasonable prices and rates of interest,

"(ii) there are unfair competitive advantages to the utility (with respect to competitors such as small businesses),

"(iii) such activity is inconsistent with the prevention of unfair methods of competition or the prevention of unfair or deceptive acts or practices, or

"(iv) the utility has not provided the Governor with all documents and records he determines necessary to make the determination under clauses (i) through (iii), and sets forth, in writing, such determination and the reasons for such determination, such exemption shall not apply to the activity which is the subject of such request.

"(C) Notwithstanding any findings of the Governor under subparagraph (B), the Governor may allow an exemption under paragraph (1)(A) or (B) if the utility establishes to the satisfaction of the Governor that it will provide appropriate competitive safeguards.".

TITLE II—REPEAL OF PROVISIONS REGARDING COMMERCIAL BUILDINGS AND MULTIFAMILY DWELLINGS

SEC. 201. (a) IN GENERAL.—Title VII of the National Energy Conservation Policy Act (relating to energy conservation for commercial buildings and multifamily dwellings) is hereby repealed.

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of contents for such Act is amended by striking out the items relating to title VII.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. OTTINGER] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from California [Mr. MOORHEAD] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman form New York [Mr. OTTINGER].

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to my colleague from Texas [Mr. RALPH M. HALL] who is the author of this legislation, and I comment him for his hard work in reaching a bipartisan compromise that greatly improves this program.

Mr. RALPH M. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished gentleman from New York for yielding time to me.

As the Members in the House know, this legislation is the product of over a year of debate between the gentleman from New York [Mr. OTTINGER] and myself. I introduced legislation last year to repeal the Residential Conservation Service and the Commercial and Apartment Conservation Service.

That bill, H.R. 3966, was the subject of extensive hearings before the Subcommittee on Energy Conservation and Power of which I am a member. Today, I stand before the House after long and tireless negotiations with Chairman OTTINGER and Chairman DINGELL, with a piece of legislation which balances many of the original concerns H.R. 3966 addressed and many that were addressed in H.R. 5467, Chairman OTTINGER's legislation. This effort represents a true compromise by both parties. Clearly, American utility consumers, utilities, and States, should view this legislation as far better than the current law.

The Committee on Energy and Commerce thought so highly of this bill that it reported it out unanimously.

In reviewing the long list of those organizations which have endorsed H.R. 5946 since it was introduced, I believe my colleagues will find an unusual alliance. Let me enumerate some of the supporters of this legislation: The American Gas Association, the Sierra Club, the Edison Electric Institute, the Environmental Policy Institute, the National League of Cities, the American Public Power Association, the Consulting Engineers Council, the U.S. Council of Mayors, and the United Methodist Board of Church & Society to name just a few.

Many of you rightly ask, what specifically does this legislation do? First, the legislation reduces Federal regulation by repealing the Commercial and Apartment Conservation Service. Second, the legislation provides more flexibility to State by providing the option to a Governor or lead energy agency of a State to certify an alternative plan for their respective State. Third, the legislation promotes energy conservation by providing targets for those choosing to operate an alternative plan, allows a variety of new means of achieving conservation to be utilized, and extends the RCS program for 5 years. Fourth, the legislation will reduce utility charges currently scheduled to be billed to consumers for the implementation and start up of CACS. Under this bill, if enacted quickly, those charges will never be assessed. Fifth, the bill protects small business as it provides a list of small business protections from utility company's anticompetitive practices. Six, the legislation does all of these wonderful things without costing Americans one additional cent beyond the authorization under current law.

At this time I would like to focus on some of the specific provisions.

Recognizing that substantial gains have already been made in commercial properties, this legislation directs resources of States and utilities where much of the work remains to be done—the residential sector. In hearings, it was clearly reflected that CACS would be cumbersome, costly, and difficult to ascertain savings. Witnesses testified both in the Subcommittee on Energy Conservation and Power and the Small Business Subcommittee that the free market is currently responding to the demand for energy efficient devices in the units which would have been covered under CACS. It is for this reason that the policy redirects the attention back to the residential sector where the original job has not been finished.

A second major aspect of this legislation is the alternative plan which can be substitued for the current RCS requirements. In the hearings before the committee a theme continually reoccurred: We need flexibility in developing conservation strategies which are more cost effective in each respective State. Under H.R. 5946, maximum flexibility is provided for a Governor of a State to arrive at a conservation strategy which best fits their individual State.

The mechanism which seeks to garner conservation in that alternative plan is the design requirements. The legislation calls for alternative plans to be designed to have as its goals 5 percent participation of the residents who have not participated in an RCS type program to date, and garner 10 percent savings in the units served. The legislation does not ascribe parameters for what approach would be best in any State, allowing for new innovative techniques to be brought forward. Despite this approach the committee recognizes the enormous variance of participation and energy savings under the current RCS program. The report on H.R. 5946 states:

The wide variation in participation rates in RCS programs from State to State and from utility to utility suggest that there may be similar variations under the alternative plan. Factors that explain these variations, in addition to program design, may include climate, energy prices, density of population, previous levels of conservation in consumer's homes, customer attitudes toward utilities or State governments, customer attitudes about energy conservation and customer's income levels and education.

In reference to energy savings the report States:

As the experience with utility programs shows, the energy savings results vary widely. The reasons for this are numerous, including resident's decisions, for example, to take advantage of conservation improvements by increasing the thermostat setting in a home, or a decision not to invest in conservation despite an expert energy audit. Further providing flexibility to individual States and not to penalize difficult situations, the legislation specifically prohibits a petition to be filed on grounds of inadequate implementation solely for failure to reach the 5 percent participation and 10 percent savings goals. The legislation also provides that a Governor may lower the 5 percent target to 3 percent if certain findings are present.

This approach should give States such as Texas and California who have vastly differing temperature zones flexibility to comply.

The bill also allows for load management techniques to be utilized by electric utilities to reduce kilowatt demand during peak demand. The legislation in no way encourages or condones replacing home appliances with appliances powered by a fuel different from that used in the original appliance. That is not considered load management in and of itself.

I am proud to have introduced this balanced legislation and greatly appreciate the chairman of the full committee, Mr. DINGELL, and the chairman from the subcommittee, Mr. OTTINGER, for all of their help and assistance. I feel that this is truly a balanced compromise which all parties can be proud to take back to their constituents as better policy for America. I urge my colleagues to give their full support.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RALPH M. HALL. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, about $800,000 would have been spent by the Federal Government on the CACS regulations in fiscal year 1985. Would enactment of this legislation present this expenditure?

Mr. RALPH M. HALL. Yes, it will.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I know that the gentleman from Texas would agree with me that there is nothing more difficult to get rid of than a Federal program once it has been implemented. Are we repealing CACS in time to prevent extensive damage to States, utilities, and the consumers?

Mr. RALPH M. HALL. Yes; CACS has not yet been implemented, and a minimum of consumer expense has been incurred so far.

Mr. MOORHEAD. The gentleman from Texas has joined me in cosponsoring H.R. 2283, the Energy Consumers Regulatory Reform Act, which I introduced early this Congress. Would this legislation repeal CACS as totally and completely as H.R. 2283 would do?

Mr. RALPH M. HALL. Yes; you can be assured that it does.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I support the compromise legislation before us today. I commend Chairman OTTINGER of the Energy Conservation and Power Subcommittee as well as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RALPH M. HALL] for their effort to work out a meaningful compromise. From my perspective, Mr. Speaker, this bill is an important step toward recognizing that the best way to achieve energy conservation is through the operation of the marketplace. Decontrol efforts during President Reagan's tenure have shown that the most rational and efficient energy choices are made when Government interference with the free market is minimized. The cost of excessive Federal regulation is always borne by the consumer, and we have seen the consumer benefit enormously when Government gets out of the way.

In the 97th Congress, Mr. Speaker, I first introduced the Energy Consumers Regulatory Reform Act to promote the operation of the energy marketplace by repealing six regulatory programs which have burdened small businesses, cost energy consumers millions of dollars, and distorted the marketplace for energy conservation products and services over the last 7 years. I reintroduced this bill in the 98th Congress as H.R. 2283, and many members of the Energy and Commerce Committee again cosponsored this bill.

Two of the programs singled out for repeal by my reform legislation are the Residential Conservation Service [RCS] and Commercial and Apartment Conservation Service [CACS] Programs.

The RCS and CACS Programs were enacted to enable households and businesses to undertake full audit of their energy use and to help low- and moderate-income families identify cost-effective conservation measures which would lower their energy bills. These programs have failed dismally. They have not benefited low- and moderate-income families. They have needlessly added to the heavy burden shouldered by our Nation's ratepayers and small businesses.

I applaud the committee's recognition of the problems with these programs and its attempt to improve the RCS Program, but I support this legislation because it repeals the Commercial and Apartment Conservation Service Program. I believe that CACS would repeat the mistakes made with RCS. Since the CACS Program has not yet been fully implemented, I believe we should prevent this program from establishing any further bureaucratic roots by supporting its immediate repeal.

Once operational, the Commercial and Apartment Conservation Service Program would have suffered from the same problems that have flawed the RCS Program and may result in even greater inequities. Like RCS, CACS audits would subsidize the affluent at the expense of the poor, elderly, and minorities. The subsidy, however, would be even larger than that provided under RCS. Comprehensive energy audits of large or multitenant buildings are far more complicated and costly than audits provided for single family dwellings under RCS. Also, CACS is fundamentally unfair since it forces residential ratepayers to subsidize commercial establishments.

It is also likely that CACS would be even less effective than RCS. A landlord has little incentive to install conservation measures when the cost of utilities are passed on to renters. On the other hand, renters are unlikely to invest in modifications which will improve the value of their landlords' property and which would only pay off over a period of time which is longer than the renters' tenancy. Also, renters are unlikely to invest in measures whose effectiveness is contingent upon other renters adopting similar conservation measures. This is particularly true in light of the dismally low rates of participation likely to be encountered.

Further, as with RCS, the likelihood that those few who do participate will install conservation measures is quite small. This should not be surprising. Many cost-effective conservation measures are obvious, and the marketplace has already insured their implementation. To the extent lower utility bills enhance the value of commercial property and improve the bottom line for businesses, owners, and entrepreneurs have a financial incentive to install cost-effective energy conservation measures.

Also, the CACS Program is anticompetitive. Small business, ready and willing to provide energy audits, would be unable to compete with the subsidized audits utilities, might have to provide commercial establishments under CACS.

Mr. Speaker, this bill would also extend the RCS Program for an additional 5 years. My preference, of course, would be to repeal this program as well. But I will support this legislation as the best possible compromise under the circumstances, and as a necessary first step in enacting all of the provisions of H.R. 2283, the Energy Consumers Regulatory Reform Act.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I might consume.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly support this legislation and again would like to commend my colleague from Texas. I must say that I never thought I would see the day when the RCS bill came out as a noncontroversial measure. It is really a tribute to his hard work and devotion to making the RCS a really good workable program that this came about.

I would also like to commend our esteemed chairman of the committee, my friend, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL], and the ranking minority member of the Energy Conservation and Power Subcommittee, the gentleman from California [Mr. MOORHEAD], for the valuable contributions that they made in resolving this issue.

The core of this compromise was drafted following hearings before our subcommittee last September. In these hearings the subcommittee heard from utilities across the country which had successful energy conservation programs that were highly innovative and achieved substantially better results than the national average. These and other utilities told the subcommittee that if they had the flexibility to design their RCS programs according to regional needs and service area experiences, significantly more conservation could be achieved.

States as well commented that where their utilities were not interested in the program, that they thought they would like to pursue programs on their own. They thought they could achieve as good as or better than utilities have achieved elsewhere under this program.

So what this legislation does is provide the flexibility that was requested in those hearings.

What this bill does is allows the States to design alternative residential energy conservation plans which best meet their needs and allows them to supplant existing RCS utility programs with these new plans. A large variety of programs could qualify for the alternative program proposed under this bill including energy audits, conservation equipment financing programs, efficient appliance rebates, or the installation of low-cost, leak-plugging measures and other measures which a State or a utility might want to adopt.

At the State's option, the program may be administered by the State or its utilities, and the utilities are given a similar option to the State, to abandon the existing RCS program of energy audits and to design alternative programs of their own.

The bill encourages States and utilities to design alternative programs to meet specific performance goals. These goals are the most important reforms of the legislation, because they are aimed at pushing the utilities into improving their performance in the residential conservation area. Or, alternatively, having States meet higher energy conservation achievements.

One of those goals is to reach 5 percent of the eligible population that has not already received benefits through Federal or State programs.

I should point out that this program never was designed just to help poor people, though we have required that efforts be made to include poor people in the program. It is designed to save energy and reduce our dependence on imported oil. The goal of 5 percent is clearly achievable. Five States reached or exceeded 5 percent of their population with their RCS program for 2 years running: Washington, Wisconsin, Delaware, Vermont, and Michigan.

With the flexibility offered under this bill, States would have the opportunity to reach higher participation rates with programs especially designed for their region.

The other performance goal of the program is to achieve energy savings or reduced peak energy consumption of 10 percent annually on average per customer participating in the program. A well crafted conservation program should be able to achieve and, in all likelihood, exceed this target. In its recent review of utility conservation programs, the Department of Energy reported that under the existing program, RCS participants experience annual savings of 8 percent. The Lawrence Berkeley Laboratory finds in their studies that utility audit programs combined with financing measures show even higher savings—15 percent. And the Congressional Research Service concludes that the potential for cost-effective conservation measures is even higher—22 percent per household. These studies show that significant energy savings can be achieved, and the 10-percent goal of this legislation is reasonable indeed, even modest.

The legislation before us today is intended to give States and utilities the tools to tap an enormous potential for cost-effective energy conservation in our Nation's buildings. According to a recent study by the Congressional Research Service, the Nation could have saved an additional 2 to 3 million barrels of oil per day between 1973 and 1981 if cost-effective conservation improvements had been made in the Nation's residences. That savings would be equivalent to an estimated savings of $25 billion to $35 billion per year in reduced energy bills to the Nation's residents.

In addition to program reforms intended to result in a more effective conservation program, this bill addresses reforms to insure more competition for installation of these conservation measures. Current law prohibits utilities from installing or supplying conservation measures except under certain exemptions.

This legislation would amend existing law to provide an opportunity for public review of potential anticompetitive practices by exempted utilities. This opens the door for much more of this work to be done by small businesses.

As with any compromise, you do not get everything you want and in order to reach accommodation, I agreed to allow the repeal of a program that I strongly support; the Commerical and Apartment Conservation Service.

I would like to have to retained the CACS program so that conservation efforts could have been directed particularly at small commerical establishments and rental housing.

□ 1300

There are lots of mom and pop stores that use very heavy amounts of electricity, particularly for grocery types of operation for freezer-cooler operations. They could be greatly benefited by the kind of information that would have been provided under the CACS program.

However, it was my primary intent in supporting the RCS reform to restructure the program to achieve more energy conservation through added flexibility in utility conservation plans. I think the legislation does achieve that.

Mr. Speaker, this is a good bill and an important program. It should improve the conservation programs under the RCS program by a great deal.

I strongly urge its adoption.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to note that on page 33 of the committee report, the word "not" was inadvertently left out due to a typographical error. The fifth line under the section entitled, "State hearing for grandfathered utility," should read, "The exemption shall not continue for a grandfathered utility if the Governor, following a public hearing, makes any of the following findings * * *." This correction would make the report consistent with section 216(d)(3)(B) added to the National Energy Conservation Policy Act by section 106 of H.R. 5946 as amended.

Before I wind up my statement on the bill I would like to point out to Members that these reforms are being proposed because the Department of Energy has shown utter contempt for the program and the law mandating it and has refused to administer the program properly. We really don't know how well the RCS Program is working as intended under the authorizing legislation because DOE has not administered it according to the law. Let me cite some examples of how DOE has sabotaged the program:

State plans have not been reviewed and approved by DOE in a timely manner.

Issuance of regulations has been encumbered by a lengthy series of delays.

Enforcement of the Federal standby authority required by statute has not been fulfilled.

Program regulations were revised to significantly relax or eliminate program requirements.

Monitoring and evaluation systems needed to determine program status have not been implemented.

Research and technical assistance activities have been cut back.

Inconsistent staffing and reorganizations have plagued the program.

Zero funding proposals have been repeatedly submitted to Congress. Following repeated rejections, the Department has failed to spend appropriated funds.

In reports and testimony before the Energy Conservation and Power Subcommittee the General Accounting Office has fully documented these findings and specifically stated that surreptitious budgetary maneuvers, including a critically timed $2.5 million spending deferral in fiscal year 1983, had left the RCS Program "in a turmoil."

Mr. Speaker, the reforms in this bill are designed to put the RCS Program back on track and put the responsibility for its success in the hands of the States, which, unlike the Reagan administration, are not ideologically opposed to the enormous economic value and benefits of strong conservation programs.

In order to make sure that the reformed program has a chance to work, this legislation extends the requirement that utilities announce the availability of the RCS Program from January 2, 1985, to January 1, 1990. Existing law does not set any sunset date on the obligation of utilities to provide the RCS service to its customers, only on the date by which it must be announced.

This is an important point and one I want to make perpectly clear: There is no termination date for the RCS Program. At the end of my statement I am inserting in the RECORD an analysis conducted by the Library of Congress which supports this reading of the law. The analysis states:

> We * * * believe that as a general matter there is no statutory expiration of the authority or mandate for the Residential Conservation Service Program, although there are specific statutory terminations of certain requirements imposed by the Act.

Mr. Speaker, we need to allow the RCS Program to work. We need to reaffirm Congress' intent to have a strong national energy policy that reduces the need for imported oil. We need H.R. 5946.

The letter follows:

WASHINGTON, DC, September 26, 1983.

To: House Committee on Energy and Commerce, Subcommittee on Energy Conservation and Power.

From: American Law Division.

Subject: Termination of the Residential Conservation Service Program Under the National Energy Conservation Policy Act.

This will respond to your request that we review the provisions of the National Energy Conservation Policy Act, as amended, for the purpose of determining whether there is a termination date established for the Residential Conservation Service Program.

We have reviewed the pertinent authorities and believe that as a general matter there is no statutory expiration of the authority or mandate for the Residential Conservation Service Program, although there are specific statutory terminations of certain requirements imposed by the Act.

As you know, the provisions of Part 1 of Title II of the National Energy Conservation Policy Act, Public Law 95-619 (1978) established the Residential Conservation Service Program. Certain amendments were made to that program by Congress by Subtitle B of Title V of the Energy Security Act, Public Law 96-294 (1980).

As amended, the statutory program required large electric and natural gas utilities to inform residential customers of the benefits of certain energy conservation and renewable resource measures, to offer their customers energy audits, and to offer to arrange for the installation and financing of such measures. For those States that elect to participate in the program, the legislation requires the submission and approval of an acceptable State plan. For those states that choose not to submit plans, the legislation requires implementation of the Federal program.

Since the Program was first establishd in 1978, a series of regulations have been adopted by the Department of Energy to carry out the Program. See, 47 Fed. Reg. 27752 (June 25, 1982), footnote 1.

The National Energy Conservation Policy Act contains three provisions that terminate on January 1, 1985, specific notice requirements that covered utilities are obliged to give to their customers:

(1) Under the provisions of 42 U.S. Code Section 8216(a), the utility program required under the Act must "include procedure designed to inform . . . each two years . . . before January 1, 1985, each of its residential customers" of certain energy conservation matters;

(2) Under the provisions of 42 U.S. Code Section 8216(d), the covered utilities must give notice to new residential customers of the conservation measures, energy audit procedures, and make offers for certain installation requirements "before January 1, 1985"; and,

(3) Under the provisions of 42 U.S. Code Section 8218(a), in connection with the home heating suppliers program, notice is required to be given "each two years . . . before January 1, 1985" to residential customers of certain specific energy cost saving measures.

In each case, it appears that the January 1, 1985, date merely terminates the obligations under the Act to give customers notice, but there is nothing under the Act that expressly provides that the entire program and the other specific ogligations imposed upon utilities expires at that time.

On the contrary, the Act provides in Section 211, as amended, 42 U.S. Code Section 8212 as follows:

This part [the Residential Conservation Service Program] shall apply in any calendar year to a public utility only if during the second preceding calendar year either—

(1) Sales of natural gas by such public utility for purposes other than resale exceeded 10 billion cubic feet, or

(2) Sales of electric energy by such public utility for purposes other than resale exceeded 750 million kilowatt-hours.

Thus, the section contemplates that the Act will impose continuing obligations on covered utilities (although certain customer notice requirements terminate on January 1, 1985) to provide the services relating to energy conservation so long as the utility meets the threshold sales requirements of Section 211 in "any calendar year."

A review of the regulations adopted by the Department of Energy at 10 C.F.R. Part 456, 47 Fed. Reg. 2772 (June 25, 1982) does not indicate any provision of the regulations that suggest a termination for the program on January 1, 1985.

For the reasons set forth above, it appears that the authority and mandate established by law provides no termination of the entire Residential Conservation Service Program on January 1, 1985 or any other date.

We trust that the foregoing has been responsive to your inquiry.

ROBERT D. POLING,
Specialist in American Public Law.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLILEY].

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, as so often happens in an election year—or just before a long-awaited congressional recess—Members are often less than willing to spend much time on seemingly minor pieces of legislation. That's understandable, since there are far fewer legislative days to deal with the major legislation that has to be passed. As a result, many bills do not get the full exposure that some require. Such is the case with H.R. 5946, the Conservation Service Reform Act of 1984.

I have no qualms with most of this bill. Indeed, I'm pleased that the worthy sponsors of this bill—particularly Messrs. RALPH M. HALL, MOORHEAD, and OTTINGER—were able to strike a compromise.

However, I'm concerned that this compromise was reached late on the evening of June 27, and was voted through the full Energy and Commerce Committee at 10 the following morning. It seemed sufficient at that time that the compromise was agreed to by a varied and bipartisan group. However, many individuals with direct interest in this bill—whether supportive or not of the two programs—had no opportunity to study the compromise nor to express concerns or educate their associates on the merits of the compromise. With little more to go on than the fact that the compromise had been struck, the committee ordered the bill reported by unanimous voice vote.

We are now being asked to give final House approval to this legislation under circumstances which provide little debate and no opportunity for amendments to improve the bill.

Members may be convinced that H.R. 5946 is noncontroversial and minimal expense is involved. Yet, the U.S. Department of Energy estimates that the Residential Conservation Service [RCS] Program which this bill extends will cost the American consumer some $7 billion over the life of the program. How much will an alternative State plan—with significantly higher participation goals—cost utility ratepayers? Although the sponsors have requested this information from DOE, the figures have not been forthcoming.

I would like to congratulate the sponsors of this bill. I support their efforts. However, I still would like to see both the RCS and the CACS Programs repealed. Indeed, if one sentence could describe this bill, it would be that "Half-a-loaf is great, but a whole loaf—that is, repealing both programs—would be much greater."

I would hope that the other body gives a thorough investigation of the merits of the RCS and CACS Programs and their associated costs to American ratepayers before giving this bill their final approval.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RALPH M. HALL].

Mr. RALPH M. HALL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to agree with the merit of changing the RCS Program as set out by the gentleman from Virginia, and repealing the CACS Program, although not officially implemented yet.

I think, given the fact that the RCS Program is not cost effective, we do not believe that the CACS Program could be cost effective either. That is the reason that we have, as the gentleman from Virginia pointed out, obtained half a loaf, and repealed CACS, and hopefully, given more flexibility to the RCS Program.

The buildings covered by the CACS Program are much more complex than those covered by the RCS Program, and certainly most building owners already have an incentive, due to rising energy costs, to implement conservation measures.

I just wanted to give those answers and also point out that no further expense is involved.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to point out that the Congressional Research Service and all the people who have worked on this have indicated that rather than costing consumers, as the gentleman from Virginia indicated some $7 billion, I have found that in the actual experience of the program where it has been implemented it has saved consumers very substantial amounts and that the potential savings of the residential conservation program run into the billions of dollars, not millions of dollars. If this program with its additional flexibility achieves that potential, it is going to save consumers lots of money, not cost them and that is why the conservation organizations, the consumer organizations of the country, so strongly support it.

● Mr. OXLEY. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5946, the Conservation Service Reform Act of 1984, passed unanimously out of the Energy and Commerce Committee on June 28. Noting that the compromise had been agreed to by the bill's sponsors, the chairman and the ranking Republican member of the Energy Conservation and Power Subcommittee, and chairman of the full committee, committee members were hesitant to raise questions about an issue which appeared to have such universal support. The slower pace of the district work period, however, has allowed an opportunity for reflection on the legislation's provisions. I would hope to raise some of these concerns in the limited time allowed for today's debate.

The bill allows the Governor of any State to substitute an alternate State plan for the requirements of the Residential Conservation Service [RCS] program established under the NECPA. The plan, in order to avoid legal challenge, must be "designed to result in" an annual participation rate of 5 percent per year for each year that the program is in existence. I question whether the goal of a 5-percent participation rate per year is realistic in light of the participation rate experienced under the RCS program. In testimony delivered before the Energy Conservation and Power Subcommittee last September, the national participation rate was approximately 2 percent per year.

Even the extensive promotion efforts of Mass-Sav, a consortium organized by the utilities in Massachusetts to run their program, only received a cumulative participation rate of 8 percent over a 3-year period.

Even if the 5-percent goal were reached, how much will it cost to achieve this goal, and will the resultant energy savings be worth the cost? Natural gas utilities have calculated the cost of conservation under the RCS program and have come up with some startling figures: Southern California Gas estimated that its cost of saving gas was $30 per thousand cubic feet; UGI, a Pennsylvania company, estimated that their cost was $32 per thousand cubic feet; while Lone Star, a Texas utility, calculated a cost of $82 per thousand cubic feet.

The alternative State plan would also have as its goal a 10-percent reduction in energy usage for each residence taking advantage of the program. How can these energy reduction percentages be guaranteed in a society which prides itself on the notion that a man's home is his castle? Once the conservation suggestion has been provided to a homeowner, who will then guarantee that it will be implemented? And if the intent is not to force the homeowner to save energy, why does the legislation establish an energy savings goal of 10 percent?

The legislation raises more questions than it answers—far more questions than can be considered in this limited period of debate.●

● Mrs. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to support H.R. 5946, the Conservation Service Reform Act of 1984, and to commend the chairman of the Energy Conservation and Power Subcommittee for his efforts to improve the existing program. However, I would also like to share a few concerns about the legislation which I hope will be resolved when this bill is considered by the other body. It should be noted that the central thrust of this legislation allows the Governor of the State to propose an alternative State plan. Although the Governor plays an extremely important role in the government of a State, he or she is not the single source or repository of all State power. The State legislatures and the utility regulatory commissions are also integral factors in the area of utility conservation programs. I am concerned that this legislation would give the Governors of some States the right to propose programs they could not enact under State law. In Maryland, attempts by the Governor, through the State energy office, to provide weatherization kits costing approximately $100 to homeowners making $34,000 per year has been rejected by the State legislature 2 years in a row. I also believe that it is important to allow the States to grandfather in existing conservation programs which have a proven track record. Finally, there is no requirement under the alternative State plan that the body most familiar with utility practices and procedures, the State utility regulatory commissions, have a role in this process. The public utility commissions determine which costs are properly paid by the ratepayers and would be more likely to take cost consideration when determining which plan provisions would provide the most benefit to utility customers. The Governor, on the other hand, is required to do no such cost benefit analysis. Hopefully, these concerns will be addressed by the time the bill reaches the President's desk.●

● Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Speaker, the major driving force behind the enactment of the National Energy Conservation Policy Act of 1978 was the realization of our dependency on foreign sources of energy. It was a matter of national security that we reduce that dependency to a minimum: We were in danger of being rendered virtually defenseless had those foreign sources of energy become suddenly unavailable. For that reason, conservation became a national directive.

As part of that directive, the Residential Conservation Service Program was enacted. Both national studies and the subcommittee hearings' records show that the program is not cost effective. No demonstrable energy conservation can be directly attributed to RCS since its implementation in 1979, yet it has cost consumers billions of dollars. The bill which we are considering today, H.R. 5946, would not only extend the RCS program for another 5 years but would also expand the requirements of the program at still greater expense.

I believe that energy conservation is a laudable goal, especially in terms of national security. But I seriously question whether this bill or the RCS program is effective in reaching that goal. I would strongly encourage my colleagues in the other body to carefully analyze the merits not only of this bill in particular, but of the program itself. Our national security is too important to waste our resources on ineffective programs, no matter how well intentioned.●

● Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my concern about certain provisions of H.R. 5946, the Conservation Service Reform Act, which would change the Residential Conservation Service. Under current law, the Federal Residential Conservation Service, administered by the utilities, must offer onsite energy audits to residential customers. H.R. 5946 permits the Governor of any State to substitute an alternative State plan for the Residential Conservation Service. While it does not specify the method for achieving conservation, the bill requires that the alternative State plan be designed to result in an annual participation rate of 5 percent per year.

I am concerned that the possible consequences of substituting the alternative State plan for the current Federal program have not been fully explored. I can see no evidence in the history of H.R. 5946 that transferring this program from Federal to State jurisdiction will acutally improve conservation efficiency. Moreover, I question whether the participation rate goal of 5 percent per year is realistic in light of the participation rate experienced under the Residential Conservation Service Program. The national participation rate is estimated to be about 2 percent per year. Even the extensive promotion efforts conducted in my own State of Massachusetts by Mass-Sav, the consortium organized by the utilities, resulted in a cumulative participation rate of only 8 percent over a 3-year period. Finally, I am concerned about the potential for politicization should this program be transferred from the Department of Energy to the discretion of the Governors. In its present form, the Residential Conservation Service is working free of local political influences; it is unclear if that will continue under alternative State plans.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation raised more questions than can be answered in the limited period of debate provided today. I am not sure it will resolve, rather than exacerbate, the problems of energy conservation programs.●

Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. OTTINGER] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 5946, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous material, on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

SMALL BUSINESS ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 6013) to amend the Small Business Act, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 6013

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. Section 20(q) of the Small Business Act is amended as follows:

(1) by striking from paragraph (1) thereof "$15,000,000" and by inserting in lieu thereof $20,000,000"; and

(2) by striking all of paragraph (3) thereof after the word "authorized" and by inserting in lieu thereof the following: "to make $41,000,000 in direct purchases of debentures and preferred securities and to make $250,000,000 in guarantees of debentures.".

SEC. 2. Section 404 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 is amended as follows:

(1) by striking from paragraph (1) of subsection (b) "may be issued" and by inserting in lieu thereof "shall be issued";

(2) by striking the period at the end of paragraph (1) of subsection (b) and by inserting in lieu thereof ", and the Administration is expressly prohibited from denying such guarantee due to the property being so acquired"; and

(3) by striking from subsection (c) "exceed 3½ per centum" and inserting in lieu thereof "be less than 1 per centum nor exceed 3½ per centum".

SEC. 3. This Act does not authorize the appropriation of funds.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

THe SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MITCHELL] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from New York [Mr. MOLINARI] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume, and I rise in support of H.R. 6013.

Mr. Speaker, this bill does two basic things. First, it increases the maximum amount of 1984 levels on three programs: It makes a $5 million increase in a loan program which assists organizations of handicapped and small businesses owned by handicapped individuals—now $15 million—it makes a $90 million increase in guarantees in the Small Business Investment Company program which provides venture capital to small businesses (now $160 million); and it makes a $6 million increase in debenture purchases in the Minority Enterprise Small Business Investment Company Program which provides venture capital to small businesses owned by socially or economically disadvantaged individuals. I want to point out, however, that these higher levels have been funded in the appropriations bill which already is law and no additional funds are needed.

Second, it makes absolutely clear that SBA may not deny guarantee assistance under the pollution control contract guarantees program because the project is being financed by the proceeds of tax-exempt bonds. I believe that the existing law is clear on this, but beginning in 1982, this administration effectively closed down the program by a strained re-interpretation of existing law. In fact, in the 29 months since the administration changed the rule and prohibited tax-exempts, SBA has approved only $30 million in guarantees. This contrasts with the previous 27 months when tax-exempts were permitted, and during this time, SBA approved $240 million in guarantees.

Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this bill was before the House in an omnibus bill earlier this year. After full discussion, and under an open rule, the House passed the omnibus bill (H.R. 3020) by a recorded vote of 386 to 11. Unfortunately, due to strong administration opposition to other matters, it does not appear that this omnibus bill will be enacted.

In addition, the matter of financing pollution facilities was considered by both the House and the Senate as part of the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984. In the House bill, the Senate bill, and in the conference report, the Congress generally prohibited using tax-exempt bonds in projects involving Federal guarantees on other parts of the project financing, but because SBA's pollution control contract guarantees program imposes a fee, the law expressly permitted tax-exempts to be used in connection with the SBA program.

I do not believe that it is necessary to debate today's measure more extensively. I simply conclude my remarks with my thanks to all of those Members on the committee who have worked on this bill and facilitated its prompt consideration, particularly Mr. BEDELL, Mr. CONTE, Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. MOLINARI, my ranking minority member.

□ 1310

Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 6013 and want to commend our distinguished chairman, Mr. MITCHELL, for bringing this bill to the floor in such an expeditious manner.

As Mr. MITCHELL has indicated, the program levels specified in H.R. 6013 are consistent with those currently provided in the agency's 1984 appropriation, and would have no budget impact. The bill expressly does not authorize any additional appropriations.

H.R. 6013 would prohibit the Small Business Administration from denying guarantees for pollution control contracts receiving funding from industrial revenue bonds, which are tax-exempt. The administration does not currently allow SBA to issue these guarantees for a project also receiving tax-exempt financing. The bill would also set a minimum of 1 percent for the pollution control guarantee fee. Current law specifies only a maximum guarantee fee of 3.5 percent. The requirement for a minimum fee is not expected to have any significant budget impact, because SBA currently requires the maximum fee of 3.5 percent on all contracts.

The authorized 1984 guarantee level for the pollution control program is $250 million, although only $11 million in guarantees has been issued to date. Demand for the program has been reduced primarily because the guarantees are not being used in combination with tax-exempt financing. Allowing the use of industrial revenue bonds to finance part of a project's cost is expected to increase participation in the program. Assuming an annual program of about $250 million, it is expected that SBA would receive guarantee fees of approximately $8.5 million annually, which would be offset by defaults of about the same amount. To the extent that the program may increase the number of industrial revenue bonds issued, tax receipts to the Federal Government may be reduced slightly, but there is no certainty about this effect. Enactment of this bill would not significantly affect the budgets of State and local governments.

The Small Business Administration's pollution control loan program was established to help small businesses obtain long-term, reasonable rate financing for Government-mandated pollution control expenditures. The SBA was given the authority to guarantee tax-exempt bond issues that small businesses used to finance pollution control expenditures. No substitute for the SBA program exists.

This program, when it has been able to function as Congress intended it to function, met the objective of helping small business finance the costs of complying with environmental protections laws.

Big businesses issued $530 million in tax-exempt pollution control bonds in the first quarter of 1984. That is more than twice the amount Congress authorized for all small businesses in fiscal year 1983.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend Mr. WILLIAMS, from Ohio, for the fine work he did in our committee on the pollution control program.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BEDELL], who certainly has been in the forefront in attempting to straighten out this snafu that developed with reference to the pollution control bonds. He has worked zealously on this, and it is a pleasure and privilege to work with him.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 6013, a bill to amend the Small Business Act and the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, as ordered reported by the House Committee on Small Business on July 26.

I would like to commend our chairman, PARREN MITCHELL, for his hard work on this legislation and thank both Chairman MITCHELL and our colleague, LYLE WILLIAMS, as has already been mentioned, for their support of an important amendment which I had introduced during the markup of H.R. 6013 and which passed with unanimous support from the full committee.

This portion of H.R. 6013 takes the exact language from the Small Business Administration's authorization bill which prohibits the SBA from denying guarantees for pollution control contracts receiving funding from tax-exempt industrial revenue bonds. The administration does not currently allow SBA to issue these guarantees for a project also receiving tax-exempt financing. The bill also sets a minimum of 1 percent for the pollution control guarantee fee. Current law specifies only a maximum guarantee fee of 3.5 percent. According to the Congressional Budget Office, "The requirement for a minimum fee is not expected to have any significant budget impact, because the SBA currently requires the maximum fee of 3.5 percent on all contracts."

Mr. Speaker, the SBA pollution control guarantee program has played a vital control in minimizing the discrimination traditionally faced by small business with regard to the financing of Government mandated pollution control equipment.

The SBA has performed an extremely valuable service to small businesses, helping them to obtain long-term, reasonable rate financing for pollution control expenditures previously. Unfortunately, this administration has seen fit to cancel out those opportunities. Administration action to cripple this program has been met by strong bipartisan resistance from both the House and the Senate Small Business Committees, as well as the Members of both the House and the Senate. Earlier this month, the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984 was passed with a special provision allowing continuation of the use of SBA pollution control guarantees in conjunction with tax-exempt financing bonds. This provision was included in the tax bill primarily because of strong support from the House Small Business Committee. Passage of this bill will complete the process and cap a long struggle to put small business back on an even par with big business in the area of pollution control financing.

Mr. Speaker, the public should be aware of exactly what has happened in this issue. This is not a Republican-and-Democrat issue. This is an issue between the Congress and this administration, and the issue is whether we are going to give small business the same opportunities that we give big business. The issue is this: Because of the cost of issuing tax-exempt pollution control bonds, small business cannot do it because the cost is so great, and previously, under the previous administration, they were permitted to bundle the bonds so that several groups could work together, and the Small Business Administration was permitted to guarantee them. That guarantee has actually been profitable to the Small Business Administration. Under this administration, both of those things were wiped out.

We had Buck Chapoton, the Assistant Secretary for Tax Policy before my subcommittee. I asked him point-blank: If it could be shown that this policy discriminates against small business, would you consider changing your policy?

His answer was one of two letters. The answer was no, they would not.

Mr. Speaker, the Members of this House and the Members of the Senate believe that small business should be able to compete on equal terms with big business so that when foundries or plating plants have to compete for business, small business will not have to say that "we cannot get tax-exempt financing but big business that competes with us can."

This is something that the Republican Members of the House, including SILVIO CONTE and others, have been actively working for. I am pleased that the House has had the courage to stand up and say we demand that there be fairness in our system and that we not discriminate.

I commend the chairman for the work he has done on this piece of legislation. I am pleased with the work the Senate has done as well. I look forward the passage of this bill and for us to again restore a situation where there will be fairness in regard to competition.

Mr. MOLINARI. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MITCHELL] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 6013, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend the Small Business Act and the Small Business Investment Act of 1958."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on H.R. 6013, the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

EMPLOYMENT SECURITY FOR VETERANS IN CERTAIN CIVIL SERVICE POSITIONS

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 5799) to amend title 5, United States Code, to establish certain requirements for the procurement by contract of certain services that are reserved for performance by preference eligibles in the competitive service, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 5799

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3310 of title 5, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 3310. Preference eligibles; examinations; guards, elevator operators, messengers, and custodians

"(a) In examinations for positions of guards, elevator operators, messengers, and custodians in the competitive service, competition is restricted to preference eligibles as long as preference eligibles are available.

"(b) An agency may not procure by contract any of the services performed by employees in any of the positions described in subsection (a) of this section if the performance of such services by contract—

"(1) would cause the involuntary separation of a preference eligible from any such position; or

"(2) would preclude the performance of any of such services by a qualified preference eligible in the competitive service.

"(c)(1) For purposes of subsection (b)(1) of this section, neither an involuntary reassignment within the same agency nor an involuntary transfer to another agency shall be considered to be an involuntary separation if such reassignment or transfer is to a vacant position—

"(A) which is of the same type as the type of position described in subsection (a) of this section from which the preference eligible was reassigned or transferred,

"(B) which is within the preference eligible's commuting area,

"(C) for which the preference eligible is qualified (taking into consideration any physical disability which the preference eligible may have), and

"(D) the grade or pay level of which is at least equal to the grade or pay level which was in effect for the preference eligible immediately before having been so reassigned or transferred.

"(2) The Office of Personnel Management shall prescribe regulations necessary to carry out this subsection.

"(d) Subsection (b)(2) of this section—

"(1) shall not preclude the procurement of services by contrast if, or to the extent that, qualified preference eligibles are not available; and

"(2) shall not apply with respect to a position which is held by an employee other than a preference eligible on the date that the contract is entered into.

"(e) For purposes of this section, the term 'qualified preference eligible' means, with respect to a position described in subsection (a) of this section, a preference eligible whose qualifications have been established.".

SEC. 2. (a) Any procurement by the Government of services performed in any of the positions described in section 3310(a) of title 5, United States Code, as amended by this Act, shall be in accordance with applicable provisions of law, including the provisions of the act entitled "An Act to create a Committee on Purchases of Blind-made Products, and for other purposes", approved June 25, 1938 (41 U.S.C. 46-48c), requiring certain procurements of services from qualified nonprofit agencies for the blind and qualified nonprofit agencies for other severely handicapped, and Office of Management and Budget Circular Numbered A-76 (including any supplement thereto).

(b) For purposes of this section, the terms "Government", "qualified nonprofit agency for the blind", and "qualified nonprofit agency for other severly handicapped", each has the meaning given such term under section 5 of the Act so entitled (41 U.S.C. 48b).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. RALPH M. HALL]. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ALBOSTA] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from California [Mr. PASHAYAN] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ALBOSTA].

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill, H.R. 5799.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, today the House will consider H.R. 5799, a bill to provide employment security and opportunities for veterans preference eligibles. in four civil service occupations reserved for veterans by law. Specifically, I am referring to the positions of guard, elevator operator, messenger, and custodian, which are restricted to competition among veterans under 5 U.S.C. 3310, as long as veterans are available.

It is with some amount of pride that I commend the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, on which I serve, for approving this legislation by a bipartisan vote of 23 to 0. The committee took action on this bill on June 27—exactly 40 years, to the day, after President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed into law the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944. This comprehensive act codified numerous regulations, Executive orders, and statutes dating back to the Civil War, which afforded special benefits and protections to those who served our country on active military duty. Included in this act was a provision which reserved the positions of guard, elevator operator, messenger, and custodian, in the civil service, for veterans and other preference eligibles.

Today, it is clear that many veterans needed the special benefit afforded them under section 3310. Nearly 75 percent of the employees in these four positions, Governmentwide, are veterans. It also is clear that there are more veterans, particularly those of the Vietnam era and those who are disabled, who may still need this opportunity to obtain secure employment, which will allow them to earn an honest living for themselves and their families.

Today, however, our veterans are faced with an elimination of the benefit provided under section 3310, through no action on the part of Congress. Research by the Subcommittee on Human Resources, which I chair, clearly indicates that many veterans in these positions can no longer count on the security of their job, because many of these services are being converted to contract performance. And the opportunity for other veterans to obtain employment, in these civil service positions reserved for them, also will be eliminated for the same reason.

That is why I introduced H.R. 5799, with strong support from my distinguished colleagues on the Veterans' Affairs Committee. H.R. 5799 will prevent the separation of a veteran from the occupation of guard, elevator operator, messenger, and custodian in the civil service, as the result of a contract award. Further, the bill provides that a veteran must be given first consideration to fill a vacancy or new position, before an agency considers contracting for one of the four services. When an agency wishes to contract for these services, it may reassign or transfer a veteran to the same type of vacant position, as long as the new position is within the same commuting area. And finally, H.R. 5799 provides that any contracting for the services of guards, elevator operators, messengers, and custodians, must be done in accordance with the provisions of the Javits-Wagner-O'Day Act—which provides for the procurement of certain services from sheltered workshops for the blind and severely handicapped—and OMB Circular A-76—which sets forth policy and guidelines for the performances of commercial activities under contract.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend several of my colleagues, who, over the past 3 years, have demonstrated their compassion and understanding of the unfortunate situation which prompts the necessity for the legislation we are considering today. Mr. MONTGOMERY, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, and Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT, the committee's ranking minority member, have recognized the need for this legislation, and I sincerely appreciate the support they have given me, to successfully move this bill.

Mr. EDGAR, a member of the Veterans' Affairs Committee and a longtime advocate of veterans' rights, took the lead on this issue 2 years ago, by proposing a successful amendment to the Treasury-Postal Service appropriations, which prohibited the General Services Administration from contracting for these four services. And most recently, Mr. LEATH of Texas, continued to demonstrate his concern for the welfare of our veterans, by introducing two bills, upon which H.R. 5799 is based. Mr. LEATH's legislation gave my subcommittee the opportunity to fully explore the impact, on veterans and others, of contracting for guard, elevator operator, messenger, and custodial services by the Federal Government.

In the years since the enactment of the Veterans' Preference Act, many veterans of World War II, Korea, and Vietnam have continued to serve their country in a variety of capacities in the Federal Government. Now, as Americans become more adamant in their desire to avoid further military conflict, I fear the recognition due our veterans may be lost, by our tendency to forget those whose deeds made peace and freedom possible for all Americans.

I would like, for a moment, to tell my colleagues about a letter I received recently from a veteran in Mobile, AL, employed as a custodian in the Federal building there. The veteran sent a form letter in support of H.R. 5799, which stated that he would soon lose his job as the result of converting custodial services in his building to contract. However, this veteran added a short sentence of his own, as well as his name and address—and it was very clear from his note that this veteran was so severely handicapped that he could not write a complete sentence or sign his own name legibly.

I ask my colleagues, is it our intent to turn our backs on this veteran, and the many others like him, who may soon find themselves unemployed, or who won't have the opportunity to gain meaningful employment, as the Congress intended? I am certain it is not, and I ask my colleagues to join with me, today, in showing those who served our country in times of national crisis, that the 98th Congress has not forgotten their sacrifices—by passing H.R. 5799.

□ 1330

Mr. PASHAYAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield my self such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5799, a bill that assures employment security and opportunities for veterans in jobs reserved for them. The bill addresses the contracting out of positions in four areas of employment that are reserved for preference eleigibles (generally handicapped veterans), whose employment rights are protected by law. These positions, custodian, guard, elevator operators, and messenger, are also sought by sheltered workshops for their handicapped workers. The Human Resources Subcommittee has been very concerned with accommodating their interests in safeguarding their contracting priority with the Federal Government while at the same time preserving veterans' preference in an area where the Government has begun to contract out the services.

I should like to commend my colleagues, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ALBOSTA] for their efforts in mediating between veterans' groups and handicapped organizations to reach the bill on the floor today. At every stage of committee action, they have assured us that in addition to continuing the tradition of veterans preference for positions historically reserved, the ability of sheltered workshops to obtain Federal contracts was not being injured. There was colloquy about the effect of H.R. 5799 on sheltered workshops in the subcommittee and in the full committee, where the bill was reported by a bipartisan 23 to 0 vote.

H.R. 5799 does not totally prohibit the contracting out of positions reserved to veterans' preference eligibles. Safeguards for veterans occupying positions, however, that an agency wishes to contract out are specifically included in this legislation. Preference eligibles must be transferred to other Government jobs before an agency can award a contract. In addition, in awarding a contract for the reserved positions, the agency must respect the provisions of the Javits-Wagner-O'Day Act, which govern the purchase of services from sheltered workshops for the blind and severely handicapped. No provision of this bill or part of its legislative history should be interpreted as indicating congressional intent to decrease opportunities for sheltered workshops.

I am glad, indeed to present this bill, H.R. 5799, to my colleagues for their approval. It expresses Congress' continued appreciation for the service that veterans have given to our country and our understanding of their special needs. Yet, at the same time, it allows the Government to serve the taxpayers more efficiently and economically and gives sheltered workshops the opportunity to compete for employment for the blind and severely handicapped.

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PASHAYAN. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, veterans' preference in Federal employment is now an accepted and proven benefit not just for veterans but for our entire Nation. H.R. 5977 is a reaffirmation of our Government's long-standing policy in this regard.

Mr. Speaker, the jobs covered by this bill—Guards, elevator operators, messengers and custodians—have been specifically earmarked by law for veterans since the Preference Act was passed in 1944. Over the past few years, however, implementation of an office of management and budget circular has eroded congressional intent by contracting out many of these positions. H.R. 5799 would prevent such erosion in the future. It establishes Government-wide standards as to these jobs. It protects veterans currently holding them and preserves the preference for future vacancies as long as qualified veterans are available.

Mr. Speaker, as this bill was being drafted, concern was expressed that programs for handicapped individuals under a sheltered workshop contract arrangement would not be available. This is not the case inasmuch as the bill specifically provides for such arrangements but also provides that any veteran who is displaced under such a contract would be placed in a similar vacant job. This compromise is an excellent one and the members of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee are to be commended for their diligence in working it out.

I would like to particularly thank my friend and colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ALBOSTA] and my friend and colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. PASHAYAN], for their work on this particular bill.

Mr. Speaker, contracting out has its place and sometimes has merit. However, eroding veterans preference in these comparatively low-paying positions is not the way to go. I therefore am pleased to add my support to H.R. 5799 and I urge my colleagues to give it overwhelming passage.

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY], the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. SPEAKER, I would like to thank the subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ALBOSTA] for bringing this bill to the floor, and also the gentleman from California [Mr. PASHAYAN] for being one of the sponsors, as well as the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN], who has certainly worked hard on it.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5799. I would like to point out to my colleagues that the Veterans' Affairs Committee does not have legislative jurisdiction over the Veterans Preference Act. Our committee does have oversight jurisdiction over all veterans' programs. In this capacity, the Subcommittee on Education, Training and Employment has held a number of hearings during this and previous Congresses on veterans' preference in the Federal civil service and the U.S. Postal Service.

This has taken place under the leadership of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LEATH], who is chairman of the Subcommittee on Education, Training and Employment, who will speak for himself, but he totally supports this legislation and has introduced two bills pertaining to veterans' preference.

June 27, 1984, marked the 40th anniversary of the approval of the Veterans Preference Act. Congress took recognition of this special day by enacting public law 98-330, which designated June 1984 as Veterans Preference Month. Section 3 of the Veterans Preference Act of 1944 restricts competition to veterans as long as they are available in examinations for positions of guards, elevator operators, messengers, and custodians. Under the provisions of OMB circular A-76, which we are very familiar with here in the House, the administration has been contracting our some of these positions, notwithstanding the intent of Congress to reserve these jobs for veterans.

At the oversight hearings by our committee, veterans organizations brought this to the attention of the committee. Pursuant to a national resolution approved by Disabled American Veterans national convention delegates, bills were introduced by Hon. MARVIN LEATH of Texas, chairman of our Subcommittee on Education, Training and Employment. These two bills, H.R. 828 and 829, received thorough hearings by Mr. ALBOSTA and his Subcommittee on Human Resources. I commend Mr. ALBOSTA for holding hearings on these bills and reporting H.R. 5799, which was unanimously reported By the Post Office and Civil Service Committee.

Mr. Speaker, the Office of Personnel Management states that there are 26,577 Federal employees in the four designated occupations reserved for veterans; 19,487 or 73.3 percent of the jobs are veterans' preference employees. There has been a 5-percent decrease in these jobs since December 1982 because of contracting out. There would have been a lot more of these jobs contracted out if Congress had not prohibited the General Services Administration [GSA] from contracting out for custodial positions and the Department of Defense [DOD] for guard positions. An amendment by Hon. BOB EDGAR, a distinguished member of our committee, to the continuing resolutions for fiscal years 1983 and 1984 prohibited the GSA from contracting out any of these positions during those years, an exception being made for fiscal year 1984 for sheltered workshops for the handicapped.

Now we are considering H.R. 5799, which will prohibit separation of veterans from these jobs reserved for veterans. This bill proposes to establish Government-wide uniform standards which will apply to all Government agencies, not just the GSA and the DOD. This is as it should be. H.R. 5799 will alleviate the concerns of thousands of veterans who could lose their jobs. Procurement by contract of custodial services by sheltered workshops will be permitted, but if a contract is awarded which would cause a veteran to lose his job, the veteran will be transferred to a similar vacant position in the Federal service.

H.R. 5799 represents a reasonable compromise which has reconciled the differences of those interested in these provisions. Chairman ALBOSTA and his subcommittee are to be commended for their sensitivity to both veterans and the handicapped. I have been informed by representatives of the major veterans organizations that they support this legislation which will continue to reserve these positions for veterans and prevent any veterans holding these jobs from being separated because of contracting out of their positions.

This is a meritorious bill and I recommend its approval.

I again commend the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ALBOSTA] and also the gentleman from California [Mr. PASHAYAN] for bringing this bill forward for a vote by the full membership.

□ 1340

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LEATH], who serves as chairman of the subcommittee and who really brought to the attention of the subcommittee the whole issue of veterans' preference.

Mr. LEATH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 5799, which would protect veterans' preference eligibles in four civil service positions reserved for them by law.

When it passed the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944, the Congress committed our Nation to providing special consideration and protection for our country's veterans wishing to enter the civil service. In addition, the Veterans' Preference Act provided that four Federal positions, those of guard, messenger, elevator operator, and custodian, would be restricted to persons eligible for veterans' preference, as long as veterans are available for these jobs. This protection is provided for in section 3310 of title 5, United States Code.

In recent years, the efforts by the U.S. Government to convert positions held by veterans' preference employees to private contractors have eroded the opportunity for veterans to obtain employment in the restricted positions, and resulted in veterans losing their jobs. I was pleased, therefore, to introduce two bills, H.R. 828 and H.R. 829, at the request of the Disabled American Veterans [DAV], which would prohibit the GSA from contracting out the jobs occupied by veterans under section 3310, title 5, United States Code. These bills were referred to the Subcommittee on Human Resources of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. Hearings were held last summer on this legislation by my good friend, DON ALBOSTA, chairman of that subcommittee.

Following those hearings, Chairman ALBOSTA rightly concluded that action was necessary to prevent continuing contracting out of the four protected positions and resulting displacement of veterans from those jobs. H.R. 5799, as amended, does not prohibit the contracting out of guard, messenger, elevator operator, and custodial positions. It does, however, prohibit the separation of a veterans' preference eligible from these Federal positions as the result of contracting out, thereby protecting these veterans, many of whom are disabled.

The legislation we are considering today is similar to an amendment I offered, now Public Law 97-306, which prohibits contracting out in the Veterans' Administration's Department of Medicine and Surgery for services which are determined to be direct patient care or incident to direct patient care. Contracting out of these services under OMB circular A-76, as intended by OMB would have impaired the ability of the VA to provide the quality of medical care that our veterans deserve and Congress intended. In the case of Public Law 97-306, my amendment affirmed the importance of an independent VA health care system with quality health services being provided to veterans in the most cost-effective manner possible and prohibits contracting out unless there would be no adverse impact on direct medical care. Today, by approving H.R. 5799, we are reaffirming the integrity of the Veterans' Preference Act in its purpose to assist veterans in Federal employment and prohibiting the loss of a job by a veteran when the service the veteran is providing is contracted out.

I want to commend DON ALBOSTA for his leadership on this issue. H.R. 5799 meets with the approval of the major veterans organizations, and reaffirms the commitment to our Nation's veterans to assist them in their efforts to find and retain meaningful, secure employment with the Federal Government.

● Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5799, a bill to provide for the employment security of veterans in certain civil service positions.

We must stop the erosion of the benefits available under the Veterans' Preference Act to veterans and veterans' preference eligibles who work in the Federal Government in the positions of guard, elevator operator, messenger, and custodian. Conversion of these positions to the private sector as a result of contracting out must not result in decreased employment opportunity for veterans who need these jobs to find work in the further service of their country.

H.R. 5799 addresses this problem by providing that as a result of a contract award, veterans in these positions may not be separated from Federal Government service, thus protecting these veterans opportunity for employment with the Federal Government, established in 5 U.S.C. 3310. I commend the committee for working out a legislative remedy acceptable to the contracting community and to sheltered workshops.

Our veterans, many disabled, who have sacrificed so that we may enjoy the freedoms we too often take for granted, must not suffer the erosion of their earned benefits. I urge my colleagues to support this bill which is so important to maintaining this important veterans' preference benefit and the integrity of the civil service.●

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5799, an act to amend Title 5, Section 3310 of the U.S. Code that establishes certain requirements for the procurement by contract of certain services that are reserved for preference eligibles.

As an original cosponsor of this measure, I feel it is imperative that Congress protect the erosion of the special benefits afforded to our veterans who have served this country so well and wish to so do in the future.

H.R. 5799 provides job security and opportunities for veterans' preference eligibles in the four civil service occupations provided for in the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944. These include the positions of guard, elevator operator, messenger, and custodian.

Research has shown that 75 percent of all employees in these four positions are veterans and that unfortunately, the actual number of positions has declined by 5 percent during the 13-month period from December 1982 to January 1984. This reduction is due, in part, to the conversion of these services to contract performance. Additionally, reports indicate that the opportunity for veterans' preference eligibles to obtain secure employment in civil service positions reserved for them by law is decreasing at an alarming rate. Finally, many of our veterans are disabled in some way, which makes their quest and attainment for employment even more difficult.

When all these factors are taken into consideration, one must realize that there are many veterans who need this added benefit so that they may earn a decent living for themselves and their families and so that they may remain productive members of society. By enacting legislation that places stricter guidelines in any contracting-out of services in these four vital job categories, the Congress will honor its commitment to these individuals who have served their country so well.

H.R. 5799 will prevent a veteran from being separated from the job of guard, elevator operator, messenger, and custodian when a contract has been awarded. It insures that if a veteran's job falls under a contractor's commitment, the agency must reassign or transfer that veteran to a vacant position in the same occupational series, within the same commuting area, and there must not be any reduction in grade or pay. In addition, the agency must first consider a veteran's preference eligible when a vacancy occurs or a new position is created. The legislation also provides that the agency must adhere to the provisions of the Javits-Wagner-O'Day Act of 1972 that gives priority to sheltered workshops for the handicapped when contracting out services covered under title 5, section 3310 occurs.

This measure has the support of various organizations, including the American Legion, AMVETS, Disabled American Veterans, Military Order of the Purple Heart, Paralyzed Veterans of America, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and Vietnam Veterans of America.

Today, I ask for my colleagues' support on this measure. I fear that the unfortunate course of events that have occurred in this area will only be perpetuated if we do not act now with speed and efficiency. It is our duty to assure that our veterans receive all the assistance we may give them for having been the crusaders for peace and freedom. We must not turn our back on our veterans when they need this benefit most.●

Mr. ALBOSTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend by staff, which worked very hard on this issue, and I also want to commend the staff of the full committee. More than anything, I want to commend the minority side. This is a nonpartisan issue, and we worked very well together, along with the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN] and the gentleman from California [Mr. PASHAYAN]. I feel very good about the bipartisan support we received on this legislation, and I want to commend them, as well as the staff, for the fine job that was done.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ALBOSTA] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 5799, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

IMPROVEMENT OF CRIMINAL PROVISIONS RELATING TO CONTRABAND AND RIOTS IN FEDERAL PRISONS

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 5910, to amend chapter 87 of title 18, United States Code, to improve provisions imposing criminal penalties for contraband and riots in Federal prisons, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 5910

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1791 of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 1791. Contraband in prison

"(a)(1) Whoever, except as otherwise permitted by law, introduces into a prison an object specified in subsection (b) of this section, or attempts to do so, shall be punished as provided in subsection (c) of this section.

"(2) Whoever, except as otherwise permitted by law, possesses in a prison an object specified in subsection (b) of this section shall be punished as provided in subsection (c) of this section.

"(b) The objects referred to in subsection (a) of this section are—

"(1) a firearm or a destructive device;

"(2) a weapon (other than a firearm or destructive device) or an object that is designed or intended to be used as a weapon or to facilitate escape from such facility;

"(3) a narcotic drug, lysergic acid diethylamide, or phencyclidine;

"(4) a controlled substance (other than a controlled substance referred to in paragraph (3) of this subsection) or an alcoholic beverage;

"(5) any United States or foreign currency; and

"(6) any other object that threatens the security of such facility or the life, health, or safety of an individual.

"(c) The punishment for a violation of this section shall be—

"(1) if the object is specified in subsection (b)(1) of this section, a fine of not more than $250,000 or imprisonment for not more than ten years, or both;

"(2) if the object is specified in subsection (b)(2) or (b)(3) of this section, a fine of not more than $250,000 or imprisonment for not more than five years, or both;

"(3) if the object is specified in subsection (b)(4) or (b)(5) of this section, a fine of not more than $25,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both; and

"(4) if the object is specified in subsection (b)(6) of this section, a fine of not more than $15,000 or imprisonment for not more than six months.

"(d) As used in this section—

"(1) the terms 'firearm' and 'distructive device' have the meanings given those terms in section 921 of this title;

"(2) the terms 'controlled substance' and 'narcotic drug' have the meanings given those terms in section 102 of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 802); and

"(3) the term 'prison' means a Federal correctional, detention, or penal facility.".

SEC. 2. Section 1792 of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 1792. Prison riot or mutiny

"(a) Whoever, in a prison—

"(1) intentionally causes a riot by inciting another person to engage in violent and tumultuous conduct;

"(2) leads a riot;

"(3) gives commands, instructions, or directions to participants in a riot; or

"(4) intentionally participates in a riot; shall be fined not more than $250,000 or imprisoned not more than ten years, or both.

"(b) Whoever intentionally participates in a mutiny at a prison shall be fined not more than $250,000 or imprisoned not more than two year, or both.

"(c) As used in this section, the term—

"(1) 'prison' means a Federal correctional, detention, or penal facility; and

"(2) 'riot' means violent and tumultuous conduct by five or more persons that creates a grave danger of imminently causing bodily injury or substantial damage to property.".

SEC. 3. The table of sections for chapter 87 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking out the items relating to sections 1791 and 1792 and inserting in lieu thereof the following new items:

"1791. Contraband in prison.
"1792. Prison riot or mutiny.".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GEKAS] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS].

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5910, which has been reported without dissent by the Committee on the Judiciary, strengthens current Federal law relating to contraband and riots in Federal prisons.

Under sections 1791 and 1792 of current title 18, United States Code, it is an offense to introduce into a Federal prison, remove from a Federal prison, or convey from place to place within a Federal prison, any contraband. Maximum punishment is 10 years imprisonment. The simple possession of contraband items is not a crime.

Section 1792 also punishes someone who "instigates, connives, willfully attempts to cause, assists, or conspires to cause any mutiny or riot at any Federal penal or correctional institution * * *." There is a difference of opinion over whether the offense requires more than simple participation. The tenth circuit is of the opinion that simple participation is not enough; the third and fifth circuits believe that it is.

H.R. 5910 is derived from the criminal code revision bill reported by the Judiciary Committee in the 96th Congress and is similar to the comparable provisions in the omnibus crime bill passed by the other body this Congress (S. 1762).

H.R. 5910 amends current law to punish simple possession of contraband. Like the Judiciary Committee's criminal code revision bill of the 96th Congress and the bill passed by the other body, H.R. 5910 makes distinctions in the severity of the offense based upon the nature of the contraband. The bill also adds a fine to the penalty that can be imposed for the offense.

In addition, H.R. 5910 amends the prison riot offense. Present law uses the term "riot" without definition. H.R. 5910 defines the term in a manner similar to the way it was defined in the criminal code revision bills considered by the Judiciary Committees of each body in the 96th Congress.

The riot offense defined in the legislation covers incitement type of conduct and is, therefore, subject to the test of Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969). If the incitement is speech, the speech must have urged or instigated the assemblage to imminent riot in a context where there was a high likelihood of riot. See United States v. Dellinger, 472 F.2d 340 (7th Cir. 1972) (interpreting 18 U.S.C. 2101). See also discussion at H.R. Rep. No. 1396, 96th Cong., 2d Sess. 405 (1980).

In addition, the bill adds a fine to the penalty that can be imposed for violating the prison riot prohibition.

Mr. Speaker, this bill has been carefully worked out with the Department of Justice and the minority members of the committee. I urge its approval.

□ 1350

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Criminal Justice Subcommittee of the full Committee on the Judiciary has very adequately described the salient provisions of this piece of legislation.

There is no more vexing problem that comes before the administrators of our prisons, as the public well knows, than the question of contraband, both by the smuggling in concept that goes on in every prison and also the ingenious methods that the inmates themselves are able to concoct to make available to themselves all the items that cause so much distress within the walls of our institutions.

So the chairman is quite correct in saying that this is much needed in tightening up those provisions and those regulations and the law, as it were, with respect to contraband.

I am pleased to note also that this is in a small measure compliance with part of the thrust of the President's crime package which he has been urging us to pass for a long time, in that the comprehensive plan that has been sent before the Congress by the administration through the President's crime package talks rather eloquently of the need to tighten up on the administration of our prisons and the serious problems that contraband items themselves cause.

With that, I, too, join the distinguished chairman of the Criminal Justice Subcommittee in urging passage of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5910. This legislation was inspired by a portion of the President's crime package and attempts to close some gaps in Federal criminal law which will help those who administer our Federal prisons.

For example, current law makes it an offense to introduce items prohibited by the Attorney General into Federal correctional facilities. However, there is no similar criminal sanction against possession of contraband. H.R. 5910 closes that loophole.

Similarly, current law punishes those who "instigate" or cause a riot. However, "participation" in a riot is not covered under the interpretation applied by several courts and so H.R. 5910 clarifies any doubts by creating a participation offense.

Under the bill, contraband is defined specifically to include such items as firearms, weapons, narcotics, currency or any objects that threaten the security of the prison facility or the life, health and safety of an individual—which should be taken broadly enough to facilitate the orderly administration of Federal penal facilities.

Mr. Speaker, this bill should be supported.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment my ranking colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GEKAS], with whom I worked on all the matters that come out of the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice. We have been able with great success to have brought these measures to the attention of the House.

I might point out, there was very little modification of the work of the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, and I wanted to take this opportunity to publicly acknowledge the work and the energy and the great attention that he has brought to the matter as a former prosecutor and State legislator—indeed, a former witness before the Criminal Justice Subcommittee before he was elected to the Congress. We have had very interesting sessions. I think our hearings make very good reading.

I would also like to identify the contraband proscribed.

First of all, I would point out to my colleagues that we identify contraband specifically, rather than leave it to be generally defined. We identify it and also grade it according to its severity or danger.

The most serious contraband is a firearm or a destructive device, which is already defined in the Federal criminal code and which under this bill could carry an additional 10 years imprisonment.

The next category covers a weapon other than a firearm or destructive device, or an object that is designed or intended to be used as a weapon or to facilitate escape from a prison. Possession of such weapons could carry a maximum of 5 years imprisonment.

The third category is a narcotic drug, LSD, or PCP, which carries a maximum of 5 years imprisonment.

The next category is a controlled substance other than a narcotic drug, LSD, or PCP, which could carry 1 year additional imprisonment.

Finally, we have the lowest item of contraband, "any other object that threatens the security of such facility or the life, health or safety of an individual." That could carry a maximum of 6 months imprisonment.

Other items that might meet the definition of contraband that do not fall into these categories would be subject to the rules of either the prison itself or the regulations that would control the guards or correctional officers.

I think that this legislation is the result of a good deal of give and take by the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice. It brings what we think is a very important additional tool to aid those who are doing such very important work in controlling our Federal prisons.

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5910. This bill strengthens current Federal law regarding contraband, riots and mutiny in Federal prisons.

Present Federal law makes it an offense to move any contraband into, out of, or within a Federal prison. The maximum punishment is 10 years imprisonment. Mere possession of contraband, however, is not covered by current law.

Current law also punishes a person who "instigates, connives, willfully attempts to cause, assist, or conspires to cause any mutiny or riot at any Federal penal or correctional institution * * *." The circuit courts differ over whether this offense covers mere participation in a riot.

H.R. 5910 would amend the law to punish simple possession of contraband. Unlike current law, the bill distinguishes the severity of the offense according to the nature of the contraband. Current law authorizes only imprisonment as a penalty. H.R. 5910 would authorize the imposition of a fine.

This legislation also amends the riot and mutiny provisions of section 1792 of title 18, United States Code. While the term "riot" is currently undefined, H.R. 5910 would define it in a manner similar to the definitions development by the Judiciary Committee's of both bodies in their work on criminal code revision.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is supported by the Department of Justice, and was reported from the Judiciary Committee by voice vote, without audible dissent. I urge its support.●

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this legislation, H.R. 5910, which amends title 18 of the United States Code to increase the penalties for possessing contraband in Federal prisons. Of particular concern to me, as the ranking minority member of the House Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control, is the provision concerning strict penalties for the possession of narcotics in Federal prisons.

During the select committee's hearing in New York City in June 1983, former Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services, Joseph Califano, testified about the gravity of the prison situation in New York State. At a time when two-thirds of New York's inmates are drug addicts or drug abusers, drug use and abuse in our prisons is a fact of life. With the increasing number of drug-related crimes—and drug-abusing criminals—our system needs some workable means of controlling the rampant drug use and trafficking which plague our prisons.

Simple possession of contraband in Federal prisons will now become a criminal offense. In addition to broadening the scope of prison riot and mutiny laws, H.R. 5910 imposes a $250,000 fine and 5-year imprisonment if narcotic drugs, PCP, or LSD are possessed in Federal prison. For other controlled substances, possession in Federal prison will result in a fine of $25,000 and 1 year's imprisonment.

No additional costs will be incurred by passage of this legislation, which I believe will provide a strong deterrent to the flood of narcotics trafficking and abuse in our prison facilities.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join with me in supporting this important legislation.●

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and so I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 5910, as amended.

The question was taken' and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous material, on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

CRIMINAL FINE ENFORCEMENT ACT OF 1984

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 5846) to amend title 18, United States Code, to improve collection and administration of criminal fines, and for other purposes, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 5846

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Criminal Fine Enforcement Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. Section 3565 of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in the sentence beginning "In all criminal", by striking out "In" and inserting in lieu thereof "(a)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, in";

(2) in the sentence beginning "Where the judgment", by striking out "Where the" and all that follows through " is paid," and inserting in lieu thereof: "If the court finds by a preponderance of the information relied upon in imposing sentence that the defendant has the present ability to pay a fine or penalty, the judgment may direct imprisonment until the fine or penalty is paid, and"; and

(3) by adding at the end the following new matter:

"(2) A judgment imposing the payment of a fine or penalty is a lien in favor of the United States and may be enforced upon filing in the manner provided under applicable State law. Except as provided in paragraph (3) of this subsection, such lien is valid against any property of the defendant, other than—

"(A) property with respect to which a lien for taxes is not valid under section 6323(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954; and

"(B) property that is exempt from levy for taxes under subsection (a) or (d) of section 6334 of such Code.

"(3) Such lien is valid against property referred to in subparagraph (A) or (B) of paragraph (2) of this subsection if, but for such subparagraph, applicabe law would permit enforcement of the lien.

"(b)(1) A judgment imposing the payment of a fine or penalty shall—

"(A) provide for immediate payment unless, in the interest of justice, the court specifies payment on a date certain or in installments;

"(B) include the name and address of the defendant, the docket number of the case, the amount of the fine, and the schedule of payments (if other than immediate payment is specified); and

"(C) if other than immediate payment is specified, require the defendant to notify the appropriate United States Attorney of any change in the name or address of the defendant.

"(2) If the judgment specifies other than immediate payment of a fine or penalty, the period provided for payment shall not exceed five years, excluding any period served by the defendant as imprisonment for the offense. The defendant shall pay interest on any amount payment of which is deferred under this paragraph. The interest shall be computed on the unpaid balance at the rate of 1.5 percent per month for each full calendar month for which such amount is unpaid.

"(3) If the judgment specifies other than immediate payment of a fine or penalty, and the defendant does not pay an amount due, at the discretion of the Attorney General, the entire unpaid balance shall be payable immediately.

"(c)(1) The defendant shall pay interest on any amount of a fine or penalty (other than a penalty under paragraph (2) of this subsection) that is past due. The interest shall be computed on the unpaid balance at the rate of 1.5 percent per month.

"(2) If an amount owed by a defendant as a fine or penalty is past due for more than 90 days, the defendant shall pay, in addition to any amount otherwise payable, a penalty equal to 25 percent of the amount past due.

"(d)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, the defendant shall pay to the Attorney General any amount due as a fine or penalty.

"(2) The Attorney General and the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts may jointly provide by regulation that fines and penalties for specified categories of offenses shall be paid to the clerk of the court.

"(e) If a fine or penalty exceeds $500, the clerk of the court shall furnish to the Attorney General a certified copy of the judgment.

"(f) If a fine or penalty is imposed on an organization, it is the duty of each individual authorized to make disbursements for the oganization make payment from assets of the organization. If a fine or penalty is imposed on a director, officer, employee, or agent of an organization, payment shall not be made, directly or indirectly, from assets of the organization, unless the court finds that such payment is expressly permissible under applicable State law.

"(g) When a fine or penalty is satisfied as provided by law, the Attorney General shall file with the court a notice of satisfaction of judgment if the defendant makes a written request to the Attorney General for such filing, or if the amount of the fine or penalty exceeds $500. Upon request of the defendant, the clerk shall furnish to the defendant a certified copy of the notice.

"(h) The obligation to pay a fine or penalty ceases upon the death of the defendant or the expiration of twenty years after the date of the entry of the judgment, whichever occurs earlier. The defendant and the Attorney General may agree in writing to extend such twenty-year period.".

SEC. Section 3569 of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in subsection (a)—

(A) by striking out "(a)" at the beginning of the subsection; and

(B) by striking out "thirty days" in the sentence beginning "When a poor"; and

(2) by striking out subsection (b).

SEC. 4. Section 3651 of title 18, United States Code, is amended in the paragraph beginning "The defendant's"—

(1) by striking out "fine or other punishment" and inserting in lieu thereof "punishment (other than a fine)"; and

(2) by adding at the end the following new sentence: "If at the end of the period of probation, the defendant has not complied with a condition of probation, the court may nevertheless terminate proceedings against the defendant, but no such termination shall affect the defendant's obligation to pay a fine imposed or made a condition of probation, and such fine shall be collected in the manner provided in section 3565 of this title.".

SEC. 5. Section 3655 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by inserting after the paragraph beginning "He shall keep records" the following new paragraph:

"He shall report to the court any failure of a probationer under his supervision to pay an amount due as a fine or as restitution.".

SEC. 6. (a) Chapter 229 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new sections:

"§ 3621. Criminal default on fine

"(a) Whoever, having been sentenced to pay a fine or penalty, willfully does not pay an amount due—

"(1) in the case of the individual, shall be fined not more than the greater of $100,000 or twice the unpaid balance of the fine or penalty, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both; and

"(2) in the case of a person other than an individual, shall be fined not more than the greater of $250,000 or twice the unpaid balance of the fine or penalty.

"(b) It is a defense to a prosecution under subsection (a)(1) of this section that the individual was unable to make the payment because of such individual's responsibility to provide necessities for such individual or other individuals financially dependent upon such individual. The defendant has the burden of establishing the defense under this subsection by a preponderance of the evidence.

"§ 3622. Factors relating to imposition of fines

"(a) In determining whether to impose a fine and the amount of a fine, the court shall consider, in addition to other relevant factors—

"(1) the nature and circumstances of the offense;

"(2) the history and characteristics of the defendant;

"(3) the defendant's income, earning capacity, and financial resources;

"(4) the burden that the fine will impose upon the defendant, any person who is financially dependent on the defendant, or any other person (including a government) that would be responsible for the welfare of any person financially dependent on the defendant, relative to the burden that alternative punishments would impose;

"(5) any pecuniary loss inflicted upon others as a result of the offense;

"(6) whether restitution is ordered and the amount of such restitution;

"(7) the need to deprive the defendant of illegally obtained gains from the offense;

"(8) whether the defendant can pass on to consumers or other persons the expense of the fine; and

"(9) if the defendant is an organization, the size of the organization and any measure taken by the organization to discipline any officer, director, employee, or agent of the organization responsible for the offense and to prevent a recurrence of such an offense.

"(b) If, as a result of a conviction, the defendant has the obligation to make restitution to a victim of the offense, the court shall impose a fine or penalty only to the extent that such fine or penalty will not impair the ability of the defendant to make restitution.

"§ 3623. Alternative fines

"(a) An individual convicted of an offense may be fined not more than the greatest of—

"(1) the amount specified in the law setting forth the offense;

"(2) the applicable amount under subsection (c) of this section;

"(3) in the case of a felony, $250,000;

"(4) in the case of a misdemeanor resulting in death, $250,000; or

"(5) in the case of a misdemeanor punishable by imprisonment for more than six months, $100,000.

"(b) A person (other than an individual) convicted of an offense may be fined not more than the greatest of—

"(1) the amount specified in the law setting forth the offense;

"(2) the applicable amount under subsection (c) of this section;

"(3) in the case of a felony, $1,000,000;

"(4) in the case of a misdemeanor resulting in death, $1,000,000; or

"(5) in the case of a misdemeanor punishable by imprisonment for more than six months, $250,000.

"(c) If the defendant derives pecuniary gain from the offense, or if the offense results in pecuniary loss to another person, the defendant may be fined not more than the greater of twice the gross gain or twice the gross loss, unless imposition of a fine under this subsection would unduly complicate or prolong the sentencing process.

"§ 3624. Security for stayed fine

"If a sentence imposing a fine is stayed, the court shall, absent exceptional circumstances (as determined by the court)—

"(1) require the defendant to deposit, in the registry of the district court, any amount of the fine that is due;

"(2) require the defendant to provide a bond or other security to ensure payment of the fine; or

"(3) restrain the defendant from transferring or dissipating assets.".

(b) The table of sections for chapter 229 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 3620 the following new items:

"3621. Criminal default on fine.
"3622. Factors relating to imposition of fines.
"3623. Alternative fines.
"3624. Security for stayed fine.".

SEC. 7. The sentence beginning "In every" in section 4209(a) of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out "a condition" and inserting in lieu thereof "conditions"; and

(2) by inserting after "local crime" the following: "and, if a fine was imposed, that the parolee make a diligent effort to pay the fine in accordance with the judgment".

SEC. 8. Section 1 of title 18, United States Code, is amended in paragraph (3)—

(1) by inserting after "which" the following: ", as set forth in the provision defining the offense,"; and

(2) by striking out "$500" and and inserting in lieu thereof "$5,000 for an individual and $10,000 for a person other than an individual".

SEC. 9. Section 3579 of title 18, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in subsection (c), by striking out "Court" and and inserting in lieu thereof "court"; and

(2) in subsection (f), by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(4) The order of restitution shall require the defendant to make restitution directly to the victim or other person eligible under this section, or to deliver the amount or property due as restitution to the Attorney General for transfer to such victim or person.".

SEC. 10. The amendments made by this Act shall apply with respect to offenses committed after December 31, 1984.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GEKAS] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS].

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous material, on this measure now under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5846, reported without dissent by the Committee on the Judiciary, revises Federal procedures for the imposition and collection of fines in criminal cases.

The Judiciary Committee concluded in 1980, when it reported the Criminal Code revision bill, that existing fine levels "Do not adequately provide the judiciary with sufficient flexibility to impose sentences that will adequately deter future criminal conduct." That statement is true today.

H.R. 5846 attempts to make the criminal fine a more effective criminal sanction—and thus a more attractive alternative to imprisonment—by authorizing Federal courts to impose higher fines. The bill permits a court, in imposing a fine, to choose the greatest of three alternatives: First, the amount specified in the provision defining the offense. Second, an amount equal to twice any pecuniary gain derived from the offense or twice any pecuniary loss inflicted as a result of the offense. Third, if the conviction is for a felony, or a misdemeanor resulting in death, $250,000 for individuals and $1,000,000 for organizations, and if the conviction is for a misdemeanor punishable by more than 6 months imprisonment, $100,000 for individuals and $250,000 for organizations.

Equally important, the bill also sets forth factors that the court must consider in determining whether to impose a fine and the amount of a fine. These factors include such things as the seriousness of the offense, the defendant's criminal history, the defendant's ability to pay, and the need to deprive the defendant of any illegally obtained gains.

Considering the defendant's ability to pay is particularly important; with the higher fine levels, there is a potential for abuse. This consideration should also result in more realistic fines, which will improve fine collection.

H.R. 5846 also enhances the ability of the Justice Department to enforce fines. The bill provides that a judgment imposing a fine is a lien on the defendant's property. The lien, moreover, is a "super" lien, applying to all property to which a Federal tax lien would apply and having the priority of a Federal tax lien. Under current law, the State law regulating exemptions and priorties controls and, in probably every instance, will not be as favorable to judgment creditors as Federal Tax Code is to the Federal Government. Thus, the bill gives the Federal Government, in its status as a fine judgment creditor, greater standing than other judgment creditors. In the unlikely event that State law is more favorable than the Federal Tax Code, the bill provides that State law will govern.

The bill makes willful nonpayment of a fine a misdemeanor but provides a defense, which defendants must establish by a preponderance of the evidence, that the failure to pay the fine was caused by their responsibility to provide necessities for themselves or for others financially dependent upon them. Like U.S. Circuit Judge Gerald Bard Tjoflat, who testified before the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice on behalf of the Judicial Conference, I am somewhat dubious of the need for this provision. It will be hard for the Justice Department, with its beefed-up ability to enforce fines, not to collect a fine, so I would expect prosecutions under the provision to be quite rare.

This bill differs from that reported by the Judiciary Committee in only one respect. An amendment has been added to require that persons who are permitted to defer payment of a fine, or to pay in installments, pay interest on the outstanding balance at the rate of 1.5 percent per month.

This bill is the result of a good deal of work by two of our colleagues, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOUCHER] and the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN]. The gentlewoman introduced legislation on this subject and made a very effective presentation on its behalf at hearings held by the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice. The gentleman from Virginia, a member of the subcommittee, did a most skillful job in fashioning a new bill that dealt with legitimate concerns voiced at the hearings.

Mr. Speaker, I urge support for the bill. This measure that will strengthen the capability of the Justice Department to collect criminal fines and will make fines a sterner punishment. This, in turn, will make fines a more effective alternative to imprisonment.

□ 1400

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself as much time as I am able to consume.

I support the legislation at hand and again compliment the chairman of the Criminal Justice Subcommittee of the full Committee on the Judiciary for bringing this legislation to this stage in its legislative life.

One thing that the public is very strongly opinionated about in the question of criminal justice is that too often a slap on the wrist is the outcome of a criminal proceeding, especially against those criminals who can really pay for their crimes. This is one way, this piece of legislation, where we can make it costlier for criminals to do business.

Too often we have a case where the payment of a fine is simply considered by the wrongdoer as a cost of doing business and he cheerfully pays that fine and goes on this wrongdoing in other fashions, ready and willing and able to pay his dues, the cost of doing business, the next time an offense occurs.

Our stiffening of the fine structure, then, does act as a deterrent to those business tycoons turned criminals or criminals who fashion themselves as business tycoons who readily pay fines as a way of life.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5846. This bill modifies the enforcement mechanisms for the collection of criminal fines to ensure that these become a significant and effective sentencing tool.

Among the major provisions of the bill, it increases fine levels for both felonies and misdemeanors to reflect the value of today's dollar. Moreover, the bill establishes fines as liens in favor of the Government, valid against property of the defendant except that exempt from levy under the Internal Revenue Code. This lien would have the priority of a tax lien and would significantly enhance the Government's ability to pursue a criminal's assets.

The bill creates an offense of willfully failing to pay a fine and toughens current law on the payment of fines and collection of overdue amounts.

The bill is a step forward in use of fines as a criminal sanction. It will promote the imposition of fines, it will increase the sums collected, and it will deny criminals more of the fruit of their crimes. To this extent, it promotes the objectives of the President's crime package and should be supported.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN].

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, when I became aware, several months ago, that so many persons convicted of drug trafficking, tax fraud, and other Federal crimes were not serving their sentences, I was appalled and disgusted. There are people sent to prison for robbing a gas station of $500—and I think they should be—while an unscrupulous physician who turns in false medicare claims totaling tens of thousands of dollars goes without punishment.

Let me hasten to assure my colleagues that these individuals are not getting off without being sentenced. They are being sentenced to fines and the fines are becoming larger. Criminals just aren't serving that sentence. They can ignore fines and get away with it.

As our jails become more crowded, there is an increasing tendency to sentence nonviolent offenders to a fine or to a short prison sentence and a large fine. And we can all agree with that move. Like most of you, I suspect, I cheer when I hear on the news that an offender who traffics in drugs or cheats on medicare has at least been given a huge fine. Then I discover that offenders don't care how large or small the fine; they can just ignore it and nothing will be done.

Once the sentence is passed, we have almost no ability to enforce the fine portion of the sentence. Assets disappear during the appeal process. Installment payments are approved even though the schedule agreed to would require centuries to pay off. Some just ignore the fine completely. Let me cite just four examples that surfaced during Senate hearings.

A defendant who pleaded guilty in Federal court to income tax evasion has yet to pay a penny of his $10,000 fine even though he owns half a million dollars in real estate and has more than $80,000 in cash and $35,000 in stocks.

A doctor who owns five homes has paid only $2,500 of a $10,000 fine that was imposed in 1978 after he was convicted of stealing $90,000 by filing false medicare claims.

A Miami drug dealer avoided paying a $100,000 fine by divorcing his wife 3 weeks before his trial and deeding all of this property to her. He continued to live with her.

In one case, a probation officer set up a $10 per month payment plan so that a convicted felon could repay his $35,000 fine after he was released from prison. This means the fine will be paid in about three centuries.

The Justice Department has no mechanism for collecting these fines and the only remedy has been a civil contempt proceeding. That effort has been undertaken only one time in 15 years. The collection rate in 1982 fell to 34 percent. As of 1983, we had $132 million outstanding from 22,000 in unpaid fines.

On October 19, 1983, Senator CHARLES PERCY and I introduced the Criminal Fine Collection Act in the House and Senate. The chief features of our bill were:

First, making it a crime to not pay a fine—an offender who does not pay his or her fine could be imprisoned for nonpayment.

Second, adding penalties and interest to fines that are not paid in a timely manner.

Third, adding a convicted offender to put the amount of his or her fine in escrow pending the outcome of any appeals.

Fourth, setting time limits on payments of fines.

Fifth, making payment of a fine a condition of probation and parole.

Sixth, allowing the Justice Department to place a lien on assets owned by convicted offenders to insure payment. The Senate passed this bill as a part of its omnibus crime package.

On the House side there have been hours of negotiations among Members, the subcommittee staff, my staff, Senator PERCY's staff, the Justice Department, the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, and other interested parties. As a result, I think the bill we have before us today is an even better bill and has positive new provisions in addition to those provisions basic to the original bill. I am pleased, therefore, to have joined the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOUCHER] in introducing the Criminal Fine Enforcement Act.

Now a fine sentence will have to be taken seriously by convicted Federal criminals. There is a real incentive to pay and a mechanism to collect these payments. No longer will a fine be tantamount to no punishment but a viable and realistic alternative to incarceration for nonviolent offenders.

I want to thank the chairman, Mr. CONYERS, for his expeditious handling of this bill. His courtesy to me during the hearing on my bill was extraordinary and his cooperation throughout the entire process has been greatly appreciated; and the ranking minority member, Mr. GEKAS, was always there when help was sought. Now, I yield back the balance of my remaining time.

□ 1410

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOUCHER].

Mr. BOUCHER. Mr. Speaker, Federal law and practice regarding the imposition and collection of fines in criminal cases suffer from serious deficiencies. H.R. 5846 addresses the four most serious shortcomings of current law.

First, maximum fine levels are currently so low that criminals can consider fines a cost of doing business. The Judiciary Committee's report on the criminal code revision bill in the 96th Congress noted that current fine levels are "woefully inadequate to deter criminal behavior." This view was echoed by the Senate Judiciary Committee in its report on the omnibus crimes bill to this Congress, which states that "the maximum levels of fines under current law are set so low that the courts are not able to use them effectively as a sentencing option." H.R. 5846 generally raises the level of all criminal fines.

Second, Federal judges at this time are provided with no statutory guidance regarding the punishment to be imposed upon convicted offenders. There is currently no statutory statement of the purposes of criminal punishment, and it was not until the last Congress that judges were given any legislative guidance at all about what should be considered when deciding the punishment to impose. That guidance concerns only restitution.

The history in H.R. 5846 of the factors to consider when deciding whether to impose a fine will have important beneficial consequences. Fine collection will be improved because more realistic fines, which evidence suggests are more likely to be collected, can be imposed. In addition, greater equity in punishment will be fostered. Fines equal in amount are not necessarily equal in punishment. A $5,000 fine for a millionaire is less severe punishment than a $5,000 fine for a person whose annual income is $15,000.

Third, current law and practice lack incentives for the prompt and full payment of fines. More than 21,000 fines amounting to $132 million are outstanding today. If a fine is to be an effective punishment, it must be collected promptly and in full. H.R. 5846 subjects overdue fines to interest, and to a penalty if excessively overdue. Willful nonpayment of a fine will become a separate crime.

Finally, the procedures available to the Justice Department for enforcing fines when the defendant fails or refuses to pay are inadequate. There is no serious problem if the fine is imposed as a condition of probation, because in that event if the defendant does not pay the fine, probation can be revoked. If the fine is a straight fine, however, the Justice Department must enforce the fine in the same manner as it enforces money judgments in civil cases.

The United States records the judgment as provided by State law and assumes the status of judgment creditor. State laws regarding the enforcement of judgments vary, so the enforceability of the fine judgment varies from State to State. This problem is also addressed in H.R. 5846, which gives the Government a surer judgment lien with the status of a tax lien for the enforcement of criminal fines. To improve current law and practice, H.R. 5846:

Substantially increases maximum fine levels, so that a drug dealer, for example, can be fined up to the greater of $250,000 or twice the amount of money the dealer made as a result of the crime;

Imposes interest at the rate of 1.5 percent per month on delinquent fines, and, if a fine is more than 90 days delinquent, imposes a penalty of 25 percent of the amount past due;

Makes it a criminal offense for a convicted defendant willfully to fail to pay a fine;

Mandates that the U.S. Parole Commission, when it paroles a prisoner who owes a fine, require as a condition of parole that the prisoner make a deligent effort to pay the fine;

Requires a court, when it stays payment of a fine, to order, unless exceptional circumstances exist, that the defendant: First, deposit with the court pending the outcome of the appeal the amount due as a fine; second, provide bond or other security to insure payment of the fine; or third, not transfer or dissipate assets; and Permits the Justice Department, when a fine is to be paid in installments, to declare the entire unpaid balance of the fine to be paid and payable if a scheduled installment is missed.

These provisions are tough, but the bill is not draconian. It requires, for example, that a judge consider a defendant's ability to pay in determining the amount of a fine. In addition, the bill is sensitive to constitutional concerns. The Supreme Court has held that a person cannot be imprisoned for failure to pay a fine if that failure is due to the person's indigency. The bill, therefore, provides that before a judge can impose a fine that requires the defendant to stay in prison until the fine is paid the judge must find that the defendant has the present ability to pay the fine.

Mr. Speaker, in summary, H.R. 5846 is a bill that will not only strengthen the Federal Government's ability to collect criminal fines, but will also substantially increase the maximum fines that can be imposed upon persons convicted of Federal crimes. It is derived from the committee's criminal code revision bill of the 96th Congress and has been carefully constructed in close consultation with the Justice Department, the Judicial Conference of the United States, the U.S. Parole Commission, and our colleagues, the gentlewoman from Illinois, Mrs. MARTIN and Senator CHARLES PERCY, sponsors of companion fine collection bills. I believe that the bill will strengthen the Justice Department's capability to collect criminal fines and will make fines a tougher criminal penalty, and I urge my colleagues to support the measure.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOUCHER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONYERS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to point out that the gentleman is not only the author of the pending bill, but was very helpful in dealing with the rather difficult issue of how to expedite and improve the fine collection process.

I want to thank the gentleman for that, acknowledge his drafting skill, and express my appreciation for his efforts to bring together all of us on both sides of the aisle. Again, he has my deep thanks. I am very pleased that he serves on my subcommittee.

Mr. BOUCHER. I thank the chairman for his kind remarks.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to express my congratulations to the gentleman from Virginia in the authorship of this legislation. It indicates to me that he is very interested in getting tougher on some of our criminal elements. I hope that that theme pervades in some of the ensuing issues that come before our subcommittee.

I want to mention that, as a final note, indeed, this is within the total scope of the initiatives that the administration has advanced in its crime package in that it does lead toward a consciousness on the part of the Congress that we must begin to deal more harshly with some of the continuous and repeat offenders of our society.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5846, the Criminal Fine Enforcement Act of 1984. This legislation will make the fine a tougher penalty for Federal crimes and will improve the Federal Government's ability to collect criminal fines. As a consequence, the fine will be a more attractive alternative to imprisonment, an important consideration in view of the overcrowded conditions in Federal prisons today.

This legislation is derived from the committee's work on the recodification of Federal criminal laws and on sentencing reform and contains many features that were first recommended by the committee in the 96th Congress, when it reported H.R. 6915, the Criminal Code Revision Act of 1980.

H.R. 5846 brings Federal criminal fines into the 1980's. It authorizes substantially increased fines for all Federal offenses. This is particularly important in the areas of drug offenses and corporate and white collar crime, where the criminal often views a fine as a cost of doing business. In addition, the bill mandates that Federal judges, when deciding whether to impose a fine, take into consideration a number of factors, such as the severity of the crime, the defendant's criminal record, the need to deprive the offender of any illegally-obtained profits, and the defendant's ability to pay.

The latter factor is important, not only because the evidence establishes that realistic fines are more likely to be collected, but also in terms of equity in punishment. A $10,000 fine has a different impact upon a millionaire than upon someone of more modest means.

H.R. 5846 also improves the Federal Government's ability to collect criminal fines. The bill gives the Federal Government a lien on the offender's property that will ensure that, if the offender does not voluntarily pay the fine, the fine can be satisfied out of the offender's property. The lien attaches to all of the offender's property, other than property that would be exempt from a Federal tax lien, and this lien has the priority of a Federal tax lien. The bill also provides that in the event that State law regulating the exemptions and priority of judgment liens is more favorable than the Federal tax code, State law will govern.

The legislation also imposes interest on overdue fines, and, if the fine is more than 90 days overdue, provides for a penalty of 25 percent of the amount overdue. In addition, the bill provides that installment fines be treated as if there had been an extension of credit, and imposes interest on the unpaid balance. The Department of Justice is authorized, when an offender misses an installment payment, to declare the unpaid balance to be due and payable.

Finally, H.R. 5846 makes it a misdemeanor willfully to fail to pay a fine. Simple failure to pay is not enough, for the failure may be due to the offender's indigent status, and the Constitution does not permit imprisonment for failure to pay a fine when the failure is due to indigency. See Williams v. Illinois, 399 U.S. 235 (1970); Tate v. Short, 401 U.S. 395 (1971). A willful failure is required. The term "willful" connotes a bad purpose to disregard the obligation to pay the fine. This provision will probably not be used very often, for with the strengthened fine collection procedures, it will be extremely difficult for a defendant to avoid satisfying the fine, either voluntarily (by payment) or involuntarily (by having property seized and sold).

I want to commend the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS], the chairman of the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, for his leadership in bringing this legislation before the House. I also want to commend the members of his subcommittee for their work on this bill, in particular the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOUCHER]. The gentleman from Virginia, the author of the legislation before us, drafted a bill that has commanded broad and bipartisan support, and his hard work and personal involvement has been crucial to the progress of the bill. Finally, I want to commend the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN] and the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. PERCY] for their efforts on behalf of the legislation. They sponsored companion bills and worked with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOUCHER] to fashion the legislation now before us.

Mr. Speaker, The provisions of H.R. 5846 are tough. The maximum fine levels are high, and slow payment of a fine (or nonpayment) subjects an offender to interest and penalty charges. Willful nonpayment subjects an offender to prosecution. The bill is not draconian, however, and is sensitive to constitutional concerns. For example, Federal judges are required to consider a defendant's ability to pay when deciding whether to impose a fine or the amount of a fine, and it is a defense to the willful nonpayment offense that the defendant's failure to pay was caused by the need to provide necessities for him- or herself or for others financially dependant upon him or her.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.●

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 5846, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FINANCIAL BRIBERY AND FRAUD AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1984

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 5872) to amend title 18 of the United States Code with respect to certain bribery and related offenses, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 5872

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Financial Bribery and Fraud Amendments Act of 1984".

SEC. 2. (a) Chapter 11 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by striking out section 215 and all that follows through section 216 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"§ 215. Bribery regarding financial operations

"(a) Whoever knowingly—

"(1) offers, gives, or agrees to give anything of value to any person with intent—

"(A) to influence any official action to be taken by; or

"(B) to induce the violation of a legal or fiduciary duty by; such person as a director, officer, employee, agent, or attorney of a national credit institution; or

"(2) solicits, accepts, or agrees to accept anything of value from another—

"(A) because of any official action to be taken by, or any violation of a legal or fiduciary duty to be committed by, such person as a director, officer, employee, agent, or attorney of a national credit institution; or

"(B) that is given with the specific intent described in paragraph (1) of this subsection; shall be punished as provided in subsection (b) of this section.

"(b) The punishment for an offense under this section is—

"(1) if the value of the thing offered, given, solicited, accepted, or agreed to be given or accepted, in violation of subsection (a) of this section, is greater than $250—

"(A) a fine of not more than $250,000 or imprisonment for not more than five years, or both, if the offender is an individual; and

"(B) a fine of not more than $1,000,000 if the offender is other than an individual; and

"(2) in any other case—

"(A) a fine of not more than $100,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, if the offender is an individual; and

"(B) a fine of not more than $250,000 if the offender is other than an individual.

"(c) As used in this section—

"(1) the term 'national credit institution' means—

"(A) a bank with deposits insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation;

"(B) an institution with accounts insured by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation;

"(C) a credit union with accounts insured by the Administrator of the National Credit Union Administration;

"(D) a Federal home loan bank or a member, as defined in section 2 of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act (12 U.S.C. 1422), of the Federal home loan bank system;

"(E) a Federal land bank, Federal intermediate credit bank, bank for cooperatives, production credit association, and Federal land bank association;

"(F) a small business investment company, as defined in section 103 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 (15 U.S.C. 662); and

"(G) a bank holding company as defined in section 2 of the Bank Holding Company Act of 1956 (12 U.S.C. 1841) or a savings and loan holding company as defined in section 408 of the National Housing Act (12 U.S.C. 1730a);

"(2) the term 'official action' means a decision, opinion, recommendation, judgment, vote, or other conduct involving an exercise of discretion in the course of administration, employment, agency or representation; and

"(3) the term 'anything of value' means any direct or indirect gain or advantage, or anything that might reasonably be regarded by the beneficiary as a direct or indirect gain or advantage, including a direct or indirect gain or advantage to another person, but such term does not include bona fide salary, wages, fees, or other compensation paid in the usual course of business.

"(d) There is extraterritorial jurisdiction over an offense under this section.

"§ 216. Graft in financial operations

"(a) Whoever knowingly—

"(1) offers, gives, or agrees to give anything of pecuniary value to any person with intent to reward such person for an official action taken by, or any legal or fiduciary duty violated by, such person as a director, officer, employee, agent or attorney of a national credit institution; or

"(2) solicits, accepts, or agrees to accept anything of pecuniary value from another—

"(A) because of any official action taken by, or any legal or fiduciary duty violated by, such person as a director, officer, employee, agent or attorney of a national credit institution; or

"(B) that is given with the specific intent described in paragraph (1) of this subsection; shall be punished as provided in subsection (b) of this section.

"(b) The punishment for an offense under this section is—

"(1) if the value of the thing offered, given, solicited, accepted, or agreed to be given or accepted, in violation of subsection (a) of this section, is greater than $250—

"(A) a fine of not more than $250,000 or imprisonment for not more than three years, or both, if the offender is an individual; and

"(B) a fine of not more than $1,000,000 if the offender is other than an individual; and

"(2) in any other case—

"(A) a fine of not more than $100,000 or imprisonment for not more than six months, or both, if the offender is an individual; and

"(B) a fine of not more than $250,000 if the offender is other than an individual.

"(c) As used in this section—

"(1) the terms 'national credit institution' and 'official action' have, respectively, the meanings given those terms in section 215 of this title; and

"(2) the term 'anything of pecuniary value' means anything of value, as defined in section 215 of this title—

"(A) in the form of money, a negotiable instrument, a commercial interest, or anything else the primary significance of which is economic advantage; or

"(B) that has a value in excess of $100.

"(d) There is extraterritorial jurisdiction over an offense under this section.".

(b) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 11 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by striking out the item relating to section 215 and all that follows through the item relating to section 216 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"215. Bribery regarding financial operations.
"216. Graft in financial operations.".

SEC. 3. (a) Chapter 63 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by adding at the end the following new section:

"§ 1344. Financial fraud

"(a) Whoever, having devised or intending to devise any scheme or artifice—

"(1) to defraud a national credit institution; or

"(2) for obtaining property of a national credit institution by means of false or fraudulent pretenses, representations, or promises; knowingly engages in any conduct in furtherance of such scheme or artifice shall be fined not more than $250,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both, if such person is an individual, and shall be fined not more than $1,000,000 if such person is other than an individual.

"(b) As used in this section, the term 'national credit institution' has the meaning given that term in section 215 of this title.

"(c) There is extraterritorial jurisdiction over an offense under this section.".

(b) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 63 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by adding at the end the following new item:

"1344. Financial fraud.".

(c)(1) The heading of chapter 63 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended to read as follows:

"CHAPTER 63—MAIL FRAUD AND OTHER FRAUD"

(2) The table of chapters for part I of title 18 of the United States Code is amended so that the item relating to chapter 63 reads as follows:

"63. Mail fraud and other fraud ..... 1341".

SEC. 4. Subsection (c) of section 2113 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by striking out "knowing" and all that follows through "this section" and inserting in lieu thereof "that has been taken in violation of subsection (b) of this section, knowing that such thing was taken with intent to steal or purloin,".

SEC. 5. This Act and the amendments made by this Act shall take effect ninety days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GEKAS] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS].

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5872, the Financial Bribery and Fraud Amendments Act of 1984, reported by the Judiciary Committee without dissent, amends Federal laws prohibiting bribery of bank officials and receiving stolen bank property and creates a new Federal crime regarding fraud against banks.

There is no question that the banks and financial institutions of this country are critical links in the flow of interstate and foreign commerce. It is therefore no surprise that the regulation of banks and financial institutions has long been a matter of Federal concern, and properly so. It has been brought to the committee's attention, however, that there are serious gaps in the Federal criminal laws protecting the integrity of banks and banking operations, and that some of the laws that do exist are obsolete and ineffective. One of the current Federal bank bribery statutes applies only to the receivers of bribes; the offeror cannot be prosecuted as an accomplice unless the bribe is accepted. In addition, many nationally controlled financial institutions are not covered by the current laws.

The laws used to prosecute frauds are also inadequate. Courts have interpreted 18 U.S.C. 656, prohibiting misapplication of bank funds, as inapplicable to insider trading. The Supreme Court has ruled that the presentation of a check for which there are insufficient funds does not constitute a false statement under 18 U.S.C. 1014. Mail and wire fraud laws are often ineffective because the use of the wires or mails is only incidental to the fraudulent scheme.

H.R. 5872 corrects some of these problems by amending current law with regard to bribery and create a new crime of financial fraud.

Section 215 of title 18, one of the current sections prohibiting bribery regarding banking operations, is amended to proscribe all payments intended to influence an officer or employee of a financial institution in making a discretionary decision, or to induce such a person to violate a duty.

18 U.S.C. 216 is amended to prohibit payments made to an officer or employee of a financial institution as a reward for violating a duty or taking discretionary action in a particular manner. In order to avoid criminalization such conduct as treating a loan officer to dinner following a successful negotiation, the section requires that the payment be in money or its equivalent, or else have a value greater than $100.

The financial institutions covered by both sections include all such institutions that are regulated by the Federal Government.

H.R. 5872 also enacts a new 18 U.S.C. 1344. The new section would prohibit devising a scheme to defraud a financial institution, or to obtain property of such an institution. The section uses language parallel to that of the mail fraud and wire fraud offenses—"scheme to defraud." There is a history of expansive interpretations of that language by the courts. Its current coverage is clearly greater than that intended by Congress. The committee is convinced, however, that fashioning new language to cover all of the activity properly within the scope of Federal concerns, such as insider trading and interstate check kiting schemes, would be difficult if not impossible. The proposal therefore uses the expansive language of current law fraud offenses. In approving such language, the committee endorses court interpretations of that language. The committee does, however, believe that any further expansion of the meaning of this language would not be appropriate.

Finally, there is little reason to require, as does current law, that a person who receives stolen property know that it belongs to a bank as a prerequisite to Federal prosecution. H.R. 5872 therefore removes that requirement from current law.

□ 1430

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, if ever we were to describe a measure that reached the floor of the House of Representatives as one intended to and resulting in the closing of loopholes in our criminal justice system, this can be properly so described.

As a matter of fact, one loophole that is glaring and about which we hear from time to time in our discussions with people involved in law enforcement is the one addressed by this legislation where check kiting, formerly under previous legislation before this came to out attention, would have been able to be perpetrated without any serious results to the kiters. So we are pleased to report, as part of the consideration of this legislation, that portion of criminal activity, check kiting, in the whole system of financial fraud will be covered by this bill should it become law.

So I again thank the gentleman from Michigan, who carefully has escorted this bill to the floor, and I offer my assistance in making sure that our voice will be heard in whatever lies ahead for the legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5872.

This bill was inspired by a portion of S. 1762, the President's crime package, and attempts to close loopholes in criminal statutes dealing with financial fraud and bribery.

Bribery of bank employees and officials is currently covered by 18 U.S.C. 215 and 216. However, these sections are obsolete because: First, they do not cover such federally regulated financial institutions as savings and loans and credit unions; second, they do not cover those who offer bribes, only those who receive them; and third, they cover payments made for future actions and fail to apply to payments made as a reward for actions already taken. H.R. 5872 covers each of their deficiencies.

In addition, current law does not cover certain fraudulent schemes where banks are victimized unless there is a false statement or theft. For example, check kiting schemes are not covered under one Supreme Court decision construing the statute—Williams v. U.S., 458 U.S. 279 (1982). Finally, current law dealing with receiving stolen bank property requires knowledge that the property was not only stolen but also that it was stolen from a bank. H.R. 5872 corrects these problems.

The bill changes 18 U.S.C. 215 to cover all payments intended to influence an official or employee of a financial institution in making a discretionary decision or as inducement to violate a duty. It amends 18 U.S.C. 216 to cover payments to an official or employee of a financial institution made as a reward for an action taken. Under this section, the bill would require that such a payment exceed $100—unless it is actually a payment in cash—so as not to include community or charitable awards or recognition.

H.R. 5872 creates a new 18 U.S.C. 1344 to prohibit the devising of a scheme to defraud a financial institution, or to obtain property of such an institution, and engaging in conduct to further such a scheme.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation will tighten laws protecting the banking industry and should be supported.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5872, the Financial Bribery and Fraud Amendments Act of 1984. Members of this body may frequently disagree about the proper role of the Federal Government, but few would doubt its historical role in preserving free commerce among the States. Our Nation's banking system provides the life lines through which this commerce flows. It is therefore not surprising that the Federal Government rightly plays a significant role in the protection of the integrity of that system. Unfortunately, many of the laws through which it fulfills that role are incapable of dealing with many new banking practices and the multiplicity of banking organizations. For example, many federally controlled financial institutions are not covered by the current law against bribery. The laws used to prosecute frauds are inadequate to prevent improper trading by insiders or to deal with schemes which do not involve the use of the wires or mails.

H.R. 5872 addresses some of these problems by amending current law with regard to bribery and creating a new crime of financial fraud.

The current bribery laws are amended to prohibit all payments to influence discretionary decisions, or to induce a violation of duty, as well as payments made as a reward for violating a duty or taking discretionary action in a particular manner. Payments that are not money or its equivalent, and do not otherwise have a value greater than $100, are permissible if merely intended to thank a bank official for a particular action. Otherwise, the giving of placques and ceremonial dinners would become criminal. This new law would apply to the officials of all financial institutions that are regulated by the Federal Government.

H.R. 5872 also enacts a new section of law prohibiting schemes to defraud a financial institution, or to obtain property of such an institution. The section is similar to the mail fraud and wire fraud offenses. This section will facilitate prosecution of insider trading and check kiting schemes.

Current law inexplicably requires that a person receiving stolen property know that it belongs to a bank as an element of the offense of receiving stolen bank property. H.R. 5872 removes that requriement from current law.

H.R. 5872 has strong bipartisan support on the Judiciary Committee. Its goals are the same as parts of the omnibus crime bill passed by the other body. It is supported, except for minor disagreements about particular language, by the Department of Justice. I urge its approval.●

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 5872, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous material, on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

ESCAPE FROM CUSTODY RESULTING FROM CIVIL COMMITMENT

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 5526) to amend title 18 of the United States Code with respect to escape from custody resulting from civil commitment, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 5526

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 751 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(c) Whoever escapes or attempts to escape from the custody of the Attorney General or his authorized representative, or from any institution or facility in which he is confined by direction of the Attorney General, or from any custody under or by virtue of any process issued under the laws of the United States by any court, judge, or commissioner, or from the custody of an officer or employee of the United States pursuant to lawful arrest, shall, if the custody or confinement is by virtue of an order of a court of the United States to commit such person—

"(1) pursuant to chapter 313 of this title;

"(2) pursuant to section 1826 of title 28, United States Code; or

"(3) as the result of an acquittal of criminal charges by reason of insanity; be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.".

SEC. 2. Section 752 of title 18 of the United States Code is amended by adding at the end the following new subsection:

"(c) Whoever rescues or attempts to rescue or instigates, aids, or assists the escape or attempted escape of any person in the custody of the Attorney General or his authorized representative, or other process issued under any law of the United States or from any institution or facility in which he is confined by direction of the Attorney General, shall, if the custody or confinement is by virtue of an order of a court of the United States to commit such person—

"(1) pursuant to chapter 313 of this title;

"(2) pursuant to section 1826 of title 28, United States Code; or

"(3) as the result of an acquittal of criminal charges by reason of insanity; be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.".

SEC. 3. This Act shall take effect on January 1, 1985.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GEKAS] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS].

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous matter, on the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5526, reported without dissent by the Committee on the Judiciary, repairs a shortcoming in the current Federal law regarding escape from custody.

Current Federal law—18 U.S.C. 751 and 752—makes it a crime to escape, or to assist another to escape, from certain types of Federal custody or confinement. The offense carries felony—a 5-year maximum term of imprisonment—or misdemeanor—a 1-year maximum term of imprisonment—penalties, depending upon the type of Federal custody involved.

Current law, however, would not reach an escape from Federal custody in three situations:

First, an escape by a person in custody following an adjudication of civil contempt;

Second, an escape by a person held in custody at the expiration of a prison term because that person is incompetent and dangerous; and

Third, an escape by a person found not guilty by reason of insanity and committed to Federal custody for treatment. While this is not currently a serious problem, it could become one if Congress enacts an insanity defense reform bill retaining the defense and authorizing Federal commitment of persons found not guilty by reason of insanity.

H.R. 5526 revises current law to make it an offense to escape—or to assist another to escape—from Federal custody in those three situations.

H.R. 5526 is supported by the Justice Department. The other body has passed similar legislation as part of its ominibus crime bill, S. 1762. I know of no opposition to H.R. 5526, and I urge its approval.

□ 1440

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the subcommittee is quite correct in assessing this legislation as one in which some new attempts have been made to seek out remedies to little-known problems that exist within the law enforcement structure. Everyone in the country is aware through a glance at a daily newspaper of the phenomenon of an escape from criminal custody such as from prisons themselves, or from the custody of a constable or some other law enforcement agency or a breakout from the court house; all the bizarre things that we have read about over the years.

Little known is the anguish that is caused the entire law structure of those kinds of things where someone is adjudged to be in contempt of court for instance, and is supposed to come to court at a particular time to respond to a court order and fails to do so. That individual, technically, was a fugitive, as it were. But the law never really cornered that individual in a way that this legislation is aimed to do. So, we see that in recognizing that escape from civil custody is just as important for the sanctity and safety of our citizens as those already on the books. When we talk about escaping from criminal custody, then one can readily see that the time has come for the passage of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5526.

This is a noncontroversial bill which is inspired by a portion of S. 1762, the President's crime package. It covers a loophole in existing law by applying criminal sanctions to those who escape from Federal custody resulting from civil commitment. It would apply specifically to those: First, committed for civil contempt (28 U.S.C. 1862); second, committed upon the completion of a criminal sentence because of a determination that the person was then insane and likely to endanger the safety of officers, property or "other interests" of the United States (chapter 313 of title 18); and third, those committed to custody for treatment following acquittal by reason of insanity. This latter case anticipates successful action later in this Congress to provide a commitment procedure within the federal system for those who successfully offer a defense of insanity to a criminal charge.

Mr. Speaker, it is already a crime to escape from Federal custody when held pursuant to criminal process. Criminal penalties should apply to custody of a civil nature as enumerated in this bill.

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the legislation.

H.R. 5526 repairs a shortcoming in the current provisions of title 18, United States Code, that make it a crime to escape, or to assist another to escape, from Federal custody or commitment. Current law is inadequate because it does not cover: First, an escape by a person in custody following an adjudication of civil contempt of court under 28 U.S.C. 1826; second, an escape by a person held in custody pursuant to title 18, United States Code, chapter 313 at the expiration of a prison term because that person is incompetent and dangerous; and third, an escape by a person found not guilty by reason of insanity and committed to Federal custody for treatment. The latter situation is not at present a serious problem because persons acquitted on insanity grounds are not committed under Federal authority. It will become more serious if the pending insanity defense legislation is enacted into law.

H.R. 5526 revises current law to cover all three situations.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary by voice vote, without audible dissent. I urge my colleagues to support it.●

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time, and I urge passage of the bill.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 5526, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADMISSIBILITY OF FOREIGN BUSINESS RECORDS

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 5919) to amend title 18 of the United States Code with regard to the admissibility of business records located in foreign nations, and for other purposes, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 5919

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) chapter 223 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new sections:

"§ 3505. Foreign records of regularly conducted activity

"(a)(1) In a criminal proceeding in a court of the United States, a foreign record of regularly conducted activity, or a copy of such record, shall not be excluded as evidence by the hearsay rule if a foreign certification attests that—

"(A) such record was made, at or near the time of the occurrence of the matters set forth, by (or from information transmitted by) a person with knowledge of those matters;

"(B) such record was kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity;

"(C) the business activity made such a record as a regular practice; and

"(D) if such record is not the original, such record is a duplicate of the original; unless the source of information or the method or circumstances of preparation indicate lack of trustworthiness.

"(2) A foreign certification under this section shall authenticate such record or duplicate.

"(b) At the arraignment or as soon after the arraignment as practical, a party intending to offer in evidence under this section a foreign record of regularly conducted activity shall provide written notice of that intention to each other party. A motion opposing admission in evidence of such record shall be made by the opposing party and determined by the court before trial. Failure by a party to file such motion before trial shall constitute a waiver of objection to such record or duplicate, but the court for cause shown may grant relief from the waiver.

"(c) As used in this section, the term—

"(1) 'foreign record of regularly conducted activity' means a memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, in any form, of acts, events, conditions, opinions, or diagnoses, maintained in a foreign country;

"(2) 'foreign certification' means a written declaration made and signed in a foreign country by the custodian of a foreign record of regularly conducted activity or another qualified person that, if falsely made, would subject the maker to criminal penalty under the laws of that country; and

"(3) 'business' includes business, institution, association, profession, occupation, and calling of every kind, whether or not conducted for profit.

"§ 3506. Service of papers filed in opposition to official request by United States to foreign government for criminal evidence

"(a) Except as provided in subsection (b) of this section, any national or resident of the United States who submits, or causes to be submitted, a pleading or other document to a court or other authority in a foreign country in opposition to an official request for evidence of an offense shall serve such pleading or other document on the Attorney General at the time such pleading or other document is submitted.

"(b) Any person who is a party to a criminal proceeding in a court of the United States who submits, or causes to be submitted, a pleading or other document to a court or other authority in a foreign country in opposition to an official request for evidence of an offense that is a subject of such proceeding shall serve such pleading or other document on the appropriate attorney for the Government, pursuant to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, at the time such pleading or other document is submitted.

"(c) As used in this section, the term 'official request' means a letter rogatory, a request under a treaty or convention, or any other request for evidence made by a court of the United States or an authority of the United States having criminal law enforcement responsibility, to a court or other authority of a foreign country.

"§ 3507. Special master at foreign deposition

"Upon application of a party to a criminal case, a United States district court before which the case is pending may, to the extent permitted by a foreign country, appoint a special master to carry out at a deposition taken in that country such duties as the court may direct, including presiding at the deposition or serving as an advisor on questions of United States law. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a special master appointed under this section shall not decide questions of privilege under foreign law. The refusal of a court to appoint a special master under this section, or of the foreign country to permit a special master appointed under this section to carry out a duty at a deposition in that country, shall not affect the admissibility in evidence of a deposition taken under the provisions of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.".

(b) The table of sections for chapter 223 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new items:

"3505. Foreign records of regularly conducted activity.
"3506. Service of papers filed in opposition to offical request by United States to foreign government for criminal evidence.
"3507. Special master at foreign deposition.".

SEC. 2. (a) Chapter 213 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end of the following new section:

§ 3292. Suspension of limitations to permit United States to obtain foreign evidence

"(a)(1) Upon application of the United States, filed before return of an indictment, indicating that evidence of an offense is in a foreign country, the district court before which a grand jury is impaneled to investigate the offense shall suspend the running of the statute of limitations for the offense if the court finds by a preponderance of the evidence that an official request has been made for such evidence and that it reasonably appears, or reasonably appeared at the time the request was made, that such evidence is, or was, in such foreign country.

"(2) The court shall rule upon such application not later than thirty days after the filing of the application.

"(b) Except as provided in subsection (c) of this section, a period of suspension under this section shall begin on the date on which the official request is made and end on the date on which the foreign court or authority takes final action on the request.

"(c) The total of all periods of suspension under this section with respect to an offense—

"(1) shall not exceed three years; and

"(2) shall not extend a period within which a criminal case must be initiated for more than six months if all foreign authorities take final action before such period would expire without regard to this section.

"(d) As used in this section, the term 'official request' means a letter rogatory, a request under a treaty or convention, or any other request for evidence made by a court of the United States or an authority of the United States having criminal law enforcement responsibility, to a court or other authority of a foreign country.".

(b) The table of sections for chapter 213 of title 18, United States, Code, is amended by adding after the item relating to section 3391 the following new item:

"3292. Suspension of limitations to permit United States to obtain foreign evidence.".

SEC. 3. Subsection (h) of section 3161 of title 18, United States Code, is amended

(1) in paragraph (8)(C), by striking out "paragraph (8)(A) of this subsection" and inserting in lieu thereof "subparagraph (A) of this paragraph"; and

(2) by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(9) Any period of delay, not to exceed one year, ordered by a district court upon an application of a party and a finding by a preponderance of the evidence that an official request, as defined in section 3292 of this title, has been made for evidence of any such offense and that it reasonably appears, or reasonably appeared at the time the request was made, that such evidence is, or was, in such foreign country.".

SEC. 4. This Act and the amendments made by this Act shall take effect thirty days after the date of the enactment of this Act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS] will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GEKAS] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS].

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on H.R. 5919, the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5919, reported without dissent by the Committee on the Judiciary, will facilitate the prosecution of criminals who use offshore banks for the laundering of profits and the evasion of taxes. What this costs the Federal Government each year is hard to say, but the Internal Revenue Service estimated when testifying before the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice that use of offshore tax havens costs billions in taxes annually.

Federal prosecutors confront serious difficulties in both the investigatory and prosecution stages of a case involving the use of offshore banks. The procedures that must be undertaken in foreign countries to obtain necessary records are time consuming, and defendants frequently seek to block prosecutor's requests, sometimes by initiating formal action in another country without informing the prosecutor.

The time consumed in obtaining these records creates several problems. First, the statute of limitations may run before the prosecutor can obtain records necessary to get an indictment. Second, Speedy Trial Act deadlines can be missed if the records cannot be obtained in time. Finally, getting the records admitted into evidence can be a problem. The custodian of the records must, under the Federal rules of evidence, testify about the manner in which the records are kept. Almost invariably the custodian will be a resident and national of a foreign country and not subject to subpoena by the Federal courts. While it is possible to take the custodian's deposition overseas, the procedures for doing so are costly and time consuming.

H.R. 5919 addresses some of these problems facing Federal prosecutors.

First, H.R. 5919 permits a Federal court, at the request of a Federal prosecutor, to suspend the running of the statute of limitation for up to 3 years if necessary to enable the prosecutor to obtain evidence located in a foreign country.

Second, the bill permits a Federal court, at the request of any party to a criminal case, to suspend Speedy Trial Act deadlines for up to 1 year in order to allow the party to obtain evidence located in a foreign country.

Third, the bill makes foreign business records admissible as an exception to the hearsay rule if the custodian of the records furnishes a certification attesting to the authenticity, and the manner of keeping, of the records. The certification must be executed under penalty of perjury, and the court has the discretion not to admit the records if it finds that the manner in which they were kept makes them untrustworthy.

Fourth, the bill requires U.S. nationals and residents, and all parties to Federal criminal cases, to serve upon the prosecutor any papers formally filed in another county in oppositon to an official request by the prosecutor for evidence located in that country.

Finally, the bill authorizes Federal courts to appoint special masters to preside over, or act as an advisor on U.S. law to the official presiding over, a deposition taken in a foreign country.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5919 has the support of the Justice Department. Similar provisions have been passed by the other body as part of S. 1762, the omnibus crime bill. I am unaware of any opposition to the bill, and I urge its approval.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONYERS. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GONZALEZ. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to compliment the distinguished subcommittee chairman from the Committee on the Judiciary for this very much-needed legislation, on behalf of this legislation.

I think that the record ought to show that it is in an area of very dire need as far as legislation, and I am delighted to see that the Committee on the Judiciary, from its jurisdictional standpoint, is aware of this problem.

I have been a member of the Banking Committee since I came to the Congress, and have been a member of the subcommittee now called Renegotiation and Oversight since it was founded about 8 or 10 years ago. We have had hearings on related matters, that is, the laundering of moneys by the illegal drug interests through the banking system, which is part and parcel of what the gentleman is addressing.

We, in fact, were responsible for a little bit of law that has to do from the banking standpoint in an attempt to control this kind of laundering of illicit gains. We also had hearings of another subcommittee in my hometown of San Antonio that brought to light partially the extent, which is great, of this kind of activity with respect to the Mexican border.

But what nothing has been really reported on, and I think I am the only one in the Congress who has even referred to it, is what I call the Latin dollar market. We hear a lot about the Euro dollar market, but almost imperceptibly has been the tremendous increment of growth in what I call the Latin dollar market, which has grown primarily as a place to which great and vast American interests, corporations, banking, and otherwise, have used as a means of evading taxes, as a means of capitializing on some type of investments that are on the borderline or penumbra of legality or illegality.

So this is a vast problem. The Latin dollar market, for instance, just in Panama alone, Panama has devised a system not too long ago that is a sort of weak edition or Latin edition of the Swiss secret bank accounts. To that has flocked a tremendous amount of American money. In fact, when the great notoriety given the Panama Canal Treaty, part of the unreported negotiations in the background, lurking in the background, had to do with this enormous growth of the Latin dollar market, which I estimates now is in excess of $35 or $40 billion.

So we are talking about an activity that is very important to the enforcement of the law, to the adequate collection of the taxes rightfully due the taxpayers of this country.

I end up, as I started, by complimenting the gentleman for his endeavor in this respect.

Mr. CONYERS. I thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ]. I should point out to the gentleman that the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice was using some of the work of his distinguished committee in crafting this legislation. Recently, the gentleman is aware that the Committee on Ways and Means has ended the tax haven status of the Netherland Antilles.

Mr. GONZALEZ. No, I have not kept up with that.

Mr. CONYERS. There has been a restriction. We did not cut them off immediately. It would convulse its entire economy, which it turns out is mostly based on banking, if one can imagine it. In a measure previously passed this afternoon, H.R. 5910, dealing with contraband in prisons, we specifically make foreign currency contraband in the prisons—we have now found Mexican and Canadian currency coming into the prisons, being used for all the purposes that currency is used for in our society.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Even since the devaluation of the peso?

Mr. CONYERS. I am afraid it has no noticeable inhibitions on the use in the Federal prison system. This does not solve the problem, as the gentleman knows, but we think this is a move forward. I am delighted that the gentleman's views were presented to the House during the debate on this bill.

Mr. GONZALEZ. I thank the gentleman for his long endeavor in this area and his successful work.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, again the chairman of the subcommittee has very adequately described the salient features of the legislation that is before us.

It is a phenomenon in court procedures that I have noticed over the years that defense attorneys, particularly in criminal cases involving fraud and financial transactions, try every device known to jurisprudence to try to make evidence inadmissible; of course, in protecting their client, someone who has been accused of some kind of bank fraud.

So it is easy to envision a case in which the records of the defendant who has been accused of income tax evasion, for instance, the records of his bank holdings in a foreign country are an important part of the prosecutor's or U.S. attorney's case against this particular defendant accused of fraud.

The prosecutor stands up and offers into evidence the bank statements from the foreign country to indicate evidence against the defendant. The defense attorney, quite alertly, rises to his feet and objects, and says, in effect, "I object to this evidence being introduced because the individual who had custody of these bank statements is not here to authenticate those bank statements. It would be unfair to my client, the defendant in this case, to pursue this matter with evidence that has not been authenticated. Anybody could just send over bank statements," he would say, "and, therefore, I ask that this evidence be declared inadmissible."

He would prevail under certain circumstances and thus throw a kink into the case of the prosecution in that kind of a case.

So to show how commonsense enters into the resolution of this problem, this legislation would simply say that where bank statements or financial records, for instance, from another country would be involved, rather than having to bring in and subpoena the custodian of that record at the cost of great gobs of money and also delay of proceedings, rather than having to do that, a procedure would be formulated whereby these bank statements can be properly authenticated by the bank official who had custody of them in the first place and thus cut through all the procedural redtape. I condider this an excellent adjunct to the Rules of Criminal Procedure which prevail in the Federal courts, and I urge passage of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5919.

This bill is similar to legislation originally proposed by Senator ROTH and adopted unanimously by amendment in S. 1762, the President's crime package. It is supported by the administration. The bill is intended to facilitate prosecution where foreign business records are required at trial. It would permit these records to be admitted at a U.S. criminal trial with the certification of the foreign custodian of these records establishing the method in which they have been kept.

H.R. 5919 offers simple, inexpensive and fair alternatives for what is now a tedious and slow procedure for admitting foreign business records. The bill adequately protects against the admission of unreliable information by requiring the custodian of the records to certify its indicia of trustworthiness subject to the criminal penalties of that foreign country. The party intending to offer the foreign business records must notify all other parties so that objection to its admission can be made and resolved before trial.

H.R. 5919 also permits a Federal prosecutor to apply for a suspension of the statute of limitations when an official request has been made for foreign evidence and it appears the evidence is, or was at the time of the request, in the country to which application was made. A change is also made to the Speedy Trial Act to exclude from its required timetable any period of delay—up to 1 year—during which this official request for foreign evidence was pending.

Mr. Speaker, at a time and in a world where criminals of all stripe can use foreign banks and institutions to cache their gains, it is imperative that we take action to bolster law enforcement. H.R. 5919 should be supported.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PARRIS].

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I rise to support passage of H.R. 5919 and to applaud the Committee on the Judiciary for moving this legislation onto the House floor for consideration.

It will help make Federal prosecutors' jobs easier in their battles for evidence that originates outside the confines of the borders of the United States.

It has been said, and rightly so, that this will aid in the fight to trace illegally obtained money that now is being laundered through foreign banks by criminals and those who would evade taxes.

Yet, there is other legislation of equal and superior importance that has not been so fortunate in its treatment. As ranking minority member of the House Banking Oversight Subcommittee, I feel it is my duty to bring the attention of the House to the failure of the Judiciary Committee to act on title IX of S. 1762 to strengthen the provisions of the Bank Secrecy Act of 1970.

We have little time remaining during the 98th Congress to consider this vitally important legislation which is aimed at controlling the international laundering of money and other currency offenses associated with the narcotics trade and organized crime.

This is part of a comprehensive anticrime package that the Senate approved 91 to 1 on February 2. That, I would remind you, was just a few days short of 6 months ago. Surely 6 months is long enough for the Judiciary Committee to consider the Bank Secrecy Act amendments. Based on oversight hearings regarding efforts to enforce the present provisions, many of us are convinced that this legislation is crucial to the efforts of our law enforcement agencies in their war against drug trafficking and other criminal activities that involve large sums of money.

The present penalties in the Bank Secrecy Act are patently inadequate and enforcement efforts have pinpointed other deficiencies in the 1970 statute.

The lack of action by the Judiciary Committee, I might add, involves not only the Bank Secrecy Act but a broad spectrum of other elements in the anticrime package. The people of this Nation have made it clear, in no uncertain terms, that they want and expect the Congress of the United States to take deliberate, firm and prompt steps to make sure that criminals are made to pay for their misdeeds.

Until this is done, innocent people, including our young people who are the special victims of the illegal narcotics trade, remain held in bondage to drugs or live imprisoned behind their own locked doors, fearful of becoming victims.

The Senate, as evidenced by its 91 to 1 vote, adopted a bipartisan approach to this very serious issue. I call upon the House of Representatives to do no less.

I and several colleagues from both sides of the aisle who serve on the Oversight Subcommittee have written the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, asking for prompt consideration of the Bank Secrecy Act so that the House can act during this session.

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the legislation.

H.R. 5919 will eliminate serious obstacles to the prosecution of persons who use offshore banks to conceal criminal profits and evade Federal taxes. Such prosecutions may often require the introduction as evidence of records of the offshore banks. Under the current rules of evidence, however, this may require that the custodian of the record actually appear in Federal court, or that a deposition be taken at a U.S. Consulate. The bill provides a simple and inexpensive substitute for the cumbersome and expensive procedures currently required for the admission of foreign business records. Such records are admissible if the custodian executes, under penalty for false statement, a certification of the genuinenesses of the records and their manner of being kept. A party may challenge the records, and the court need not admit them if the court finds that the source of information for the records or the manner or circumstances of preparation of the records indicates a lack of trustworthiness for the records.

Another problem arises because defendants often file actions in foreign courts to hinder access to bank records, causing lengthy delays. Delays in obtaining records from foreign countries may prevent the bringing of charges before the statute of limitation has run out or may prevent the Government from being able to go to trial within the period prescribed by the Speedy Trial Act. H.R. 5919 deals with this type of problem by authorizing a Federal court to suspend for up to 3 years the running of the statute of limitation if the prosecutor establishes that the time is necessary in order to obtain evidence located in a foreign country. The bill also authorizes a Federal court to suspend for up to 1 year, Speedy Trial Act deadlines if any party establishes that there is pending an official request for evidence located in a foreign country.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5919 was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary by voice vote, with no audible dissent, and is supported by the Justice Department. I urge my colleagues to support it.●

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONYERS] that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 5919, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL ARCHIVES AND RECORDS ADMINISTRATION ACT OF 1984

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 534 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 3987.

□ 1505

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 3987) to improve the preservation and management of Federal records, and for other purposes, with Mr. GONZALEZ in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BROOKS] will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HORTON] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair now recognizes the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BROOKS].

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Chairman, in the 50 years since its creation, the National Archives has played a vital role in the organization and preservation of our Nation's documentary heritage as well as in the efficient management of the Federal Government's records activities. The Archives was established in 1934 as an independent agency, headed by an Archivist appointed by the President. Fifteen years later, however, the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 transferred the Archives to the newly created General Services Administration. The principal archival functions which were previously exercised by the Archivist were vested in the Administrator of General Services and the Archivist became a subordinate of the Administrator.

Over the 35 years since that transfer, numerous groups and individuals concerned with the Federal Government's archival activities have contended that this placement has impaired the Archives' effectiveness in handling, preserving, and disseminating Federal records. Under the present system, the Archivist lacks clear statutory authority for most archival functions and, as a result, accountability for their efficient operation is impaired.

In preparation and defense of the Archives' annual budget, the Archivist lacks direct access to OMB and to the Congress. Vital administrative support services for the Archivist have been poor in quality and unresponsive to the Archives' specialized needs. Submerged within a bureaucratic structure that is primarily concerned with housekeeping details, the Archives has suffered and, as a result, its vital work has suffered.

H.R. 3987 corrects this situation by making the National Archives and Records Administration an independent agency in the executive branch. Under this bill, the Archivist of the United States will once again become a Presidential appointee to be confirmed by the Senate. The bill provides that the Archivist may be removed by the President; but, to ensure that the President will be held accountable in the political process for any such removal, it also requires that the President communicate the reasons for this action to the Congress.

The archival functions which currently are vested in the Administrator of GSA and merely delegated to the Archivist would be the statutory responsibility of the independent Archives. These functions include basic archival activities, operation of Federal records centers, operation of Presidential libraries, and custody and control of Presidential papers, and publication of official documents, including the Federal Register and the Code of Federal Regulations.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Government Operations was particularly concerned about the issue of records management activities. Historically, authority for records management functions was delegated by the Administrator of GSA to the Archivist. In 1980, pursuant to the Paperwork Reduction Act which originated in the Committee on Government Operations, GSA was assigned a lead role in information resources policy formulation and oversight. As a result, information related records management functions were reassigned to the newly created Office of Information Resources Management within GSA.

Under this realignment, records management functions pertaining to the handling of records with permanent value were retained by the Archives. H.R. 3987 divides records management authority between the Archivist and the Administrator along the lines that this authority is currently exercised.

Mr. Chairman, it is vital that the new independent Archives function as efficiently and effectively as possible, and that the Archivist be given sufficient authority to carry out his responsibilities. For this reason, title II of H.R. 3987 makes several procedural changes to title 44 of the United States Code. These improve the operation of the National Archives trust fund, strengthen the Archivist's authority to determine what constitutes a Federal record, and grant him access to agency records to make such determination. In addition, the ability of the Archivist to seek legal redress to prevent the unlawful removal or destruction of agency records is also improved.

Mr. Chairman, passage of H.R. 3987 this year will be more than a gift of independence to the Archives on its 50th birthday. Establishing the independence of the Archives, and ensuring that the Archivist has sufficient authority to carry out his functions efficiently and effectively, will be a gift to the generations to come.

I urge support for this bill.

□ 1510

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 3987, the National Archives and Records Administration Act of 1984.

This bill would rectify a mistake of 35 years' standing. By separating the National Archives from the General Services Administration, and reestablishing it as an independent agency, H.R. 3987 would greatly strengthen the ability of the Federal Government to protect, preserve, and make available to its citizens the records which document its history.

I am pleased to note that the administration has stated that it, too, supports the establishment of the National Archives as an independent Federal agency.

Mr. Chairman, let me provide a historical perspective to this subject. During the 1930's and 1940's, as the Government tried to move quickly to fight the effects of the Great Depression, and then World War II, the executive branch became a jumble of independent agencies. After the war, people realized that if the Government were to function effectively, order would have to be rendered from this chaos. Spurred by the work of the first Hoover Commission, Congress abolished some agencies and consolidated many others.

Among the consolidations was the creation of a central housekeeping agency, the General Services Administration. Within GSA were brought together the Government's activities relating to various business-related activities—construction and operation of public buildings, procurement and distribution of supplies, and other similar matters—and the National Archives.

The idea of consolidation is frequently a good one in structuring executive agencies, and I am convinced that GSA, despite its failings, works better as a single agency than it would if its parts were still separate. But the National Archives is a glaring exception to that statement, as investigations by the Committee on Government Operations have made clear.

The National Archives has virtually nothing to do with business. It selects, preserves, and makes available to the public the permanently valuable historical records of the Federal Government. It stores and services noncurrent records of other agencies. It operates libraries containing the papers of several former Presidents. It publishes the Federal Register and other documents. And it coordinates the work of the National Historical Publications and Records Commission. None of these functions have much of anything in common with any other activity of the General Services Administration.

In my 22 years of service on the Government Operations Committee, we have always tried to make sure that agencies are organized in ways which will be most conducive to the performance of their functions. Back when the Congress placed the National Archives in GSA, it violated that fundamental principle of organization. The "shotgun marriage" of housekeeping functions with a cultural activity has never worked, and the wonder to me in retrospect is why we have taken so long to recognize it.

The basic incompatibility between running a business and encouraging scholarly research has been most vividly demonstrated by the misunderstanding of the Archives by the GSA Administrators and their subordinates. An Administrator appointed by President Kennedy imposed an inappropriate set of management goals on the Archives. An appointee of President Nixon attempted to take possession of Presidential papers under conditions which were antithetical to public access. An appointee of President Carter tried to decentralize the agency's holdings, which would have had highly detrimental effects on historical research. Under all these individuals and others, support personnel in GSA have not understood the mission of the Archives, and consequently have not provided it with an appropriate level or quality of services.

Throughout the years, the highly dedicated and professional staff of the National Archives has been able to overcome the misguided efforts of GSA Administrators and keep the agency on course. But this is hardly the way that organizations should be designed to operate. The Archives could obviously function much better if its own professional leadership were free to set policy which is consistent with the agency's mission.

Furthermore, I wonder how much longer the organization could survive under the current structure. Over the past decade, reference requests from the public to the Archives roughly doubled, and requests from other agencies tripled. The need for preservation of documents has become more apparent, and in many cases, critical. Demands for greater declassification of records have been made by many people, including the current President's national security adviser. The number of items offered to the Archives for accessioning as permanently valuable records of the Government grows each year. But appropriations have not kept pace with inflation, and as fixed costs—mainly imputed rent—consume a greater part of the agency's budget, funds available for staff have shrunk. Permanent employment at the Archives dropped by a third from 1976 to 1983; the last class of professional archivists entered 5 years ago, and many of those people have left since then.

Mr. Chairman, the National Archives now stands as an agency on the brink of being unable to do its job. The professional archival community knows it. The agency's employees know it. The Archivist of the United States knows it. But as long as the Archives remains in the General Services Administration, an agency with a business-oriented outlook, the immense needs go unrecognized or frustrated by the parent organization. Resources continue to be diverted to functions which are more consistent with GSA's main purpose.

Enactment of H.R. 3987 will put an end to this situation. Mr. Chairman, I urge all Members to give this bill their support.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONABLE].

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

I rise in support of H.R. 3987, which would establish the National Archives and Records Service as an independent agency in the executive branch.

When the National Archives Act was passed in 1934, the National Archives was an independent agency with the Archivist of the United States appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate; in 1949, the National Archives was incorporated into the General Services Administration.

I agree with historians who say that the functions of these two agencies are incompatible. In my judgment, the GSA—as the "custodian" of the Federal Government—is not equipped to provide the specialized services needed to collect and preserve the records of our documentary history. It is imperative that the National Archives and Records Service be given a mandate to perform this work independently. The National Archives and Records Service should have authority over its own budget, program priorities, and personnel management as do the Library of Congress and the Smithsonian Institution.

It is fitting that in 1984—the 50th anniversary of the founding of the National Archives as an independent agency—it again be restored to that status.

I ask my colleagues to support H.R. 3987.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the managers of this bill a question, however, and that reflects an ignorance on my part that I would like to have dispelled if possible, and that is does H.R. 3987 follow fairly closely S. 905 as originally submitted or as amended on the floor of the Senate?

My particular concern is an amendment that was adopted on the floor of the Senate as follows:

> Notwithstanding any provision in this title, no return or return information as defined in section 6103 of title XXVI of the United States Code may be disclosed except as authorized by title XXVI.

Now, such return information—that is the amendment that was adopted in the Senate—such return informaiton would involve tax information and it would cover IRS records directly and information relating to return information found in the files of other agencies, such as the FBI, the Federal district courts, the GAO among others.

I object to this particular amendment adopted in the floor of the other body, because it would have the tendency to isolate forever, without access, returns relating to tax information. I think it may be entirely appropriate to seal such information for a limited period of time, even for 15 or 25 years, but I would hate to see it made permanently inaccessible, because that is incompatible with the purpose of the public archives, which are to preserve for the access and instruction of the public the records relating to important instrumentalities of Government.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONABLE. Yes, I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HORTON. That provision is not in this bill. I would agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONABLE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, let me just say to my distinguished friend, the gentleman from New York, that I was most favorably impressed with his objective and enlightened attitude about the treatment of IRS records in relation to this legislation. I fully share the gentleman's deep concern and would state for the record that the bill as reported by the Government Operations Committee maintains the status quo of these IRS records.

I understand that the IRS and the Archivist have some differences about the handling of tax records, but I did not think we ought to try to resolve that policy question in this legislation or exclude the IRS forever from any evaluation as to what kind of records are to be disclosed.

The gentleman's position on that is a wise one and I hope we can maintain it. I hope the gentleman will talk with some of the other members of that great committee on which the gentleman serves with such honor, and maybe with some of the senior staff who seem to have a divergent view from that so eloquently expressed by the gentleman.

Mr. CONABLE. Well, as the gentleman knows, my jurisdictional responsibilities give me more than a passing interest in tax matters. I do believe that to seal these records forever would be totally inconsistent with the purpose of the archives, while putting some appropriate restriction on it, because obviously tax information does have to be constrained to some extent. It would seem there should come a time when the public should have access to that along with all other Government records.

I thank the gentleman very much for his assurance. I am grateful to the committee for taking the attitude it does on this sensitive matter.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Government Information, Justice, and Agriculture, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ENGLISH] whose subcommittee has maintained such excellent oversight on the National Archives and Records Service.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to have the opportunity to express my continued support for reestablishment of an independent Archives.

Let me assure you at the outset—I know that independence is not a panacea; that it will not solve all of the many problems facing the National Archives. But, after nearly 4 years as chairman of the subcommittee with oversight of the Archives, I also know that until the Archives becomes independent it cannot realistically address many of those problems.

The problems addressed by this legislation are not new. The National Archives was created as an independent agency in 1934. However, 15 years later it was incorporated into the newly created General Services Administration. This change was inspired by the first Hoover Commission. That commission operated under the principle that government efficiency would be increased by grouping agencies with comparable functions and, thereby, reducing the number of separate agencies.

The Hoover principle was, and is, sound. Unfortunately, as archivists and historians tried to tell us from the very outset, the grouping effected by the creation of GSA was less than totally logical: the Government's procurement officer, its supply clerk, and its buildings management team—people under constant pressure to keep the wheels of Government well oiled with desks and dust pans—were placed under the same roof as those charged with perserving the documentary history of our Nation.

Nevertheless, the Archives faired reasonably well during the first years of this arrangement. At my subcommittee's March 1982 hearing, Jess Larson, a fellow Oklahoman who happened to be the first administrator of General Services explained why this was so. He told us he delegated authority to the Archivist, kept his hands off day-to-day operations, and supported necessary increases in funding and staff.

Larson's understanding of, and support for, the mission of the Archives was apparently the exception to the rule for GSA administrators. The relationship deteriorated rapidly; and, in 1965, Wayne Grover used the occasion of his retirement after 32 years of Government service—during 17 of those years he served as Archivist—to urge the reestablishment of an independent National Archives.

I don't want to take a lot of the House's time running through the myriad problems in the GSA-Archives relationship uncovered by my subcommittee; however, there are several incidents that I think are symptomatic of how little GSA support there is for the mission of the Archives or real concern over the well-being of this Nation's documentary history:

For example, last fall, after a multiyear, bipartisan effort, the National Historical Publications and Records Commission Grant Program was finally reauthorized for 5 years. Despite our effort, despite the President's approval, when the time came to put together the President's 1985 budget, the budget review panel at GSA decided once again to try to zero-out this small but important program.

Another incident found the administrator of General Services reneging on a public commitment made in March of 1982 that his public buildings service would correct longstanding fire safety and environmental problems at the Archives. When faced with a devastating fire safety assessment last October, GAS officials concocted an illegal retroactive delegation of authority—shifting the burden for fire safety from PBS to the Archives, effective October 1, 1981.

Just last year, my subcommittee discovered that GSA managers were intimately involved in the day-to-day operations of the Archives. Management controls are one thing, but we found that all Archives personnel actions had to be approved by GSA; that individuals were transferred between the Archives and GSA, at the whim of GSA officials; that already approved travel was subjected to yet a second GSA review; and, finally, that when Archives officials balked, a GSA study team was sent to the Archives for the sole purpose of finding ways to discredit both those individuals and the independent Archives initiative.

My support for the reestablishment of the National Archives as an independent entity represents an evolution in my thinking. Had someone broached the subject with me 5 years ago, I would have told him that drawing new boxes is expensive and doesn't solve problems. But then, of course, I didn't understand that GSA was causing many, and impeding resolution of most, of the Archives' problems.

Now after 4 years as chairman of the Oversight Subcommittee, I've come to belive we can solve problems and, in the long run, save both money and our documentary heritage, by making a change. The administration supports reestablishment of an independent Archives; the Senate has passed an independent Archives bill; and now, in this, the golden anniversary year of our National Archives, it is the turn of the House of Representatives.

I urge my colleagues to support enactment of H.R. 3987.

□ 1520

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KINDNESS] the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Government Information, Justice, and Agriculture of the Committee on Government Operations.

Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to H.R. 3987. I do not believe it is either wise or necessary to grant the National Archives independence at this time and I fear that independence could exacerbate rather than solve the problems that are faced by the National Archives in the fulfillment of its mission.

Based both on general principles of government organization and on particular circumstances of the National Archives, this bill provides the wrong response to the legitimate concerns that have been raised over the fulfillment of the National Archives' mission.

So here we go again. The wagon is already rolling down the hill and I am saying "Whoa."

Well, somebody ought to say "Whoa." It is worth taking a few minutes to look at this matter, and I am not going to bore my colleagues with a lot of detail at this time because it is Monday afternoon and we are really going to be deciding on this bill on Wednesday, and nobody is paying that much attention today probably.

But I just would like to point out, for example, that the role of the National Archives basically has been preservation of historical records from its inception. Just last week in our morning newspaper we were treated to the news that finally the National Archives has a 20-year preservation plan. They have not had a plan of work for all of these years.

This is the kind of institutional problem that needs to be solved. It is not going to be solved by making the National Archives and Records Service independent.

Several years ago a structurally similar organization was considered by the Congress; that is, the creation of the Department of Education. Everybody loved that one. Certainly the size of the agencies involved and the constituency politics were of a larger scale. But it was fundamentally, as here, a question of whether a subunit of an organization should be severed from that organization and given equal rank with that organization.

Well, we did it. Was it the right thing to do? You tell me.

I think it is clear from the lobbying on this legislation that there is a narrow constituency group which feels that its interests will be better served by having a National Archives independent of the General Services Administration, just as the National Education Association lobbied on behalf of creation of the Department of Education. But was it the right thing to do? I question that.

Finally, I do not believe that you will find independence from GSA is necessary in order to solve the problems which are alleged to arise out of its structural placement within GSA. I have prepared an amendment in the nature of a substitute which I will file for the record for printing in the RECORD today which would provide just those things necessary to bring the National Archives and Records Service into the kind of condition that we are all talking about. It is very, very similar to the committee reported bill.

It would transfer all statutory authority from the Administrator of the GSA to the Archivist, just as does the committee bill. It would provide for Presidential appointment of the Archivist. It contains the provisions of title II of the committee bill clarifying the Archivist's authority to make final determinations as to what is an agency record. And like the Department of Energy Act, it provides that the National Archives original budget request must be included in GSA's budget submission to the Congress. So it is right out there in clear light, and we could not have a continuation of the problems with the budget that the national archives has experienced within GSA in recent years.

The one thing my substitute would not do that the committee bill does is to sever the National Archives from the GSA and make it an independent agency.

In sum, I believe that independence is a drastic step which is neither wise nor necessary. I would urge consideration by my colleagues of the amendment in the nature of a substitute which will be printed in the RECORD for today.

Mr. Chairman, it is worth taking a few moments to review just what some of those missions are. If we relied solely on constituent mail, we might come to the conclusion that the National Archives is solely a cultural institution, like the Smithsonian, which serves the interests of scholars and genealogists only. Certainly, the acquisition and preservation of historically significant documents and nonducmentary material and the facilitation of the use and exhibition of those materials are some of the most important reasons for the existence of the National Archives. But, the Archives has also been responsible for the daily publishing of the Federal Register and for the fostering of good records management practices in Federal agencies which will assure the adequacy of documentation of the operations of the agencies. Thus, the Archives is not just a cultural institution, but rather it is also an important participant in the day-to-day operations of the Federal Government.

The National Archives was created 50 years ago and, so, in terms of preserving the historically important documents of our Nation's history, it was already over 150 years behind. In terms of day-to-day records management as we know it today, that was a concept which was just beginning to be developed as the size and role of the Federal Government was beginning to expand.

Today, 50 years later, how good a job has the Archives done? I believe that a review of testimony received over the last 6 years by the Government Information Subcommittee, which has the responsibility of oversight of the National Archives, is instructive. For example, in the area of preservation, we learned back in 1979 that, up to that point, the National Archives was spending but one-quarter of 1 percent of its budget on textual preservation; but, what was more disturbing was that NARS did not appear to have any systematic program to meet its responsibilities for the physical preservation of historically significant Government records. In oversight hearings 2½ years later, in March 1982, we learned that the budget for preservation had been increased a few percent but that the Archives still did not have a plan by which to fulfill its preservation responsibilities.

While I am pleased that the Archives has finally developed a plan, I am reminded of other testimony we received in those hearings as to how much more rapidly the documents of the post-Civil War period deteriorate because of the higher acid content paper that was used from that time on and I wonder how much time we have lost in waiting for the Archives to even come up with a plan—not the money, mind you—just the plan.

One other example in the area of preservation. In 1978, there was a tragic fire at the Suitland, MD, film vaults in which millions of feet of newsreel film was destroyed. This film was nitrate-based and highly flammable. After an investigation by the Government Operations Committee, it reported to the House that it was questionable why the Archives had so much nitrate-based film at the time of the fire. The committee found that even though some of the footage was old enough to deteriorate to a dangerous point, the Archives proceeded at a slow, almost miserly, rate in converting it to safety-base film. And, the committee found that much of the film, which had been acquired in 1970 from Universal Studios, was accessioned without first determining what was historically valuable and thus worth preserving. In hindsight, then-Archivist James B. Rhoads acknowledged error, but said that:

> On the other hand, we have stored film in these specially constructed vaults since 1949, and until August 1977 without incident. Based on nearly 30 years of nitrate storge experience, we felt the risk of suffering a severe loss from fire was minimal.

Ironically, the first Archivist of the United States, Dr. Wayne C. Grover, expressed concern over some of that film in testimony before the Government Operations Committee in 1950 in which he stated that:

> We do have a peculiar problem there in connection with that film because it is usually on a nitrate base which deteriorates rather rapidly and is highly explosive under certain conditions. We hope either to get some better constructed vaults for that film than we now have or else to transfer the film to an acetate base, which is a very expensive process—even more expensive, I think, than the film vaults.

Well, Mr. Chairman, neither was done by the National Archives and it exacerbated the problem by acquiring more film than it could handle or should accession and by not planning for its proper preservation.

Some might say that I am rehashing old news and that things are getting better at the National Archives; and, I wouldn't disagree with them. The point is that this is symptomatic of management at the National Archives. And, before anyone jumps in and says "Resources. What about the resources to do the job?" I suggest that before one can obtain resources he must have some idea as to what he is going to do with those resources. The Archives has had great difficulty in figuring out exactly what it needed to do and that is what concerns me about granting it independence.

The National Archives has been a part of GSA since 1949; so its problems go back to times when it was independent as well as since it has been a component of GSA. And, I am not standing in this well as a defender of the General Services Administration. The actions of Administrators Sampson and Freeman were ill-conceived and went beyond the legitimate supervisory control of the Administrator over one of GSA's components to which statutory authority has been delegated. In fact, for those who, like John Adams on behalf of the Thirteen Colonies, have called long and strong for independence for the Archives from GSA, former GSA Administrator Gerry Carmen effectively rekindled memories of King George III's treatment of the American Colonies with his treatment of NARS.

Perhaps if, as a result of our oversight of the National Archives over the last 6 years, I had seen evidence of better management, I would be less reluctant to support independence. But, I did not see that management improvement was dependent upon NARS relationship with GSA. And, I believe that there are some general principals of government organization which should be considered before we decide whether it is wise to grant independence to the Archives.

In opposing the severance of the Office of Education and its elevation to Cabinet rank, our late colleague, Ben Rosenthal, and three others, Messrs. CONYERS, WAXMAN, and WEISS, wrote that:

> The proposal for a Department of Education constitutes a rejection of the theory of administrative management which underlies the recommendations of the first Hoover Commission (1949), the Heineman Commission (1967), and the Ash Council (1971). All three commissions argued for large Departments organized around general purposes and rejected any need for narrow, constituency oriented departments.

In particular, the Heineman commission report stated:

> We urge resistence by Presidents to the perpetual pressures to create more executive departments and independent agencies. Unchecked, these pressures to widen the President's span of control will eliminate the possibility of meaningful direction from and contact between the President and the major line officials of his administration. We do not believe that either the Nation or the President can afford today or in the future to waste the President's major line deputies in the running of interference or errands for narrow groups.

Some may say in response that the National Archives really doesn't belong within GSA; that the custodian of the Government's washrooms, storerooms, and workrooms should not be the custodian of the Nation's records. That argument proves too much. We have already decided that the National Archives should not be in charge of the Government's acquisition of automated data processing equipment, the means of managing an increasing store of Government records in the present and the future. Who's to say that, given the ever-changing technology and the need for the Government to keep up with it, GSA's Office of Information Resources Management couldn't justify independent status. Why should people who presumably have expertise in hardware and software, and local area networks, and fiber optics, have to compete for budget and management resources with people who procure pencils and cleaning fluids. Now, I don't want to give Frank Carr, the current head of the Office of Information Resources Management, any ideas here. But, given the important day-to-day responsibilities to the entire Federal Government which are delegated to the National Archives for records management and publishing the Federal Register and running the Federal records centers, I do not believe that the argument that the National Archives is incompatible with GSA is particularly persuasive; if anything, it proves too much in that it could justify independence for other components of GSA as well.

In addition to violating a general principle of government organization, I believe that this bill could make the fulfillment of NARS' missions more difficult. There is no guarantee that an independent National Archives will have more resources with which to work. I think it is important to point out that I have not opposed more resources for the Archives; I have despaired at times at how those resources have been used, but I do not deny the need for more resources to fulfill its missions.

An independent National Archives will have to provide administrative support services now provided by GSA. Those services include: Congressional Affairs, Office of Ethics, Public Affairs, General Counsel, Inspector General, Personnel, Budget and Finance, Office of Oversight, and Procurement. While the bill before us contains a provision for transfer of appropriations from GSA to NARS for these services, it is not clear that it will be enough to provide high enough grade level for the heads of these new offices within a newly independent NARS or the physical accommodations in which to situate them. I think we should expect NARS to come to us next year seeking more than will be transferred in this act in order to provide an adequate level of administrative support services for itself.

And that brings to mind the budget woes of the original National Archives when it was independent from 1934 through 1949. In his book, "The National Archives: America's Ministry of Documents, 1934-1968," Donald McCoy stated the advantages accruing to NARS upon its incorporating into GSA:

> [GSA] did assume administative tasks that the Archivists had often found onerous. It also made NARS more conscious of how to do things efficiently. Equally important, NARS would be generally better financed and better protected from the occasional wrath of Congress and the White House . . . There would be troubles, of course. The Archivist would have problems getting everything for his organization that he believed it needed, and occasionally officials in GSA's central office would be overbearing, interfering, and even obtuse. They were, however, ever so much more effective at getting program authorizations and funds for NARS than [it had ever been as an independent agency].

I suspect that proponents of independence could reply that the Archives budget situation couldn't get much worse than it was in the past couple of years under Gerry Carmen. But, I wouldn't be so confident that it's going to get much better. There are a lot of interests competing for Federal dollars and the Archives is going to have to be thoroughly prepared with justifications for increases. Even when NARS has had the support of GSA, it has not been assured of success. In his prepared testimony before the Government Information Subcommittee in 1979, then-GSA Inspector General Kurt Muellenberg noted that for the 2 previous years NARS had requested funds through the budget process to alleviate backlogs in accessioning and description but each year OMB reduced the funding level to that of the preceding year. Perhaps the recent announcement of the 20-year preservation plan shows signs that NARS is beginning to make the hard decisions that constitute planning. Now it has to develop the justifications to support such a program. I am not confident, given what has gone on to date, that NARS will be successful without some additional focus upon good management practices.

Arthur Sampson could sign an agreement with former President Nixon because statutory authority to enter into such agreements is vested in the Administrator, not the Archivist. Rowland Freeman was able to propose dispersing the Archives collections through the records centers because such authority is vested in the Administrator, not the Archivist. A statutory transfer of the authority contained in title 44 of the United States Code from the Administrator to the Archivist would deprive the Administrator of the statutory basis with which to meddle in the substantive archival responsibilities contained in title 44. And, that can be done without setting up the Archives as an independent agency. Furthermore, it is not unusual for Congress to grant a larger measure of autonomy to some components of an agency as opposed to others. The Office of Federal Procurement Policy within OMB is one example and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission within the Department of Energy is another. With respect to the latter, Congress provided that the budget submission of the Energy Secretary contain the original request of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission so that, in effect, FERC has a direct line to Congress as to its budget needs. Providing similar authority to the Archives would give it the best of both worlds—support from the larger agency, GSA, when GSA agrees, for its budget request, and a direct, official line to the Congress, even bypassing OMB, when it doesn't have the support of GSA.

Granting a large degree of program autonomy would free the Archives from the meddling of Administrators in the past while sparing it the trauma and drain on resorces that will necessarily come from the efforts to establish itself as an independent agency. The Archives has made some progress over the past 6 years; but, it has been slow, painfully, unjustifiably slow.

So, I hope that the House will not adopt the committee bill in its current form and instead consider an alternative which would alleviate most of the problems inherent in the relationship between NARS and GSA while not throwing the Archives out into the world, unprepared to be out on its own.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time, and I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. ENGLISH] having assumed the chair, Mr. GONZALEZ, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 3987) to improve the preservation and management of Federal records, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

TAX STATUS OF SPACE ACT

(Mr. AKAKA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. AKAKA. Mr. Speaker, my colleague HERB BATEMAN and I have recently introduced a simple, yet immensely elegant bill called the "Tax Status of Space Act." Mr. Speaker, this bill is a measure of vital importance to the growth and long-term health of the commercial space industry. Under current law, companies that make and do things in space are forced to bear the brunt of unfair and unintentional discrimination with regard to their tax status. This is true only because when many of our tax laws were crafted, we never dreamed that we would be making products in space for profit. Times have changed and so must the "tax status of space."

Under current tax law, space investments are not eligible for the investment tax credit, the research and development tax credit, or accelerated depreciation, solely because these investments are located in space, rather than on the ground in the United States. In addition, under current law, income earned from space will be considered "foreign source" income. And, under current law, products made in space by American companies on American spacecraft will be subject to import tariffs when they are returned to the ground by the space shuttle! All of this not by design, but just because it never occurred to us that space would be a place of business where fortunes are won and lost.

It is clear that the age of space commerce has dawned. Already, our Nation's entrepreneurs are engaged in the early phases of commerical space activities. Some of the products which can be made better and cheaper in the zero-gravity environment of space include: The manufacture of drugs to treat serious diseases such as diabetes and cancer, the growth and manufacture of crystals for advanced computer chips, and the casting of new metals and alloys with valuable properties unkown until now.

It is estimated that by the year 2000, commercial space activities may be worth as much as $200-$300 billion to our national economy and may account for as many as 10 million jobs. Commercial space activities will certainly be a building block for our Nation's economic prosperity in the years ahead.

I ask that my colleagues lend their full support to H.R. 5975, the Tax Status of Space Act, introduced by myself and Representative HERB BATEMAN. This simple little bill has the support of industry and will quickly remedy the deficiencies in present tax and tariff law. Under the terms of this bill, activities performed in space and products made in space will receive the same tax treatment as products and activities made and taking place on the ground in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which already has the kind of broad, bipartisan support common to space enterprise. As such, it merits the wholehearted support of this body, as well as swift action. Certainly, we owe it to those who would do business in space to pass this bill quickly and cleanly.

WAYNE W. FREEMAN

(Mr. HUBBARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, when I first began to practice law in 1962 at Mayfield, KY, one of the few people there whom I had known for years was an attorney and longtime public official named Wayne W. Freeman.

I personally am very fond of this 71-year-old neighbor who attended Murray State Teachers' College—now Murray State University—at Murray, KY, with my parents during the thirties.

Freeman, whose wife is the lovely and talented Hazel Bernice Freeman, was a close friend and confidant of the late Vice President Alben W. Barkley. Both Barkley and Freeman were born in rural western Kentucky's Graves County—Freeman at Symsonia and Barkley at Wheel. Barkley and Freeman were both avid Democrats and successful public officials—Barkley in the House and Senate in Washington and Freeman in the House and Senate at Frankfort, KY's State Capitol.

On July 9 a full-page feature story with photos in the Mayfield Messenger told of Senator Freeman's "45 years in Kentucky politics." The article was written by the newspaper's editorial page editor and feature reporter, Dennis Hill.

I share a portion of the article with my colleagues today:

He worked his way through college washing dishes, feeding hogs, milking cows and selling a few possum skins. After graduation, unable to get a teaching job, he ran for public office on a shoestring budget and won Graves County's seat in the Kentucky House of Representatives against heavy odds, negating the predictions of the county's seasoned politicians. He hitchhiked to Washington D.C. in order to attend law school, and later suffered through four years of tuberculosis before he was finally able to become an attorney.

When he served in the Kentucky Senate in the 1950's, his clashes and feuds with then Governor A. B. Happy Chandler were the grist for newspapers and political writers across the state. He masterminded the drive to change Graves County government from the magisterial form to the commission style in the mid 1960's.

As a delegate to two Democratic National Conventions, he cast votes for John F. Kennedy in Los Angeles in 1960 and Hubert Humphrey in Chicago in 1968, from the convention floor. He has been active in Kentucky Democratic politics for 50 years and has crossed paths with many of the greatest political figures this state has ever produced.

But those are just a few of the things Mayfield attorney Wayne Freeman has accomplished in his years of public service. Freeman is a New Deal Democrat who cut his teeth on hard-ball partisan Kentucky politics. Sitting in his office, with its walls lined with pictures of political friends and foes spanning 45 years, is like sitting in the midst of a pictorial history of the state's Democratic Party.

Born on Christmas Day, 1912, the sixth of ten children born to Otha Niley and Lula Mae Freeman, a Symsonia farm family, Wayne was the only one of his siblings to complete high school and college.

Freeman worked his way through college doing odd jobs. "That's when I first got into politics and first met Happy Chandler," Freeman said. "I was washing dishes down in the basement of Wells Hall and Jake Chandler, Happy's father, walked in and asked me to vote for his son for governor. This was 1935. I was already for him and had organized clubs for him at Murray. In fact, some of the people I worked for there had threatened to fire me for supporting Chandler."

Over the next 20 years, Freeman's friendship with Chandler grew, but in the mid 1950's the two politicians had a falling out that would make them enemies for 25 years to follow. But that's getting ahead of the story.

In 1939 Freeman decided to run for Graves County's seat in the Kentucky House of Representatives. "I didn't have any money and I wasn't able to teach here, so I decided I would get into politics. I didn't have a car, so I walked all over the county, from door to door. The first day of my campaign I walked 16 miles. I didn't have a dime to spend on the campaign, so the people of Symsonia had 25,000 campaign cards printed up for me, and I took off walking, handing them out. I slept a lot in the highway garage, and sometimes farmers would put me up for the night. By the end of the campaign, I had lost 36 pounds.

In 1940, after the legislative session had ended, Freeman decided he would go to Washington D.C. and try his hand at becoming a lawyer. "I got out on highway 80 and stuck out my thumb and started hitchhiking. I hitch-hiked all the way. It wasn't long after I got there that I ran out of money. I wanted to go to Georgetown University at night, but I needed to job during the day.

"I went to see Noble Gregory (a Graves Countian and Kentucky's First District Congressman at that time) and he couldn't get me a job. Then I went to see Happy Chandler, who was then the junior U.S. Senator from Kentucky. He took me to the Senate dining room and introduced me to some of the Senators."

The names of some of the Senators, introduced to Freeman by Chandler, reads like a Who's Who of American political power of that period and many years to follow. "I met men like Senator Tydings from Maryland, Claude Pepper (now in the House), Estes Kefauver and Everett Dirksen. I was really impressed, but Chandler still didn't fix me up with a job."

Freeman was luckier at his next stop. "I went to Senator Alben Barkley's office. He was the majority leader of the Senate. I told him that I wanted to go to law school and that I needed a job. He called Dave Moore, who was the assistant secretary of agriculture. Barkley said 'I've got Wayne Freeman over here in my office. He's from the crossroads at Symsonia and I'm from the crossroads at Wheel, west of there. I'm going to send him over there in the morning and I want you to give him a job.'

"Barkley didn't ask him to give me a job," Freeman said. "He told him to. Of course Dave Moore had no earthly idea where Symsonia or Wheel either one were, but it didn't matter. I went over there the next morning and went to work for the Office of Emergency Management."

Freeman spent more than a year in Washington, working days and attending law school at night. Then he came back to Graves County to run for and win re-election to his state House seat. When the 1942 legislative session ended, Freeman headed for Louisville where he worked days and attended the Jefferson School of Law at night. He had tried to join the military but was rejected for physical reasons.

Then, in 1944, law school and everything else in Freeman's life came to an abrupt halt. He was diagnosed as having tuberculosis. "I spent the next four years in Waverly Hills Sanatorium, 31 days of that in the death ward," Freeman said. But he wasn't to be denied his law degree.

"When I was discharged I went back to Jefferson and completed my legal studies and got my LLB degree in 1949."

In 1951, Freeman ran for the State Senate from Kentucky's first district. His opponent in that race was another familiar state political figure, Harry Lee Waterfield, from Hickman County. Freeman said that he and Waterfield never got along, and their political dislike for each other came to a head in the mid 1950's when Waterfield was Lt. Governor under Chandler.

Freeman beat Waterfield in the 1951 Senate race and began the first of his four two-year terms in the State Senate. It was in 1956 that the well publicized split with Chandler came.

"I had always supported Chandler, but as governor in 1956, he wanted to repeal the tax on parimutuel betting on harness racing. I led the fight against repealing the tax. It would have meant increasing income tax for everyone to make up the revenue.

Freeman's brother Theron "Shorty" Freeman temporarily lost his job with the state highway department, a position he had held since 1941. Freeman adamantly claims to this day that his brother's firing was political, denied at the time by Chandler, and came as a result of his anti-administration stand.

"In 1958 we got the parimutuel tax reinstated and in 1959, I campaigned hard all over the state to help get Bert Combs to the Governor's mansion instead of Waterfield. I spoke to a crowd of 10,000 people in Prestonburg on Combs behalf. He got the Democratic nomination and was elected governor."

In the 1960's during his three terms as Railroad Commissioner, Freeman brought his politics home to Graves County and fought the local political establishment on a bitter issue, changing the county government from a magisterial to commission system.

Among his fondest memories are his trips to Los Angeles and Chicago as a delegate to the Democratic National Conventions. He met and talked with Harry Truman, John F. Kennedy and the late Hubert Humphrey. He also has some very fond memories of his relationship with the late Senator and Vice President Alben W. Barkley.

"I was in charge of Barkley's last motorcade in Kentucky in 1955," Freeman said. "I could tell a thousand stories about that trip, all the stories he told me in the car as we rode from stop to stop. We spent some time arguing about which of us was the best Democrat. I think Barkley did more for this state than any politican in its history. He was a great politician and a great man. It distresses me that his home at Angles couldn't be preserved, not by the state or federal government, but by the people. I think the people of Kentucky owe him that much. There should have been some kind of drive for contributions directly from the people. It is a very sad thing that Angles couldn't be saved."

And what about his final reconciliation with his one-time friend and long-time adversary Happy Chandler?

"It was at the Fancy Farm Picnic three or four years ago," Freeman recalls. "I guess it was the last time he came down for the picnic. I had talked to Shorty earlier that day and he told me that I should make some move to reconcile with Chandler. He told me our differences were in the past and that we should be friends again. At the picnic, I was standing in the crowd near the podium and Happy was sitting on the speakers' platform. He motioned for me to come over to where he was. I walked over to him and he leaned over and said, 'Back when I fired your brother, you got the best of me. I would like to forget the past and be like we were when I ran for governor the first time (in 1935).'

"We shook hands and since then we have been on very good terms. I've visited in his home and he sends me tickets to UK ballgames and other things. So I guess it turned out all right in the end."

At 71, Freeman doesn't walk Graves County anymore, or hitch-hike to Washington. He hasn't fought head to head with Governors or County Judges in a long time either, but he still keeps his hand in local and state politics, and from all appearances, if a good fight arose, he would be in the forefront of the fray.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may be permitted to extend their remarks and to include extraneous material on the subject of the special order speech today by the gentleman from Florida, Mr. PEPPER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. NELSON] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, due to official business on Thursday, July 26, 1984, I missed two votes. Had I been present, I would have voted "aye" on rollcall No. 327, which was a motion to recommit the Trade Remedies Reform Act to the Committee on Ways and Means; and I would have voted "no" on rollcall No. 328, final passage of the Trade Reform Act.●

BAILOUT OF CONTINENTAL ILLINOIS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WEAVER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, it has been in the front pages of the newspaper all last week that the U.S. Government has nationalized the eighth largest bank in the United States of America, Continental Illinois.

Now this has been done under the administration of President Ronald Reagan, a man who has proclaimed his belief and convictions of the free enterprise system and the free market system.

In other words, what has happened is that under this conservative, free enterprise President, we have nationalized, we have socialized one of the largest banks in the country. We have set a precedent that has told all the other banks: "Don't worry about the loans you make or the problems you get into, just go ahead and do whatever you want because if you get into trouble the administration of Ronald Reagan, free enterpriser, conservative Republican, will get in there and bail you out."

Now, was this a small matter? Was this a helping somebody out in a moment of need and not affecting the Government much? The amount of money that Continental Illinois required from the U.S. Government has been up to now $4.5 billion.

This Government, the taxpayers of this country, under free enterprise, President Ronald Reagan has just given the eighth largest bank in the United States of America $4.5 billion cash and has taken over bad loans amounting to around $3.5 billion.

In other words, the U.S. Government, the U.S. taxpayer, gets saddled with $3.5 billion worth of rotten loans that the Continental Bank people had made; the Government has given the bank $4.5 billion with promises of more, many more billions if they need it: while at the same time thousands of businesses in this country are in deep trouble because of the policies of this administration. They get no help.

The timber industry in my congressional district is in deep, deep trouble primarily today because the Canadian dollar stands at 75 cents in relation to the U.S. dollar. So, therefore, Canadian lumber can come into this country at far below the price that our industry can sell lumber for in this country because of the 25-cent differential between the Canadian dollar and U.S. dollar; they can undersell us in our lumber markets all over this country, and they are.

Canadian lumber into this country generally runs between 5 and 10 billion board feet a year; today it is up to 12 billion board feet per year, with housing starts not at their highest peaks at all.

The reason the Canadian dollar is so low and they are able to undersell our lumber on the U.S. markets is that the high interest rate policy of the Reagan administration, the huge deficits policy of the Reagan administration causing the high interest rates has created that very, very high dollar, has created those high interest rates which again has devastated our timber indusy among many other industries in this country.

The Reagan administration has not really done good. I do not understand when President Reagan gets up there and says, "We done good." I cannot imagine.

What has happended, what growth we do have in the economy has been done simply becasuse we have had $200 billion deficits. Now if you push $200 billion of deficits that means pouring $200 billion worth of cash into the U.S. economy; paper money that the Government prints, naturally you are going to get a momentary boom in the economy. It is going to be a boom that will collapse of its own weight and soon will, and soon will.

President Reagan is lucky to be running this year for reelection because it so happens that every bank collapse and every major bank panic in the history of this country with almost no exception has occurred the year after a Presidential election; 1837, 1857, 1873, 1893; these are all major bank money panics and beginnings of depressions in this country; 1929, of course, shortly followed after the election of Herbert Hoover; 1985 looms ahead of us as a year that may be the most serious—one of the most serious years in our economy and in our Nation's history and if the President's policies continue, it certainly will be.

So President Reagan, this great free enterpriser, has devastated industry after industry in this county, including the timber industry with its high interest rate-high deficit policies. But let something happen to the banks and the Reagan administration rushes in to bail them out at a cost of $4.5 billion, and the taking over of an additional $3.5 billion worth of bad loans that Continental made to the oil and gas industry.

This bailout of Continental Illinois is greater than the Chrysler bailout, the New York City bailout, and the Lockheed bailout combined, and it was done without an act of Congress. They simply wrote a check; the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Federal Reserve Board simply gave the money, printed the money and gave it to Continental Illinois.

□ 1540

Now the Federal Reserve Board, one cannot help but wonder what kind of an institution it is when it stands idly by and sees thousands of industries and businesses in this country going bankrupt and doing nothing about it, not lowering interest rates to help us out, keeping interest rates high, but let one of the chosen few, one of their banks get into trouble, and they rush with billions, and billions, and billions, and billions of dollars without even asking Congress. Does the Congress know the power of this institution that it can write checks for this kind of money without asking us for authority? I think it is time to bring into question the Federal Reserve Board's policies of bailing out their own kind, banks, and letting the rest of the industries collapse.

Now, does President Reagan know that he is a socialist? I think that if you said, "President Reagan, you are a socialist," he would absolutely completely deny it and believe it. I do not think he would even conceive of himself as being the President who nationalized the first bank in this country, the first private bank in this country. I cannot imagine it.

We even asked him does he know how high the deficits are. And he says, "Oh, the deficits really are not there." I think he believes the things he says. I really do. All I can comment on is that ignorance is bliss.

The President does not know what is going on in this country, does not know what is happening to industries such as the timber industry, does not realize the effect it will have on our economy later on, but what—and I call upon the President to say what he thinks about the socialization of the Continental Illinois Bank and the peddling of $4½ billion, as a reporter asked him, "Mr. President, did you approve and agree to giving $4½ billion of cold, hard printed cash to the Continental Illinois and taking over another $3½ billion of their bad loans by the U.S. taxpayers?"

He should be asked this and I certainly hope in the campaign that is coming he will be. Banks should have the right to fail right along with every other company and individual in this country. Somehow they are sacred cows. I do not know why.

I have a letter here, for example, from the U-Lane-O Credit Union, that is the major credit union in my home county of Lane County, OR. It is written by Lynn F. Sullivan, their treasurer-manager. He says that he for one and his credit union have been treated most unfairly as one of the 145 credit unions around the country that had an uninsured deposit in the Penn Square Bank of Oklahoma City. They lost $81,210 when the Penn Square Bank failed. They have lost it. It is money out of their members' pockets, money that the U-Lane-O Credit Union no longer has. He says, but the money that Continental Illinois had in Penn Square loans, and that is what they did, Continental Illinois bought a billion dollars worth of the oil and gas loans that Penn Square had made. What happened to those loans? The U.S. Government has just taken them over, bailed out Continental Illinois from their bad loans taken from Penn Square. But what happened to the credit unions that had money in Penn Square? They lost it.

So again this administration wants to bail out the big banks. The Federal Reserve Board wants to help the big banks, but they do not care about the credit unions, the Federal credit unions who are the very ones who help and serve the small working saver. That is their customer.

Continental Illinois, their customers were some of the biggest entities all over the world. Some of this big money from Hong Kong, Saudi Arabia, and elsewhere had billions of dollars on deposit in Continental Illinois and they took their money out, they got it out because the Federal Government was right there ready to write a check.

But the people who work for the lumber companies in my district who desposit with U-Lane-O Credit Union, they lost their money in Penn Square.

This administration obviously stands forthright and foursquare for the bigs, even bigs in the foreign countries. Whoever you are, if you are big enough and rich enough we will help us, says the Reagan administration. But if you are just a working person, an American citizen, in the Fourth Congressional District of Oregon or elsewhere, why we will not help you, we will not do a thing for you. If you are not a big bank, then you can lose your money. If you are a big bank, we will save you. We will put taxpayers money—my people have to pay twice, through their taxes to bail out Continental Illinois and pay because the Government does nothing for them and their credit union.

Well, I think that this shows exactly what the Reagan administration is. I hope the American people know it. Certainly if they watch their pocketbooks and see what is happening to them and watch the pocketbooks of the wealthy and see what is happening to them, they will know it. On election day they will let their views be known.

So I want to say to Lynn F. Sullivan, treasurer-manager of U-Lane-O, I am going to continue fighting for you and the people who deposit their money, the working people of Oregon who deposit their money in your credit union and credit unions like yours, in working to oppose the bailout of the huge international banks such as Continental of Illinois, that this administration has just given $4½ billion to, and taken over another $3½ billion worth of their bad loans.

Socializing the banking industry, nationalizing the banking industry through Continental Illinois and calling itself a free enterprise, go ahead, get ahead administration, that is the Reagan administration.

Well, let me tell you what is going to happen when next year the big banks, City Bank, Chase Manhattan, Manufacturers Hanover, when they start going under. What happens when the Argentines, the Brazilians, and the Mexicans openly repudiate their $90 billion and $50 billion loans that our banks and others have made to them? They have repudiated that debt now, do not let anybody kid you, that debt is repudiated, but it has not been openly repudiated. But some politician is going to get up in one of those countries and say, because the people of their countries do not know it has been repudiated either and they are going to have to tell them, "We are not going to pay those gringo banks." When that happens there is going to be a run on those big New York City banks and will the Federal Reserve Board then bail out, not with $4½ billion, but with $40½ billion, or $100 billion it will take to bail out those banks at that time, I want to ask this administration and the Federal Reserve Board, "Are you prepared to do that when a year from now perhaps those banks start to go?"

This policy should be debated in the halls of the Congress, an authority vested only in laws passed by this Congress and not in the executive, the Reagan administration, if they indeed are in office next time, show themselves to be pure socialists when it comes to the banking industry, or with the Federal Reserve Board that goes on and on in its help only to its select chosen few, the big banks.

THE NEED FOR PREVENTION AND EARLY DETECTION OF BREAST CANCER

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. GONZALEZ]. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, each year in the United States, there are 37,000 deaths due to breast cancer. Approximately 7 to 8 percent of all women will ultimately develop breast cancer, 115,000 new cases each year. There has been no substantial reduction in either the death rate or number of new breast cancer cases since the 1940's. Today, the total cost of hospital care alone for breast cancer treatment is greater than the entire National Cancer Institute budget.

The likelihood of survival for breast cancer patients is directly related to the extent of the disease at the time of diagnosis. Disease detected early has been associated with 90-percent 5-year survival as compared to less than 50 percent for more advanced disease.

At a June 28 hearing by the House Select Committee on Aging Subcommittee on Health and Long-Term Care, which I have the privilege to chair, experts testified that early detection offered one of the best available methods for reducing breast cancer deaths.

Methods for early detection of breast cancer are available. A clinical trial completed in the 1970's demonstrated that early detection of breast cancer would reduce the number of deaths by one-third.

Application of early detection might save up to 10,000 of the 37,000 breast cancer deaths yearly.

Unfortunately, less than 20 percent of women use early detection methods, including mammography, a radiographic procedure, to identify early breast cancer. A major problem is that screening procedures, like mammography, are not reimbursable costs under medicare or other health insurance programs unless performed for diagnostic purposes—but not for early detection of cancer in asymptomatic women. By the time the symptoms develop, the disease is advanced and the woman's life threatened.

At the hearing, evidence was presented that indicated that the costs per patient for screening and early detection is far less than the current insurance and medicare payment for diagnosis screening for breast cancer. For example, breast cancer screening could be done for $25 to $30 per person as compared to over $100 currently paid by insurance companies and medicare for a diagnostic evaluation of a symptomatic individual.

The reduction in cancer deaths as well as from other chronic disease requires a vigorous effort in prevention and early detection of disease.

The legislation which I am introducing today, with the support of my colleague from Ohio, Representative MARY ROSE OAKAR, would allow the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services to designate specific prevention and early detection technology as being effective in reducing mortality and morbidity and provide reimbursement under part B of medicare at a reasonable cost to be determined by the Secretary.

The absence of such authority and the implementation of effective programs is probably a major reason for the continued high death rates due to breast cancer, other cancers, and chronic diseases.

I urge my colleagues to join me in urging quick consideration of legislation to provide medicare coverage for such routine cancer screening.

Thank you.●

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, today the Honorable CLAUDE PEPPER and myself are introducing a bill permitting the Secretary to provide reimbursement such as medicare for routine cancer screening when it has been proven to be effective and appropriate in reducing morbidity and mortality from cancer. As a result of a breast cancer hearing held at my request and chaired by Senator PEPPER, both Mr. PEPPER and myself were presented with evidence that routine cancer screening methods are very costly, especially to the elderly who are on a limited income comprising social security benefits and few other subsidies. medicare covers limited health care, and therefore, senior citizens very often will neglect preventative measures to detect cancer because of great expense to themselves. Since it is an accepted fact that cancer prevention hinges on early detection and frequent checkups, this bill will allow our citizens, especially the elderly, easy access to routine cancer screening methods without great financial hardship which they can ill afford to be burdened with. More important, it will allow them to have these checkups as a high priority in their medical care.●

THE BANKING INDUSTRY

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. WEAVER]. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I can assure the gentleman that it is far from my intention to utilize the 60 minutes that, under the privilege of this procedure we call special orders, we, the Members of this numerous House, can enjoy the privilege of extending, enlarging, providing a greater area of participation in the discussions. This, I am sure, is a history of what we now come to know as special orders. Under the limitations that of necessity must be imposed in a numerous member body, this is the one opportunity one has to enlarge his or her further and more adequate input into the processes.

So I have been very respectful of this privilege, in fact venerate it, and I have tried never to abuse it. I do not think that in the many, many times that I have availed myself of this forum since I came to the Congress 22½ years ago and long before TV coverage was considered, I have tried to limit myself to the purposes and the objectives for which we are recognized during this special period of session. I have studiously avoided injecting the purely partisan political because I think that that should be reserved for the stump, not for the House floor. And when I have addressed criticism, it has been either to the executive branch or to particular actions in which as a Member of this House and of the Congress I have myself participated in.

I think I should advise the gentleman presiding, who preceded me here, that my intention was to speak out precisely on the subject matter he addressed, and I want to salute his concern, I sympathize with it, I understand it, and I have for many, many years spoken out, regretfully anticipating such things as the recent experience with the Continental of Illinois.

I am a member of the Banking Committee and have been a member since I came here 22½ years ago, so naturally my field of interest and area of concern has been primarily in the banking, financial, fiscal, monetary, and related subject matters.

It was obvious at least 19 years ago that the country was heading for an inevitable confrontation with a decision that sooner or later the people through their Representatives and only through their Representatives could make, and that was the bringing down to the original purpose for which the Congress created the Federal Reserve Board.

Now, I think the majority of my colleagues in the Congress—I know the majority of the folks outside of Congress—when asked, readily answered that the Federal Reserve Board is a Federal agency. It is not. The Federal Reserve Board now, as it is in its operating form, way outstrips and transcends the original purposes for which the Congress founded it. The Federal Reserve Board is a creature of the Congress. It was born out of the adoption of the Federal Reserve Act of 1913, which in turn followed the events immediately preceding that decade and during the beginning of that decade, the panic of 1907, the panic at the end of the last century and the one preceding, the economic crisis that followed the Civil War and which was the big concern on the mind of President Lincoln as he was killed, and the adoption of the 1865 National Currency Act which for the first time recognized what we call a national banking system, that is, since the first attempt.

All through our history the very issue that the gentleman from Oregon was insinuating in his criticism of the recent actions demonstrated in really the nationalization of the Continental Bank has been at the heart of the prime issue and concern of all of our national leaders since the beginning of our country as a nation.

Let us never forget—how many Americans realize this?—that in the first 10 years of our national existence such an office as the Presidency was not even thought of or desired. It was the Continental Congress, the first one and the Second Continental Congress. No such thing as the office of the Presidency. There was good reason why. There was fear, the prevailing predominant fear in the minds of those who fought and gained the independence and formed the first structural unit that we call the birth of our Nation as a nation, as a national entity, their fear of the executive power of a king. And let us never forget again that these are fundamentals that we should teach every day as we do religious lessons to our American children, and that is that they wrote the most revolutionary words, certainly, in that world—and even revolutionary to this day, when they finally, after their trials with the First and Second Continental Congress and the Articles of Confederation—the Constitution.

In a world which was completely ruled everywhere on the globe either by a king, or a czar, or a potentate, or a clique, an oligarchy, these Americans dared say that all power came from the people, not from God, as in the case of kings, not from the self aggrandized grasp of power by authoritarians, be they oligarchs or despots, but from the people.

So the first five, six, seven, eight words of our Constitution tell us clearly: We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, et cetera. It does not say, "We the Congress," or "I the President." It says, "We the People." This is the source of all power. That has been forgotten. That has been traduced. So that today this big issue, the one that agitated our leaders at the beginning of the formation of our country, who is going to control the apportionment of credit? Who is going to control who gets what? The allocation of credit is what the financiers call it.

Naturally, those accustomed to having that power wanted it. Oh, they called them bankers. Today that word really needs some further refinement and definition because we are talking about a very different animal. But it was the issue then, it was the issue after the adoption of the Constitution and the birth of the first U.S. bank and the second U.S. bank, which Andrew Jackson put an end to by saying, "I am going to get you bankers and horsewhip you out of existence. I am going to banish you from the temple of democracy which you have taken over and have trafficked and commerced in our temples of democracy." And he did. This became the issue in 1865. But there, for the first time, the pattern was started that now has taken over completely. Our country is in the hands of those forces. The Congress, it has been nothing but a lap dog to those interests. I disagree with the preceding speaker, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WEAVER], when he says that high interest rates are Mr. Reagan's. Look, we have had high interest rates with other Presidents.

But why? Why would we in this country take as if it were natural and rightful interest charges of 17 percent, prime rates of even 21 percent of a few years ago which, incidentally, was the case under the previous administration as well as this one. Why? Why? I have many of my constituents, businessmen particularly, say, "Hey, Henry, we thought there was a law against interest rates above 10 percent."

Oh, yes, there used to be. There used to be.

All through mankind's history as we know it, even before the extant written history, every society, no matter what form, reports to us in dismal terms that no society can thrive and flourish and live peacefully with usury, with extortionate interest rates. Why? Because interest rates are the mechanism by which the wealth of a society is transformed.

□ 1600

We have cheated two generations now of Americans of the promise and the hope of homeownership. We are reserving that now as we were in 1929 for about 8 percent of our population. Why? By why all of this? Is this an act of God as the financiers and the bankers and the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board have tried to tell me?

The gentleman from Oregon raised a question, he said:

> How can the Federal Government, through its agencies, its regular agencies; the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, that, unlike the Federal Reserve Board is a Federal agency. How could it have doled out this immense amount of money in order to take over literally the Continental of Illinois?

Well, the truth is, sir, they cannot legally do it. But the Attorney General, one of those handmaidens of these interests, as reflected in such things as the administration of the antitrust laws, and all of the other related laws that five generations of Congresses had passed to safeguard against the very thing that has now happened, and has stripped naked the American people of any hope of economic freedom and security.

Of course it is not in the law; that should have been a matter brought to the Congress for approval, but the Attorney General says that his interpretation is no, he thinks it can be done under the implied and delegated agency powers of the FDIC. Now those powers that the Federal Reserve Board Act of 1913, as passed by the Congress, do give the Federal Reserve Board among others, they certainly have not been, and particularly under the chairmanship of the present chairman, but for that matter, not so much either. Even though this "money mania," which has been agitating the American economy now for more than a decade, was not yet in its severe form as it has been under this Federal Reserve Board Chairman.

Now the Federal Reserve Board Act, section 2, provides, it almost mandates, that the Federal Reserve Board do what it was intended to do: Restrict speculation on the part of banks. The very opposite has been happening. You have the Chairman of this Federal Reserve Board meeting in secret with Nelson Bunker Hunt, the Texas billionaire, who thought he was so smart that he could outsmart those old European gold and silversmiths and speculators. The most speculative market in the world. Controlled speculation is the gold and silver markets, as in London and Zurich, even in Paris. Old Nelson Bunker Hunt thought that he could corner the silver market. But in order to do that he had to borrow and use 30 billion dollars' worth of banking resources, which, under the chartering provisions of our laws, giving banks the highest privilege nowadays as they operate, because banks actually coin money.

If any one of you doubts this, take out your $1 bill and see what it says on top. It says "Federal Reserve Note." When I came to the Congress 22 years ago, the same dollar bill used to have "Treasury Note" more instances than not. What does that mean? It means sir, that it is a lot more complicated than a simplistic trying to politically attach some kind of fault on any particular administration. The fault lies, partially, if not greatly so and more so, in the Congress. The Congress went along with the change that made it possible for us to have now Federal Reserve Board notes.

The Federal Reserve is the one, the gentleman is correct, that is printing the money. Under the Constitution, Congress only is supposed to be responsible for coinage. How did that happen? How can that be allowed to suffer to continue to happen? Even as our businesses are going out in greater numbers than even at the peak of the Depression, because of high interest rates. High interest rates are an act of God? Of course not; it is a manmade evil, and it is susceptible of manmade solution. All we have to have is the courage to do what we said we wanted to do, which was to represent the American people in all of their rightful interests, over and above every other, and particularly, any one other single source of power.

So when we can, and it is too lengthy for me to go into the discussion, why we are the only country that handles our money matters this way in the industrialized world. In those countries they think we really, really must be stupid or simple folks or completely sold down the river, which is more like it, to think that for that same $1 bill that says, "Federal Reserve Note," you, the American, pays interest to have it printed. Why there is no country in the world, even under the most authoritarian nation, that the people have allowed that to happen. How did it happen?

Well, it is very interesting and it involves history, and the Congress was part of that process. We talk about credit unions, savings and loans. There are no such more animals. They are now all banks. Why? Because the Congress, in the name of saving the savings and loans, just 2 years ago adopted the most extensive, comprehensive changes of the fundamental Banking Act of 1935 since then. It homogenized all of our financial institutions, forgetting that savings and loans were founded, were chartered and were empowered under privileged conditions for one purpose, and that was to give the mechanism by which, and the financial reference by which homes could be constructed and made available and affordable for a decent American family to have decent, safe, and hygenic homes.

That has gone down the river, and no perception of it that I can see. The people back home have an idea, but what can they do about it? We say that if the administration makes the decision to bail out the Continental, that where is it going to stop? Well, let me tell you, it is not. When Mr. Volcker, the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board appeared before the committee that I belong to, in behalf of an $8 billion super bailout of the banks through what is known as the IMF [the International Monetary Fund], I asked him, I said, Mr. Volcker, you know now you are dealing with entities that are sovereign nations over which you do not have any jurisdiction, what are you going to do if they tell you to go jump? How far are you going to go to defend these American banks who, unbelievably, have done the same thing as they did before 1929, when once again, given that tremendous power, they hesitated not one quick to sell the American people down the river.

They have done it again, we are now beginning to see, although some of us have been talking out on this for almost 20 years. Naturally, we couldn't raise very many hackles when interest rates were around 6 percent. When they went to 7 percent, and even 8 percent, there was not much concern. The money maniacs were in full power. Money maniacs we have had all through history, but it seems to me that these tremendous powers that pride themselves on being conservative, in being prudent, would certainly not go and do the same thing they did in the 1920's when the poor American people's deposits that they had taken in, with the faith, and trust, and confidence that the American people had in them, as they have substantially today, and they would invest in them.

Why? Because greed, again; big interest returns, in Japanese Imperial bonds, to be paid back in 1941. They had 20- and 25-year maturity dates, and some of them, believe it or not, were due and payable in 1941, and they paid it at Pearl Harbor; German Government bonds. We financed Germany's rebuilding. We then had the big declaration of moratorium, the Hoover moratorium of 1930, somewhere around there, 1929.

The papers then, like today, said big deal, the stock market is going up, confidence everywhere, while Germany was threatened with collapse, the whole financial system, just like today, except it is not Germany so much, even though it is still there, but some of the so-called undeveloped or underdeveloped Third World nations. I do not like to use that word. There is no such thing as a Third World. We are all in the same boat.

When those bankers then speculated in those bonds, there was no control then, they had more freedom, the big difference is that today, once removing some of the restrictions, as we did, for instance, in the passage of the so-called Private Gold Possession Act of 1975, to no avail did I try to convince my colleagues that hidden in that simple-minded legislation were grave and ominous threats, just like before 1932 when they had to pass the Gold Control Act.

To no avail. Today it is not a question of who is to blame, as I see it; it is a question, though, I am afraid too late, of what can be done here and now. It was to no avail that just 2 years ago I tried to rise to point out that the legislation of October 1982 was not just a simple act to provide equity safeguard and relief for the savings and loans; that it contained wholesale revisions of the 1935 Banking Act.

It does no good to say, "Hey, wait a while." This takover by the Feds of a bank, which in other countries, as the gentleman from Oregon well said, they call it nationalization. They do not make any bones about it. They just call it nationalization. Here, for whatever reason, fine, we do not. But the basic principle involved is one in which the proper role and extent of authority of these agencies is involved.

If the Congress does not rise and define, I do not know who else the American people can go to. Yet, it was very embarrassing for me to have to go before the Committee on Rules and appear to be in opposition to the overwhelming membership and leadership of my own committee. But I have never once been the one, and I can testify that the American people are there, at least in my case, to hold back in silence, out of fear, because in the long run if the American people are given a chance, we can depend and bet our last dollar on the safe, just and wise decision they will make. But they have got to be given a chance. They have got to be informed, and then they have got to be given a choice to choose from, and they have not.

We talk about the printing of money. As I said, the constitutional grant of authority has not been delegated. Why is it that the Federal Reserve Board, which is a private entity—the Federal Reserve Board is comprised of the 14,000-some, or most of them, commercial banks, but the way it operates today it is controlled by 6 or 7 of the biggest.

I referred a while ago to a secret meeting between Chairman Volcker in Florida one dark night, and Nelson Bunker Hunt, and I do not know if he is a president, or chairman, or something of the First City National Bank, Walter Wriston. Why were they meeting in secret? How important could it be that two such individuals could summon forth this fearless Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board who, incidentally, comes from the Chase Manhattan payroll, who unquestionably, when he ceases to be Chairman, will go back, just like Henry Kissinger. Henry Kissinger left the office of Secretary of State, and he went and still is on the payroll of the Chase National Bank.

If you go and talk to the people south of the border, they will tell you that Mr. Kissinger is a collection agent for the Chase National Bank, and that the troops Mr. Reagan has so obligingly and for the first time in our history, so numerously, sent to Central America, are collection agents. I know that does not sound as if that is what they are saying, but let me assure you, I know they are.

Whether they are right or wrong or indifferent is not the point. The point is, what are we going to do here and now? I have offered some suggestions by way of resolutions and bills. I again call the attention of my colleagues to those, earnestly implore their support, and perhaps something can be done, at least if not to prevent, attentuate and anticipate. Anticipatory legislation can be most helpful.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

AMENDMENTS

Under clause 6 of rule XXIII, proposed amendments were submitted as follows:

H.R. 3987

By Mr. KINDNESS:

(Amendment in the nature of a substitute.)

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

TITLE I—ESTABLISHMENT OF THE NATIONAL ARCHIVES AND RECORDS SERVICE

ESTABLISHMENT

SEC. 101. Section 2102 of title 44, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 2102. Establishment

"There shall be an agency within the General Services Administration to be known as the National Archives and Records Service. The Service shall be administered under the supervision and direction of the Archivist.".

ORGANIZATION AND GENERAL AUTHORITY

SEC. 102. (a) Chapter 21 of title 44, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by redesignating sections 2103 through 2114 as section 2107 through 2118, respectively; and

(2) by inserting after section 2102 the following new sections:

"§ 2103. Officers

"(a) The Archivist of the United States shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Archivist may be removed from office by the President. The President shall communicate the reasons for any such removal to each House of the Congress.

"(b) The Archivist shall be compensated at the rate provided for level III of the Executive Schedule under section 5314 of title 5.

"(c) There shall be in the Service a Deputy Archivist of the United States, who shall be appointed by and who shall serve at the pleasure of the Archivist. The Deputy Archivist shall be established as a career reserved position in the Senior Executive Service within the meaning of section 3132(a)(8) of title 5. The Deputy Archivist shall perform such functions as the Archivist shall designate. During any absence or disability of the Archivist, the Deputy Archivist shall act as Archivist. In the event of a vacancy in the office of the Archivist, the Deputy Archivist shall act as Archivist until an Archivist is appointed under subsection (a).

"§ 2104. Administrative provisions

"(a) The Archivist shall prescribe such policies, standards, criteria, procedures, rules, and regulations as the Archivist finds necessary or appropriate to carry out the functions of the Service. The head of each Federal agency shall issue such orders and directives as may be necessary to conform the activities of the agency with the policies, standards, criteria, procedures, rules, and regulations prescribed by the Archivist.

"(b) Except as otherwise expressly provided by law, the Archivist may delegate functions to designated officers and employees of the Service, and may authorize such successive redelegations of such functions as the Archivist may deem to be necessary or appropriate. A delegation of functions by the Archivist shall not relieve the Archivist of responsibility for the administration of such functions.

"(c) The Archivist is authorized to establish, maintain, alter, or discontinue such regional, local, or other field offices as the Archivist finds necessary or appropriate to perform the functions of the Archivist or the Service.

"(d) The Archivist may establish advisory committees to advise him with respect to any function of the Archivist or the Service. Members of any such committee shall serve without compensation but shall be entitled to transportation expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence in accordance with section 5703 of title 5.

"(e) The Archivist shall advise and consult with interested Federal agencies with a view to obtaining their advice and assistance in carrying out the purposes of this chapter.

"(f) If authorized by the Archivist, officers and employees of the Administration having investigatory functions are empowered, while engaged in the performance of their duties in conducting investigations, to administer oaths.

"(g) In each annual appropriation request, the Administrator shall identify the portion thereof intended for the support of the Service and include a statement by the Archivist (1) showing the amount requested by the Service in its budgetary presentation to the Administrator and (2) an assessment of the budgetary needs of the Service.

"§ 2105. Personnel and services

"(a) The Archivist is authorized to select, appoint, employ, and fix the compensation of such officers and employees, pursuant to part III of title 5, as are necessary to perform the functions of the Archivist and the Service.

"(b) The Archivist is authorized to obtain the services of experts and consultants under section 3109 of title 5.

"(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 973 of title 10 or any other provision of law, the Archivist, in carrying out the functions of the Archivist or the Service, is authorized to utilize in the Service the services of officials, officers, and other personnel in other Federal agencies, including personnel of the armed services, with the consent of the head of the agency concerned.

"(d) Notwithstanding section 1342 of title 31, United States Code, the Archivist is authorized to accept and utilize voluntary and uncompensated services.

"§ 2106. Reports to Congress

"The Archivist shall submit to the Congress, in January of each year and at such other times as the Archivist finds appropriate, a report concerning the administration of functions of the Archivist and the Service.".

(b) Section 2101 of title 44, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by designating the two indented paragraphs as paragraphs (1) and (2), respectively;

(2) by striking out "sections 2103-2113 of this title" in the matter preceding the first such paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof "this chapter";

(3) by striking out the period at the end and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon; and

(4) adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(3) 'Archivist' means the Archivist of the United States appointed under section 2103;

"(4) 'Service' means the National Archives and Records Service of the General Services Administration established under section 2102; and

"(5) 'Federal agency', notwithstanding section 2901(14), means any executive department, military department, Government corporation, Government-controlled corporation, or other establishment in the executive branch of the Government (including the Executive Office of the President), any independent regulatory agency, or any establishment in the legislative or judicial branch of the Government (except the Senate and the House of Representatives).".

(c)(1) The table of sections for chapter 21 of title 44, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

TRANSFERS

SEC. 103. (a)(1) All functions which are assigned to the Administrator of General Services by section 6 of Executive Order No. 10530 of May 11, 1954 (19 Fed. Reg. 2709; relating to documents and the Administrative Committee of the Federal Register), and by Executive Order No. 11440 of December 11, 1968 (33 Fed. Reg. 18475; relating to supplemental use of Federal exhibits and displays), shall be exercised by the Archivist of the United States.

(2) All functions pertaining to the maintenance, operation, and protection of a Presidential archival depository which were assigned to the Administrator of General Services by the Act of September 6, 1965 (Public Law 89-169, 79 Stat. 648), relating to the Lyndon Baines Johnson Presidential Archival Depository, and by the Act of August 27, 1966 (Public Law 89-547, 80 Stat. 370) and the Act of May 26, 1977 (Public Law 95-34, 91 Stat. 174), relating to the John Fitzgerald Kennedy Library, shall be exercised by the Archivist of the United States.

(b) Prior to the appointment and confirmation of an individual to serve as Archivist of the United States under section 2103 of title 44, United States Code, the individual holding the office of Archivist of the United States on the day before the effective date of this Act may serve as Archivist under such section, and while so serving shall be compensated at the rate provided under subsection (b) of such section.

SAVINGS PROVISIONS

SEC. 104. (a) All orders, determinations, rules, regulations, grants, contracts, agreements, permits, licenses, privileges, and other actions which have been issued, granted, made, undertaken, or entered into in the performance of any function transferred by this Act or the amendments made by this Act shall continue in effect according to their terms until modified, terminated, superseded, set aside, or revoked in accordance with law by any authorized official, a court of competent jurisdiction, or by operation of law.

(b)(1) The transfer of functions by this Act and by the amendments made by this Act shall not affect any proceedings, including notices of proposed rulemaking, or any application for any license, permit, certificate, or financial assistance pending on the effective date of this Act before the General Services Administration; but such proceedings and applications, to the extent that they relate to the functions so transferred, shall be continued. Orders shall be issued in such proceedings, appeals shall be taken therefrom, and payments shall be made pursuant to such orders, as if this Act had not been enacted; and orders issued in any such proceedings shall continue in effect until modified, terminated, superseded, or revoked by the Archivist, by a court of competent jurisdiction, or by operation by law. Nothing in this subsection shall be deemed to prohibit the discontinuance or modification of any such proceeding under the same terms and conditions and to the same extent that such proceeding could have been discontinued or modified if this Act had not been enacted.

(2) The Archivist is authorized to promulgate regulations providing for the orderly transfer of proceedings continued under paragraph (1) from the General Services Administration to the Service.

(c) Except as provided in subsection (e)—

(1) the provisions of this Act and of the amendments made by this Act shall not affect actions commenced prior to the effective date of this Act, and

(2) in all such actions, proceedings shall be had, appeals taken, and judgments rendered in the same manner and effect as if this Act had not been enacted.

(d) No action or other proceeding lawfully commenced by or against any officer of the United States acting in his or her official capacity shall abate by reason of any transfer of functions by this Act or by an amendment made by this Act. No cause of action by or against the General Services Administration or by or against any officer thereof in the official capacity of such officer shall abate by reason of any such transfer of functions.

(e) If, before the date on which this Act takes effect, the General Services Administration or any officer thereof in the official capacity of such officer, is a party to an action, and under this Act any function in connection with such action is transferred to the Archivist or any other official of the Service, then such action shall be continued with the Archivist or other appropriate official of the Service substituted or added as a party.

(f) Orders and actions of the Archivist in the exercise of functions transferred by this Act or by amendments made by this Act shall be subject to judicial review to the same extent and in the same manner as if such orders and actions had been by the individual holding the office of Archivist of the United States on the day before the effective date of this Act or the Administrator of General Services in the exercise of such functions immediately preceding their transfer. Any statutory requirements relating to notice, hearings, action upon the record, or administrative review that apply to any function transferred by this Act or by any amendment made by this Act shall apply to the exercise of such function by the Archivist.

(g) Subsections (b)(6) and (l)(1) of section 552a of title 5, United States Code, are amended by striking out "Administrator of General Services" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "Archivist of the United States."

(h) Section 5314 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Archivist of the United States.".

(i) Section 4(5) of the Act of October 25, 1951 (25 U.S.C. 199a) is amended by striking out "Administrator of General Services" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "Archivist of the United States".

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 106. For purposes of sections 103 and 104—

(1) the term "Archivist" means the Archivist of the United States appointed under section 2103 of title 44, United States Code, as added by section 2 of this Act;

(2) the term "Service" means the National Archives and Records Service of the General Services Administration established under section 2102 of such title (as amended by section 2 of this Act); and

(3) the term "function" includes any duty, obligation, power, authority, responsibility, right, privilege, activity, or program.

TITLE II—ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

COPYING AND AUTHENTICATING CHARGES

SEC. 201. Section 2116(c) of title 44, United States Code (as redesignated by section 102(a)), is amended to read as follows:

"(c) The Archivist may charge a fee set to recover the costs for making or authenticating copies or reproductions of materials transferred to his custody. Such fee shall be fixed by the Archivist at a level which will recover, so far as practicable, all elements of such costs, and may, in the Archivist's discretion, include increments for the estimated replacement cost of equipment. Such fees shall be paid into, administered, and expended as a part of the National Archives Trust Fund. The Archivist may not charge for making or authenticating copies or reproductions of materials for official use by the United States Government unless appropriations available to the Archivist for this purpose are insufficient to cover the cost of performing the work.".

NATIONAL ARCHIVES TRUST FUND BOARD

SEC. 202. (a) Chapter 23 of title 44, United States Code, is amended by striking out sections 2302 through 2305 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"§ 2302. Authority of the Board; seal; services; annual report; bylaws; rules; regulations

"in carrying out the purposes of this chapter, the Board—

"(1) may adopt an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed;

"(2) may utilize on a reimbursable basis the services and personnel of the National Archives and Records Service necessary (as determined by the Archivist) to assist the Board in the administration of the trust fund, and in the preparation and publication of special works and collections of sources and preparation, duplication, editing, and release of historical photographic materials and sound recordings, and may utilize on a reimbursable basis the services and personnel of other Federal agencies for such purposes;

"(3) shall submit to the Congress an annual report, by account, of the moneys, securities, and other personal property received and held by it, and of its operations, which shall include a listing of the purposes for which funds are transferred to the National Archives and Records Service for expenditure and to other Federal agencies;

"(4) may adopt bylaws, rules, and regulations necessary for the administration of its functions under this chapter; and

"(5) may, subject to the laws and regulations governing appointments in the competitive service, appoint and fix the compensation of such personnel as may be necessary to carry out its functions.

"§ 2303. Powers and obligations of the Board; liability of members

"Except as otherwise provided by this chapter, the Board shall have all the usual powers and obligations of a trustee with respect to property and funds administered by it, but the members of the Board are not personally liable, except for malfeasance.

"§ 2304. Compensation of members; availability of trust funds for expenses of the Board "Compensation may not be paid to the members of the Board for their services as members. Costs incurred by the Board in carrying out its duties under this chapter, including the obligations necessarily incurred by the members of the Board in the performance of their duties and the compensation of persons employed by the Board, shall be paid by the Archivist of the United States from trust funds available to the Board for this purpose. The Board, by resolution, may authorize the transfer of funds (including the principal or interest of a gift or bequest) to the National Archives and Records Service to be expended on an archival or records activity approved by the Board or to accomplish the purpose of a gift or bequest.

"§ 2305. Acceptance of gifts

"The Board may solicit and accept gifts or bequests of money, securities, or other personal property, for the benefit of or in connection with the national archival and records activities administered by the National Archives and Records Service. Moneys that are for deposit into the trust fund shall be deposited within 10 working days of the receipt thereof.".

(b) Section 2307 of title 44, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 2307. Trust fund account; disbursements; sales of publications and releases

"The income from trust funds held by the Board and the proceeds from the sale of securities and other personal property, as and when collected, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States in a trust fund account to be known as the National Archives Trust Fund, subject to disbursement on the basis of certified vouchers of the Archivist of the United States (or his designee) for activities approved by the Board and in the interest of the national archival and records activities administered by the National Archives and Records Service, including but not restricted to the preparation and publication of special works, and collections of sources and the preparation, duplication, editing, and release of historical photographic materials and sound recordings. The Archivist may sell publications and releases authorized by this section and paid for out of the income derived from trust funds at a price which will cover their cost, plus 10 percent, and moneys received from these sales shall be paid into, administered, and expended as part of the National Archives Trust Fund.".

(c) The table of sections for chapter 23 of title 44, United States Code, is amended by striking out "employees;" in the item pertaining to section 2302 and inserting in lieu thereof "services; annual report;".

AUTHORITY TO LITIGATE

SEC. 203. (a) Section 2905(a) of title 44, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "In any case in which the head of the agency fails to initiate an action for such recovery or other redress within a reasonable period of time after being notified of any such unlawful action, the Archivist of the United States shall, through the Attorney General, initiate such an action; and the Archivist shall report the circumstances of any such failure by the head of the agency, or of any refusal of the Attorney General to initiate such an action, to the appropriate committees of the Congress.".

(b) Section 3106 of title 44, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "In any case in which the head of the Agency fails to initiate an action for such recovery or other redress within a reasonable period of time after being notified of any such unlawful action, the Archivist of the United States shall, through the Attorney General, initiate such an action; and the Archivist shall report the circumstances of any such failure by the head of the agency, or of any refusal of the Attorney General to initiate such an action, to the appropriate committees of the Congress.".

INSPECTION OF RECORDS

SEC. 204. Section 3301 of title 44, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by inserting "(a) before "As used in this chapter,";

(2) by inserting ", as determined by the Archivist of the United States," after "public business and preserved or"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) The Archivist of the United States shall, by regulation, establish detailed criteria under which material shall be examined to determine if it is a record as defined under subsection (a) and such regulation. The Archivist may have access, to determine compliance with such subsection and such regulations, to any material made or received by an agency of the United States Government.".

PUBLIC NOTICE

SEC. 205. Section 3303a(a) of title 44, United States Code, is amended by inserting ", after publication of notice in the Federal Register and an opportunity for interested persons to submit comment thereon" immediately after "may" in the second sentence thereof.

TITLE III—EFFECTIVE DATE; CONSTRUCTION

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 301. The provisions of this Act shall be effective October 1, 1985.

RETURN INFORMATION

SEC. 302. Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed to authorize the disclosure of any return or return information (as defined in section 6103 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (26 U.S.C. 6103)) except as authorized by such Code.

On page 5, line 7, strike out the colon and all that follows down to the period on page 6, line 2.

SENATE—Monday, July 30, 1984

The Senate met at 4 p.m., and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. THURMOND].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Bless the Lord, O my soul: and all that is within me, bless his holy name.—Psalm 103:1 (KJV).

Lord God of justice and truth, thank Thee for an orderly universe which operates according to predictable laws making it possible to measure hours, days, weeks, months, and years. It is frightening Lord, to contemplate our confusion if this were not true. Help us to find the justice, truth, and order of God for our own lives, individually, and corporately.

Father in Heaven, we pray for the Temporary Select Committee on Committee Reform, and its chairman, Senator QUAYLE, in its inaugural hearing tomorrow. Give members and witnesses wisdom and courage as they wrestle with committee structures and practices. Help them to correct procedures about which everyone complains but no one wants to change. Guide according to Thy will O Lord, that the Senate may be efficient and effective in its work. In Jesus' name. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The acting majority leader is recognized.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, would the Senator mind if I get recognized just to put these amendments in?

Mr. STEVENS. I yield to the Senator for being recognized for the purpose of submitting amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The distinguished Senator from Ohio is recognized.

SUBMISSION OF AMENDMENTS TO S. 268

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I send a group of amendments to the desk in connection with the rules under the cloture rule.

I thank the acting majority leader.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader may proceed.

(The amendments are printed later in today's RECORD under Amendments Submitted, and are numbered amendment No. 3455 through amendment No. 3581.)

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, it is my understanding, pursuant to the order on Friday, that the reading of the Journal has been dispensed with, the call of the calendar has been dispensed with, no resolution shall come over under the rule, and the morning hour is deemed to have expired; further, that we are to have leader time under the standing order and the special order for the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE].

Is there any other item ordered prior to the quorum that is required under rule XXII for the cloture vote at 5 p.m.?

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. ABDNOR]. The order for morning business for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. Very well. That has been ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Senators should be on notice that there will be at 5 p.m. the mandatory quorum under rule XXII to establish that there is a quorum present for the purpose of proceeding with the cloture vote on the majority leader's motion to bring about cloture under rule XXII on the amendments of the House of Representatives to Senate bill S. 268.

Mr. President, I say for the information of the membership that it is not certain when we will convene on Tuesday. That depends on the outcome of the cloture vote that will take place this evening. We will attempt to start consideration of the agriculture appropriations bill tomorrow if that is possible. There will be the normal recess tomorrow between 12 noon and 2 p.m. for the respective party caucuses and conferences.

We anticipate a vote on the cloture motion that has been filed on the Wilkinson nomination at 3 p.m. after 1 hour of debate. And there is a subsequent cloture motion pending on the Hoover Dam bill. That, of course, depends on the outcome of the vote this evening.

It is uncertain how long we will stay in this evening, until we determine whether or not cloture will be approved.

LOW-POWER TELEVISION IN ALASKA

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, low-power television is playing an increasingly important role in Alaska's expanding telecommunications system. Through the learn Alaska network, educational programming is made available to nearly 200 outlying communities in my home State. In villages that often have only one or two teachers, a small library, and very limited access to guest lecturers, low-power television supplements the curriculum in a uniquely important way.

Modern telecommunications are bringing the outside world into small, remote, rural villages in Alaska, providing rural Alaskans with educational and entertainment opportunities that are normally found only in the more populated areas of the State.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article describing the Alaska low-power television network published in LPTV Currents—the National Institute for Low Power Television's official journal—be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LPTV THRIVES IN ALASKA

(By Leslie Danoff)

Eskimo children living in Alaska's northernmost community 300 miles from the North Pole recently produced a live television program carried by satellite to the rest of the state.

Fifth and sixth graders in the isolated North Slope town of Barrow—population 3,000—described their lives in the Arctic. They demonstrated the tools for subsistence survival as well as their native toys such as the Eskimo yo-yo, made out of seal, moose or caribou hide. One student explained the importance of whaling to his people. A second showed the multipurpose ulus, knives made out of whale ivory, caribou horn and wood, which are used for foraging, skinning, butchering big game, and preparing meals.

The youngsters read stories they had written about Eskimo symbols, illustrating them with papier mache masks made by their classmates.

The most striking element of this program was its use of technology. Not only were students across the huge state—⅕ the size of the lower 48—able to watch their faraway fellow Alaskans via standard one-way television but they were also able to talk directly with them. This connection was made by means of audio-teleconferencing.

The program, called Talkback, was made possible by Learn Alaska, one of Alaska's two low power networks. Launched on January 1, 1982, the 24 hour-a-day Learn Alaska Network provides instructional programming that spans the generations—from preschoolers to adults.

At the University of Alaska, William McCaughan oversees the largest LPTV network in the U.S. on behalf of the Alaska Department of Education and the statewide university system. Learn Alaska's goal, as he sees it, "is increased access to educational opportunity for the people who live in the small communities of rural Alaska." (Only 30 communities in the state are not considered rural.)

The state mandates that all communities with 25 or more permanent residents receive the low power Instructional Telecommunications Channel. Of the 250 sites that will eventually come on line, almost 200 are now operational.

A second low power channel, the Entertainment Network, functions as a translator system and brings these towns entertainment programming. Installation of the requisite hardware has proceeded rapidly in the remote areas. "As recently as 1976, only five communities in Alaska had television at all," recollects Deputy Commissioner of Telecommunications, Julianna Guy. Superbowl Sunday, January 1977, kicked off the Entertainment Network. At that time, 35 villages received the signal.

The citizens of Alaska make the programming decisions for both LPTV networks. Fourteen people comprise the Rural Alaska Television Network Council, which selects the entertainment LPTV. Alaska's 12 Native Corporations each send one representative to the Council. The Governor sends two.

Meeting three or four times a year, the Council cherry-picks the programming schedules of the four Anchorage stations—PBS and the CBS, NBC, and ABC affiliates. "If the program directors who are very professional and are paid a lot of money in the Lower 48 could sit and watch this, they'd be amazed," muses Guy. "Our Council members end up acting just like network executives. They like sex and violence and cartoons."

Representatives of Alaska's school districts and university campuses review educational programming possibilities for Learn Alaska, surveying their constituencies regarding areas of particular interest.

"Do they want more cultural information on Asia? More computer science programming? We rely on the populace to tell us," says Diane LaResche, Program Manager of Instructional Telecommunications in the State Education Department.

A hundred fifty series—3,000 programs a year—are targeted to the preschool to Grade 12 audiences. According to LaResche, every content area is covered. "We have a lot of one and two teacher schools. They aren't equipped to provide instruction in every subject. In a large community, a teacher could go to a library or call experts into the classroom. In our communities, that's impossible. We don't have roads and it's too expensive to fly someone in. So we call experts into the classroom through television and audio conferencing."

The most exciting programming undertaken by Alaska LPTV is interactive television, linking the parallel systems of one-way video and two-way audio. Grade school as well as university courses are conducted in which professors can elicit class participation in the most isolated villages without ever leaving their comfortable university settings. Classes located in each of Alaska's four time-zones are involved simultaneously. Compositions may be submitted to the teacher and circulated among the students in advance of the class. The students are then placed in constant contact with the teacher as well as with other students thousands of miles away through teleconferencing. According to McCaughan, Learn Alaska's bridging system has the potential to handle 90 lines simultaneously.

A leader of locally originated programming who is actively developing programming ideas based upon this dual video-audio conferencing system is Marilyn Rasmussen. She is the Director for the Media Division of the State Department of Parks, Culture, and Recreation. Three years ago she began a low power station for the municipality of Unalaska, a community of 2,000 in the Aleutian Islands.

Rasmussen, the driving force and coordinator of the Talkback program with the Eskimo children, is now working to organize a children's world teleconference in 1984. This year Alaskan students will use the audio-video systems to discuss and select a theme. Two potential subjects are "Alternatives to World War III" and "World Citizenship." The idea is to communicate with children in developing and developed countries. For the first try, students in Alaska will talk to foreigners who speak English (thereby avoiding the additional encumbrance of interpreters). India is one of the countries that may participate.

A second project is Close-up: Learning the Legislative Process. Junior and seniors in high schools around the state travel to Juneau, the capitol, to learn about the workings of Alaska government. They engage in intensive legislative training, holding mock sessions and press conferences, and learning bill research.

After the young people conclude the first week of the program they'll go on statewide television and share their knowledge with the kids back home. Their classmates will ask questions over the network, using the audio conferencing hook-up. "This is a way," says Rasmussen, "to get more kids excited and involved in the legislative process."

Another program Rasmussen hopes will materialize is Politics as Process. Again, using the Juneau uplink, Alaskan students will question their representatives about current bills concerning education and educational technology. "Before the Congresspeople actually start pushing bills through the legislature, students will get involved," she says. "Their concerns could very well influence the future of educational legislation in the state."

Rasmussen hopes that a series with the working title, Where We Are—patterned after Talkback—will also be funded. Program production coordinators will travel to communities that have satellite uplinks and work with the children to help them crystallize what they want to share about themselves, their communities, their lifestyles. The second part of each of these programs will use interactive audio, as children from other parts of the state ask questions. The show might also experiment with slow-scan video, as Talkback did.

All of these schemes require dollars. "In spite of all the fabulous Alaskan wealth everyone hears about, it's all a bunch of nonsense," states McCaughan. "The majority of what we're doing is on a shoe-string."

His annual operating budget for both audio and video is $900,000. This includes the costs of purchasing 24 hours of daily programming, operating and maintaining facilities. It does not include uplink charges, the transponder lease, and station construction costs. That amounts to several million more.

The station's start-up costs vary widely, reports Learn Alaska's Operations Manager, Charles Hickman. Of the 250 sites, only 38 are accessible by road. That means more expensive modes of transportation—planes or boats and sometimes both—must be used to bring equipment and technicians into the country.

"Per site installation appears to average $50,000," says Hickman. The cost is that low because the state is able to rent space and sometimes facilities from Alascom, the only long line carrier in the state. (Alascom owns the Satcom 5 satellite which services Alaska.)

"I'm not saying Alascom is overly generous in assessing our monthly payments," explains Hickman. "But if we had to bear the whole brunt of installing the entire state from scratch, it would have cost us $200,000 for every site."

In some communities, leasing space from Alascom is not an option. Learn Alaska then turns to the network's main focus—the school. Often the 4.5 meter dish can be positioned in a schoolyard, and the transmitter can sit in a janitor's closet. But since the schools only have their power turned on during nine months of the year, an alternate source has to be found for the remaining three. In all cases, the community pays the power costs.

There are rare instances in which a community does not welcome the Learn Alaska Network. Julianna Guy recalls one little village which had repeated problems with its dish, requiring a technician to fly out several times. On the third visit, he was met at the tiny airstrip by a man with a shotgun who said, "There's no problem here." The dish had been turned purposely so the community could receive the signal of a second entertainment channel instead of the instructional network.

For the most part, however, the people in the towns and villages appear to be quite receptive to forging channels of communication with the outside world. In addition to reaping the educational benefits of the video-audio conferencing connection, they will soon be introduced to the possibilities of teletext. Learn Alaska is just beginning to install the equipment.

Teletext will be used to keep the people abreast of the complex and rapidly changing wildfife and fishing regulations that affect their daily lives. It will also constantly update aviation weather conditions throughout the country, information that is vital to a nation for which planes are the primary method of travel. Until now, those reports have often been incomplete or unavailable.

According to McCaughan, teletext will bring health and social service information to Alaska's citizens: how to perform basic CPR, where to get information and assistance on administering the antidotes to poisons, how and where to get Social Security benefits or food stamps.

Low power television is clearly bringing the whole world to the tiny, insolated villages for which the most modern communications before its arrival were intermittent radio broadcasts. But that learning is clearly not all flowing in one direction. Learn Alaska is providing the opportunity for those in more developed areas to be introduced to the cultural diversity that exists within the vast wilderness of this nation's last frontier.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of our time.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Democratic leader is recognized.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

A SPECIAL DAY IN JULY

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, throughout history, July has been a month of significant events. July 1 was the day on which Teddy Roosevelt led the Rough Riders in their famous cavalry charge up San Juan Hill. July 4 is Independence Day. July 14 is Bastille Day. And the first battle of Bull Run was fought on July 21, 1861.

But in that multiplicity of special July dates, I call the Senate's attention to July 13. On that day in 1908, one of perhaps the Senate's best known and most respected long-time officers was born, and on this past July 13 Dr. Floyd M. Riddick, our Parliamentarian Emeritus, celebrated his 76th birthday. Dr. Riddick retired as Senate Parliamentarian in 1974, but he has served on as a Senate consultant since then, continuing in his official emeritized status to make vital and important contributions to the Senate's day-to-day operations, and continuing also to make friends and win admirers within the ranks of the Senate's new Members in his retirement, as he did prior to 1974.

A native North Carolinian, Dr. Riddick is author of the massive and authoritative "Senate Procedure, Precedents and Practice," and has added appreciably to the Senate's ongoing formal recollection of its past in an interesting, anecdotal oral history that he gave to the Senate Historical Society about 5 years ago. Few nonelected individuals in the long Senate tradition have left as deep an imprint on or been as intimately involved in the functioning of this distinguished body as has Floyd Riddick.

Dr. Riddick was educated at Duke and Vanderbilt Universities, winning his doctorate in political science from Duke in 1935. After stints in academic teaching and private research and writing, in 1947 he became an editor for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In 1951, Dr. Riddick was appointed the Senate's Assistant Parliamentarian, subsequently serving as Parliamentarian from 1965 to 1974. Over the years, he has been compared favorably as an expert on formal parliamentary procedure and precedent to the famous 18th century Parliamentarian of the British House of Commons, John Hatsel, and to our second Vice President, Thomas Jefferson.

Here is a man of intense dedication, who serves for the Senate without salary, and last January in addition to the work he does without salary, Dr. Riddick assumed regular added duties as President of the Cosmos Club downtown.

But, week after week, he can be found in the suite of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, readily lending his hand and his worthy advice to Senators in any ways in which he is asked.

I know that all of our Senate colleagues and Dr. Riddick's many friends and admirers on Capitol Hill join me in congratulating him on the celebration of his 76th birthday even though we may be a little belated in doing it. We also, I know, join in thanking him for his long years of loving service and unflagging devotion to the U.S. Senate.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I do want to join with the Senator and thank the distinguished Democratic leader for calling the attention of the Senate once again to the distinguished service of our good friend, Doc Riddick.

WEST VIRGINIA IS PROUD OF ITS OLYMPIANS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, it is appropriate to note that the games of the 23d Olympiad of the modern era are well underway in the United States this week. Our Nation is being very ably represented by over 600 athletes across America.

I wish to recognize two athletes who are competing today—Mary Lou Retton of Fairmont, WV, and Edward Etzel, of Morgantown, WV.

West Virginia's Olympic athletes compete in quite different events. Mary Lou Retton is the current U.S. national champion gymnast. Edward Etzel is an expert marksman who is competing in the smallbore rifle and English match rifle events.

Ms. Retton is considered one of the finest gymnasts in the world, and she will be seen by millions of Americans for the first time tonight on television, as the American women's gymnastic team begins competition.

Mr. Etzel is the coach of the rifle team at West Virginia University. The team has captured the last two collegiate rifle championships, a fact that demonstrates Mr. Etzel's leadership and knowledge of his sport. He will compete today in the exacting smallbore rifle event.

West Virginians are good riflemen, good marksmen, living in the mountains, and hollows, and hills of that great State. It should not, therefore, be a surprise to anyone that West Virginia can produce a man like Mr. Etzel.

I wish both of the West Virginia Olympians the best of luck in their endeavors today.

Mr. President, if I have any time remaining, I yield it to Mr. PROXMIRE who, in turn, may yield it to any other Senator who wishes to have it.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask the distinguished Senator from Nebraska if he would like to go ahead. I have about 15 minutes.

Mr. EXON. If the Senator would yield to me for a brief period of time.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am happy to do that.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be able to yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Nebraska without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has that right.

Mr. EXON. I thank my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. EXON. I am happy to yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this brief statement not be charged to Mr. EXON's time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, Mr. JOHNSTON has asked Mr. METZENBAUM to handle the time and be the manager on this side of the aisle with respect to the Hoover Dam legislation, and I make this statement for the RECORD. If Mr. METZENBAUM would like to sit at this desk, he is perfectly welcome to do so.

I thank Mr. EXON.

AFFORDABLE CREDIT TO FARMERS AND FAIR TREATMENT TO AGRICULTURE BORROWERS

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the minority leader for just a moment, the Senator from Nebraska has been trying to get the attention of the majority leader and the minority leader for the last couple of days, and it just has not seemed to work out. The majority leader is not here now. I just talked to the acting majority leader, and I would like to enlist the help and support of my friend from West Virginia to see if he might be able to help me expedite a matter that we agreed to when the matter was pending on June 29 with regard to the debt ceiling bill.

I believe the minority leader will remember that on June 29, this Senator introduced, and it was agreed to be placed on the calendar, Order No. 1043, Senate Concurrent Resolution 130, which I offered on the debt ceiling bill and did not press for it at that time, with the clear understanding of the majority leader and the minority leader that they would do everything they possibly could to expedite bringing up this concurrent resolution as soon as we returned.

The RECORD will show at that time that I said that every time we had a quorum call or every time we were not doing anything, the Senator from Nebraska would be here to remind the majority leader and minority leader of the commitment that was made at that time. I am really renewing my request at this time.

This has to do, as the minority leader might remember, with a concurrent resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that the President should assure an adequate flow of affordable credit to farmers and should assure fair treatment to agricultural borrowers.

I would just like to renew my request at this time to see if the minority leader could intervene with the majority leader. It seems to me that since I agreed not to press this on the debt ceiling bill, there seems to be little reason why we could not exercise this probably sometime tomorrow. If we do not bring it up then, I will attempt once again to add it to the agriculture appropriations bill when it comes up. I am sure that at that time we would have an argument as to whether or not it is legislation on an appropriations measure, and I may have a vote on that. I am going to insist that this be brought up as quickly as it can reasonably be, pursuant to my understanding with the majority leader and the minority leader when I agreed not to press for a rollcall vote on Senate Concurrent Resolution 130 on June 29 on the debt ceiling bill.

I am wondering if the minority leader has any pertinent information on this for me and if he might assist me in getting it brought up with the cooperation of the majority leader.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, the Senator states the facts accurately as far as I can recall. Although I cannot presume to speak for the distinguished majority leader, I am sure that, based on our experiences with him over the past several years, I do not have any problem in expressing the assurance to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska that both the majority leader and I will do everything we can to see that the distinguished Senator from Nebraska gets an opportunity, as we told him we would make every effort to do everything within our power, to present the amendment in question.

May I say that, as far as our side of the aisle is concerned, we are attempting now to clear this matter. We are working with the Banking Committee in an effort to get an agreement on the language that is in the proposal of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska. We will continue to work with the Banking Committee and with the Senator to see if there is any problem which would necessitate the modification, perhaps, of some language or whatever.

But the Senator can be sure that both the majority leader and the minority leader will do everything we can to help him to have his opportunity to have the Senate take a position on the matter.

Mr. EXON. I thank my friend from West Virginia, and I thank my friend from Wisconsin. I yield back to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank my good friend from Nebraska.

HOW STAR WARS JEOPARDIZES NUCLEAR ARMS CONTROL

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this is the fifth of my response to Gen. Daniel Graham's series of arguments in favor of the administration's proposed "star wars" or antimissile—not antisatellite—programs. General Graham defends "star wars" by setting forth seven arguments against the Antimissile Program. He then answers each of them. As an opponent of this antimissile system, I have been putting the Graham arguments of "star wars" in the record and responding to each of them on the Senate floor.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that General Graham's fifth defense of the antimissile system in this case against the charge that the system will threaten arms control be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the document was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

5. It Jeopardizes Arms Control.

Answer. If the objective of arms control negotiations is to reduce the danger of nuclear war and the numbers of nuclear weapons threatening the U.S. and the Free World, High Frontier represents instant arms control. The threat of nuclear war is driven back toward zero by removing any hope of a successful first strike while at the same time sharply reducing the change of war by accident. High Frontier can effectively reduce the inventory of threatening nuclear missile warheads by over 80 percent. Is there any real chance of reducing the Soviet inventory of such weapons by that amount through negotiations?

High Frontier provides the only real chance of reduction of nuclear inventories through negotiations. The day that the long range nuclear missile becomes less useful to the Soviets because of an effective defense is the day reduction in their numbers becomes an achievable goal.

The only past agreement affected by High Frontier is the ABM Treaty and even in that case there is room to argue that the deployment of space-borne defense requires no more than "discussion" with the Soviets. On the other hand, Soviet violations of that treaty starting in 1974 are by now so obvious that the U.S. should feel free to pursue High Frontier without regard to the Treaty.

Another option is to offer an amendment to current agreements allowing both sides to deploy in space non-nuclear defenses against first or accidental strikes by long-range missiles. If there is one kind of Soviet military capability in which we could tolerate equality or even superiority, it is a capability to protect against a deliberate or accidental first strike by U.S. long-range nuclear missiles.

So why, Mr. President, does this new defensive technology represent any increased threat to arms control? First, the antimissile system sharply advances and extends the nuclear arms race. Second, it does so by obviously and overtly violating the antiballistic missile treaty that has been ratified both by the United States and the Soviet Union. What is the authority for the assertion that "star wars" would violate the treaty? My authority is the testimony of General Abrahamson, the Defense Department's chief proponent of "star wars" in testimony before the Senate Defense Appropriations Committee earlier this year. I was present at that time, Mr. President.

General Abrahamson was specifically asked whether the deployment of the antimissile system would violate the ABM Treaty. His answer was: "Yes." He did not equivocate. He did not modify. He just said "yes." It would violate the arms control treaty that we have ratified.

Third, because the antimissile system is designed to reduce the capability of the Soviets to deliver their nuclear payload on U.S. targets, "star wars" would ruin any prospect that the Soviets would agree to any arms control agreement to limit their offensive missiles or any arms control agreement to stop nuclear weapons testing. Why do I say that? It follows because the new defensive ABM technology would surely call forth Soviet research and testing to develop new varieties of offensive missiles to overcome the antimissile defense. Why would they agree to arms control limiting their offensive missiles when the easiest and surest answer to "star wars" on their part is to increase their offensive missiles? They would not agree. So they would not have arms control.

Fourth, a sure byproduct of "star wars" would be the development on both sides of antisatellite systems. That is another step. For any nation that had developed an effective technology for finding and knocking out incoming intercontinental ballistic missiles, it would be a short and easy step to perfect an antisatellite variation that would make the United States and Soviet satellites as vulnerable targets as fish in a barrel.

What does this threatened vulnerability of satellites have to do with arms control? The answer: Satellites provide the very heart of verification of any arms control agreement now or in the future. Both the United States and the Soviet Union rely for 90 percent or more of their arms control enforcement on the intelligence provided by satellites. Satellites are truly the eyes and ears of arms control. Without them, arms control would collapse surely and quickly because neither superpower has any faith in the honesty and reliability of the other.

Indeed, the Soviet leaders have frequently said that they believe in the old principle that the end justifies the means. Without verification, arms control represents an idealistic, idle, empty dream. So since "star wars" would greatly increase the threat to satellites and the verification of arms control agreements, it does indeed jeopardize arms control.

Fifth, the advent of a "star wars" competition between the United States and the Soviet Union would seriously diminish the credibility of arms control agreements because it would sharply reduce the reliability of verification. Any arms control agreement in this kind of a scenario would have to cope with a far more complex offensive missile system that would much more easily deceive arms control provisions. Verification would have to get into such matters as "skin hardening" of offensive missiles, the number and distribution of decoys, as well as keeping track of the far greater number of offensive missiles which the defensive missile system would surely provoke.

That means that an arms control agreement would mean on-site inspection without notification. It would be the hardest kind of verification.

To respond to the one specific argument by General Graham I have not already answered, he contends that the new antimissile system would constitute an instant arms control because it would "effectively reduce the inventory of threatening nuclear missile warheads by over 80 percent." Now come on, General. What is to prevent the Soviets from simply producing more offensive missiles, which they can do at a relatively modest cost, thereby totally nullifying the elaborate and expensive defensive system?

To summarize, "star wars" would jeopardize arms control in the following ways: First, it advances and extends the arms race. Second, if deployed, it obviously violates the Anti-Ballistic Missile Arms Control Treaty according to testimony by the Defense Department's own leading advocate of "star wars."

Third, it would end any chance of a treaty limiting Soviet offensive missiles because the Soviets would certainly not agree to an arms control treaty that nullified their ability to retaliate effectively to a nuclear attack. The easy response by the Soviets to "star wars" is to build more offensive missiles. If we go ahead with "star wars," they will do just this and they will certainly refuse to agree to any treaty that would prevent them from doing so.

Fourth, "star wars" would seriously jeopardize the superpower satellites which constitute the very heart of arms control verification. Fifth, "star wars" would seriously diminish the credibility of arms control agreements because it would make verification of a much more complex and far-flung offensive missile system much less reliable.

And sixth, any offensive missiles the antimissile system could intercept and stop could be, and would be, replaced by new offensive missiles the Soviets would build in anticipation of precisely this kind of problem.

THE NEED TO RATIFY THE GENOCIDE TREATY: ANTISEMITIC VANDALISM

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, last year the Anti-Defamation League of the B'nai B'rith Organization reported 670 incidents of antisemitic vandalism. One more incident has surfaced, this time in the form of 3-foot swastikas painted on the side of the Beth El Ner Tamid Synagogue, a newly built temple in Mequon, WI.

The swastika was a symbol of the Nazis, persecutors of 6 million Jews and 3 million of other faiths who resisted the hated symbol of the Nazi party.

This incident elicited an overwhelming response within the community. Mr. President, I would like to take this time to applaud the public officials, clergy, members of the congregation, and other concerned citizens for their responsiveness to the matter. They have all expressed their disbelief and embarrassment for the desecration of the temple, and some have offered to contribute money toward the removal of the swastikas.

At the same time, it is dangerous to underestimate the gravity of this situation.

What does this incident and the 670 similar acts of vandalism mean? They send a clear message that the fight against hatred, prejudism, and antisemitism is far from over.

Beneath the swastikas were the letters "A.H.," obviously a reference to Adolf Hitler, the leader of the Nazi Party during World War II.

This act, whether committed by thoughtless pranksters unconscious of the symbolism inherent in their vandalism, or by organized professionals, was deplorable in 1984 America. The immorality of such crimes must be made clear.

If not monitored closely, the problem could become dangerous.

As a champion of human rights, our country must strive to protect and enhance the lives of all, and work to eliminate any traces of antireligious and prejudicial acts.

As a positive preventive measure, we should ratify the Genocide Convention. This treaty expressly condemns any attempt to eliminate, in whole or part, any national, racial, ethnic, or religious group. Simply stated, the Genocide Convention attempts to safeguard under international law the most fundamental human right, the right to live.

Our country stands alone among developed nations in our refusal to ratify the Genocide Convention.

It is up to us. I urge my Senate colleagues to ratify the Genocide Treaty, and participate in the international effort to condemn and punish those who commit the heinous crime of Genocide.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time, and I yield the floor.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business for not to exceed 15 minutes with statements therein limited to 2 minutes each.

HYDROELECTRIC POWERPLANTS

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I want to take advantage of the morning hour prior to the cloture vote because I am afraid we will not have time to say enough about this Hoover power problem that has been brought up by my friend from Ohio. But to get the matter down to something that we might be able to understand, Arizona uses 8,000 megawatts of power. Hoover provides us with 160 megawatts which is 2 percent of our power needs. With the upgrading at Hoover, we will receive 320 megawatts which will provide us with 4 percent of our power supply. We now receive 17.6 percent of Hoover Dam's power output and with the upgrading, we would be receiving over 20 percent of the generation of power from Hoover.

I have read so much into the debates that we have listened to on the floor and I have read so much into the editorials that have been passed around to get the idea that many people believe those of us who live in the Southwestern part of the United States benefit greatly by this obviously cheap power, if you look at the cost of power at the generator.

Mr. President, as I mentioned here on the floor the other day, I have a four-bedroom house. Yes, it is air-conditioned. But my last month's bill was almost $500 for electricity to run that house. I do not think there is a place in the United States that has higher power rates than we pay in Arizona in spite of the fact that 3 percent of our power comes to us at a very low basic rate.

I must remind my friends in this body who want to make it look like we are benefiting so greatly that the cost of power at a generating site is not the criterion that should be followed. It is how much to transport this power and how much to retransport it to the homes after it has reached the points of destination. I just wanted to get that into the record, Mr. President, to make it clear that even though Hoover power costs at the megawatt level very little at the generator, it costs a devil of a lot by the time it lights a bulb in your house.

I yield the floor.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Are we still in morning business, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

TOO MANY GENERALS?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, not too many days ago a Member of the House of Representatives made some comments to the effect that we had too many generals. Yet we have probably the same number of generals or a little more than we had during World War II, Korea, or Vietnam. This was strange coming from this gentleman because when he came to take charge of the committee he is now chairman of, he had eight members on his staff. He now has 16. I wish he would think about that point before he criticizes the Armed Forces.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

GREAT LAKES POLLUTION LINKED TO HUMAN HEALTH

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, on Sunday, July 22, the New York Times carried an article entitled "Peril Is Seen for Babies Whose Mothers Ate Fish With PCB's."

This is but the most recent of a growing body of literature describing the threats to human health of eating contaminated fish from the Great Lakes. The Times article was based on an article published in the most recent issue of the Journal of Developmental Psychology.

In this article, a clear link is drawn between mothers who ate as little as two meals of Great Lakes fish per month to developmental disorders of their offspring. The study identified behavioral and developmental problems ranging from sluggish emotional response to lower birth weights and smaller head circumference.

The mechanism for PCB contamination of the Great Lakes fish is not completely understood. We know that PCB's were deposited in the lakes before they were banned in 1976. In addition, we know that some PCB's enter the lakes as by-products of industrial and manufacturing processes. There is considerable speculation today that additional PCB deposition reaches the lakes from the fallout of toxic air pollution. We do not know the magnitude of these classes of pollution or even the major generators of this toxic material.

The contamination of human food supplies by PCB's is only one of many urgent problems facing the Great Lakes. The Great Lakes contain 95 percent of our Nation's surface freshwater. We cannot allow this spectacular resource to be squandered.

The Federal effort to manage the Great Lakes is a textbook example of how to abuse a natural resource. There are at least a dozen Federal agencies with conflicting interests competing for the use of the lakes. While the Great Lakes are a resource which can sustain, and rightfully should have, multiple use, there is no adequate mechanism for resolving conflicts of resource use.

There is no single Federal agency with a comprehensive perspective for lakes management. Instead, the Federal agencies have a piecemeal approach to Great Lakes management. What we need is a single, efficient institution with comprehensive responsibility for lakes management.

I have introduced legislation that will fill this need. S. 2751, the "Save the Lakes Act of 1984," will provide for comprehensive management of the lakes.

The purposes of this legislation are to:

First, provide comprehensive management of the Great Lakes.

Second, develop a coordinated data base on the Great Lakes.

Third, identify the major threats to the environmental quality of the lakes.

To achieve these purposes, the legislation provides for the creation of the Great Lakes Research and Management Office. This office will coordinate all Federal efforts to manage the Great Lakes. Other responsibilities will include:

First, identifying all Federal, State, and foreign agencies involved in Great Lakes managment.

Second, creating a Great Lakes Research Exchange.

Third, develop, in cooperation with Federal and State agencies, a comprehensive management plan for the Great Lakes.

Fourth, provide an annual "State of the Lakes Report."

Mr. President, at this time I would like to add as cosponsors of S. 2751, Senators QUAYLE, PERCY, LEVIN, and DIXON.

Finally, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the recent New York Times article entitled "Peril Is Seen for Babies Whose Mothers Ate Fish With PCB's" be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PERIL IS SEEN FOR BABIES WHOSE MOTHERS ATE FISH WITH PCB'S

(By Daniel Goleman)

The infants of women who ate Lake Michigan fish contaminated with PCB's show subtle, "worrisome" signs of problems in their behavioral development such as sluggish emotional responses, a new study indicates.

The study, published in the curent issue of the journal Developmental Psychology, is the first to find deficits in the children of women exposed to low levels of PCB's. The women who were studied ate an average of two to three meals of contaminated fish per month for 16 years.

PCB's, polychlorinated biphenyls, are chemicals that were widely used in electrical equipment and other industrial applications before they were banned in 1976. PCB's are man-made molecules that accumulate in fatty tissue and are believed to cause cancer. They do not decompose under bacterial or other biological action.

Predatory fish such as lake trout and salmon can have especially high concentrations of PCB's. Because of the cancer risk, pregnant women, nursing mothers, women of child-bearing age and young children have been advised in the past to limit their consumption of fish species likely to have high accumulations of PCB's.

"I would advise women of child-bearing age not to eat fatty fish like salmon and lake trout at all," said Joseph L. Jacobson, one of the researchers, "or else to cut off the fattier part or broil the fish, which removes most of the PCB's."

The researchers are cautious about the implications of their findings, since they do not yet have evidence that the problems will persist.

Moreover, although they went to great lengths to be sure that the effects they observed were due to PCB's, they note that other factors, including other toxic chemicals, could be the cause.

The effects of much higher levels of PCB's had already been observed in studies of pregnant women in Japan and Taiwan who had accidentally consumed rice oil contaminated by PCB's and other chemicals. Their infants showed a distinctive set of physical characteristics, and most were mentally retarded, sluggish and clumsy in their movements, and were generally apathetic.

313 INFANTS STUDIED

The current study suggests, however, that even exposure to low levels of PCB's can have detrimental effects.

The researchers interviewed 8,482 mothers the day after their babies were delivered in four hospitals in western Michigan. They compared infants of 71 women who reported eating no contaminated fish with those of 242 women who reported regularly eating fish from Lake Michigan, including species known to have PCB contamination.

The infants of the women who had eaten fish had a lower birth weight and smaller head circumference than the infants of women who had not.

On a standard test of infant development, the infants of women who had eaten fish showed a number of abnormal responses including jerky and unbalanced movements, sluggishness in response, and weak reflexes.

The study was done by Joseph L. Jacobson and Sandra W. Jacobson of Wayne State University in Detroit, Greta G. Fein of the University of Maryland, Pamela M. Schwartz of the University of Michigan and Jeffrey K. Dowler of Wayne State University.

Low levels of exposure to toxins, the researchers note, can produce different symptoms in different children, depending on genetic predispositions or other factors.

The patterns found in the infants whose mothers were exposed to PCB's would be considered worrisome by clinicians. Although the patterns would not necessarily mean than an infant would continue to have problems as it matured, a clinician would ordinarily monitor the child's development for signs of further problems.

The investigators are planning to retest the infants in the study when they reach age 4 to see if developmental problems emerge. They note that problems in infancy are often transitory and their long-term implications for development are uncertain.

Infants of the women who had the highest exposure to PCB's had the most worrisome ratings, according to the study; their behavior tended to be the most sluggish and depressed.

Because these deficits are subtle, the investigators say, they are often unnoticed in infants, and developmental problems that emerge later are likely to be traced back to the mother's exposure to a toxic substance.

CONTAMINATION IS DECLINING

CHICAGO, July 21.—Studies since 1975 have found a steady decline in the level of PCB's in fish from Lake Michigan, said Thomas J. Murphy, a DePaul University chemist and member of the Lake Michigan Federation, a private nonprofit group.

From 1972 to 1975 Coho salmon contained on average more than 10 parts of PCB's per million, and lake trout contained from 18 to 22, Mr. Murphy said. Data gathered in 1981 show lake trout measuring 6 parts per million, he said, with a similar decline in salmon.

These levels, however, are still above the Federal Food and Drug Administration's limit of two parts per million of PCB's in fish.

Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana and Michigan, the states bordering Lake Michigan, issue warnings on fishing licenses against eating contaminated fish.

In New York State, the Hudson River contains PCB's, and Lake Ontario and Erie have other chemical contaminants. The New York City Health Department recommends that people eat no more than one meal a month of New York State freshwater fish, and that pregnant women, women of child-bearing age, nursing mothers and children under 15 years old eat no New York State fish at all.

ARKADELPHIA—A NEW PASSENGER STOP FOR AMTRAK'S EAGLE

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I was delighted recently to receive a favorable response from Amtrak President Graham Claytor to my request that Amtrak bring passenger railroad service to the city of Arkadelphia.

Mr. President, the people of Arkadelphia and the surrounding areas in Clark County were very persistent in their efforts to secure this service. This is a fine example of how citizens can bind together at the grassroots level, and—against the odds—make the Federal Government more responsive to their particular needs.

I am convinced that this service will broaden the transportation alternatives not only to the citizens in Clark County, but to all Arkansans. The addition of Arkadelphia means Arkansas now has six passenger railroad stops on the Eagle run, which stretches from Chicago to San Antonio.

Finally, I want to thank the citizens of Clark County for their dedication and help on this matter. I look forward to my next journey on the Eagle and to the new passenger stop in Arkadelphia, which Amtrak hopes to have in place by October.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of Mr. Claytor's letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMTRAK,
Washington, DC, July 19, 1984.

Hon. DAVID PRYOR,
U.S. Senate, Russell Senate Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR PRYOR: I am responding to your June 15 letter concerning your support for the institution of a passenger stop at Arkadelphia.

As you can well imagine, Amtrak receives many requests each year from the towns and communities through which we pass requesting that we stop our trains in their communities. While we would like to accommodate all requests, we simply cannot do so without seriously affecting the scheduling of the train. Therefore, when we consider making any additional station stops we take into account several factors, including the size of the potential market to be served, the proximity of the proposed stop to other stations which might serve the same market, and the estimated value of the market compared to the cost of adding the stop to the train.

Amtrak had previously informed the City of Arkadelphia that it would be willing to add the stop to the schedule of our Eagle service if the City would provide and maintain a facility at no expense to Amtrak, and if the Missouri Pacific would agree to accommodate the stop with no additional running time added to the schedule. The City has indicated its willingness to satisfy the requirements for a stop, but the Missouri Pacific has informed Amtrak that it will require five minutes to be added to the schedule of the Eagle if the stop is made.

Amtrak is continuing to negotiate this matter with the railroad, and we will try to reduce the amount of time required for the stop. Although we would not normally agree to establishing a station stop in light of the railroad's current position to lengthen the schedule of the Eagle, we will do so on an experimental basis to determine if the stop can generate sufficient ridership to justify its continuance. As you know, the Eagle currently serves Malvern, a town of about the same population as Arkadelphia, and only about six persons per train make use of this stop. Considering that Malvern is only 22 rail miles from Arkadelphia, it is possible that some of these riders would use the stop at Arkadelphia. We believe, however, that because of the enthusiasm of the City and their contention that the stop will generate additional passengers, we will offer the community the opportunity for a stop on a one-year trial basis. Our staff will advise Mayor Callaway of our decision and will work with them to establish the stop effective with the October timetable.

I appreciate your interest and concern in behalf of your constitutents. If I may be of further assistance, please let me know.

Sincerely,

W. GRAHAM CLAYTOR, Jr.,
President.

THE CLOTURE VOTE ON HYDROELECTRIC POWER PLANTS

Mr. HECHT. Mr. President, I would like to make a few summary remarks concerning the upcoming vote to invoke cloture on S. 268, the Hoover Dam bill.

Some people have questioned why, after only 4 hours of debate, a cloture petition was filed on this legislation. The reason is simple. This bill has already passed the Senate once, by unanimous consent. It has passed the House of Representatives by an overwhelming margin. Hearings have been held in both bodies, and in my view, ample time has already been provided for Members to voice their concern and offer constructive, and I emphasize that word "constructive," amendments.

This is not the time or the place to be debating as fundamental an issue as Federal hydropower pricing policy. We have offered to hold additional hearings on this subject. We have offered to make the Hoover contracts subject to any pricing changes that Congress might choose to make in the future. The Senator from Ohio has flatly rejected all of these offers.

What the Senator from Ohio really wants is for the Federal Government to earn a profit on the sale of Hoover power. He wants to impose a tax on the 15 million ratepayers who benefit from Hoover Dam, supposedly to help balance the Federal budget. More fundamentally, he wants to impose a back door Federal tax on all electric consumers who buy power from Federal dams. Does anyone here believe this is the time or place to be debating such a fundamental public policy issue? That is what this vote is really about.

In closing, let me try to correct some of the misrepresentations I have seen in the press and heard here on the floor during this debate.

There is no subsidy inherent in the concept of tying the price of power to its cost of production. This is the way 98 percent of all power in America is priced. The electric industry is a regulated monopoly. Show me a public utility commission who allows its utilities to earn a profit on dams, coal plants, or any other facility whose cost of construction has been fully repaid by the ratepayers.

The Senator from Ohio claims that this bill will encourage the wasteful use of electricity in the American Southwest. He claims that power rates in this region are dirt cheap because of subsidized Federal power. This is nonsense. Hoover represents only a small fraction of the power generated in the Southwest. Its price is rolled in with all the rest. At the end of the line, where prices really count, Nevada, Arizona, and California consumers pay rates that are comparable to, and in the case of southern California, substantially higher than, the national average.

Finally, the Senator from Ohio claims that we are trying to rush this bill through the Senate. He claims that with a little time, he can work something out with the bill's sponsors. He makes it sound as if we are being totally unreasonable in this matter. Let me repeat: We have offered to hold hearings. We have offered to make the Hoover contracts subject to any pricing changes that Congress might make in the future. This has not been good enough apparently, but this is unfortunately as far as we can go. We are not ready to make wholesale changes in Federal power pricing policy in the context of this bill.

I hope this statement has helped clarify some of the statements that I have heard over the past few days. Again, I urge my colleagues to get on with the business of the Senate, and I ask their support of the pending cloture petition.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. DURENBERGER]. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CLOTURE MOTION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One hour having elapsed since the Senate convened, the clerk will state the motion to invoke cloture.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

CLOTURE MOTION

We, the undersigned Senators, in accordance with the provision of Rule XXII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, hereby move to bring to a close debate on the Baker motion to concur in the House amendment to S. 268, the Hoover Powerplant Act of 1984.

Senators Howard Baker, Ted Stevens, James A. McClure, Pete Wilson, Daniel J. Evans, Chic Hecht, Barry Goldwater, Alan Cranston, Orrin Hatch, Jeremiah Denton, John East, Dennis DeConcini, Mark Hatfield, Thad Cochran, Mack Mattingly, Paul Trible, Paul Laxalt, Max Baucus, Pete Domenici, Jeff Bingaman, John Melcher, and Jake Garn.

CALL OF THE ROLL

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pursuant to rule XXII, the Chair now directs the clerk to call the roll to ascertain the presence of a quorum.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names.

[Quorum No. 8 Leg.]

Abdnor	Durenberger	Proxmire
Burdick	East	Randolph
Byrd	Ford	Sarbanes
Chafee	Gorton	Specter
Cranston	Hawkins	Stafford
Danforth	Hecht	Stevens
DeConcini	McClure	Weicker
Dole	Metzenbaum	Zorinsky
Domenici	Mitchell

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is not present.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be requested to request the attendance of the absent Senators and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the Sergeant at Arms, under the rules, requested or is he to be instructed, because the motion was that he be requested to seek out the absentees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There does not appear to the Chair to be a difference between "requested" and "instructed."

Mr. METZENBAUM. The Chair is ruling there is no difference between him being "instructed" and "requested"?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, if it makes a difference to the Senator from Ohio, I will be pleased to amend my request and say that he be instructed to request the attendance of the absent Senators. I agree with the Chair that there is no difference in my meaning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alaska. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BAKER], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHAFEE], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN], the Senator from Alaska [Mr. MURKOWSKI], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PERCY], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON] are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART], the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. TSONGAS] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 85, nays 3, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 201 Leg.]

YEAS—85

Abdnor	Goldwater	Metzenbaum
Andrews	Gorton	Mitchell
Armstrong	Grassley	Moynihan
Baucus	Hatch	Nickles
Biden	Hatfield	Nunn
Bingaman	Hawkins	Packwood
Boschwitz	Hecht	Pell
Bradley	Heflin	Pressler
Bumpers	Heinz	Pryor
Burdick	Helms	Randolph
Byrd	Hollings	Riegle
Chiles	Huddleston	Roth
Cohen	Humphrey	Rudman
Cranston	Jepsen	Sarbanes
D'Amato	Johnston	Sasser
Danforth	Kassebaum	Specter
DeConcini	Kasten	Stafford
Denton	Kennedy	Stennis
Dodd	Lautenberg	Stevens
Dole	Laxalt	Symms
Domenici	Leahy	Thurmond
Durenberger	Levin	Tower
Eagleton	Long	Trible
East	Lugar	Wallop
Evans	Mathias	Warner
Exon	Matsunaga	Wilson
Ford	Mattingly	Zorinsky
Garn	McClure
Glenn	Melcher

NAYS—3

Proxmire	Quayle	Weicker

NOT VOTING—12

Baker	Cochran	Murkowski
Bentsen	Dixon	Percy
Boren	Hart	Simpson
Chafee	Inouye	Tsongas

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With the addition of Senators voting who did not answer to the quorum call, a quorum is now present.

Mr. STEVENS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak for 30 seconds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, if the outcome of this vote is that we will get cloture, of course, we will remain in session. If we do not get cloture, we have a bill cleared for consideration tonight that will take very little time. We do anticipate one vote on that bill.

VOTE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Is it the sense of the Senate that debate on the Baker motion to concur in the House amendment to S. 268, the Hoover Powerplant Act of 1984, shall be brought to a close?

The yeas and nays are automatic under the rule and the Clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BAKER], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHAFEE], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN], the Senator from Alaska [Mr. MURKOWSKI], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PERCY], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON] are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PERCY] would vote "nay."

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART], the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. TSONGAS] are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON], would vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. DENTON]. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 60, nays 28, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 202 Leg.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this vote the yeas are 60, the nays are 28. Three-fifths of the Senators duly chosen and sworn having voted in the affirmative, the motion is agreed to and amendment 3419 falls as nongermane.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold?

Mr. STEVENS. We are just trying to get the managers of the bill here.

Mr. BUMPERS. Did I hear the leader say a moment ago that we would have another vote?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I will have to confer with the managers of the bill to see what kind of votes there will be tonight. We had an agreement to take up another bill, on which there would be a vote, had we not obtained cloture. We will consult with the Senator from Ohio to see whether we will have votes tonight.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

Mr. STEVENS. I withhold that.

Mr. BYRD. I wanted to make the statement that if a quorum is present, we cannot have another quorum call until business is transacted.

HYDROELECTRIC POWER PLANTS

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill (S. 268).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to concur.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, what is the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to concur.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present. A quorum call is not in order.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

AMENDMENT NO. 3448

(Purpose: To set a policy for the sale of power at Hoover Dam)

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

Excuse me. Mr. President, I call up amendment 3448.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM] proposes an amendment numbered 3448:

Amend Section 105(h)(1) by striking "within one year" and inserting "within five years.".

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I think we ought to be aware of what has just transpired. I have heard Members of the Senate talk about orderly procedures, and I have heard them talk about changing the rules. As a matter of fact, I heard no less a person than the Chaplain of the Senate talk about the matter of orderliness and rules.

If there is anybody in this body who feels that this body gains stature by the switching back and forth of votes in the last half-hour and the delaying of calling out what the actual vote was, then I must confess that I fail to see it.

Frankly, what was the Senator from Ohio advocating? He was advocating that the Hoover Dam issue, which does not become a fact or reality until May 31, 1987, be extended briefly, for a year, and during that period all provisions of the bill except the pricing measure be effected. It would have taken care of the allocation problem. It would have taken care of all other problems that they had with respect to the upgrading. The only thing left for Congress to deliberate on would have been the price.

The price in connection with this power was set 50 years ago—50 years ago—and we have before us a power play to push through a bill to extend that for an additional 30 years.

Nowhere have I advocated or suggested that the power be market-related. I have said that Congress has an obligation to inquire into this subject. That was what was expected of us, based upon the action that took place 50 years ago. Now what we have is a power push, people switching around.

I cannot tell you how many Members of this body on that side of the aisle have come to me within the last several days and said, "You're right. We're with you. I'm glad you're raising the issue."

Today is a good example of profiles in courage who came to the floor and voted the opposite way.

Mr. President, the world will not come to an end, so far as the Senator from Ohio is concerned, but I will say this: This body has some reason to be embarrassed.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. METZENBAUM. May I yield to the Senator on his own time?

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Ohio be permitted to yield to me on my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, let me say, first, that I voted against cloture. I started to vote for cloture, but then I listened to the debate, and I decided to vote against cloture. I was hoping that cloture would not be invoked and we would all have a chance to hear a little more of the debate, because I suspect that some Senators are in the position that I admit I am in, and that is not yet knowing enough about this proposition to vote on it.

Let me first assure the Senators from the West, who are vitally concerned with this, that I do not think public power should be used only to enrich the Federal Treasury. We have hydrodams in my State, and I hope to have many more. The Hoover Dam was built to promote the development of that area, and it has done so.

However, the Senator from Ohio made what I thought was a fairly cogent case for his amendment. He has argued that we should first study this matter, because there is no urgency about extending the contract for 30 years. Apparently no hearings have been held on the justification for this contract under those terms, and that brings me to my question: What power authority markets the power?

Mr. METZENBAUM. It goes to several different power authorities as well as some privately owned public utilities. So the language of the legislation is unusual in that it makes the specific allocation under the bill, and I shall give the Senator a more specific answer.

Mr. BUMPERS. Could the Senator make this distinction for me without being all that definitive? As I understand it, the bill is an extension of the contract for the allocation of Hoover Dam power; is that correct?

Mr. METZENBAUM. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BUMPERS. Is the allocation under the bill essentially the same allocation that has existed for the past 50 years?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Approximately so. They have negotiated this matter between themselves and then they spelled out in this legislation that Southern California Edison Co. gets 277,500 kilowatts; the city of Los Angeles gets so many; and the Metropolitan Water Division gets so many.

They have added, I think, nine new districts. San Diego indicated they wish to be added, but they have not been added.

Mr. BUMPERS. What is the capacity? What is the output of Hoover Dam when it is running at full capacity?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I will give the Senator an answer to that later.

Mr. BUMPERS. Let me ask the Senator this question: Under the original sale of power to all of these authorities that have been operating under this last 50-year contract, what was the cost of power; in other words, what was the Government receiving for the power from Hoover Dam?

Mr. METZENBAUM. They were getting approximately a half-cent per kilowatthour, about four-tenth of 1 cent, to be exact, 4 mils.

Mr. BUMPERS. The Senator is telling me in the last 50 years, during the oil embargo and the 400 percent increase in power for the rest of the country, Hoover Dam power was still being sold for the same price it was sold 50 years ago?

Mr. METZENBAUM. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BUMPERS. Is the Senator saying that if this bill passes, power from Hoover Dam will continue for another 30 years to be sold at the same price?

Mr. METZENBAUM. It will not be sold at exactly the same price because under this bill the proponents have asked that there be 2½ mils allocated for salinity control and 4½ mils for some improvement in Arizona. So the price could go up in certain instances but not across the board. Generally speaking, for the power itself it would remain at the same price that was set in 1937.

Mr. BUMPERS. So it is going to be roughly 1½ cents for power.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Or less.

Mr. BUMPERS. Less than 1½ cents?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Yes. We are talking about 800 megawatts of power. I was not able to answer the Senator previously.

Mr. BUMPERS. This is getting a little technical. If the United States is going to build a 800-megawatt coal-fired plant today, what would the normal cost for power from such a plant, based on current capital costs?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I am not in a position to answer authoritatively, but I will give the Senator a guesstimate which I think is not totally out of line. I would guess it would not be less than 8 cents or 10 cents per kilowatthour.

Mr. BUMPERS. Eight to ten cents a kilowatthour?

Mr. METZENBAUM. As compared to four-tenths of a cent in this bill.

Mr. BUMPERS. Let me ask the Senator a further question, because to this extent I am sympathetic to the Western States on this point. I do not think the Government should enrich itself, but by the same token I do not think we should continue selling this power for a half-cent a kilowatt either. What is the Senator's attitude about what the policy of this country should be in situations similar to this? About 3 years ago several municipalities in my State were hurt when the Southwestern Power Administration raised its rates. There are five States involved in that particular power pool. Fifty-two percent of the power comes from my State, but we only get 27 percent of it back. That is another little sore point with me, and the Senator can tell by the way I said that.

But even so, the power is relatively cheap even after rates increased significantly, SPA insisted that it was necessary to amortize its total debt.

But my question to the Senator is, what does he think our policy should be? If it should not be a penny a kilowatt and it should not be 8 cents a kilowatt, which is what new generated power could cost, what should it be and what is the basis of the Senator's conclusion?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I am frank to admit and I said this publicly on the floor before, I am not certain what the rate should be. I am quite certain that it should not be the four-tenths of a cent per kilowatt that is presently being charged.

I have an amendment that I had at the desk that was taken down because it was not germane. At least that was the ruling of the Parliamentarian which I might say I totally disagree with, but the fact is that it was taken down and that was his ruling and I did not see fit to appeal it.

But the fact is that under that amendment all I was actually saying was let us hold this matter in status quo for a year beyond 1987, and I had indicated publicly and privately I was prepared to even go beyond that if that be necessary to let Congress take a look at this issue.

What I object to is the fact that Congress has never examined into this issue. The Senate had no hearings on it. The Senate never sent this part of the bill to the committee for a hearing.

Mr. BUMPERS. No hearings have ever been held on this.

Mr. METZENBAUM. No hearings have been held in the Senate on this issue on the question of how costs should be determined.

I have publicly indicated on the floor of the Senate and I have privately indicated to others who have indicated their concern that I am not standing on the floor ever and have not been on the floor advocating market-based costing, and something in between is probably the correct solution. But I think, like a lot of other instances, too often people just want to bang through a 30-year renewal, which is what is being done here.

Here we have a situation where it was claimed that the Consumer Federation of America was for this bill. They are not for market-based pricing and they have no position with respect to the amendment I had pending, and the fact is the National Taxpayers' Union, the Competitive Enterprise Institute, the New York Times, the San Francisco Chronicle, the Sacramento

Bee, the San Diego paper, and others have all indicated that this is an unfair procedure.

Yet we just saw Members' arms twisted on the floor of the Senate in order that they might get the necessary 60 votes to cut off debate.

I really believe that this body has a lot more important matters to be deliberating upon than this one and that this kind of power play does not reflect well upon our Government processes or any of us. When we are talking about balancing the budget, we are giving away something like $6.5 billion over the next 10 years.

Mr. BUMPERS. Is that $6.5 billion based on what the Government would get if we sold the power at market price?

Mr. METZENBAUM. At the marginal price, not the market price.

Mr. BUMPERS. The marginal price.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Yes.

Mr. BUMPERS. What is the marginal price?

Mr. METZENBAUM. It is the highest price which oil-fired facilities would be charging in Los Angeles.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BUMPERS. Who is being charged with the time used here?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio in the discussion after the Senator from Arkansas asked the question.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, let me make a point. I think it was clear to everyone in this Chamber I intended for this dialog to be charged against my time. I ask unanimous consent that that be the case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, the Senator from Arkansas requested the right to obtain the floor to ask a question and the Chair is correct that once that question is asked it was not chargeable.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, that is not correct. I asked unanimous consent that the time which I wanted to use to make an observation and ask a question be charged to me.

Mr. DECONCINI. The Senator is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ruling that that was the memory of the Chair and that was done. That took 4 minutes. The subsequent discussion was allocated timewise to the Senator from Ohio. The Senator from Arkansas then posed a unanimous-consent request, which I put to the floor, and the Senator from Alaska has reserved the right to object.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I understood the situation exactly the way the Senator from Arkansas described it. I think, in fairness, he ought to be permitted to allocate his time in that manner. I have no objection.

Mr. BUMPERS. I thank the Senator very much. It was certainly not my intention to delay. I was trying to edify the body and myself.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that that be the case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I wanted to ask the Senator from Ohio one other question. Does the 50-year contract in existence now extend until 1987?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Yes.

Mr. BUMPERS. And it was the Senator's amendment that would have carried it 1 year beyond that during which a study would be made?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Yes.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Idaho, because I know he is very knowledgeable in this matter, the same question I just asked the Senator from Ohio. As a matter of public policy, what does the Senator from Idaho feel the Government's posture ought to be concerning power generated from this dam, or any other power similarly generated? I know the Senator from Idaho has a great interest in the Bonneville Power Authority, and so on. I would like to know what he thinks the public policy ought to be in cases like this where a contract expired.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for asking the question because if we are talking about pricing, not the other issues that may be involved in the use of water or the allocation of power, the pricing of power or the issuance of licenses, just on the question of pricing, it seems to me we ought to be pricing the power on the basis of what it costs to produce it. Just as we do for every other utility in the United States, whether it is TVA or Commonwealth Edison, it is based upon what it costs to produce it.

I think, in that connection, we ought to look at what is being proposed under this bill. First of all, Hoover Dam power users will have repaid every cent that was allocated to the construction costs of the Hoover Dam that were allocated to power production, together with the interest under the applicable formula during the period of time since the construction of that dam.

Under this bill, they want to upgrade the facilities. The power users, the consumers of that power, will be asked to repay all of the upgrade, 100 percent of it. Under this bill, the Federal Government would not provide 1 penny of that upgrade expense. That would be done at the expense of those who are getting the block of power.

I could not help but respond, if the Senator will allow me to answer his question just a little further with respect to pricing, what is the pricing under this bill.

It is true that Hoover Dam, having been started in the early 1930's and completed in the mid to late 1930's, has a very low capital cost with today's inflated dollar.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, incidentally, what did that dam cost when they built it?

Mr. McCLURE. I am told by staff that the original authorization for the dam was $165 million.

Mr. BUMPERS. Does anybody have a figure as to what the replacement cost of that dam would be right now?

Mr. McLURE. I have no idea what the replacement cost would be, but I do know what the upgrade is because that is imbedded in this proposal. They intend to replace some of the generating capacity with more modern, up-to-date generators, and that will be a $77 million upgrade. And that will be financed entirely without Federal expense.

Mr. BUMPERS. Is that dam, incidentally, a base load dam?

Mr. McCLURE. It is in part base and in part peaking. It depends upon how it is operated and that will depend upon its integrated operation.

But when we look at pricing, when you look at salinity control, as the Senator from Ohio said, and salinity control and conservation, which are required under this bill and allocated to the—and, incidentally, salinity control is a substantial benefit to the taxpayers of the United States because under our treaty with Mexico that becomes a Federal obligation.

In this instance, the power users are going to shoulder that portion of that cost that otherwise would be spread across all taxpayers of the United States. Together with the cost of retiring the bond on the upgrade, it would triple the cost of power going from Hoover Dam to the consumers. That brings it up to about 1.5 cents, which is a bargain by any test.

But before you think that is all of the story, I think you ought to look also at the blended costs to consumers when you take into consideration not just the Hoover Dam power that they consume but the total amount of power that they consume through their systems from all sources.

Mr. BUMPERS. How do power rates compare. For example, I think Los Angeles probably gets the bulk of the power; does it not?

Mr. McCLURE. I think the Senator from California could probably give you better figures with respect to Los Angeles. But I can speak of the area of use in the Southwest, and that is where we are making comparison. The average cost paid by ratepayers throughout that region is about 5 to 6 cents per kilowatthour.

Mr. BUMPERS. How does that compare nationally?

Mr. McCLURE. I think it is pretty close to the average, but let me check that to make certain.

Mr. BUMPERS. I think that would really be a relevant figure for this body to know; that is, what the average blended cost of power is to those who are getting power from Hoover Dam now and how that compares with the national average.

Mr. McCLURE. Well, my recollection is that this is pretty close to the average. I am informed by staff that southern Nevada is about 6 cents, which is close to the average, and Los Angeles, if I am informed correctly, is about 8 cents, which is, aside from New York City, the highest in the Nation.

Mr. BUMPERS. I must say that that is a very interesting figure. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McCLURE. I thank the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I would like to ask the distinguished floor manager of the bill about our philosophy here that the Senator from Arkansas has talked about. It seems to me if we hold this same kind of philosophy on waterways and roads and everything else, it would be that any time we do a Federal project, then we would do nothing except just try and continue with operating expenses. I am thinking of the new locks and dams, for instance; that once they are put in, we would not try and put a user fee on other than just the cost of keeping that lock operating. We do not do that. We try to do more than that.

If we do the same thing across the board, then we are just running ourselves further into the hole. I very much favor projects of locks and dams, hydropower projects, whatever, but it would seem to me to be a logical public policy that once those things are up and once they are in use and we start a user's fee or start a cost per kilowatthour that pays back that expense, then, at that point it seems to me it should be available to do other projects like that rather than just favoring one part of the country at the expense of the rest of us into the indefinite future.

It seems to me if we are going to have the Government doing this, it should apply not only to places like the Hoover Dam, but it should apply to our roads—we should not only charge just enough then in gas tax fees, for instance, just for road maintenance and not try to amortize the original cost of that road; same thing should apply to waterways.

If we do that, then it seems to me we are helping different parts of the country develop and doing it on a payback basis once it is in, and not doing things like we are with Hoover, where one of the California papers noted the other day that we even give cheap power to cover the cheap pumping of water over a watershed which denies northern California water and helps further develop an already overdeveloped Los Angeles Basin. That is a very foolish use of power. It seems to me that where we do that we encourage the development of one part of the State against the other.

So I think we should have a public policy that applies basically the same thing to interstate systems, water of the country, to harbors, dams, waterway improvement, things like that. And if it is to be used on a recovery of operating expense basis, which is what we are talking about with Hoover Dam, then that is a whole new concept. If we are following that for all the waterways and everything else, then it is going to be a whole different way in which we operate the Federal Government and how much we are recompensed for our expense.

Mr. CRANSTON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLENN. I yield the floor.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I would like to briefly state, regarding the cost of Hoover power, that the cost of Hoover power is going to rise when we adopt this measure, if we do. It will rise to approximately 1.5 cents per kilowatthour under the new contracts. That is an increase in cost of 300 percent—a 300-percent increase in the present cost.

That is the cost of power to Hoover Dam that does not include the cost of the transmission facilities to deliver the power to the areas of use, although there will be that additional increase. When Hoover power is combined with other resources in the Southwest, the average cost paid by the ratepayers in the Southwest, to answer Senator BUMPERS' question, is about 5 to 6 cents per kilowatt hour, and that is not an unreasonable rate.

I would like to deal with one other question that has arisen about the reason for acting now.

The Hoover Dam power allottees need long-term contracts to assure economic viability of their investment in uprating Hoover Dam. The uprating will cost $77 million. The allottees won't pay 100 percent of the construction costs up front. They are not going to invest their money if they have a contract for only 1 year or 5 years.

The Department of Energy—to get into the timing of this—started the marketing process for Hoover power in 1979. This was done even though the contracts did not expire until 1987. It was the Department's intent to complete the marketing process by 1982, or 5 years prior to the termination date of the contracts. This was a sound business decision by the Department of Energy which recognizes the long leadtime required to either develop alternative resources or to purchase power from other entities. In fact, there are essentially no resources that can be built in 5 years; 10 to 15 years is the general timeframe. We are now at a point where delays in passage of S. 268 mean delays in modernizing the generating units at Hoover to provide needed additional capacity. The units simply cannot and will not be financed until people know that they are going to get the power at reasonable rates for a reasonable period of time.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CRANSTON. I yield the floor.

Mr. GLENN. We talk about reasonable rates. Having them rise at a maximum up to 300 percent of what they are now and still be only 1½ cents per kilowatthour is hardly reasonable rates for the rest of the country where I think the average is something like 7½ cents per kilowatthour. I think once we get our money back out of the projects like that, or get repaid, then it would seem to me to make a lot of sense to ramp up to what regular market rates are over a period of say 5, 6, or even 10 years. But to just continue to subsidize that at a reduced rate and in effect attract industry from the Midwest, and attract industry from other parts of the country because of exceptionally low electrical rates just does not make any sense. We are giving an unfair advantage to that part of the country as opposed to the rest of us who have to pay higher rates. I do not think that is fair.

I yield the floor.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington was the first Senator seeking recognition. The Senator from Washington is recognized.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. President, I am sorry our colleague has left the Chamber. I think it is important to reiterate what has been stated here before but apparently not fully understood; that it is true and it makes sense that projects of this sort ought to be fully repaid by the user. The Federal Government makes an investment. The user should repay the capital costs, the maintenance and operation, and the improvements. That is precisely what is being done in this case. It has been done throughout the history of this Nation as we have built the infrastructure of this Nation. The Federal Government is not in business to make a profit. We would do well if we could only break even. But, nonetheless, in each of these investments we have done it at the lowest possible price in order to give to the people of this country, and the individual States and communities of the Nation an opportunity to better themselves.

Certainly those from the Far West who are a long way from the major markets of the Nation have had to deal with the problem of not being close to the markets. That has been a penalty. Certainly there has been no objection raised to my knowledge—or no serious objection—to the benefits accrued from the investment the taxpayers made in the St. Lawrence Seaway, and the opening up to the many States of the Middle West and the North Middle West of that great construction project. But that history is a lot closer to the subsidy which people talk about than the Hoover Dam, or any of the other dams the Federal Government has constructed.

That St. Lawrence Seaway obligation to its construction has been reduced from that of principal and interest and operating costs first to relieve the project of its principal cost, and then its interest cost until now the users or ratepayers are paying only the operation and maintenance costs.

I do not know of an interstate highway that has been built in this Nation which has been built with the concept that once we make the investment, and the bonds sold to pay off that highway have been paid off, somehow we then ought to open key sections of the interstate system, or particularly bridges on that interstate system, to public bid so that someone could bid, reinstitute tolls, pay some amount to the Federal Government purportedly to reduce the deficit, and charge what would be "market prices" for the value of that particular piece of infrastructure for this Nation.

It is obvious that as we have built the infrastructure for the Nation we have done so with the knowledge that some pieces of it will benefit one part of the country where the geography, and the natural resources will allow that to happen. Other benefits have accrued to other parts of the country—some blessed with abundant deposits of natural gas and oil; others blessed with the enormous deposits of coal; some with forests; and some with rivers which can be dammed and tamed.

The important thing to keep in mind is that we have never to my knowledge in the history of this Nation built the infrastructure with the concept that it ought to be sold to the highest bidder and that somehow we ought to make a profit. Certainly in the case of electrical power where the consumers are forced to accept high electrical power from one provider, there is a monopoly throughout the Nation in the production and distribution of electric power. As far as each individual consumer is concerned, they have no choice to the degree they need electricity. The use of electricity which they have become accustomed to has depended to a degree on price. Of course, if electricity is cheap, you build in a way that uses more of it and less of other product. Other parts of the Nation have the benefit and the privilege of using other kinds of commodities to provide the same service, which happen to be cheaper—in some cases natural gas, and in other cases oil which substitute for electricity which may be at higher price.

What I am trying to get at is the concept that somehow one part of the Nation is getting something for nothing is simply untrue. They are paying all of the cost, all of the maintenance and operating costs, and all of the improvements which are now to be made in this case.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Would the Senator from Washington yield for a question?

Mr. EVANS. I would be pleased to yield.

Mr. METZENBAUM. The Senator claims that they are paying all of the costs. Would the Senator feel that there would be any rate problem if the Congress did that which it was expected to do, and looked at this entire issue rather than jam through a bill to extend the period for 30 years without any congressional review or any determination made on the part of the Congress? Do you not think there would be some advantage to our taking a look at it as the Members of Congress determined that we should do 50 years ago?

Mr. EVANS. I do not believe it is necessary, unless we are prepared through this vote on this bill at this time, to assume that we are going to change a policy which has been held in this country, in my view, for virtually all of its 200-year history. That is to build this infrastructure for what it costs and to regain those costs, but not to make a profit beyond that. I do not see any reason to review that policy at this time. I think it has been a good policy, it is a good policy, and will continue to be a good policy. If someone thinks it is not, then it is time to introduce a much broader bill which applies on a much broader basis, not just to electric power and not just to this dam but to the entire infrastructure which has been built by the Federal Government.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Would the Senator explain where that policy has been set? The period of time has run out with respect to the original term. It is my understanding that this is the first piece of legislation that deals with that. Can the Senator tell me of any policy having been set in connection with the time we are asking about?

Mr. EVANS. I believe that the policy has been evolved and continuously reiterated every time we authorize the construction of a new project of this nature in the country. There has been a consistent number of them, each one done on the same basis year after year. I do not know when the most recent one was, but I will bet it was not very long ago. Each time we do that, we reiterate the same policy.

Mr. STEVENS addressed the Chair.

Mr. EVANS. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to table the Senator's amendment. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. METZENBAUM. There is? Is that what the Chair ruled?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is what the Chair said.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

[Quorum No. 9 Leg.]

Biden	Evans	McClure
Bumpers	Hecht	Metzenbaum
Byrd	Hollings	Pell
Chiles	Kennedy	Randolph
Cranston	Long	Stafford
Danforth	Mathias	Stevens
Denton	Matsunaga	Wilson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is not present.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, a point of order.

The Senator from Ohio was first on his feet asking for recognition. The Chair has no authority to recognize anyone except the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No Senator may have recognition during a quorum call. The Senator from Alaska has been recognized.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be instructed to request the attendance of absent Senators and ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alaska. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A point of order is not in order during a rollcall.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BAKER], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. COCHRAN], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DURENBERGER], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. KASSEBAUM], the Senator from Alaska [Mr. MURKOWSKI], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PERCY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. SIMPSON], and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WEICKER] are necessarily absent.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Texas [Mr. BENTSEN], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. BOREN], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HART], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. HUDDLESTON], the Senator from Hawaii [Mr. INOUYE], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SARBANES], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SASSER], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. TSONGAS] are necessarily absent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. GORTON]. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 76, nays 3, as follows:

[Rollcall Vote No. 203 Leg.]

YEAS—76

Abdnor	Garn	McClure

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The acting majority leader.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 11 a.m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATORS WARNER AND PROXMIRE TOMORROW

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, following the time for the two leaders under the standing order, there be special orders in favor of Senator WARNER and Senator PROXMIRE, not to exceed 15 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR H.R. 5890 TO BE HELD AT THE DESK

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that H.R. 5890, which is being held at the desk, be held at the desk until the close of business on Tuesday, July 31.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MOTION TO RECESS UNTIL 11 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I move to recess until 11 a.m. tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, it is our intention to try to get a vote on the pending motion to table. The yeas and nays have been ordered. I hope we will not have to go through a series of votes. The Senator from Ohio knows that we can get to that vote tonight. There are only four motions such as this he can make. I guess the first one is not dilatory. Certainly, the next one would be.

Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is that a dilatory motion at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not dilatory.

The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

ORDERS FOR TOMORROW

ORDER DESIGNATING PERIOD FOR ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska is recognized.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the time for the two special orders tomorrow, there be a period for routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 12 noon with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER DESIGNATING RECESS ON TOMORROW FROM 12 NOON TO 2 P.M.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the hour of 12 noon the Senate stand in recess for 2 hours until the hour of 2 p.m. for the purpose of party caucuses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session, the Acting President pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

MEASURE HELD AT THE DESK

The following bill was ordered held at the desk until the close of business on July 31, 1984, by unanimous consent:

H.R. 5890. An act to establish a commission to assist in the first observance of the Federal legal holiday honoring Martin Luther King, Jr.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. SASSER (for himself and Mr. BRADLEY):

S. 2880. A bill to extend the existing suspension of duty on natural graphite until January 1, 1985; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. ANDREWS:

S. 2881. A bill to allow duty-free entry of certain equipment for North Dakota State University, Fargo, ND; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. HELMS:

S. 2882. A bill to extend duty-free treatment to Meta-toluic acid [MTA]; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. DANFORTH:

S. 2883. A bill to amend the Tariff Schedules of the United States to provide an appropriate classification of recently developed dairy products; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. GRASSLEY:

S. 2884. A bill to amend the United States Code to clarify the intent of Congress in adopting title IX of the Education Act Amendments of 1972; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. HELMS:

S. 2882. A bill to extend duty-free treatment to metatoluic acid [MTA]; to the Committee on Finance.

DUTY-FREE TREATMENT OF META-TOLUIC ACID

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation that is simple, and I believe, noncontroversial. It would extend duty-free treatment to metatoluic acid [MTA].

I offer this amendment at the behest of Mr. Gary F. Taft, president of Morflex Chemical Co. in Greensboro, NC. I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Taft's letter to me explaining why this amendment is necessary be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MORFLEX CHEMICAL CO., INC.,
Greensboro, NC, February 6, 1984.

Hon. JESSE HELMS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR HELMS: I have had the opportunity of meeting you several times over the past few years in Washington due to my participation in the Greensboro Chamber of Commerce. An important event occurred for the employees at Pfizer's Greensboro Plant in December of this past year. Pfizer sold this business to the employees and as of December 1, 1983, Morflex Chemical Company has been in existence. The business was purchased from Pfizer under an Employee Stock Ownership Plan (ESOP). All the employees, eighty-eight in number, will participate in the ownership of the business.

Our product line consists of the manufacture and sale from Greensboro of specialty organic chemicals. We make organic intermediates for the textile, adhesive, food, film, cosmetic, and insect repellant industries.

As you may be aware, Catherine Bennett of Pfizer's Washington Office recently met with Scott Wilson of your staff to discuss a tariff problem on our behalf. This discussion focused upon our interest in the introduction of legislation regarding the U.S. import tariff on meta-toluic acid, an important raw material to our production at Morflex. Mr. Wilson suggested that we provide you directly with the following background information which explains why we believe a suspension of the current duty on meta-toluic acid is justified.

1. Meta-toluic acid is reacted with diethylamine to form N'N-diethyl m-toluamide [DEET] which is widely known as an insect repellant.

2. The only country we have imported from in the past five years is Japan. The substance is also produced in Germany. We have not been made aware of any imports into the U.S. However, we are aware of DEET being shipped to the U.S. at a lower tariff than that of meta-toluic.

3. The import tariff on meta-toluic acid is 1.7 cents per pound plus 17.9% ad valorem. The import tariff on the finished product, DEET, is 1.5 cents per pound plus 12.5% ad valorem. The resulting price differential in the finished product has led some U.S. firms to purchase DEET from Germany rather than from the domestic producers. Apparently, Morflex and Virginia Chemicals (Norfolk, Virginia) are the only U.S. producers of DEET, and we both import the raw material, meta-toluic acid.

4. Volume over the past five years (in pounds):

1983 (estimated)	1,300,000
1982	1,031,765
1981	912,719
1980	753,822
1979	595,255
1978	357,151

5. Meta-toluic is currently produced in the U.S. by Argus (Division of Witco) located in Brooklyn, N.Y. Their quality is not acceptable for use in Greensboro. Previously, product was produced by Cowles Chemical in Skaneateles Falls, N.Y. The plant was closed in 1972 due to EPA restrictions. Stauffer later purchased the plant. Mobil produced meta-toluic in their Beaumont, Texas plant until 1974. They ceased production due to a lack of process technology and availability of raw materials. Velsicol purchased this plant in 1977.

Legislation providing the relief we seek was introduced in the U.S. House of Representatives last fall by Representative Robin Britt, who represents Greensboro. This bill is enclosed for your information. It is our sincere hope that you conclude that a duty suspension on meta-toluic acid is justifiable and agree to introduce companion legislation in the U.S. Senate as soon as practicable.

Sincerely,

GARY F. TAFT,
President.

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, in the interest of time, I will not go into a detailed explanation of this matter, but let me emphasize one or two points.

First of all, Morflex is an interesting and unique company. The previous owner of the company, Pfizer, sold it to its employees under an employee stock ownership plan. So the employees of the company own it.

The company makes specialty organic chemicals, and meta-toluic acid is an essential ingredient. Only one U.S. plant still manufactures MTA, and according to Mr. Taft the quality of its product is not acceptable for Morflex's use. MTA is combined with diethylamine to form N'N-diethyl m-toluamide [DEET], and insect repellant.

The import tariff on MTA is 1.7 cents per pound plus 17.9 percent ad valorem. The import tariff on DEET is 1.5 cents per pound plus 12.5 percent ad valorem. As a result of the price differential, some companies are purchasing DEET from German manufacturers rather than from domestic manufacturers such as Morflex.

This bill would simply eliminate the duty on MTA, restoring a fair and proper balance between the price of the ingredient and the price of the finished product.●

By Mr. DANFORTH:

S. 2883. A bill to amend the Tariff Schedules of the United States to provide an appropriate classification of recently developed dairy products; to the Committee on Finance.

TARIFF CLASSIFICATION OF NEW DAIRY PRODUCTS

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, all of us are aware of the crisis that we have reached in this country caused by enormous surpluses of dairy products. Through the dairy price support system, the Government is endeavoring to balance an adequate supply of dairy products at a reasonable price for consumers and the need to ensure an adequate income for farmers. What is becoming clear, however, is that Government interference with natural market forces will not provide an ultimate solution to this serious problem. Instead, it will be up to the private sector to discover means of utilizing greater quantities of dairy products in order to bring back into reasonable alinement supply and demand.

Certain segments of the dairy industry already are responding to this challenge. Several American companies have developed the technology to manufacture nutritious, high protein foods that can be incorporated into an expanding range of finished food products. These new dairy products have been recognized as safe by the Food and Drug Administration and future markets appear very promising.

The three food products that I am referring to are whey protein concentrate, lactalbumin and milk protein concentrates. Whey protein concentrate and lactalbumin are both high protein derivatives of whey, itself a by-product of cheesemaking. This same whey was, up until recently, considered to be an environment-threatening waste product. Mild protein concentrates or total milk proteinate is a high protein skim milk derivative.

While the technology to manufacture these products is available, adequate production facilities are not. Several companies have reached a crossroads, where, in order to channel their expansion into future markets, they must make a substantial capital commitment to build new plants and facilities better able to utilize new technology. Yet, they are reluctant to make this commitment, due to a cloud on the horizon that could severely undermine the future of the markets of these products.

That cloud is in the form of outmoded tariff classifications that were enacted by Congress before these products even existed. The U.S. Customs Service, when faced with the predicament of classifying these products under existing classifications, has placed them in "basket" classifications that have little or no relationship to what the products really are. The industry petitioned the Customs Service to administratively reclassify these products into existing dairy classifications, but Customs concluded that these existing classifications did not anticipate such high technology food products. The only remaining avenue toward reclassification is legislation.

New classifications for these products make sense for a number of reasons. First, because the technology and the products themselves are new, U.S. imports at this point are very low. Now is the time to act to prevent the development of a casein-like situation where a serious classification problem exists but so do substantial domestic markets for cheaper imports.

Second, if domestic companies are going to make an important financial commitment to production, they are entitled to product classifications that logically reflect what the products are. Whey protein concentrate and lactalbumin are modified wheys and should be classified as such. Milk protein concentrates or total milk proteinate is a skim milk product that, again, should be classified as a dairy product. All three clearly are dairy products that should be imported under rules for dairy products set up by Congress, although tariffs will not be altered by the reclassification. Failure to appropriately reclassify gives foreign manufacturers an unfair advantage that could halt the progress of this developing domestic industry.

Today, I am introducing three bills that will, if enacted, appropriately set dairy classifications for these three products—products that represent but one more example of private sector ingenuity finding solutions to vexing public problems. I urge your favorable consideration.●

By Mr. GRASSLEY:

S. 2884. A bill to amend the United States Code to clarify the intent of Congress in adopting title IX of the Education Act Amendments of 1972; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

SEX DISCRIMINATION PROHIBITION ACT

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, most of us are aware that last February the Supreme Court issued a decision construing the enforcement language in title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972. And very frankly, Mr. President, most of us in Congress disagree with the Court's narrow view that the antidiscrimination provision in title IX is program specific rather than institutionwide. But there are some of us, myself included, who have not jumped aboard the S. 2568 bandwagon. Why? Because Mr. President, I do not believe that there is 1 cosponsor in 63 that fully understands the impact of this legislation.

Statements by sponsors of this legislation speak in terms of overturning the Grove City versus Bell case. The bill that I am introducing today does just that. The difference between this bill and S. 2568 is that there are no ambiguities as to who will or will not be covered. There is no question as to whether American farmers have to abide by the Rehabilitation and Age Discrimination Acts if they receive Federal crop subsidies under the terms of the bill I have in hand. There is no question as to whether the elderly will be adversely affected by a definition of the Age Discrimination Act that is so broad that it would penalize the private sector for providing special benefits to the elderly. There are countless questions that have been raised by the provisions of S. 2568. Yet, offering amendments to the bill, processing the bill through normal legislative channels, has been equated with heresy by many outside groups who equate amending the bill with killing the bill.

At the risk of lecturing, I might add, Mr. President, that the 10th amendment states: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." I suggest that the enactment of S. 2568 will expand Federal power into many areas including those reserved to the States. We are all aware that in creating their new constitutional government, the framers sought protection from excessive government by separating governmental power not only between the three branches of the Federal Government, but between the Federal Government and the States. The bill that I am introducing today balances the interests of State sovereignty with the vital interest of continuing to ensure that no discrimination exist in the American educational system.

I suggest that the aim of ridding our society of discrimination is best accomplished through narrowly drawn legislation. For by expanding the reach of title VI, title IX, section 504, and the Age Discrimination Act, we are largely eliminating the remaining distinctions between Federal and State and Federal and private, concerns.

It is my hope that others in the Senate who are interested in overturning the program-specific interpretation of the Court without injecting the Federal regulator into every province of the State will support this bill.●

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

S. 337

At the request of Mr. PACKWOOD, the name of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. PRYOR] was added as a cosponsor of S. 337, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to make permanent the deduction for charitable contributions by nonitemizers.

S. 1531

At the request of Mr. RIEGLE, the name of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. EAGLETON] was added as a cosponsor of S. 1531, a bill to encourage the use of public school facilities before and after school hours for the care of school-age children and for other purposes.

The Commission shall report its findings and recommendations by January 1, 1986.

AMENDMENT No. 3526

At the end of the amendment, add the following:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, including this Act, the Secretary of Energy shall provide for surplus revenues by including the equivalent of 10 mills per kilowatthour in the rates charged to purchasers of power generated at Hoover Dam. Such surplus revenues shall be transferred to the Secretary of the Interior and used for the purposes of Federal dam safety modifications in Arizona, California, and Nevada. Such dam safety modificatons shall be for the purposes of dam safety and not for the specific purposes of providing additional conservation storage capacity or of developing benefits over and above those provided by the original dams and reservoirs."

AMENDMENT No. 3527

At the end of the amendment, add the following:

"The provisions of this Act shall be effective upon the date of enactment; Provided, however, that no provision of this Act or any other law regarding the pricing of power generated at Hoover Dam shall be effective after July 1, 1993."

AMENDMENT No. 3528

At the end of the amendment, add the following:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of this act or any other law, the Secretary of Energy shall sell power generated at Hoover Dam after May 31, 1987 at not less than the average cost of electric power sold in the United States. Surplus revenues that result from this provision shall be returned to the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

AMENDMENT No. 3529

At the end of the amendment, add the following:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of this act or any other law, the Secretary of Energy shall sell power generated at Hoover Dam after May 31, 1987 at not less than 50 percent of the average cost of electric power sold in the United States. Surplus revenues that result from this provision shall be returned to the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

AMENDMENT No. 3530

At the end of the amendment, add the following:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of this act or any other law, the Secretary of Energy shall sell power generated at Hoover Dam after May 31, 1987 at not less than 75 percent of the average cost of electric power sold in the United States. Surplus revenues that result from this provision shall be returned to the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

AMENDMENT No. 3531

At the end of the amendment, add the following:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of this act or any other law, the Secretary of Energy shall sell power generated at Hoover Dam after May 31, 1987 at not less than 75 percent of the average cost of hydroelectric power sold in the United States. Surplus revenues that result from this provision shall be returned to the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

AMENDMENT No. 3532

At the end of the amendment, add the following:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of this act or any other law, the Secretary of Energy shall sell power generated at Hoover Dam after May 31, 1987 at not less than the average cost of power marketed by the Department of Energy through the Western Area Power Administration."

AMENDMENT No. 3533

At the end of the amendment, add the following:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, no contract authorized by this Act or any other law shall prescribe terms and conditions for the sale of power generated at Hoover Dam beyond the period ending December 31, 1999."

AMENDMENT No. 3534

At the end of the amendment, add the following:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act or any other law, the Secretary of Energy shall sell power generated at Hoover Dam after May 31, 1987; at not less than 50 percent of the average cost of hydroelectric power sold in the United States. Surplus revenues that result from this provision shall be returned to the Treasury as miscellaneous receipt."

AMENDMENT No. 3535

At the end of the amendment, add the following:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, including this Act, the Secretary of Energy shall provide for surplus revenues by including the equivalent of 10 mills per kilowatthour in the rates charged to purchasers of power generated at Hoover Dam. Such surplus revenues shall be returned to the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

AMENDMENT No. 3536

At the end of the amendment, add the following:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of this act, no contract authorized by this act, or any other law shall prescribe terms and conditions for the sale of power generated at Hoover Dam beyond the period ending December 31, 1995."

AMENDMENT No. 3537

At the end of the amendment, add the following:

"The provisions of this Act shall be effective upon the date of enactment; Provided, however, that no provision of this Act or any other law regarding the pricing of power generated at Hoover Dam shall be effective after July 1, 1997."

AMENDMENT No. 3538

At the end of the amendment, add the following: "Notwithstanding any other provision of this act, no contract authorized by this act or any other law shall prescribe terms and conditions for the sale of power generated at Hoover Dam beyond the period ending December 31, 1997."

AMENDMENT No. 3539

At the end of the amendment, add the following: "The provisions of this Act shall be effective upon the date of enactment; Provided, however, that no provision of this Act or any other law regarding the pricing of power generated at Hoover Dam shall be effective after July 1, 1995."

AMENDMENT No. 3540

At the end of the amendment, add the following: "The provisions of this Act shall be effective upon the date of enactment; Provided, however, that no provision of this Act or any other law regarding the pricing of power generated at Hoover Dam shall be effective after July 1, 1991."

AMENDMENT No. 3541

At the end of the amendment, add the following: "Notwithstanding any other provision of this act, no contract authorized by this act or any other law shall prescribe terms and conditions for the sale of power generated at Hoover Dam beyond the period ending December 31, 1993."

AMENDMENT No. 3542

At the end of the amendment, add the following: "Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Energy shall require the Western Area Power Marketing Administration to repay the Federal investment in its power and transmission projects to the Treasury by annual payments sufficient to amortize the debt, including principal and interest, on each project on a straight line basis within the service life of such project or 50 years, whichever period of time is shorter. The Secretary may waive the requirements of the preceding sentence only under exceptional economic conditions. If the Secretary does waive such requirements, any missed annual payment shall be repaid in the next succeeding year with interest equal to the average interest rate payable by the Treasury upon its total marketable public obligations as of September 30 of the fiscal year the payment was originally due."

METZENBAUM AMENDMENTS NOS. 3543 THROUGH 3581

CONVEYING CERTAIN LAND TO THE ZUNI INDIAN TRIBE

GOLDWATER AMENDMENT NO. 3582

(Ordered to lie on the table.)

Mr. GOLDWATER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2201) to convey certain lands to the Zuni Indian Tribe for religious purposes; as follows:

At the end of the bill, insert the following new section:

"SEC. 9. Notwithstanding 25 USC 640d-18(c)(1), the Secretary of the Interior is directed to discontinue any fencing activity at the area commonly referred to as Big Mountain within the former Joint Use Area for two years after the date of enactment of this Act."

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the bill S. 2201, a bill to convey certain lands to the Zuni Indian Tribe for religious purposes, and I ask for the amendment's consideration at the proper time.

Mr. President, under existing law, the Secretary of the Interior is directed to fence off the Navajo partitioned lands and the Hopi partitioned lands, of the former joint use area. Presently, plans are underway to fence off the area known as Big Mountain. This area is also the focal point in pending land exchange negotiations between the Navajo and Hopi Tribes. A very volatile situation exists at Big Mountain; by fencing it, there is a real potential for violence, and this is something I am sure none of the concerned parties want to see happen. Events are escalating to the point where things could go completely out of control and action must be taken immediately to defuse this critical situation. I will tell my colleagues that I view this as a temporary, but much needed, measure since I plan to introduce legislation next year that will provide a permanent and equitable land exchange involving Big Mountain if the Navajo and Hopi Tribes cannot resolve their differences this year. This amendment, however, is needed at this time and I urge my colleagues to support me in this.

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

SUBCOMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS AND RESERVED WATER

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the Senate and the public the scheduling of a public hearing before the Subcommittee or Public Lands and Reserved Water to consider the following bills:

S. 2657, to withdraw and reserve for the Department of the Air Force certain public lands within the Nellis Air Force Range, within Clark, Nye and Lincoln counties, Nevada, for use as a training and weapons testing area, and for other purposes;

S. 2658, to withdraw and reserve for the Department of the Army certain public lands within the McGregor Range, Otero County, New Mexico, for use as a training and weapons testing area, and for other purposes;

S. 2659, to withdraw and reserve for the Department of the Air Force certain public lands within the Luke Air Force Range, Maricopa, Pima and Yuma Counties, Arizona, for use as a training and weapons testing area, and for other purposes;

S. 2660, to withdraw and reserve for the Department of the Army certain public lands within the Fort Greely Maneuver Area, in the Big Delta Area, Alaska, and certain public lands within the Fort Greeley Air Drop Zone, in the Granite Creek area, Alaska, for use as a training and equipment development area, and for other purposes;

S. 2661, to withdraw and reserve for the Department of the Army certain public lands within the Fort Wainwright Maneuver area, Fourth Judicial District, Alaska, and for other purposes; and

S. 2662, to withdraw and reserve for the Department of the Navy certain public lands for the Bravo 20 Bombing Range, Churchill County, Nevada, for use as a training and weapons area, and for other purposes.

The hearing will be held on Wednesday, August 8, beginning at 2 p.m. in room SD-366 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building. Those wishing to testify or who wish to submit written statements for the hearing record should write to the Subcommittee on Public Lands and Reserved Water, Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC 20510. Witnesses will be arranged in panels and oral testimony will be limited to 5 minutes. Witnesses are requested to submit 25 copies of their written statement to the Subcommittee 24 hours in advance of the hearing, as required by the rules of the committee, and 75 copies on the day of the hearing.

For further information regarding this hearing you may wish to contact Mr. Tony Bevinetto of the subcommittee staff at 224-5161.

COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs will hold a hearing on Senate Joint Resolution 319, to amend the Agriculture and Food Act of 1981 to provide for the establishment of a commission to study and make recommendations concerning agriculture-related trade and export policies, programs, and practices of the United States on Friday, August 3, at 9:30 a.m. in SD-342 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building. For further information, please contact Mr. Howard Marks at 224-9515.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I would like to announce for the information of the public that the Select Committee on Indian Affairs will hold a hearing on August 6, 1984, beginning at 10 a.m., in Senate Russell 428-A on the following bills: S. 2862, a bill to declare that the United States holds certain lands in trust for the Cocopah Indian Tribe; S. 2823, a bill to provide for the use and distribution of funds appropriated in satisfaction of judgments awarded to the Saginaw Chippewa Tribe of Michigan in dockets numbered 59 and 13E before the Indian Claims Commission and docket numbered 13F before the U.S. Claims Court; and S. 2824, a bill to provide for the use and distribution of funds awarded the Wyandotte Tribe, and for other purposes.

Those wishing additional information should contact Paul Alexander or Peter Taylor of the committee at 224-2251.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

TRACY CAULKINS: IN SEARCH OF GOLD

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, after much fanfare and political controversy, the 1984 summer Olympics are finally underway. For the next couple of weeks, the eyes of the world will turn to those men and women who have worked and struggled and trained to carve their niche in Olympic history.

We will watch their accomplishments in awe, herald their triumphs, and anguish in their near victories. But in the end we will all applaud their courage and sense of accomplishment, knowing that they are part of something which, to the great majority of us, will remain only a dream.

To some, participation is a victory in itself, but to others nothing short of a gold medal will suffice. One such individual to which the latter applies is Tracy Caulkins from Nashville, TN.

Yesterday, the years of hard work and dedication finally paid off. Tracy Caulkins won a gold medal in the 400-meter individual medley swimming event, and she did so convincingly by beating her closest opponent by more than 9 seconds, a truly astounding feat.

Winning is not new to Tracy Caulkins. At age 21, her list of achievements boggles the imagination. She set her first American record in 1976. In 1977, she won her first national titles at the U.S. championships in Canton, OH. In 1978, she led the U.S. national team at the world championships, winning five gold medals and setting three world records in the process.

In 1979, at age 16, she became the youngest winner of the Sullivan Award, which is awarded to the best amateur athlete in the Nation. After winning gold medals at the pan-American games later that year, Caulkins set a new world record in the 200-meter individual medley.

With last night's victory, Tracy Caulkins has won 48 national titles and set 62 U.S. and world records. Even more exciting, however, is the potential for three more gold medals in these Olympic games.

Mr. President, we are all proud of our Olympic athletes and I am especially proud of Nashville's Tracy Caulkins. She exemplifies the spirit and competitiveness of the Olympic games. She has worked hard and spent incalculable hours in preparation for the opportunity to showcase not only her individual talents, but the U.S. Olympic team's talents before the rest of the world.

We are proud of you Tracy, and we wish you the best of luck in your quest for future accomplishments.●

HEALTH CARE FOR THE POOR

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article, "Care of the Poor Revisited," by David Kinzer, president of the Massachusetts Hospital Association, be printed in the RECORD. This piece appeared in the spring 1984 issue of Inquiry (v. 21, pp. 5-16) a publication of the Blue Cross/Blue Shield Association.

Mr. Kinzer's article reminds us of the need to ensure access to health care for the poor and medically indigent of our Nation. As we get caught up in debates about cost containment and promoting competition, we must be mindful of the need to preserve the gains in access to the health care system for the elderly, poor and others, achieved over the last two decades. We must also be aware that many still fall through the gaps in service and coverage. A report recently released by the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation indicated that in 1982, 21 million adults and 7 million children were unable to obtain needed health care. President Reagan's cutbacks in Federal programs for the poor and underserved have made these problems worse.

Kinzer's article warns that our "system" of indigent or free care is being overloaded and is in danger of breaking down.

It is essential that solutions be designed with the issue of access to the health care system in mind. My bill, S. 2424, the Medicare Solvency and Health Financing Reform Act of 1984, does address both problems of cost and access. It acknowledges that hospitals, like physicians and patients, are burdened by the current organization of health care delivery. Rather than focusing the blame on any group of providers, propose changing elements of the system so that all can prosper.

I urge my colleagues to examine Mr. Kinzer's thoughtful article.

The article follows:

HEALTH CARE OF THE INDIGENT: IT'S EVERYONE'S RESPONSIBILITY

The leading article in this issue of Inquiry is David Kinzer's assessment of the growing problem of support for health care of the poor and the medically indigent. This is a timely reminder that this burden, which in past years has been a shared obligation of public authority and private initiative, has been put aside as something to be dealt with later. Now Kinzer is telling us that it is already later than we think, that the problem not only is not going to go away but will certainly get worse, and that we had better turn our attention and our resources toward finding ways to pick up the burden before it becomes unmanageable. As Kinzer has reported here, it is unmanageable right now for many community hospitals whose margins leave no room for charity and many public hospitals running out of room for patients, not to mention the cities and counties running out of money.

After considering the evidence, I expect we would all agree that the problem is not only local and regional but national in scope, and not for government only or for the health professions and institutions only, but for everybody. But what is everybody's problem is likely to become nobody's responsibility to resolve. This is what has been happening, and it's time to change that.

Whatever our roles in the health care system, we all believe deeply, I'm sure, that this society must not let its poor and near poor members suffer or die for want of resources to pay for needed medical care. We may not ever achieve the desirable goal of making the same access and the same care available to all members of society, whatever their status. We never have. But we keep trying, and we've come closer in the Medicare and Medicaid era than we ever did before. Now we're slipping back, and unless we can find ways to provide for this growing segment of the population the slip could become a slide that would bring on the kind of solution nobody wants. What is needed for long-term stability is a workable plan for sharing the cost of indigent care among all the parties at interest—government at all levels, business and industry, providers of service, insurers and insureds, taxpayers—so that all are paying their fair shares. This won't come quickly, but it won't come at all unless all of us who are directly involved make it a high order of business.

Meanwhile, there are some models for local action. In a number of communities, broad-based coalitions of business, physicians, hospitals, Blue Cross and Blue Shield Plans, local governments, insurance companies, and others have been organized with local initiative and local leadership to gather information, make studies, formulate plans, and undertake programs aimed at making health care affordable for those who can pay. There isn't any reason why the same kind of local group, using the same local resources, can't gather data, make plans, and devise programs aimed at making health care available to those who can't pay. The money will have to come from the same place the plans come from, with everybody paying a negotiated fair share. But the money won't come without the plans. The time to get started is now.

CARE OF THE POOR REVISITED

(By David M. Kinzer)

(In a keynote address before the AHA Conference on Maintaining Services to the Poor, the author expressed his personal concerns and conclusions about what is happening on the "care of the poor" front in this country. This article highlights those concerns, among them: the preemption of concern for equity in the delivery of health care services by other national priorities; the disinclination of the states to assume the burden of caring for the poor forced on them by the Reagan administration; and the moral and financial dilemma this has placed on health care providers. The author concludes that the trend toward increasing the numbers of for-profit hospitals and preferred provider organizations will only worsen the situation, and that equalizing the charity care burden may best be accomplished in states with regulated systems. He concludes that the issue could reach a political explosion point in this election year.)

Introductory note. In August 1982, a special committee of the American Hospital Association, which I chaired, issued a report entitled Health Care: What Happens to People When Government Cuts Back? [1] The report sounded some early alarms about the adverse public health impacts that were just beginning to show as a result of the Reagan administration's budget cuts and of the new discretion given the states to abridge their Medicaid and other human service commitments.

It expressed apprehension about how the hospital system would respond to the increased public expectation for "free care" created by the cuts and by increases in the unsponsored case load wrought by a slumping economy. The committee was certain that public expectations for their hospitals to respond positively to these increased demands would go on, regardless of government's retreat from its commitments. The committee was sensitive to the present drift of the hospital field to think of itself as a form of commerce, in contrast to a public service, and to behave accordingly. And, even though the indigent-care portion of most hospital budgets is small compared with what is represented by Medicare, Blue Cross Plans, and private insurance, the special committee was convinced that a breakdown of our "system" of indigent care could have political repercussions that would have dislocating impacts on all hospitals.

The concerns stated in the committee report focused sharply on urban public general hospitals and other care settings of last resort and on whether they had the capacity, physical and fiscal, to meet the expected flood of redirected demand for their services. On a broader base, concern focused on what the new funding constraints would do to our nation's teaching hospitals, which currently deliver an outsized proportion of the nation's "free care."

The report also expressed deep (although not unanimous) skepticism about the central assumption in the Reagan administration's New Federalism strategy, which assumed that state and local governments would pick up the slack of the federal funding cuts (already then imposed) and do the job more responsively and efficiently.

All of this explains the committee's recommendation of a "fair share" approach by hospitals to respond to the mounting "free care" issue. It urged all hospitals to at least hold the line on their charitable commitments and increase them if they could so as to avoid a dangerous service deficit to needy citizens. The report assumed that a strong public backlash would soon be generated against the governmental cuts and said that it was in the long-range interests of the hospital world to be a part of the backlash.

In this article, I review events since the committee report was published over a year ago and relate my personal concerns and conclusions, based on these events, about what is happening on the "care of the poor" front. The article is adapted from a keynote address I gave in Chicago on October 31, 1983, to the AHA Conference on Maintaining Services to the Poor.

Experience across the country through 1983 on the care of the poor has been intensive and instructive and a good deal less than encouraging for those of us who believe that the public service mission of hospitals must somehow be sustained. In what follows I attempt to relate my own sense of reality about the implications of what I have observed.

Equity in the delivery of health services is still not a top priority issue in our country.

The issue has been preempted by much stronger public concerns. Fear about the nuclear weapons buildup certainly heads the list. Thanks to the Physicians for Social Responsibility and other concerned citizen groups, it has become the public health issue that dwarfs all others. Unemployment and the economy, toxic wastes, acid rain and other environmental issues, and the parlous state of secondary education all outrank access to health services, according to recent polls. Health care costs are much more of a concern than citizens' rights to health care. The AIDS crisis is now attracting much more concern (and governmental response) than the nutritional deprivation of AFDC children.

So our special committee's expectation of a backlash against the cuts is still unfulfilled. Certainly part of the explanation for the low-key appeal of the equity issue in health is the long-standing public prejudice against people on the public dole. Polls show strong public support for trimming welfare rolls and benefits, but the same polls show equally strong public support for the principle that no one should be denied needed health services because he or she can't pay for them. The main problem with equity as an issue is that it is an abstraction. People (and their politicians and the working press) become excited and supportive about the health crises of individuals, but don't as easily relate to more global issues.

A recent example of this was a story on the front page of the "Metropolitan" section of the Boston Globe.[2] In the story the governor of Massachusetts, Michael Dukakis, announced that he would pick up part of the tab for a heart transplant at Stanford University using Massachusetts Medicaid funds even though the patient, John Faragi, was employed, had Blue Cross coverage, and was not Medicaid eligible. (Blue Cross had denied payment responsibility because, in conformance with federal payment policies, the procedure is still considered experimental.) In the same Globe on the same page was a story about the Massachusetts legislature approving a $50 million cut in the AFDC budget, to give the welfare department a greater "incentive" to collect support payments from straying fathers, a budget that our governor later signed.

As a matter of fact, poverty as such is a much more generic issue than the equity issue in health services. Our failures in the health arena are just another expression of the poverty problem along with two others we are reading a lot about lately, hunger and homelessness.

In spite of the efforts of Senator Edward Kennedy and various advocacy groups to dramatize the poverty issue in public hearings across the country, there has been little enough public response. Witness the failure of Congress before its 1983 adjournment to enact health insurance for the unemployed and to do anything about a rapidly deteriorating situation on health services for poor children.[3] The equity cause seems to be getting lost in the stampede to control health care costs, with health budget cutting becoming a favored device for reducing governmental deficits—federal, state, and local. More federal health cuts were avoided in the 1983 congressional session by the failure to agree on an overall deficit reduction package, but these moves only appear to have been delayed.

Meanwhile, the Reagan administration asserts its will to cut commitments the latest initiative being proposed regulations in October 1983 that would give states new powers to restrict eligibility and to reduce benefits for children, the elderly, and the disabled now getting support as medical indigents. At last report these people constituted 3.7 million of the 21.9 million people receiving Medicaid support.

After what the states have done to Medicaid, who still wants states' rights?

When our special committee report was published, the states were on a clear track of cutting their Medicaid commitments on eligibility, benefits, and provider payment, and in some situations all three. Under the new discretion given them under federal law, they continue on this track. With the exceptions of North Dakota and Alaska, all states at best are in a "budget neutrality" mode on their Medicaid commitments and at worst are indulging in major surgery. A sign of the times is that one of the two states increasing its commitment (Alaska, by 13.9%) also felt impelled to enact a prospective payment system for Medicaid.

Some of the states' responses to the new era of limited resources have involved political log rolling in the worst tradition of state legislatures. In Illinois there was a zero-hour political compromise that set a limit of $500 on payment per admission to hospitals for people on general assistance (the "medically indigent"), even though costs per admission, especially in Chicago, average several times that amount.

In Alabama a funding crisis has made a joke out of a new prospective payment system for Medicaid that had been installed just the year before.[4] The state has now frozen hospital payment levels under a new grouping system installed in 1983, cut reimbursable days of care from 20 to 12, and set a limit on reimbursable outpatient visits of 12 a year.

Several states are cutting payments for emergency care visits for cases that turn out not to be true emergencies. This is in face of the fact that retroactive denials on these cases ignore the reality that physicians and hospitals feel obliged to at least diagnose these patients as self-protection against possible lawsuit.

Probably the most dramatic example of reckless state behavior is provided by California, which, in one swoop, went to selective contracting with hospitals to service its Medi-Cal case load, instituted major cuts in program benefits, and transferred responsibility to caring for 260,000 medically indigent adults to the counties, cutting state support for this activity to 70% of expected costs.

A full assessment of the effects of this action won't be forthcoming for a long time, but danger signals already are being heard. In an issue of its CHA Insight, which was headlined "The Bottom Falls Out of Medi-Cal,"[5] the California Hospital Association recently reported that Medi-Cal patient days in the first quarter of 1983 had declined 22.61% from what they were in the first quarter of 1982. Capping all of this, Governor George Deukmejian, recently proposed cutting another $61.8 million out of state support for county health services, which would reduce the state sharing of county health expenditures from 70% to 61%. Nobody seems to know how the counties, still living under the constraints of Proposition 13, can pick up this slack. In another issue of CHA Insight there is a report of an apparently irreversible trend of closing county hospitals.[6]

It is apparent that the lack of any common commitment among the states to their needy citizens is a problem that is getting worse. In fact, what the states have done collectively to cut their dollar commitments to the needy already exceeds the federal cuts, though exact numbers here are currently impossible to come by. Also, the states in the most economic trouble with the most needs to address, like Michigan and Illinois, are the ones least able to respond.

Standards of eligibility and the levels of benefits are now all over the map. According to the Department of Health and Human Services, New York offers 29 optimal benefits, Wyoming six. Twenty-two states cover only the "categorically needy" under Medicaid, but 33 cover the medically needy also, Massachusetts has no limit on the number of hospital inpatient days covered, Wyoming covers only 14 days, Florida 45. It is impossible to relate this hodgepodge of state policy to any definable or even minimal standard of health protection for the poor.

An "out of sight, out of mind" psychology seems to prevail on what happens to people falling through the "safety net."

As Charles White of CHA put it to me, "No one knows what has happened to all the Medi-Cals that aren't coming to our hospitals, nor to the MIA's either. They've sort of gotten lost." A reality is identified here that isn't unique to California. The means for following disenfranchised welfare recipients are largely lacking. Some concerned advocacy groups are picking up the baton here, but what is involved is painstaking and often expensive research projects and long, after-the-fact delays in identifying whatever hardship results.

The psychology that comes into play here can't surprise anyone. State welfare directors, most of them under heavy pressure from budgetary watchdogs, are only too pleased to have fewer needs to meet with their always limited state funding. Life is made easier for them when they can blame it all on Ronald Reagan, as with the AFDC cuts and the federally mandated weeding of disability case loads. This cut 750,000 people out of the national case load. Even in a state as socially committed as Massachusetts, cutting out 29,000 AFDC cases and more than 8,000 on disability assistance hasn't caused too great a stir, either inside of government or out.

"Out of sight, out of mind" is descriptive of the political problem of addressing the issue of poverty in our country. A very high proportion of our electorate have only minimal direct exposure to the problem. It is also descriptive of the emotional set of many hospitals and other providers of care, especially when they are not overly dependent on Medicaid for patients. Almost always, Medicaid underpays both hospitals and physicians, and generally the underpayment problem is getting worse. So, as with free care, the fewer Medicaid patients coming in, the better. The disenfranchised patient becomes somebody else's problem.

Hospitals will stop doing good before they go broke.

If this point seems unduly cynical, I must recite a great truth I have picked up in representing hospitals in a state long buffeted by cost-control efforts: If there is one thing more important to a hospital than its community service obligation, it is its economic survival. Bankruptcy can't be made to look good on any hospital CEO's resumé. In Chicago, any hospital CEO who doesn't do all he can to fend off as many general assistance patients as he can, with their newly imposed $500-per-stay inpatient limit, just isn't being "businesslike" and will be so judged by his board of trustees.

The work "businesslike" poses the problem in a larger context. The chorus of criticism of the not-for-profit hospital now coming from business leaders and government alike and much abetted by the present editorial content of many hospital journals is that they need to be "better managed." Not surprisingly, many CEOs are taking this to mean that you shouldn't treat too many patients who represent bad debts, free care, or oversized "contractual allowances." This response promises to become more pronounced as overall constraints on hospital revenues are imposed and the resistance to cost shifting increases.

Hospital CEOs with with a social conscience mostly must learn to keep it well concealed.

I go to a lot of meetings where hospital CEOs let down their hair more or less privately. It seems significant that care of the poor doesn't surface too often as a subject. Concern about the issue, of course. varies by individual, but I sense another reason: The social obligation of hospitals to keep doors open to the poor is now an exceedingly uncomfortable subject. I found it astonishing that a recent article on ethics for hospital CEOs doesn't even identify the maintenance of the hospital's social mission as an ethical consideration. The author does skirt the subject when he says, "Ethical values in hospital administration are about to be sorely tested. The quality of patient care has always been in conflict with the bottom line of the balance sheet. It will soon be on a collision course with financial statements."[7]

It already is on a collision course in Massachusetts. Given the state's new revenue cap on hospitals[8] and the imperative to produce a positive bottom line (especially when you have revenue bonds to pay off), the CEO is constrained against making any commitments, in side or outside the hospital, in support of services that are likely to be losers. Also, he is often locked in by his and his board's growing dependence on the bottom-line orientation of chief financial officers, who often are the only people in the hospital who understand ever more arcane and conflicting third-party payment policies.

So the successful hospital CEO these days has to be cautious, and cannot be up front about taking more medicaid or delivering more free care. If there is an ethic about keeping the hospital responsive to community needs, you wonder who can reasonably be expected to keep it alive. Certainly the onus here is on the hospital's board and its collective altruistic spirit, where there still is one.

Another way of making this important point is that there is a clear correlation between the people who care a lot about what happens to the poor and those who care for a lot of them. Mostly the CEOs who are going public in their advocacy of equity are those who run public hospitals in urban settings.

The altruistic behavior of hospital medical staffs, or the lack of it, is a more than relevant consideration when a hospital tries to fulfill its social mission.

It has become a truism that the public does not readily make distinctions between the behavior of a hospital and that of its medical staff. When OB-gyn specialists on a hospital staff decided to no longer accept Medicaid patients, as has happened recently at several Massachusetts hospitals, the hospital shares in the adverse public reaction. On a grander scale, large numbers of physicians persist in refusing to accept Medicare assignments. In the state of Florida, I am told, this pertains to nearly all the physicians with a license to practice. As this is written, organized medicine is succeeding in its all-out effort to head off an attempt by Congress to force hospitals to force their staff physicians to accept these assignments. But it is guaranteed that this effort will be renewed in the 1984 session of Congress.

None of this seems to fit in very well with a national recession and government's clear incapacity to stay with its present medical payment commitments. Some of our elderly are affluent, but many more are having trouble keeping up with the ever increasing federally required copays and deductibles, without also being obliged to reach deeper into their pockets to pay their doctors something extra.

On the free-care issue, the medical profession's ethical taproots go much deeper than any that might govern a nonprofit community hospital. Dr. Arnold Relman notes [9] that, until recently, the American Medical Association's Judicial Council's Opinions and Reports contained the statement that "ability to pay should be considered in reducing fees; excessive fees are unethical." This statement is now out of the latest edition (1981), but it does say: "Under no circumstances may the physician place his own financial interest above the welfare of his patient. The prime objective of the medical profession is to render service to humanity. Reward or financial gain is a subordinate consideration."

All of this now sounds a little old-fashioned when you look closely at physicians' economic behavior inside the hospital. In Massachusetts hospitals, the vast bulk of indigent care, compensated and uncompensated, is delivered by house staff and other physicians salaried by the hospital. When a private practitioner decides to give free care—and they all say they do—he limits the largesse to his office setting.

I am beginning to hear hospital boards talk about instituting free-care requirements on their voluntary staffs to match up with the hospital commitment, but very few of them have done it to date.

Social advocates are easily found, but are not easily heard inside our hospitals.

Beyond the public urban CEOs who have deep concerns about care of the poor, I quickly add that there are many nuns at the helm of Catholic hospitals who are deeply concerned. Though they have not yet made themselves very visible in the political realm, I believe they will ultimately become a force. As indicated, the dichotomy of hospitals as a form of commerce and as a public service is causing unease for most CEOs, but it now is a form of torture for many members of religions orders. As John Curley, president of the Catholic Health Association, told me, the mounting pressure to be more "businesslike" has the ingredients of a personal crisis for many of his constituents. "If they perceive that the poor are no longer available for them to care for," he said, "they will leave the ministry."

One heartening aspect in the response to our special committee report was the number of people, including many CEOs who have been personally silent on the issue, who said they were glad that we had publicly identified their concerns. Also the process of preparing our report, and its aftermath response, was very instructive on the question of who really cares about the issue.

I rank medical social workers first on this score. They know and care more about what happens to the poor than any other professional group in our hospitals. Usually they express the most frustration about not being heard. Also, and my earlier statements notwithstanding, there are clearly many physicians on hospital staffs who have a strong social orientation. But only rarely do these individual concerns have an organized expression. And nurses! The social commitment is alive there, too, but does not seem to be very much heard, either. In some Massachusetts hospitals that I won't name, the political strength of medical and nursing staffs, along with the large admitting and discharging discretion of house staffs, is an effective checkmate to the hospital's top-level businesslike behavior.

In the volunteer groups, the auxilians seem to have much more sensitivity to social concerns than do the boards. Also, they seem to have the most trouble finding anyone who will listen to them. I risk here generalizing too much. Though "businesslike" considerations dominate board thinking nowadays, I've encountered many board members who express frustration because what they must do conflicts with their prime motivation in becoming board members.

On the present trend lines, the divisions between the for-profits and the not-for-profits are becoming irreconcilable.

A recent study comparing the economic performance of voluntary, public, and investor-owned hopitals in California made one startling revelation relating to care of the poor: [10] The investor-owned hospitals in the study group delivered charity care in amounts so minute that they go a "0.00" score in one of the tables. They also were conspicuously below the others in the volume of Medi-Cal patients treated.

Given the growing economic pressures on all hospitals on the revenue side, and the deterioration I have noted in public support of indigent care, the ingredients of a major division are with us. The reality here is that hospitals as profit-making business enterprises and hospitals as community services cannot be treated, or represented, as having common purposes. Lately, the trend among the non-profits seems to be in the direction of behavior patterns more like those of the for-profits. Most of the so-called voluntary chains that have come into being have been imitative in their economic behavior of the for-profit chains. They seem not to be in any more of a hurry to pick up economic "losers" than the big corporate chains. But what this is doing is not to mute the incipient conflict, but to bring it to a head, because it is having the effect of putting the care-of-the-poor responsibility on an ever narrowing and ever more threatened group of institutions. Part of the survival pattern of these institutions must be to discredit the for-profits.

The competitive strategy for controlling health care costs can't be anything but threatening to the institutions that deliver the most charity care and to all the people who continue to expect it.

To compete effectively on price, a hospital is well advised to do as little teaching as possible, limit its patient mix to as few Medicaid patients and unsponsored cases as possible, avoid offering services that are regular losers, and ship as many high-intensity, high-risk patents as possible into the referral centers. This is what is happening now in many areas. Distress signals now being heard from urban referral centers, public and private, confirm it.

In July 1982, a Chicago paper ran a story that Cook County Hospital was operating at full capacity for the first time in years.[11] Elliot Roberts, the hospital director, said that "our capacity to handle patients on the medical wards is exhausted" and issued a plea to other hospitals in town not to transfer any more patients. He said that 618 patients had been transferred to County in June 1983, compared with 122 in June 1981.

Parkland Memorial Hosptial in Dallas had a similar experience,[12] reporting that ER visits "had jumped dramatically during the recession and now averaged between 500 and 550 per day. The rate of patient transfers from other hospitals to Parkland has nearly tripled over the past year and is now occurring at the rate of almost 200 per month. Most of these transfers are for financial reasons and frequently involve medically indigent residents of neighboring counties and suspected illegal aliens."

The evident popularity of the competitive strategy with many of our hospitals has become a bad joke with the public hospitals. It isn't very popular with our teaching hospitals, either. As Richard Knapp, director of the department of teaching hospitals of the Association of American Medical Colleges, told me recently, "The gap between those institutions doing well financially and those that are not is widening. . . . Those hospitals serving large numbers of marginal-income and no-pay patients are being badly stretched and some are hitting rock bottom."

The new craze in our field, preferred provider organizations (PPOs) is heightening the apprehension of the public and teaching hospital groups. They view this new competitive initiative, based on what they are seeing to date, as an effort by groups of hospitals that don't do much teaching or give much charity to take away the share of the private market the teaching and public hospitals need to subsidize their teaching and charitable services.

Testifying before a congressional committee, Larry Gage, president of the National Association of Public Hospitals, identified the new competitive impulse in its broadest dimension: "As pressure increases among payers to end or reduce cost shifting, the patients whose costs must be shifted will become increasingly isolated. When no organized insurer admits to any responsibility for serving the uninsured poor, those patients will increasingly be dumped on our nation's public hospital system—at least up to the limits of local taxpayers' willingness to support that tremendous burden." [13]

The emerging reality here is that the competitive strategy is really a mad scramble for a larger share of the private market and has only the most limited relevance to the cause of cost control. Its continued popularity among physicians and hospitals is mostly attributable to the fact that it seems to be the only conveniently available alternative to more regulation. And marketplace forces, in inexorable fashion, are forcing insurers like Blue Cross Plans to abridge their prior commitments to community rating, open enrollment, individual coverage, and cross-subsidization of high-risk groups.

What little support the competitive strategy had in Congress now is wanting, as lawmakers begin to feel the pressure of the increasing numbers of citizens unable to pay for their health services. Besides, no one knows how to design and legislate a politically acceptable competitive system that addresses this problem. A signal on this is the change of heart of Representative Richard Gephardt (D., Mo.), one of the early apostles of the competitive strategy who is now sponsoring federal legislation to mandate an all-payers state approach to cost control.[14] His draft bill, though, does include a competitive option for states that can prove that this approach does hold aggregate hospital expenditures below nationally set target limits.

That piece of the competitive doctrine that puts the consumer of care at risk just isn't real when applied to poor people. Even so, and as earlier noted, some state Medicaid programs are trying to do this with results that were predictable in advance. You can't reasonably impose significant financial risk on people who can't afford to pay their bills in the first place. Their risk under the current competitive doctrine is to not receive the medical services they need.

Acceptance of the idea of a two-tiered system of care seems to be gaining ground in our country, but only among those who know they will land safely in the top tier.

The theme of the 1983 Duke University Forum on Hospital and Health Affairs was equity in health care. The clear consensus of the parade of speakers was that the reality of limited resources dictated some significant retreat from the equal access, equal-care goal of the last 20 years. The tone of it all was regretful resignation with a heavy mix of academic detachment. Undoubtedly, some of the resignation derived from the reality that the country more or less already was living with two tiers and, in some areas, three or four.

Gathered in the room were many national health leaders. Looking around me, I tried hard to understand the consensus that had clearly been reached. Then I realized that there wasn't a single person I knew in that room—and I knew a lot of them—who didn't have reason to believe that he or she would stay securely in the top tier.

In my aftermath pondering of the meeting, I had great difficulty understanding what the speakers meant by "two tiers" and a "dual standard." If it meant hamburger instead of steak, and ward accommodations instead of private, and open windows instead of air conditioning, that is one thing, but almost everybody in the room knew that this kind of austerity barely makes a dent in our aggregate medical bill. If it meant making it more difficult for the second-tier types to get inside our hospitals, that is another thing. If it meant giving them fewer medical services, that is quite something else. And if it meant consigning all of the country's indigent to understaffed and underequipped public charity hospitals, that is something else again.

The dilemma comes into focus immediately when it is related to specific situations. Does this mean that we shouldn't give a liver transplant to the father of a young family when the father doesn't have a job? Does it mean a premature infant of an AFDC mother can't get inside a neonatal intensive care unit? Does this mean we should take dialysis away from the elderly?

My point is that if the second-tier people get an explanation of what the term really means, they won't like any of the four interpretations, and least of all the last three. And a lot of the people they helped elect to public office will not like them either.

A major problem with a two-tier system, barely discussed at the forum, is that it can put the ethical physician in an impossible position. Dennis O'Leary, M.D., dean for clinical affairs of the Georgetown University Medical Center, identified the ethical problem, saying, "[The physician] feels an obligation to do everything to sustain the patient," but then acknowledged that "very subtle adjustments" are already being made in society's standards and expectations.[15] In a different forum, Edmund Pellegrino, M.D., expressed more explicit concerns. Mentioning the physician's "covenant" to do all he can medically for his patient and referring to reductions in payments for care of the poor, he said, "Things do not become right because we are forced to do it. . . . We are trying to turn the physician into an agent of economic and social policy."[16]

So moving overtly to two tiers poses significant ethical as well as political problems. Many physicians finesse the ethical issue by not signing on with Medicaid or by limiting their practices to private patients. You can't neglect patients you never see. But most of our hospitals can't afford to be that selective. Two tiers becomes a more uncomfortable solution to cost problems in that setting. I don't know any hospital CEOs in Massachusetts who are yet telling staff physicians how much they can do for their patients. I don't know any who really want to try.

A collective and voluntary "fair share" approach by hospitals to meet charity care needs becomes less acceptable as payment constraints tighten.

There have been some efforts across the country by hospitals voluntarily to agree to accept a defined proportion of the charity care load in their communities. Mostly they have not succeeded. Resistance to the idea increases as the money faucets are turned down.

It would seem that there is more potential for "fair share" within the nonprofit systems of hospitals that are still growing across the country than there is for local sharing by solo hospitals. The Evangelical Group in Greater Chicago is now helping to carry two threatened inner-city hospitals. Some of the Catholic orders are now trying cross-institutional cross-subsidization. But the potential of this is limited by the self-protectionism of local community interests, especially when hospitals in the order are widely dispersed.

Besides, in the face of competition from the for-profit chains, the temptation to drop a loser is very strong. A story out of Philadelphia is instructive on this point. St. Christopher's, a children's specialty hospital in the inner city, recently bought three smaller investor-owned hospitals in the suburbs. One of the "understandings" when the hospital got its certificates of need to purchase the hospitals was that St. Christopher's would stay where it is. Now, though, the hospital board has had a change of heart and has proposed building a new hospital in a more affluent section of the city. This has produced a tremendous public hullabaloo. The hospital nonetheless has a real-world problem. It is located in an area of high unemployment with a high proportion of Medicaid recipients and very high outpatient utilization. I am advised that the state pays only $12 an outpatient visit, currently only 30% of that hospital's cost per visit.

Equalizing the charitable care burden is most readily accomplished in states with regulated systems of care.

Another emerging reality is that collective, voluntary initiatives to meet the mounting charity care needs of our country have about as much long-range viability as did the AMA- and AHA-sponsored voluntary effort in cost control. Law and regulation will increasingly be the instruments for getting this done. It is no coincidence that in the four eastern states (New York, New Jersey, Massachusetts, and Maryland) with federally waivered payment systems there is now less trouble meeting the health care needs of the poor than in many states that have no overall regulation.

George Allen, president of the Hospital Association of New York State, told me recently that the long-beleaguered city hospital system in New York City is now in better financial shape than it has been in years. This was accomplished before New York completed its first year under a regulated system. Though it can't be said that all of the public hospitals in the four states are in sound shape, there are no crises there that compare with what is happening at Cook County, St. Louis City, Denver General, Grady in Atlanta, and the Charity Hospital of New Orleans.

The reason is that the systems permit creation of payment pools to give extra support to the hospitals that deliver a high volume of free care. They also distribute free-care obligations among governmental and voluntary payers, whereas nationally, given Medicare's and Medicaid's policy not to accept responsibility in this area, the cost of free care and bad debt still must be loaded on private payers only.

Another feature of regulation in the four states is that it sustains the contribution of the private sector to meet hospitals' charitable obligations. In states where PPOs are burgeoning, where major industrial purchasers of care are negotiating "administrative services only" contracts and are hard bargaining hospitals into cutting prices, hospitals are being forced into a situation where there is less sharing than ever. To put it bluntly, the pious crusade against cost shifting now being led by business coalitions is a not very disguised cop-out on a social responsibility they have been carrying for years.

It is easy enough for private group purchasers of health services to get cut-rate prices in states that have no regulation, but it is not so easy in states that do.

The negative side of regulated systems is that they implicitly acknowledge that definable limits can be put on the total dollars in the payment pool, which means that if you spend more money to help one category of hospital, less goes to others. But the definable-limits pattern of thinking is also gaining foothold nationally. Witness what has just happened in Medicare, now controlled globally by the new "budget neutrality" commitments of Congress.

Politically, it has been possible to finesse the equity issue with the cost issue and make hospitals take most of the rap for both.

The cost issue has hospitals very much on the defensive. Politicians at all levels of government now use the steadily rising hospital expenditure curve as justification not only to cut hospital payments but to cut benefits and eligibility as well. And they justify cuts in nutritional services and maternal and child health because, as they often put it, hospitals are eating up the lion's share of available human service funds. At the December 1983 National Governors' Conference, Governor Thomas Kean of New Jersey put it this way: "Health care is acting as PacMan in our budget, eating up funds that would otherwise be used for good and useful projects."[17]

A not unusual hospital response to government retrenchment—cutting out services for which government has cut its support or limiting services that the government cuts have turned into losers—more ofter than not gets the hospital into public trouble. A children's hospital in my state was so politically victimized by angry legislators for its announced plan to retrench on one of its big losers, psychiatric counseling services to sexually abused children, that it had to drop the idea.

In this environment, political leaders somehow find it easy, on the one hand, to stand up for the rights of the poor to get new livers and hearts or transplanted bone marrow and, on the other, to vote for global health budget cuts to force the issue on "controlling hospital costs."

Over the last year, I have noted in my in-basket a marked increase in the number of instances of murderous media treatment of hospitals that refuse to treat a critically ill infant because he came from another county, a heart attack victim who dies while being transferred from the emergency room of a private hospital into a county hospital, a critically burned patient without third-party support who almost died before a burn unit could be found willing to treat him, and much more of the same kind of thing.

The anger generated by these stories is not only damaging to the hospitals named, but is hurting the image of the whole field. And this, in turn, gives our politicians public justification for even more heavy-handed treatment of hospitals, putting them even more on the defensive.

The word "dumping" is now being used with increasing frequency by the media to describe our collective hospital treatment of the poor. It is a horrible word,

The health care poblems of the poor will need to worsen before they will be squarely addressed nationally—and they will worsen.

This reexamination forces me to the conclusion that our health "safety net" for the poor and otherwise disadvantaged people in our country has deteriorated significantly since our special committee report was issued more than a year ago. I refer here not just to the erosion of state Medicaid programs, but also to the fact that the main burden of meeting the health care needs of dependent groups in our population seems to be falling on an ever narrowing group of institutions that generally aren't in very robust financial condition.

Though the current economic revival can help our situation, all the economic prognostications I see are that unemployment rates will probably stay at high levels into the indefinite future. Also, economic improvements don't seem to offer much hope of reducing the numbers of people needing some form of government assistance. For example, the steadily increasing number of elderly in our population guarantees ever increasing pressure on the nursing home portions of already strained state Medicaid budgets. At least 70% of the poverty group in our country is hard core in the sense that dependence on government assistance is guaranteed into the indefinite future. In addition to the aged, the people needing some form of public assistance include the disabled and households headed by a lone female parent with at least one preschool-aged child. Mothers in these households don't usually work and now have little incentive to do so.[18] Add to this list the mentally ill, where the dual standard has always been with us. There are signs that the deinstitutionalization of state hospitals has stalled and that the affected patients are backwatering into state inpatient settings. Efforts in my own state to "privatize" that case load died because of state employee union opposition and because everybody knew privatization would cost more money.

Other forces at work support the assumption that the health services situation for the poor will get worse before it gets better. The move to a prospective DRG system for Medicare promises over time a racheting down of revenues from this main payer that will likely force more hospital retrenchment of commitments in other payer categories, like Medicaid, where payments are even more suppressed. And, as already noted, the rush to more free-market competition in the private sector really is a global cost-shifting device that, as Larry Gage said, redirects more low-pay, no-pay, and high-risk patients into referral centers, which in turn is increasing their vulnerability to more cost cutting by government.

All of this notwithstanding, it cannot yet be said that the equity issue in health has a strong national constituency. The impact of the problem, like the impact of our recession, varies in the extreme. Because it has achieved crisis proportions mainly in urban centers, effective response is often hobbled by the long-standing divisions of city and country in state legislatures.

Most important, there doesn't seem to be very much interest in Washington in facing up to this mounting problem. This applies not just to the White House, with its large capacity to define public issues, but to Congress as well.

Emily Friedman, senior field editor of Hospitals magazine and one of the most concerned observers the hospital field has on the "care of the poor" front, takes a very dark view of where we are heading. She projects a steady decline of the numbers of people with some degree of Medicaid protection from the present 21.9 million down to "just a few million." These newly uninsured, she says, "can join the 26.6 million people who are already in that boat, and throw themselves at the mercy of the private sector. Private providers, even if they were inspired to do so by reimbursement at 50 cents on the dollar, could not possibly absorb the expenses of a population of that size. So we could end up right where we started nearly 20 years ago, with those who can't pay being funneled to strapped, underfunded local government providers." [19]

In spite of the not very pleasant realities I have identified in this analysis, I do not accept the Friedman scenario. My reason: We are confronted with a destabilization in our social structure that can erupt as a major political issue soon, and certainly much sooner than it will take for that scenario to play out. In its broadest dimensions, it is the now much publicized fact that the proportions of rich and poor in our society are increasing while the middle class shrinks. In health, the issue is well conveyed in a recent paper from the Urban Institute which points out that the "implicit" system of financing health services for the poor—that is, expecting the charge payer to pick up the losses incurred therefrom—is rapidly approaching breakdown, a fact that is bringing to the forefront consideration of more "explicit" solutions.[20]

The American body politic can and always has tolerated a certain amount of poverty and a certain amount of discrimination against the poor, including the dual standard in health care. But there is a question of how much more it will tolerate. Though the impact of the incipient breakdown I have described is limited to a minority of institutions, such as public hospitals, and minorities in our population, especially blacks and Hispanics, this breakdown could give the issue sharpened political focus. The media are now feeding on the human crisis wrought by this destabilization. And 1984 is an election year. One of the buildups to this election has been aggressive voter registration drives among blacks, Hispanics, and women, the latter with seemingly deeper concerns about human service causes than men.

I can't predict any specific political resolution of the equity issue. I am only saying that we are very likely to have one as a result of the election, one that could be as impetuous as last year's congressional action that put DRG limits on Medicare payments. And certainly the issue is such that it will require a national solution. Based on our last two years of experience, our country cannot live much longer with the fantasy that the needs of the poor can be addressed by a combination of enhanced private philanthropy and state and local government support. For our hospital system, with its huge expense commitment, the potential of philanthropy to offset mounting demands for free care is very small. And the maldistribution of dependent populations is such that the urban centers where the poor are concentrated have similarly limited capacity to finance the services that the poor need.

Politically, the equity issued in health can be likened to someone walking into a room with a gas leak carrying a lighted match. Stuart Altman, dean of the Heller School of Brandeis University and former assistant secretary of HEW in the Nixon and Ford administrations, suggested that 40 million "uncovered" individuals in our population would be a benchmark service deficit that could revive a push for national health insurance "within four or five years." [21] We are moving up to that number at a steady rate.

It seems obvious that the health provider community and its various organizations will not and cannot be a rallying point on the equity issue in health. All of them are split by the conflicting motivations of financial gain (or survival) versus community service and ethical considerations. Besides, their credibility with the people most damaged by the cuts and the politicians who represent them is currently not at a very high point. Nor does it seem likely that the decisions will be made on the basis of what is best for the health care establishment. Cost control is with us to stay. It seems certain that any move to broaden health care entitlements will involve more constraints on how much health care providers will be allowed to spend in delivering these services.

It should not be assumed that a political response on the equity issue must wait until a majority of the public is hurt by the status quo. A majority needs only to care about people being hurt. The issue is a caring kind of issue and will become political to the extent that politicians running for office can mobilize voters around it. It seems to follow that the influence of individual members of the health provider community on whatever "solution" is developed will hinge on whether they can demonstrate, now and in the future, that they really care about the problem.

CHINA: A LOST CAUSE FOR THE WEST

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, ever since the founding of our Republic, the United States has taken pride in the fact that we base our very existence on personal freedom and individual dignity. Indeed, we have fought and bled and died to preserve those principles. It is, therefore, very disturbing to me to sit and watch the unseemly haste by which certain people in this country are tossing aside our very birthright.

Mr. President, I am referring to those politicians and businessmen who are willing to accommodate themselves to Red China for their own, narrow poltical and monetary benefit. What we are coming to when the principles of our Founding Fathers are sacrificed on the altar of expediency?

Without a doubt, Red China will be enshrined in the pages of history as one of the cruelest, most bloodthirsty and oppressive regimes that ever dominated a country. Have we forgotten how many of their own people were killed or allowed to die by starvation during the Cultural Revolution or the Great Leap Forward? Have we forgotten Korea, Tibet, Vietnam, Laos, or Cambodia? Perhaps the enormity of evil is so great that it tends to numb the mind which allows even the best-intentioned person to overlook the failings of Red China.

Mr. President, without agreeing with the writer's critical remarks about Chinese culture, a high art form which has been corrupted by communism, I ask unanimous consent that an article from the London Daily Telegraph of May 24, 1984, be printed in the RECORD. In this article, the author, Giles Mathews, argues persuasively that the myth of the "China card" is exactly that—a myth. Indeed, his thesis is that when all human endeavors are dictated by the Government for purely political purposes, then even such things as art and literature lose their very essence. It is one thing, he argues, to be a patron and it is an entirely different thing to be a dictator in these areas. I certainly hope that my colleagues will read this article in light of our own history.

The article follows:

CHINA'S INSCRUTABLE FACE HIDES A LOST CAUSE FOR THE WEST

When you go to China they give you a banquet. The format of these functions is always the same, whether you are President of the United States or the export manager of Nuts & Washers Ltd—though of course there are differences of scale.

Smiling officials usher you to the seat of honour. The senior of your hosts fusses over you, setting choice delicacies on your plate. He compliments you on your skill with chopsticks. You stutter a few memorised phrases in Mandarin; they lean forward eagerly to catch your words, and chuckle with delight. Toasts are drunk to the eternal friendship of the two nations. Flattery is exchanged. Warmed by the smiles, the sycophancy, the toasts, you at last rise and make a gushing speech. You express regret for the misunderstandings of the past, and hope for the future. How can it have happened that there has been such a gulf, such incomprehension between our two cultures? When we have so much to learn from each other! So much to gain from friendship!

Thousands of Westerners have had this experience—most recently Ronald Reagan. I wonder how many of them now reflect, as I do, that perhaps we have nothing at all to learn from China, and little to gain from China's friendship? Very few, I suppose. It is still received wisdom that China is a Good Thing. Her culture being ancient, is presumably profound. Her population is vast, and so must be a desirable market. Her foreign policy is proudly independent, and therefore good for tying down a few Russian divisions far from Europe. Is not friendship with China worth the effort?

If it is, it must be a friendship freed from illusions. The illusion of China's high culture will do for a start.

By the time Western powers arrived in force in the 19th century, long subjection to total power had emptied Chinese culture of all content. The last philosopher of any content had been dead 2,000 years. Poetry had flowered briefly a thousand years before, then withered. Other literature was of the samizdat type. History was ruthlessly doctored to give support to State dogmas. Pure science and mathematics did not exist. The only indigenous religion was a dog's breakfast of superstition and medical quackery. Art had degenerated into decorative prettiness.

On exposure to Western ideas this dessicated fabric collapsed in a cloud of dust, like Tutankhamun's shroud. During the following period of relative freedom (roughly, the first half of this century), some embryo native forms of art began to appear based on half-understood Western models, but all this was aborted when the present régime came to power. Now China is a cultural desert.

One does not need to be an expert to know this. It is open to any sighted person to examine a nation's architecture, for example. Modern Chinese architecture is just not there, except as tawdry imitations of Russian styles (themselves only copies of certain late classical and Byzantine forms). The greatest Chinese painter of the past 100 years was Ch'i Paishih. His favourite subject was prawns. Prawns! Where, as in Hongkong, culture has been allowed to flow freely between Chinese people and Westerners, the flow has been all one way—the sure sign of a vacuum at the receiving end.

Our export manager is not much concerned with all this. All right, he will say, so we can't learn anything from them. Surely, though we can sell them something? All those people?

Yes, there are profits to be made in selling to China, for those willing to face the rigours of negotiating with purchasing officers which (in one case I know of) don't answer their mail. However, the great dream of large-scale foreign investment in the country is not dissolving fast.

Beginning in the late 'seventies the Chinese experimented with allowing their enterprises to keep more of the surpluses of their production, and foreign investors more of their profits. Seeing this, some observers put it about that the Chinese were turning to capitalism. Unfortunately, the systems of central planning and rigid price control were never abandoned, or even much modified; and on these rocks the experiments are foundering.

It is very important to understand that in a society like China's the priorities are always political, never economic. If the authorities are sufficiently sure of themselves politically—for example, in the general public relief after the end of a period of arbitrary State terrorism—they will indulge themselves in the luxury of economic tinkering. However, when the result is (as always) a diminution of their power, or rising demands from the people, or threatening rumbles from the bureaucracy, they will quickly fall back into more familiar habits. The present round of agricultural reforms began with Teng Hsiaoping exhorting the peasants to "get rich!" This is exactly what Bukharin said to Russian peasants in 1925. We must try to remember these things.

There remains the possibility that China, properly armed, may be useful to us in keeping Russia confined. This idea has been most clearly stated by Richard Nixon:

"A weak China invites aggression. China cannot become stronger militarily unless it becomes stronger economically and it will only turn to the Soviet Union if it has given up on the West."

In fact, it is inconceivable that the Chinese would turn to Russia for large-scale assistance. They did so once before, in the 'fifties, and have been regretting it ever since. Any Chinese will tell you the reason for the Sino-Soviet split: "They didn't want to help us, they wanted to dominate us."

It is true that Russia keeps some 50 divisions on China's borders, but it is very difficult to imagine any circumstances in which those divisions would be removed. A weak China might "invite aggression:" it is at least equally possible that a China loosely allied to the West and rapidly modernising its armies would alarm Russia into some action. Fishing in these murky waters may be good for our armaments industries, but it is not likely to be helpful to the cause of world peace.

Statesmen always over-estimate their power to move events, never more so than when dealing with introverted empires of the Russia-China type, who are hardly interested in the outside world at all, and whose affairs do not really concern us. To be brutally frank about it: if the Russians become determined to attack China, no imaginable improvement in Sino-Western relations will discourage them. It is not even clear that such an attack would affect the West in any way.

Throughout history there have always been free States somewhere, and there has always been a barbarian hinterland. The barbarians can occasionally spring nasty surprises—as Genghis Khan, Alexander, and the founder of the Chinese Empire did—but the proper precaution against this is for free States to co-operate for mutual security.

There is no harm in our making money by trading with the barbarians, but we should not flatter them that they are important to us. Neither should we flatter ourselves that they give a fig for our trade, our friendship, or our values.●

A NATIONAL INFRASTRUCTURE COUNCIL

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, so many aspects of American life are bound up with the condition of the Nation's infrastructure. The degree to which we can all enjoy a health economy, national security, and social progress depends in good measure on the adequacy of our roads and bridges, water and sewer systems, public buildings, and other elements of our infrastructure network.

Unfortunately, as a variety of studies and surveys have indicated, the condition of our infrastructure is disturbing—and increasingly so. Not only is the existing infrastructure inadequate to meet the growing demands in it, it is often deteriorated. It has become clear that we must launch a comprehensive effort to improve our infrastructure, to halt the deterioration and generate necessary new construction.

An important first step in this effort would be to establish a national infrastructure council, such as the one put forth in S. 1330, Public Capital Investment Act of 1983, now before a House-Senate conference committee. This council, composed of Government and private sector representatives, would assess the condition of the country's infrastructure and provide recommendations on cost-effective means of improving it. As a member of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, I proposed the establishment of such a council; and the proposal now enjoys support across a broad spectrum of public interest groups, as well as bipartisan support in the Senate.

One organization keenly interested in improving the Nation's infrastructure is the American Institute of Architects, the professional organization representing the Nation's architects. The AIA this year celebrates its 127th anniversary. In autumn 1983, Mr. Leroy Bean, vice president of the AIA, addressed a combined meeting of the AIA and the Associated General Contractors in Dallas, TX, on the subject of infrastructure. There, he set forth the AIA's position on a variety of specific infrastructure issues, including support for a national infrastructure council. Mr. Bean's statement, I believe, offers a valuable analysis that will contribute to our deliberations over infrastructure improvement legislation. I ask that Mr. Bean's statement be printed in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT OF LEROY BEAN, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE AIA

All of us are familiar with the nursery rhyme "London Bridge is Falling Down." Today, London Bridge is, as you know, no longer in London. It's in Arizona. Nor is it in any imminent danger of falling down.

I wish I could say the same for the West Fourth Street Bridge in South Boston; or, the water main that blacked out New York's garment district last August; or, the dam that burst in Colorado, killing four people; or, the east and gulf coast harbors that are being choked by silt; or, the prisons in 36 States and territories under court orders to end overcrowding.

In short, I wish that I could say that the bones, muscle, and arteries that tie this Nation together are as sound as London Bridge. Unfortunately, as all of us in this room are well aware, this is not the case. Our Nation's digestive, circulatory, and nervous systems are not well. Our Nation's infrastructure is sick, and this sickness is literally life-threatening.

But the purpose of my being with you here today is not to play the role of the doctor diagnosing a sick patient. All of you here are fully aware of the symptoms. All of you here know the disease.

So I am not going to take up your time reciting grim statistics. You know them better than I.

Nor am I going to belabor the matter of cost. You've heard that a one trillion dollar pricetag is attached to a complete overhaul of our country's infrastructure.

But what will the cost be of not repairing our Nation? I've read that New York City annually pays claims of about $9 million to persons injured because of broken sidewalks or crumbling street surfaces.

And that's just one small drop from a very rusty bucket. What is in fact at risk is nothing less than the destruction of our economic base. What kind of pricetag can you attach to that kind of scenario?

Therefore, neither the need for nor the cost of repairing America's infrastructure is the subject of my remarks this morning. This audience is beyound the talking stage. You are ready for action.

For this reason, I am going to spend the brief time I have with you to talk about what kinds of action the AIA is right now backing. And I would in passing like to raise another matter: the question of how we choose our priorities when we begin the great task that is at hand.

But first I'd like to offer this observation. I am convinced that we are not making the best case we can for rebuilding America. I believe that we must go beyond rhetoric that is charged with images of disaster. Panic and fear are seldom the parents of truly effective action.

A persuasive argument can be made that our deteriorating infrastructure is more than a crisis. It is also an opportunity—an extraordinary opportunity not merely to bandage, but to improve this Nation's quality of life.

Once we ourselves are persuaded that we stand at the threshold of drawing up a blueprint for a better America, then we will be in the position to lead our society to that kind of future.

Thanks to the Media's coverage of recent infrastructure failures, we certainly have the public's ear. But the public wants to hear something more than shrill cries of "Wolf!" And it will be difficult to galvanize the body politic if our industry is prepared to discuss the matter only in terms of sludge, silt, potholes and clumsy words like "infrastructure."

We need to offer the public a vision of the future that has specific goals—clean water, safe highways, handsome public buildings, parks for our children, hospitals for the elderly.

I believe that such goals can be every bit as challenging as the Manhattan Project or as exciting as putting a man on the Moon.

Yet I am not aware that our industry is appearing before Rotary clubs or chambers of commerce with that kind of blueprint in hand. But we must, if we really believe that a coordinated, nationwide effort is called for to address a truly nationwide concern. To do less is to get nothing better than the piecemeal approach, the on-again, off-again financing that has pushed this Nation into this fix in the first place.

So I applaud the fact that you have chosen infrastructure as the subject of this meeting. And I particularly congratulate the Dallas chapters of the AGC and the AIA for sitting down together to discuss this matter. Your coordinated approach ought to be the model for the entire construction industry, not to mention this Nation.

To give the U.S. Congress its due, it hasn't been sitting on its hands while our water mains break and our Interstate Highways come tumbling down. Currently, there are at least four important bills in the hopper that address the issue. Taken together, these bills deal with such matters as the setting up of a national public works inventory, the rehabilitation of public buildings, state control over infrastructure improvement, the funding of such improvements, and other related matters.

The AIA has studied these bills. Indeed, we offered testimony on their contents and ramifications last April before the Senate's Committee on Environment and Public Works. The main points of the testimony may be summarized as follows.

The AIA supports State control over infrastructure improvement. This support is predicated on the adequate involvement of local governments in the development of State infrastructure improvement programs.

By that I mean States should be required to establish infrastructure improvement plans in consultation with local governments and then only after reasonable opportunity for public comment has been provided. These plans should then be subject to disapproval within a specified time period by the administering Federal agency. Furthermore, we believe that the States should be required to allocate funds to localities according to a State-determined, needs-based formula.

As for the question of funding, the AIA support the concept of revolving funds as a continuing source of monies for necessary infrastructure improvement projects.

However, the AIA is concerned that the terms and conditions for maintaining these revolving funds, as provided in current pending legislation, may inhibit the use of proposed infrastructure programs by the communities that need such programs the most. If funds are disbursed to communities based on their ability to repay, then those communities best able to handle repayments will emerge as prime candidates for assistance. You and I know however, that such relatively well-off communities are not usually the ones with the most serious problems.

The AIA believes that the repayment and matching requirements of any Federal revolving fund scheme be not a strict dollar-for-dollar approach. We have suggested instead that the Congress consider establishing State revolving funds that give the States the authority to make grants not on a community's ability to repay such funds, but rather according to State-determined need criteria. Further, we are suggesting that repayment be no more than the Federal contribution.

Most public discussion of America's infrastructure has thus far focused on water, sewage, and transportation. But there is another element of this country's infrastructure vital to its health. I'm referring to our Nation's public buildings—its schools, libraries, justice facilities, hospitals, and the like.

The AIA believes that public buildings constitute an integral part of the national infrastructure system. They serve as the centers for services vital to local economics and social needs. Therefore, we have urged Congress to explicitly include public buildings in any infrastructure improvement program.

Key to the success of whatever program is ultimately adopted will be the arrangements made for its administration. The AIA believes that the following elements should be included: rapid implementation of the program; close coordination among Federal agencies in devising rules and regulations; and direct involvement of States, localities and the private sector in the development of those regulations.

In providing for a Federal administering body, the AIA believes that Congress should consider establishing first a national interagency council, or coordinating body, that would be composed of certain Cabinet members and agency administrators, such as the Secretaries of Commerce and Labor.

This council would develop the rules and regulations to implement the program. It would also be charged with the responsibility for bringing this program into alignment with other programs that bear directly on infrastructure improvement. The Secretary of Commerce would be an appropriate head for the council, given the extensive role of that Department in the Nation's economy.

This is another way of saying that the executive branch must make a special commitment to insuring the success of a national infrastructure program. What that comes down to is rapid implementation.

However, the council should not work in a vacuum. Instead, it should draw upon the experience of other levels of government and the private sector. To do this, any proposed infrastructure legislation should provide for the establishment of a National Infrastructure Advisory Commission to work with the infrastructure council in the development of the program. This advisory panel would be composed of representatives of commercial and industrial interests, organized labor, professional organizations with experience in the design and construction sectors, and State, municipal, and county governments.

Because the States will actually administer the program, and because the local governments will in most cases be the ultimate beneficiaries, their participation is particularly important.

In short, the administrative structure being proposed by the AIA would place the responsibility for establishing and operating the national infrastructure program in the hands of appropriate Federal Government officials; provide for coordination among Federal departments and agencies with important jurisdiction over infrastructure matters; and offer ample opportunity for other interested parties—both public and private—to participate in the implementation of the infrastructure program at the national level.

Repairing and replacing the Nation's infrastructure cannot proceed without an honest and carefully documented list of precisely what it is that needs to be repaired and replaced—and in what order! This is why almost every serious commentary on the subject has called for some kind of national inventory of America's infrastructure. Indeed, some of the proposed legislation now being studied by Congress calls for just such an inventory.

The AIA supports the concept. Infrastructure inventories can be important tools in determining funding priorities and schedules.

However, the AIA also believes that such inventories would be best carried out on the State level as part of a State infrastructure plan. This plan would reflect national guidelines and criteria established by the administering Federal agency to insure consistency among these State inventories. What would these guidelines address? Such issues as the techniques to be used and the timely completion of the inventories following allocation of funds to the States.

Now, as far as the allocation of funds goes, the AIA believes that any funding mechanism should be based on relative needs. The formula that would determine these needs would include these factors:

Relative population according to the latest census or most recently updated population estimate;

The relative amount of infrastructure;

The relative age of that infrastructure; and

The degree of economic need or distress.

Through this approach, Congress would provide guidance to the executive branch, but it would leave to the administering agency the responsibility for working out the necessary technical details for constructing an allocation mechanism. Following this approach, the American people could be reasonably sure that their money would go where needed, not to deep-water terminals in North Dakota or irrigation projects in Maine.

However, the formula that I've just spelled out is missing one important element. It does not make the distinction between what is perceived to be needed by a community and what is desirable for the Nation as a whole.

To give you a hypothetical example of what I have in mind, let's consider what might be called a tale of two cities.

Community "A" located in the upper Midwest has an infrastructure that is more than a half century old. Although the area has plenty of water, the city loses nearly 18 percent of its water supply because of leaking and broken water mains. This is just one of the many problems that discourage economic growth and development in the inner city.

Community "B" has a different problem. It is located in the growing Southwest. It is a new city. Its infrastructure, such as it is, is adequate for a smaller city. But this town is bursting at the seams. Again, economic growth and development are being discouraged, but this time it's because water and sewer permits cannot be wrangled out of city hall.

The effect—economic stagnation—is the same in both communities. The cause of their problems—an inadequate infrastructure—is similar. But are they equal candidates for funding?

If funds are limited (as they surely will be), which community stands first in line? Which goes to the rear?

Here's another question. Should the Federal Government encourage the continued development of community "B" in a part of this Nation where the ecology is so fragile? At what point on the graph does the available supply of water fall below the rising population curve?

These are not easy questions to answer, but I see no way that we can afford not to raise them. If the infrastructure crisis is nationwide, and if the programs currently being proposed are, as they should be, nationwide in scope, then we are talking about nothing less than a master plan for this Nation's development.

We may balk at the prospect of Big Brother off in Washington telling us how our rural and urban areas should or should not develop. But a trillion dollars targeted at America's infrastructure is going to have a pretty big impact. It will shape how we look in a big way by the year 2000.

The only question is will this shaping be informed by a broad, informed public consensus as to what this Nation should be, or will we be treated to the spectacle of a rabble of local interests putting the squeeze on their local representatives to raid the U.S. Treasury for turkey projects brought in on a one-time basis? This is how it's worked in the past in the absence of a broad nationwide agreement as to how this Nation should grow, which is at least part of the reason why we find ourselves in this room worrying about the sorry state of our infrastructure.

Who will assist the public in the development of this kind of informed consensus so that priorities are determined by true national needs and broad quality of life issues? Partly, at least, the challenge falls to us in the construction industry. We have the training and the practical experience to help them through their elected Representatives to work for the building of a better America.

What this means, practically speaking, is working together as an industry. Your meeting here and the clout you have together in this community is a model for the industry. But that's just the beginning.

It means proposing legislation through our representatives. It means monitoring closely all legislation pertinent to the issue, always being prepared to testify in support of or in opposition to legislation or provisions of individual pieces of legislation that are inadequate to the task at hand.

It means addressing the public directly in a variety of forums: town meetings, at the luncheons of community service organizations, in the newspapers, in magazine articles, on television—always stressing not only the gravity of the problem, but the opportunities afforded by a commitment to addressing the challenge.

This involves becoming informed, each one of us. Here, our individual professional associations can play a key role in gathering information and disseminating it clearly and concisely to Members.

It also involves developing a mind set that sees opportunity rather than crisis: the opportunity for America to be a better place in which to live, and the opportunity of our industry to be of service in realizing this vision of our Nation's future.

If this sounds idealistic, believe me, I have no illusions about the difficulties we as an industry and we as a society face in getting from where we are now to where we can and should be. For example, we will have to contend with the fact that State and local politicians want to enjoy all the short-term political benefits that accompany the imposition of tax limitations, while also maintaining services at current or still greater levels at Federal expense. These are the same politicans who refuse to isolate any line item in the whole of the Federal budget as suitable for substantial reduction, object to any evidence of Federal concern about how these monies are spent, and yet call in ever greater numbers for a balanced Federal budget!

But, as I said at the opening of my remarks, the time for action will never be better than it is right now. The public has begun to listen to what many of us have been saying for some time now about the deterioration of our Nation's infrastructure. In the absence of any remedial action, that deterioration will only worsen as each day passes.

The patient is sick, but far from terminal. We have the know-how and I believe that we have the resources. What we need is the commitment to translate the know-how and the resources into action.

The effort must begin at the grassroots level, here in Dallas and in communities across this Nation. Are we up to the task?

This is a question that we as professionals and as a people will answer one way or another in the coming months. I believe we have the ability to answer yes. I hope we have the strength and vision to do so.

Thank you.●

RUN JEFF RUN

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I would like to call to the attention of this distinguished body the efforts of one young man who has begun a cross-country run from Boston to Los Angeles to raise money for the American Cancer Society and the National Handicapped Sports and Recreation Association. His courageous undertaking will not only benefit these organizations but will touch the lives of all people across out Nation.

In 1974, Jeff Keith faced a major battle for life when, at the age of 12, he was diagnosed as having cancer. As a result, Jeff's right leg was amputated. Since then, Jeff has distinguished himself as a formidable athlete. He was a varsity lacross player at Boston College and was the only amputee to compete against 500 others in last year's triathalon at Lake Mahopac in New York. He finished 13th in the 1½-mile swim event and completed the 28-mile bike race and 10-mile run among more than 300 remaining competitors.

In a campaign called Run Jeff Run, Jeff Keith will complete the 3,300-mile journey in about 6 months. During his run, he will visit rehabilitation centers and hospitals in 20 States.

Jeff has already begun. On June 5 he began his journey from Boston and is here in Washington this week before starting across the country to Los Angeles.

As you know, Mr. President, my son Ted underwent a similar tragedy early in his life. But as a family, we always believed that nothing could stop Teddy from doing anything in life and that the only obstacles that one must overcome are the ones we create ourselves. Jeff Keith subscribes to that same philosophy and describes his trek as "just another challenge in my life, and I know I'll rise to meet it."

Jeff Keith is also challenging us, as people and as a nation, to understand that handicapped people are people first. They are individuals who face physical and mental challenges and who have the ability to participate in life as fully as any citizen in this country. Jeff is showing us the way to meet this attitudinal challenge and we must follow him. He is doing the physical work for us, we must help him with our words and actions.

I commend Jeff Keith for his commitment to himself and to people who are physically and mentally challenged. I commend him for his commitment to assist us to better understand and accept more fully each individual for the valuable contributions each has to offer our great Nation. My thoughts will be with Jeff during his cross-country run. Los Angeles is his destination, but it is my hope that here in the Senate and across the United States, we will continue to meet the challenge this young man has given us long after he has triumphed.●

SUPERFUND REAUTHORIZATION

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, though we face a tight legislative schedule over the next 2 weeks, it is imperative that we take time to consider the Superfund reauthorization. Today I am submitting a sound analysis of this critical issue by my colleague from Ohio Congressman DENNIS ECKART.

Under the Reagan administration, EPA has completed cleanup on only 6 of the 546 national priority sites. We cannot tolerate further delay in implementing the Superfund. Congress should send a clear signal to the administration and the public that we are committed to aggressively enforcing Superfund and to renewing our commitment to the protection of public health and the environment from toxic poisons.

I ask that Congressman ECKART's article and an accompanying editorial be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

HAZARDOUS WASTE SUPERFUND NEEDS A SUPER OVERHAUL

(By Dennis E. Eckart)

Since Congress enacted the so-called Superfund program more than three years ago, the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) has cleaned up only six hazardous chemical waste sites, only two with direct assistance from the Superfund. Surely, this snail-like pace is prescription for disaster.

If Superfund is supposed to be an effective war against hazardous chemical waste dumps, then we have yet to fire the first shot. And if this is a marathon, then the EPA is in danger of failing to reach the finish line. At the present cleanup rate it's going to take the agency 273 years to clean up the 546 hazardous chemical waste sites on the national priorities list.

Unfortunately, the EPA is proving that lethargy is the common enemy of progress and good government. And, as is the case with many other issues in Washington, neglect of a problem becomes our worst enemy and intransigence is the ally of that neglect. Under the administration of President Reagan, EPA seems to have forgotten its mission: that "protection" of the environment and the public health and welfare is what its mission is all about.

The record becomes all the more disturbing when one analyzes the magnitude of the nation's hazardous waste problem. Consider, for example, that there are probably 1,000 to 2,200 other hazardous waste sites waiting in the wings to be added to the national priorities list. Consider, too, that a study paid for by the Chemical Manufacturers Association estimates—probably conservatively—that there are 13,400 "inactive" hazardous waste dumps littering the nation's landscape. At least 3,700 of these are likely to require some federal assistance in the cleanup process.

In evaluating hazardous waste sites for the national priorities list, the EPA has identified at least 444 separate chemical pollutants. An agency task force reports that "virtually all of the most commonly encountered of these are known to exhibit chronic toxicity and therefore may cause human health injuries after months or years at extremely low levels of exposure."

There is ample evidence of these chemical pollutants mixing with one another and leaking into ground-water supplies. An EPA study estimates that 29 percent of the ground-water supplies of larger communities contain chemical contaminants. Of the 546 hazardous waste sites now on the national priorities list, more than 300 pose a threat to water supplies. Serious cases of chemically contaminated water have been reported in 34 states.

The Harvard School of Public Health has found increases of illness in children who drank chemically contaminated water in some neighborhoods of Woburn, Mass. The Harvard study in Woburn also found that it is no exaggeration to argue that the hazardous waste problem poses a threat to those yet unborn.

The House is considering a bill to fundamentally reform the Superfund program. The original five-year, $1.6 billion program is likely to be able to finance the cleanup of only about 170 of the 546 hazardous waste sites on the national priorities list. The new bill proposes to expand Superfund to a five-year, $9 billion program. At the very least the reforms under consideration would begin to more significantly address the scope of a problem on which Congress's

Office of Technology Assessment has put a $10 billion to $40 billion price tag.

More important, the new Superfund bill contains strict provisions requiring the EPA to respond to a reasonable and timely cleanup schedule. It's time to give the agency explicit cleanup orders that force more aggressive and effective action. Congress can no longer afford to rely on the EPA to act based on implied and well-intentioned discretionary authority in the language of the Superfund law.

The new legislation also addresses the serious issue of compensation for victims of hazardous waste sites. The present Superfund program fails to provide any adequate remedies for health care costs or deaths associated with exposure to hazardous chemical wastes.

The Judicial system and programs such as workers, compensation in the states have failed to provide proper assistance to victims of hazardous wastes. The new legislation establishes a strict right to sue either in state or federal courts and puts into effect a uniform statute of limitations that is fair and reasonable to victims of hazardous wastes.

Surely, the case for reform is persuasive. Preserving the status quo is unacceptable. Business as usual won't do. Superfund must be made to mean what its title implies. Otherwise we will continue to put in jeopardy the health of too many of our citizens. People who suffer hardship essentially through no fault of their own have a basic right to petition their government for assistance. And a government worthy of their trust and confidence must respond in a proper and fitting fashion.

SUPERSLOW

Congress needs to get its act together on an issue that remains largely overlooked by a considerable segment of the American people:

The need for an expanded "Superfund" to clean up hazardous waste.

Unfortunately, Congress as a whole has dragged its feet on the issue this year, despite the fact that the current Superfund legislation expires in September 1985. That may seem a long way off, but considering the time it takes to put new laws in place, to staff regulatory agencies, and to bring industry up to date on changes in existing regulations, September 1985 can be said to be just around the corner.

Besides, there is legitimate concern among environmentalists that if Congress waits to enact new legislation until next year—after the November presidential election—there will be insufficient public pressure on lawmakers to enact a truly meaningful bill.

Environmental legislation could well be lost in the shuffle of the deficit-reduction and tax-reform measures that are expected to dominate the 1985 legislative agenda.

Such concerns ought not be taken lightly.

Just how important is this business of cleaning up waste dumps throughout the United States? Very important. The Environmental Protection Agency, for example, has identified more than 540 hazardous waste dumps. Moreover, there are some 17,000 sites that are considered dangerous.

Unfortunately, as pointed out by US Rep. Dennis E. Eckart in an article on today's Opinion page, since Congress enacted the Superfund program more than three years ago, the EPA has cleaned up only six hazardous waste sites.

At that rate, Mr. Eckart wryly notes, it would take the EPA 273 years to clean up all those sites.

The House Energy and Commerce Committee, to its credit, has cleared a $9 billion Superfund bill that, among other considerations, set stringent timetables for cleaning up chemical dumps.

Many legislative hurdles remain—both on the House side and, particularly, on the Senate side. In the Senate, a measure will first have to clear the committee level. It is not expected that a bill will come before the full Senate until later this year—assuming strong support emerges in that chamber for such a measure.

Such a snail's-pace effort need not be accepted by the American people.

It is time to clean up America's far too many hazardous waste sites. That means that Congress must move ahead with greater dispatch on Superfund legislation.●

THE AMERICAN STEEL INDUSTRY: MYTH VERSUS REALITY: X

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, today I present my 10th in a series of brief statements that will appear periodically in an effort to elevate the level of debate on the crisis in the American steel industry.

On June 20, 1984, Mr. Eric Hanushek of the Congressional Budget Office testified before the Subcommittee on Trade of the House Committee on Ways and Means. At that time, Mr. Hanushek submitted a summary of a forthcoming CBO study outlining the causes of the steel industry's problems and the potential effects on steel prices of S. 2380, the Fair Trade in Steel Act of 1984. The American Iron and Steel Institute recently released a statement commenting on the CBO analysis and questioning some of its projections, while pointing out other facts the study omitted. I would like today to discuss these AISI comments concerning the CBO study.

Today's presentation is part of a continuing effort on my part to make available all of the facts concerning the state of the American steel industry. Those participating in the current debate taking place in the Congress and the administration this summer are those who have the power and the responsibility to restore the steel industry to competitive health.

MYTH

The CBO summary identifies three fundamental trends as the primary causes of the American steel industry's deteriorating performance: First, the shifting of steel production to developing countries; second, declining U.S. steel intensity—consumption of steel per dollar of GNP; and third, greater use of minimills, rather than the impact of unfair foreign import competition.

REALITY

The American Iron & Steel Institute has responded to each of the identified trends. First, CBO did not take the effect of subsidies and foreign market protection into account when discussing shifts in production and consumption worldwide. Subsidization practices abroad have led to an excess steelmaking capacity outside the United States of 200 million tons, including capacity financed by $12 billion of developed country funds which enabled the sale of steel plant and equipment to less developed countries. In addition to subsidization, foreign governments have essentially closed much of their market to foreign competitors, leaving only the U.S. market as a potential dumping ground for excess steel. The failure of the world steel market system has been the principal problem for the U.S. industry, and is not even mentioned by the CBO study.

Although steel intensity has declined in the United States, the change is attributable mainly to a lack of growth in the U.S. steel industry compared to the rest of the economy. Actual steel consumption in the United States has remained remarkably consistent except for the 1982 and 1983 recession years. The most dramatic change has been in the source of steel consumed and the increase in import penetration levels as other world steel producers have sought to export their excess production to the United States at prices well below cost.

Third, the importance of growth in the minimill sector of the steel industry has been overestimated. The increased market share enjoyed by these producers has not been a major factor in the "deteriorating performance" of the basic steel companies. Minimills concentrate on lower value, high volume and limited product lines; often a limited range of plate and heavy structurals. Dependence on the price and availability of scrap supplies and America's need for an integrated steel industry will work to cap growth in the minimill sector.

MYTH

Price effects of a 15-percent steel quota are likely to be severe.

REALITY

AISI believes that the CBO estimates for 1985 and 1986 are not realistic or consistent with those of any other analyst. For example, CBO predicts an increase in domestic prices of about 16.6 percent in 1985 without a quota, nearly impossible considering the magnitude of world steel overcapacity, modest recovery in U.S. demand and continued intense competition in the U.S. market. Past experience shows price changes of this magnitude are highly unlikely except where dumped and subsidized foreign steel price effects are eliminated and intense domestic competition restrained.

CBO estimates of price increases are so high compared to present levels that most are entirely inconsistent with other analysts. By 1986, without a quota, CBO projections show steel prices rising 25.7 percent higher than World Steel Dynamic's estimates of current levels. A 15-percent quota shows prices rising about 37 percent above estimates of current price levels.

CBO's analysis of price effects ignores the "costs" of foreign steel imports to the balance of the U.S. economy while concentrating only on benefits to the consumer of lower priced imports. A recent CRS study showed that each dollar of domestic steel industry sales supports an additional $1.20 of activity throughout the rest of the economy. Each job in the domestic steel industry supports 2.35 jobs in supply industries, retailing, wholesale trade, and government. Government gains $473 in taxes for every $1,000 in domestic industry sales. The effects of a 15-percent quota as estimated by AISI would increase tax revenues to a level equal to the "costs" estimated by CBO. Additional advantages include maintaining $28 billion in economic activity, saving 199,000 jobs in this country, and the complete modernization and rationalization of one of this country's basic industries. Clearly, economic benefits outweigh the costs of removing the price and volume suppression effects associated with dumped and subsidized steel.

MYTH

The American steel industry has lost its comparative advantage and can no longer compete in its home market.

REALITY

In recent years, the American steel industry's competitive position has improved dramatically, due to a reduction of $100 per ton in pretax costs since 1982. In fact, World Steel Dynamic's carbon steel model shows for the second quarter of 1984, U.S. total costs per net ton shipped at $478.06. Many imported products were sold in the U.S. market at prices much lower than production costs. World Steel Dynamic's data also shows U.S. steel producers ranking with Japanese producers in terms of productivity. For example, U.S. man-hours per net ton shipped at actual operating rates equaled 6.48 in the third quarter of 1983 while Japan's equaled 7.28, West Germany's 11.42, France's 11.62, and the United Kingdom's 11.31 for the same period. CBO's report did not acknowledge any improvement for the U.S. industry in costs or productivity.

MYTH

Steel firms are unable to maintain the level of investment they claim they need because of dispersed investment among numerous plants, a lack of market focus, and a low rate of return.

REALITY

Until 1982, the U.S. industry was the most profitable major integrated steel industry in the world, reinvesting more in steel operations than it received in cash-flow. U.S. producers did reduce capacity in the face of lower demand by 35 million tons, absorbing their own shutdown costs unlike other producers whose rationalization processes were subsidized by their government. This has caused the U.S. industry's financial position to deteriorate.

The dispersal of industry investment over too many plants can be solved by expanding the capital funds available for investment or by shutting down plants. Presently, AISI says that the U.S. industry does not have the capacity to supply even our own domestic market in a time of only moderate demand. Yet growing amounts of dumped and subsidized imports have hindered domestic plant modernization, limiting capital funds available for reinvestment and forcing many facilities to be closed.

The inefficient foreign producers, artificially maintained by life-support systems of government subsidies have made it difficult for private producers to earn adequate profits to attract funds for investment. Most other nations realize the importance of the domestic production of integrated steel to their national interest, yet CBO seems to propose that the United States react differently. The U.S. steel industry needs temporary import relief in order to reestablish its competitiveness in a world industry dominated by foreign government-controlled producers.

Mr. President, I ask that the comments of the American Iron and Steel Institute on the June 20, 1984 statement of the Congressional Budget Office be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The comments follow:

COMMENTS OF THE AMERICAN IRON & STEEL INSTITUTE ON THE JUNE 20, 1984, STATEMENT OF THE CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE

On June 20, 1984 the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) presented a statement to the Trade Subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means commenting on H.R. 5081, the Fair Trade in Steel Act of 1984.

AISI believes that the CBO has omitted major facts in its analysis of the current problems of the U.S. steel industry. Moreover, the CBO statement contains projected data which are not an accurate representation of the industry's present position and its near-term prospects for the future.

CBO STATEMENT OF CAUSES OF THE STEEL INDUSTRY'S PROBLEMS

CBO says the primary causes of the United States (traditional steel industry's) deteriorating performance are to be found not in unfair foreign competition . . . but in three more fundamental trends:

Steel production and consumption have gradually shifted away from their traditional centers in Europe and North America to developing countries;

The U.S. has been consuming less steel per dollar of GNP;

Mini-mills, according to CBO, now account for about 18% of domestic steel output.

AISI RESPONSE

Effect of subsidies and foreign market protection not acknowledged

CBO's major omission is its failure to acknowledge the fact that over the past 15 years, foreign governments have provided $40 to $50 billion of subsidies to their steel industries. These foreign government subsidies have permitted inefficient and unprofitable firms to maintain steel production and upgrade facilities, while sustaining massive losses, thus contributing to the present overhang on the market of at least 200 million tons of excess capacity outside the United States. This includes capacity financed by up to $12 billion of developed country funding for the sale of steel plant and equipment to less developed countries. In addition, subsidization of foreign steel industries has been combined with a substantial closure of their own markets to foreign competition. European Community bilateral agreements with other producing nations and the effective insulation of the Japanese market from imported products are key examples of this phenomenon. Moreover, imported steel typically doesn't enter developing countries if those countries themselves can produce the products concerned. The huge excess capacity built up by subsidization has been forced to find an outlet in the only major market left open, i.e. the U.S. The result has been a breakdown in the international steel trade market mechanism, since the market has not disciplined inefficient or rewarded efficient producers. These subsidies have removed the link between market share, profits and investment flows. The attendant breakdown in the market system has caused major increases in imports at uneconomic prices. It is this failure of the world steel market system that has been the principal problem of the U.S. industry, and the one which CBO has not identified.

Decline in intensity

As to the decline in steel intensity, it is correct that the steel component of U.S. GNP has been declining, but that is also true in all the major developed countries of the West in the past decade, during a period when most of these countries were expanding their steel capacity and dependence on export markets, when the U.S. industry was not.

The data below show there has been no appreciable decline in actual steel consumption in the United States, except in 1982 and 1983, during the most severe recession since World War II. What has dramatically changed is the source of steel consumed—namely the growth of imports into the U.S., as other world steel producers desperately sought to export their excess production at prices below their costs:

CBO does not acknowledge that an offsetting factor is a gradual increase in the value of steel products shipped, as steel users have increased their demand for higher value, lighter high strength and treated steels.

While the CBO alludes to the impact of declining "steel intensity," the conclusion is hardly consistent with its optimistic econometric analysis showing 111–115 million tons of apparent consumption by 1989.

Growth of minimills

In general, mini-mills make and ship rod and other billet-related products. They now account for about 16% of U.S. production (and not the 18% asserted by CBO). Minimills do not produce anything like a full range of steel mill products. They do not, for example, produce any sheets or tubular products and they produce only a limited range of plates and heavy structurals. Moreover, they will not be able to expand their product lines into heavier shapes or flat rolled products without major facility investments. Their growth in the past 10-15 years, however, has been rapid. It has been at the expense of both imports and other domestic steel producers and is due, in part, to their concentration on lower value, high volume, limited product lines. However their increased market share in recent years has not been a major factor in the "deteriorating performance" of the basic steel companies.

But comparing the position of mini-mills to integrated carbon steel producers is an invalid comparison. If CBO is truly interested in assessing the competitive position of the U.S. integrated carbon steel industry, it should draw comparisions with the major integrated carbon steel industries of the EC and Japan, which together with the U.S., still account for 70–75% of free world raw steel production. Comparisons with producers in developing countries that are almost totally subsidized, are less relevant.

CBO STATEMENT ON EFFECT OF STEEL QUOTAS ON PRICES

CBO has developed an econometric model attempting to assess the effects of H.R. 5081/S. 2380 on prices, demand, shipments, import share, and employment. From this model, CBO has made the following projections of price increases, without a quota, and with one in place.

[Dollars per net ton]

Average price	1983 actual	1984 [1]	1985	1984 to 1985 increase [1] (percent)	1986	1985 to 1986 increase [1] (percent)
Base case (no quota)	$484	$480–485	$564	16.0	$607	7.6
H.R. 5081/S. 2380 (15 percent quota)	484		613	26.6	657	7.2

AISI RESPONSE

CBO estimates for 1985 and 1986 are not realistic or consistent with those of other analysts

Steel industry average realized prices were approximately $480 to $485 in the first half of 1984, according to data from the World Steel Dynamics model. During that period, average pre-tax costs were about $483 according to WSD. This suggests the industry operated close to the break-even point in the first half of 1984. Industry financial data tend to confirm this. The CBO report forecasts an increase in domestic steel prices of about 16.6% in 1985 without a quota, a remarkable projection given the overhang of world steel capacity on the market, only modest recovery in the U.S. demand and the continuing intense competition in the U.S. market.

Although the steel industry needs and could utilize the additional funds such an increase would provide to it, on the basis of past experience increased price realizations of this magnitude are highly unlikely, absent the elimination of the price depressing effect of dumped and subsidized foreign steel, and the intense competition among U.S. producers.

CBO has projected the rate of inflation at 5%. Assuming a corresponding 5% increase in U.S. carbon steel pretax costs (from the 1984 level set forth in the WSD model), this would increase average costs to a level of approximately $504–$509 per ton in 1985.

The CBO realized price projection of $564 per ton without a quota, would produce 1985 pretax profits of $55 to $60 per ton, or $4.6 to $5 billion, at the level of shipments projected by CBO. AISI knows of no serious analyst in or outside the steel industry who is projecting profits of this magnitude in 1985, without quantitative restraints.

With a quota in place in 1985, the CBO projects that average prices will reach $613 per ton, a level about 26.4% higher than the level of 1984 realized prices estimated by WSD. Given the above average estimated costs of $504 to $509 per ton in 1985, we calculate that a CBO's projected price level, with a quota, pretax profits next year would be $8.7 to $9.1 billion. Either with quotas or without them, CBO appears to have solved almost all the near term capital and modernization problems of the steel industry. CBO has accomplished this by estimates of price increases so high compared to their present levels, as to be totally inconsistent with those of most analysts and to approach the absurd.

By 1986, without a quota, CBO projects steel prices will rise about 25.7% above the WSD estimate of their current level. According to CBO, a 15% quota would cause prices to rise about 37% above the WSD estimate of the current realized price level.

CBO does not acknowledge the offsetting benefits of quantitative limitations

CBO says that in 1989, average prices would be 9% higher with the quota than without it.[1]

The CBO analysis emphasizes the potential price increases resulting from quotas. CBO's analysis should also recognize the "costs" of foreign steel. While the consumer may temporarily enjoy lower prices due to imports that are subsidized or dumped, there are substantial costs imposed on the balance of the U.S. economy.

A recent Congressional Research Service study concluded that each dollar of domestic steel industry sales supports an additional $1.20 of activity throughout the rest of the economy. Also, each direct job in domestic steel supports an additional 2.35 jobs with suppliers, retail and wholesale trade, and government. Government revenues are also affected, as each $1000 in domestic industry sales generate direct and indirect taxes amounting to $473.

The following summarizes the estimated "cost" to the U.S. economy from steel imports that exceeded 15% of the market in 1983:

Steel industry shipments lost	4.6 million tons.
Steel industry sales	$2.3 billion.
Total impact on GNP	$5.1 billion.
Government taxes	$1.1 billion lost.
Unemployment benefits	$350 million paid.
Jobs, direct and indirect	62,000 last.

The above summary does not take into account the total injury imports caused from price and volume suppression in 1983, only the increment of imports exceeding 15% of consumption.

CBO's estimates that the difference in domestic industry revenues between the quota and non-quota cases amounts to $12.8 billion in 1989.

Using the Congressional Research Service analysis, the benefit to the economy from CBO's quota case would be:

Increased steel industry sales	$12.8 billion.
Total impact on GNP	$28.0 billion.
Increased Government taxes collected	$6.1 billion.
Increased jobs, direct and indirect	119,000.

The impact of increased tax collection alone would nearly equal the "cost" described by CBO. Add to that the spin-off effects of keeping $28 billion in economic activity, 119,000 jobs in this country and the long term benefit of complete modernization and rationalization of one of the nation's basic industries. Clearly the balance of economic benefit outweighs the cost of removing the price and volume suppression associated with dumped and subsidized foreign steel.

CBO report does not recognize reduction in price levels which continue in 1984

In its report, CBO provided little information on recent prices and costs. To provide some perspective on this, listed below are WSD model estimates of realized prices and costs for 1981 through the first half of 1984.

	U.S. operating rate (percent)	Dollars per net ton shipped
		Domestic list price	Realized price	Pretax cost at actual operating rate
Year:
1981	85.68	522.96	514.99	494.90
1982	54.54	548.57	516.53	579.77

1984
January			476	490
February			476	486
March			476	478
April			483	480

[1] In its prehearing brief before the U.S. International Trade Commission, the U.S. Federal Trade Commission estimated an increase in domestic prices of $5 per ton as a result of a 15-percent quota on steel imports. A $5 per ton increase is less than a 1-percent increase in domestic steel prices.

The difference between CBO's projection of a $564/ton price level in 1985 without a quota, and $613 with a quota is about $49 per ton, or 8.7% higher than CBO's projected price level without a quota. We have already pointed to the inconsistency of these figures with other estimates. But applying CBO's projected percentage increase of 8.7% to WSD's current estimated realized price of $480-485 per ton would result in a 1985 price level of $527/ton. This is only $11 or 2.1% higher than the realized price level which WSD estimates actually occurred in 1981-1982. Furthermore, the price level of $527/ton is substantially lower ($37/ton) than CBO's price estimate without a quota, and $86/ton lower than CBO's price estimate with a quota.

CBO STATES THE U.S. INDUSTRY HAS LOST COMPARATIVE ADVANTAGE

CBO says that "by and large," the competitive problems of traditional American steel companies reflect adverse cost trends and a shift in comparative advantage away from the United States.

AISI RESPONSE

CBO did not recognize cost reductions which occurred in 1983 and 1984

Present cost relationships show that it is incorrect to contend that the U.S. industry can no longer compete in its home market. Second quarter 1984 data from the World Steel Dynamics carbon steel model show that even with current misaligned exchange rates the U.S. steel industry is now cost competitive in the U.S. market. This is shown below:

[Costs per net ton shipped [1] 2d quarter 1984 (at actual operating rates)] [2]

	U.S.	Japan	West Germany	France	U.K.

[1] Table 5, World Steel Dynamics, Steel Strategist No. 9, February 1984—Paine Webber Mitchell Hutchins, Inc.

[2] The U.S. advantage would be less if each industry were able to operate at or close to capacity. Since 1975, low operating rates have been a serious burden for all major steel industries, but the U.S. industry, except for 1982 and 1983, has operated at consistently higher levels of capacity utilization than its major competitors. Over a long period of time, potential efficiency from a potentially high rate of capacity utilization becomes meaningless as a measure of efficiency, if market demand does not produce a sufficiently high level of utilization. Persistent excess capacity represents a managerial error which the market will not condone, regardless of the potential efficiency of the facilities which are idle. Given the persistent under-utilization of capacity in the E.C. and Japan, the use of a "standard" operating rate rather than an actual rate to measure efficiency against that of the U.S. is meaningless.

[3] More recent data on pretax costs from the WSD model show that total costs for the 2d quarter 1984 average $481 per net ton, due to a lower actual operating rate than earlier estimated. This however does not change the conclusion that the U.S. industry is generally cost competitive in its home market.

The domestic industry's competitive position has improved substantially since 1982, due to a reduction of about $100 per ton in pre-tax costs (approximately 17%) according to WSD. CBO did not acknowledge in its report this major reduction in costs.

CBO did not acknowledge most imports have been entering the United States at prices below costs of productions

The average value of steel imports entering the U.S., listed below, show that steel import values continue to be well under costs of production (per net ton shipped, as set forth on previous page) for most of the countries exporting to the United States. This is true for imports from both developed and developing countries, in 1983-84.

CBO did not recognize recent gains in U.S. labor productivity

Latest data set forth below show that the U.S. steel industry ranks with Japanese producers in terms of labor productivity at actual operating rates for carbon steel production by integrated producers. Given the inability of the U.S. industry to invest sufficiently to fully modernize, its carbon steel labor productivity represents a solid performance in comparison with the results achieved by foreign industries in newer plants built with government support.

The WSD data on carbon steel productivity are believed to be the most accurate available public data. In the case of Japan, for example, they are based upon official government data adjusted for comparable product mix, including contracted-out workers, but excluding contract construction workers. They are cross-checked against actual plant data.

CBO omitted any comment in its report on the recent substantial increase in productivity which has occurred in the U.S. industry.

CBO COMMENTS ON STEEL INDUSTRY INVESTMENT

CBO queries why integrated steel firms have such difficulty achieving the level of investment they claim they need, saying the problem cannot be blamed on capital markets, but instead on dispersion of investment among numerous plants, lacking market focus, and producing low rates of return.

AISI RESPONSE

What CBO omits saying is that for two decades, until 1982, the U.S. industry was the most profitable major integrated steel industry in the world, and that it invested substantially more in steel operations than it derived in cash flow from those operations. Due to massive plant shut-downs, the U.S. industry did reduce its capacity by 35 million tons in just a few years, a capacity loss about double the current size of the British, Canadian or Korean steel industries. Although developing country steel industries continue to install steel capacity—much of it not justified economically—various kinds of capacity reductions are occurring around the world among developed country steel industries—even in Japan. Typically, however, this rationalization process is being subsidized by governments, in sharp contrast to the rationalization occurring in the U.S. industry, which is absorbing its own shut-down costs. In the last two years, the U.S. industry's financial position has deteriorated sharply. By year-end 1983, the industry had a debt to equity ratio of more than 80%, and a decline in equity amounting to more than $5 billion. Existing capital expenditures are now disbursed over fewer plants—at a very heavy cost in both human and financial terms.

CBO says that industry investment has been dispersed over too many plants. The only way to solve this problem is either to expand the capital funds available for investment—which increasing imports have prevented the industry from doing—or shut down plants—which the industry has been compelled to do by losses stemming from increasing imports during the worst recession in the industry's history. In the 1970s, most of the major world steel industries were expanding, adding to the excess capacity in the world, while the U.S. industry did not. The U.S. industry, which does not have sufficient capacity to supply the domestic market in a period of only moderately strong demand, had some hope in the 1970s that a combination of market forces and an enlightened public policy response to dumped and subsidized imports would permit existing plants to be modernized. What has occurred are shut-downs of many facilities, seriously impairing the corporate financial structure of steel companies.

CBO, however, is pretending in its report that the real steel market has functioned in the past as it should, and still is functioning; allocating capital and rewarding the relatively efficient with adequate profits and stable employment—when it is not. From 1976 through 1981, the U.S. steel industry, based upon its profits, should have been one of the most attractive targets in the world for integrated steel investment. But Western world data show that the industries with the worst profit performance, utilizing massive assistance from their governments, have been among the most aggressive in undertaking capital investment. As long as inefficient foreign producers are artificially maintained by a life-support system of massive government subsidies, it is difficult for private producers to earn adequate profits to attract funds for investment. That is what has happened to U.S. steel producers.

We also note that integrated carbon steel investment, worldwide, has shown a far lower return on investment in every industrial country than the average for all manufacturing. Yet almost all advanced industrial countries regard their domestic production of integrated carbon steel . . . the overwhelming share of their domestic supply . . . as vital to their national interest. These facts are easy to substantiate. Yet CBO seems to infer the U.S. should react differently in this regard.

Steel is a vital part of our economy—the fourth largest industry in the United States. But its future prospects will be determined in large measure by our Government's response to the flood of dumped and subsidized imports.

The steel industry needs government action to re-establish the conditions by which the United States can preserve a competitive, privately held steel industry, in a world industry for which foreign government control and direction of steel industries has become the norm.●

A TIME OF REMEMBRANCE

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to cosponsor Senate Joint Resolution 336 recently introduced by my distinguished colleague, the junior Senator from Alabama. This resolution would designate October 23, 1984, as "A time of Remembrance" for all victims of terrorism.

Each year, on Memorial Day, this Nation honors those American servicemen who died for their country in the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, World Wars I and II, the Korean War, and Vietnam. The sacrifice of those who have fallen in a different kind of war is no less memorable.

Throughout the world, service men and women, government officials, innocent civilians, and harmless children are victims of an undeclared war being waged by terrorists against our society and its institutions. During the past 10 years, 3,500 people have died in almost 6,500 terrorist incidents. More than 7,600 people have been wounded in these incidents. Over 2,500 of these incidents claimed American citizens as victims.

The victims of terrorism may be world famous figures, such as Pope John Paul II, people doing their everyday jobs, such as Yvonne Fletcher—a policewomen in London, a tourist drinking a cup of coffee in a Paris cafe, or a child playing in the streets of Beirut.

The victim of terrorism may be murdered in cold blood like Dennis Keough in Namibia, kidnaped like Jeremy Levine, the Cable News Network Bureau Chief in Beirut, or wounded in body or spirit like the Americans taken hostage in the Tehran embassy.

The victims of terrorism are caught in the crossfire of events beyond their control. They are casualties of a policy of terror practiced by cold-hearted, merciless criminals. We must not forget the suffering of these victims and their loved ones.

I commend the No Greater Love organization for initiating this action to honor the victims of terrorism. No Greater Love has planned a program for October 23, 1984, with the theme "Let Peace Take Root." The symbol of the program is a purple ribbon representing patriotism, dignity, loyalty, and martyrdom.

I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring Senate Joint Resolution 336 and in wearing the purple ribbon on October 23.●

U.S. CONFERENCE OF MAYORS HOUSING SURVEY

● Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I rise today to bring to my colleagues' attention an important study recently completed by the U.S. Conference of Mayors on "Housing Needs and Conditions in America's Cities." This survey of 66 cities was undertaken this spring by the Conference of Mayors in an attempt to provide an objective look at the housing problems facing our great cities.

The findings of this major survey are sobering.

Fully 77 percent of the cities surveyed stated that demand for assisted housing in their communities had increased over the last year. Not one of the cities surveyed indicated that demand had gone down.

In response to another question, the cities reported an average wait of 20 months of assistance of all types in their communities—that is nearly a 2-year interval between the time a family applies for and is certified as eligible for assistance and the time they actually receive it.

While this figure itself is unsettling, an even more staggering range of waiting periods for assistance was revealed by the survey—while at least one city reported no wait at all for all types of assistance, another reported a 302-month wait for family section 8 certificates. Mr. President, that is over 25 years before receiving a certificate.

Finally, the survey found that even when assistance is available, many families are simply unable to find suitable units in the so-called free market and must relinquish the subsidy. A total of 55 percent of the respondents said that 25 percent or more of the section 8 certificates they issued were eventually returned by recipients who could not find housing qualified for the program.

The U.S. Conference of mayors is a nonpartisan organization representing the Mayors of America's principal cities in Washington. Its findings are an indictment of the current policies approved by both the Congress and the administration concerning lower income housing assistance.

While needy Americans are forced to wait as long as 25 years for assistance, the Federal Government has cut subsidy commitments for lower income housing from nearly $30 billion in fiscal year 1980 to $11 billion in fiscal year 1985. We have repeatedly been told that housing vouchers—a watered down version of the section 8 existing housing program—could solve our housing problems. Yet the figures provided in this report cast grave doubt on this assertion.

I am proud to have successfully sponsored legislation in this Congress which, with the help of colleagues from both sides of the aisle, we were able to enact into law last year. Yet the appropriations we have been able to secure for the Housing Development Grant and Rental Rehabilitation Programs—$615 million over 2 years—are totally inadequate to the task.

Despite decades of dedication to the goal of a decent home in a suitable living environment for all Americans, our country today is actually losing gains made in previous years. For a family facing an average 2-year wait for assistance, our progress to date must seem pitifully inadequate.

Mr. President, the U.S. Conference of Mayors has done a great service by undertaking this survey. I would like to have the full text of their important report included here in the RECORD so that all of my colleagues can study it in detail.

The remarks follow:

HOUSING NEEDS AND CONDITIONS IN AMERICA'S CITIES—A SURVEY OF THE NATION'S PRINCIPAL CITIES

SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

The overwhelming conclusion of the U.S. Conference of Mayors Survey on Housing Needs and Conditions is that the demand for housing assistance among lower income households is increasing, and that the resources available to meet this rising demand are inadequate.

A total of 77 percent of the respondents to the survey said that demand had increased over the last year. No respondents reported any decline whatsoever. The cities surveyed reported an average wait for housing assistance of 20 months for all types of assistance on which they reported, with the wait for Section 8 Existing Housing Certificates for families topping the list at 25 months' average wait. Moreover, these averages mask a range of waiting list lengths which is staggering. For instance, the longest wait recorded in the responses was 302 months, for family Section 8 certificates, while a waiting list of "0" months was recorded at least once for each particular type of housing for which information was sought.

The cities surveyed by the Conference of Mayors are a diverse sample of American cities. A total of 66 cities were included in the survey tabulations, with a total population of 26 million persons. The largest city included in the survey is Los Angeles, population of 2.97 million, and the smallest was Burlington, Vermont, population of 37,712. The average population of the cities covered in the survey is 394,000, and the median population 250,000.

The survey also shows a good distribution geographically around the country. The Northeast accounts for 23 percent of the total cities included; the South accounts for 21 percent; the North Central region accounts for 21 percent; the Southwest for 26 percent; and the Northwest for 9 percent of the total.

In addition, the surveyed cities have broad experience in the various assisted housing programs. All together, the surveyed cities reported that they contain 428,050 units of assisted housing of various kinds, ranging from a high of 36,320 units to a low of 235. The average number of assisted units in the survey is 6,485, while the median is 3,794.

Other major findings from the survey include the following:

Demand for assisted housing is so out of scale with available housing resources that 61 percent of the cities surveyed have closed their waiting lists to households seeking assistance.

Even when assistance is available, many recipients cannot use it because the housing market is so tight. For instance, 55 percent of the respondents reported that 25 percent or more of their Section 8 Existing Housing Certificates are eventually cancelled because recipients cannot find suitable units at acceptable rents.

The resources already in place in American cities are under severe stress, with the demand for rehabilitation and modernization funding far outstripping the funds available. The surveyed cities were asked to estimate their need for modernization funding in existing public housing. The total need came to $1.7 billion. However, the same cities estimated that they expect to receive only $218 million of this total—or 12 percent—in current modernization plans.

Cities perceive the most critical roadblocks to adequate housing for lower income people to be a lack of income, and inadequate or substandard dwelling units. Only a small minority of respondents believes either of these problems has improved over the last two years, and a large majority believes the problem of low income has gotten worse.

When asked if the private sector could meet local needs absent housing subsidies, 89 percent said "no."

Cities themselves are contributing funds for housing assistance through a variety of means, including Community Development Block Grants (CDBG) and direct contributions to public housing authorities. However, shrinking resources at the local level have meant cutbacks in some of these areas in the last two years.

FOREWORD

Since its founding in 1932, the U.S. Conference of Mayors has been a major force in the assisted housing field. Over this period, impressive progress has been made. Americans are better housed than ever before. Great strides have been made in eliminating dangerous housing conditions in many areas. The overall condition of American housing has improved tremendously since the federal involvement in this area began in 1934.

Yet despite this progress, housing remains one of the most pressing social issues confronting American Mayors today. Although over 60 percent of the American people currently own their own homes, millions of Americans can no longer even dream of buying a house. Although housing costs for millions of households have declined over the years, for many millions of other families, rent burdens are reaching intolerable proportions. During the decade of the 1970's, the median value of a home rose by 175 percent, and rents rose by 125 percent. In contrast, household income over the same period rose only 98 percent.

For lower income tenants, the situation has become particularly grim. During the 1970's the total number of units available to those earning $3,000 or less per year at 30 percent of income dropped by 75 percent, to a total of less than 1.5 million. The total number of households in this category declined by only 50 percent to a total of 2.9 million, leaving a shortfall in this income group alone of 1.4 million units.

Since 1978, the number of households living in poverty has increased by 32 percent, with 1 in 7 American—or 34.4 million persons—now living below the poverty line. Many of these households have been priced completely out of the private housing market.

In fact, 16 years after the adoption of national housing goals, the words of the 1968 Housing Goals and Annual Report still ring eerily true in urban America:

"The policies designed to contribute to the achievement of the national housing goal (realization as soon as feasible of the goal of a decent home and a suitable living environment for every American family) have not directed sufficient attention and resources to the preservation of existing housing and neighborhoods; that the deterioration and abandonment of housing for the nation's lower income families has accelerated over the last decade, and that this acceleration has contributed to neighborhood disintegration and has partially negated the progress toward achieving the national housing goal which has been made primarily through new construction."

Despite rising levels of poverty and homelessness, and the accelerated loss of low-income housing stock, budget cuts enacted by Congress since FY81 have reduced federal low income housing resources by almost 60 percent, the largest percentage reduction of any discretionary program category in the budget. The FY85 budget proposals from the Administration would have cut appropriations for housing assistance programs by an additional 38 percent from FY 84 levels.

Since 1934, when the Federal Housing Administration (FHA) was established, the country's track record in making housing affordable to millions of middle-class families has been unparalleled. But the fact that the President's 1981 Housing Commission could report that 7 million lower income households are paying more than 30 percent of their income for shelter and not receiving any federal housing assistance is vivid testimony to the unmet needs of lower income persons.

This survey provides information from cities all over the country on low income housing need and the resources available to meet it. The U.S. Conference of Mayors is committed to working with the Administration and the Congress to develop policies that will achieve the national housing goals. We hope that this report will contribute to this end.

This report was prepared by the staff of the Conference of Mayors, which is solely responsible for its content. The survey was designed, distributed and tabulated with the invaluable assistance of Modesto Abety, a National Urban Fellow carrying out his practicum at the Conference of Mayors during the Spring of 1984, and Rodney Hambrick, Conference of Mayors staff. The principal author of the report was Barry Zigas, Assistant Executive Director of the Conference of Mayors.

JOHN J. GUNTHER,
Executive Director,

METHODOLOGY

[Tables appear at end of article]

The U.S. Conference of Mayors sent the Survey of Housing Needs and Conditions questionnaire to a representative cross-section of cities with populations of 30,000 or more in late April, 1984.

The survey was sent directly to the Mayor of each city along with a letter from the Conference of Mayors Executive Director. To increase the response rate from the mailing, various steps were taken. First, a memorandum was sent to all members of the National Community Development Association (NCDA) in cities included in the survey notifying them in early May that the survey had been sent to the Mayor and urging assistance in securing a response. During mid-May, contact was made with the Washington representatives of cities included in the survey for the same purpose. Finally, some additional cities were contacted directly by telephone by the Conference of Mayors and urged to complete the survey promptly.

A final draft of the survey was field tested by a number of housing and community development officials prior to its mailing to the Mayors. Recommendations received through this process were incorporated into the survey instrument, which was designed to facilitate response by the use of graphs and scales.

By May 30, completed surveys had been completed by 66 cities. A list of these cities is included as Appendix 1. The regional and population distribution of these cities is displayed in Tables 1 and 2 below. A map showing which states comprise each of the five regions used in the report is attached as Appendix 2 to this report.

Additional surveys have been received since May 30, but these are not included in the tabulations presented here. They can be included in further analysis of the data.

The completed questionnaires were answered by housing, community development and/or planning officials knowledgeable about their cities and the subject of the survey. Because the survey sought information about public housing and Section 8 programs, the use of Community Development Block Grant (CDBG) funds, as well as overall housing conditions, needs and fair housing policies, the responses in many cities represent a collaboration among various agencies and individuals.

The survey's questions sought factual information. In some instances subjective judgments were called for based on the respondent's awareness of factual data. A copy of the questionnaire is included as Appendix 3 to this report.

The information presented here addresses the housing needs and conditions of cities that responded to the survey. Although we believe the results reflect a representative sample of American cities, the conclusions presented here cannot necessarily be extrapolated to cities not surveyed or included in these results. While we believe the conclusions are indicative of housing needs and conditions in America's principal cities, the conclusions must be tempered by an understanding of the survey's limitations.

HOUSING NEEDS

A major finding of the Survey on Housing Needs and Conditions is that demand for assisted housing of all kinds has increased over the last year, in some cases dramatically.

All surveyed cities were asked whether, during calendar year 1983, the demand for assisted housing for low income families had "increased," "decreased," or "remained the same." A total of 51 cities—77 percent of those responding—said that it had increased. Another 13 cities, or 20 percent, said that it had remained the same. No respondents stated that it had decreased, although two failed to answer the question.

In response to a question regarding the extent of change in demand over the last year, 69 percent of those who identified and increase estimated it to range between 25 and 100 percent, with 23 percent estimating the increase in the 50 percent and up range.

The stark reality of this unmet demand is illustrated in the waiting lists local communities are maintaining at the present time for all types of assisted housing. Among all the respondents to the survey, the average time between application for assistance by a low or moderate income household and the actual delivery of the assistance was 20 months. Among all the respondents to the survey, a total of 227,777 households were on waiting lists at the time of the survey, with an average among all surveyed cities of 3,451.

Because of the range of housing assistance available at the local level, respondents were asked to provide the length of time applicants wait for a variety of housing assistance. The average waits as reported by the respondents are displayed in Table 3 below.

While these average waits are sobering enough, they mask a range of waiting list lengths which is truly staggering. For instance, while at least one community reported no wait at all in each of the categories for which information was sought, the waiting lists also ranged as high as 302 months—or almost 30 years—for Section 8 Certificates for families. Table 4 shows the highest and lowest figures reported for each category of assistance on which information was requested.

Respondents were also asked to estimate what percentage of the households on their waiting lists currently lived in substandard housing, or paid more than 50 percent of their income for rent. A total of 73 percent of the respondents said that 50 percent or more of the households on their waiting lists fit either or both categories. In other words, the families awaiting assistance include a high percentage of those who by all counts are suffering the greatest need for housing assistance.

Not surprisingly, these figures prove daunting not only at the national, policy making level, but also provide a powerful discouragement to new applicants at the local level, thereby masking a significant reservoir of unmet need. This is vividly illustrated by the finding that 55 percent of the respondents said they believed that families in their own jurisdictions were discouraged from applying for assisted housing. Moreover, 61 percent of the cities have actually closed their waiting lists and stopped accepting any new applications at all.

The evident discouragement of lower income housing applicants is apparently well-founded. In 29 percent of the responding cities, 50 percent or more of the Section 8 certificates allocated require at least one extension of the original 60 days provided in order to find a suitable and affordable unit.

Indeed, 55 percent of the respondents said that 25 percent or more of the certificates they issued were eventually cancelled altogether because recipients cannot find units suitable for the program. A total of 24 percent of the respondents said that their cancellation rate reached 50 percent or more of the certificates issued, and 6 percent ranked the cancellation rate at 75 percent or more of those issued.

NB: Under the Section 8 Existing Housing program, local public housing agencies issue certificates to eligible housholds. These recipients then have 60 days—which can be extended—to find a housing unit suiting their family characteristics and carrying rents within HUD's "Fair Market Rent" guidelines. Tenants pay 30 percent of their income for rent, and the Section 8 subsidy makes up the difference between this amount and the approved rent on the unit. Commitments to eligible tenants are cancelled when the recipients are unable to find suitable units within the allotted time period. These certificates are usually then issued to another household and the process begins again until a unit is placed under subsidy.

Another relevant finding is that actual admission to public housing is no guarantee of security. A total of 68 percent of the respondents reported that evictions in public housing have increased over the last two years.

DECLINING SUPPLY

Despite the rising and critical demand for assisted housing among these cities, 57 percent of the respondents said that the supply of housing available to low and moderate income households had decreased or remained the same over the last 5 years. Many of those who said the supply had increased cited significant federal investments in new construction and substantial rehabilitation through programs which have been practically eliminated over the last three years.

Moreover, even 40 years after federal assistance in low income housing began, only 12 percent of the respondents—8 cities—estimated that one-half or more of the eligible households in their cities are receiving assistance at this time.

The most frequently cited reason for a decreasing supply of housing was decreased construction, with increased demand from higher income renters cited second most frequently. Table 5 below shows the responses from surveyed cities to the question, "if the low-income rental housing stock has been decreasing, please rank from 1-5 the major causes of this loss, with 1 being the major cause."

These findings suggest that the combination of decreased rental housing construction—particularly the severe cutbacks in federally assisted new construction and substantial rehabilitation—coupled with increased competition from higher income renters is squeezing the lower income renter out of the urban housing market.

Moreover, when asked if the private sector could meet rental housing needs absent any subsidized production programs, 89 percent of the respondents said "no".

Barriers facing lower income households

Respondents were asked to rank the importance of 5 barriers to safe, decent, and sanitary housing in their cities. The results of this question are displayed in Table 6 below.

As Table 6 shows, "low income" was clearly the single most important barrier chosen by the respondents, with 83 percent of them choosing it as either the first or second most important factor. Moreover, 65 percent of the respondents stated that this problem has gotten worse over the last two years, while another 29 percent said it had remained the same over that period.

The second most frequently cited barrier for lower income people was "inadequate or substandard dwellings", which 48 percent of the respondents chose as either the first or second most important barrier. "Housing shortages" was listed third most frequently, with 38 percent of the respondents choosing it as the first or second most important factor.

A total of 68 percent of the respondents felt that the problems of inadequate or substandard housing had gotten worse or remained the same over the last two years, while 73 percent of them felt this way about housing shortages. The full results of this question are displayed in Table 7 below.

The importance of preserving existing housing stock

Substandard housing is still a major problem in the surveyed cities. Not only was it identified as one the major barriers to lower income housing opportunities, but the surveyed cities were also asked to identify the number of vacant and abandoned units in their jurisdictions. While the average number of vacancies throughout the responding cities was 3,873, the range was vast—from a high of 53,687 to a low of 10.

Moreover, 57 percent of the respondents said that 50 percent or more of these units could be rehabilitated, and another 18 percent said that between 25 percent and 50 percent of them could be rehabilitated.

Not surprisingly, the cities also identified rehabilitation of existing units as the single most effective way to combat substandard housing, with fully 74 percent of the respondents picking this as the first or second most effective technique. Code enforcement, a related tactic, was the first or second choice of 45 percent of the respondents to this question. A full display of these results can be found in Table 8 below.

This interest in and need for rehabilitation is most dramatically brought home in the existing public housing stock. A total of 208,710 units of public housing were included in the respondent cities, according to figures provided by the cities. This ranged from a high of 23,546 in one city to a low of 99 in another. The average number of public housing units per city was 3,162, and the median 1,670 units. Cities were asked to estimate the total dollars needed to bring existing public housing units up to "standards" through the modernization program operated by HUD. Among all the respondents, the stated demand totals $1.7 billion, with an average need of $26 million per city. However, the surveyed cities estimated that they would receive a total of only $218 million to meet these needs, or 12 percent of the stated requirement. Expected funding averaged only about $3.3 million per city. Table 9 below summarizes these findings.

Once again, these figures illustrate dramatically the impact of federal funding on the condition and affordability of low income housing. Based on these survey findings, there is a tremendous shortfall between need and available resources, particularly from the federal side.

HOUSING DISCRIMINATION

Although it was most frequently the fourth or fifth choice of respondents as a barrier to housing availability, discrimination still looms as a major impediment to decent housing in many cities. Among the respondents, 67 percent reported that they maintain a fair housing office to handle complaints about housing discrimination. Half of the respondents reported that the nature of housing discrimination complaints has not changed significantly in the last two years, while a substantial proportion—26 percent—failed to answer this question. In addition, 52 percent of the respondents said that complaints have not increased in the last two years. In contrast, 33 percent said that they had.

More importantly, the surveyed cities reported that discrimination against minorities and against female-headed households with children remains a serious problem in many localities. Of the 51 cities who reported that demand for housing assistance had increased over the last year, 37 percent said that housing opportunities for minorities were either "difficult" or "very difficult", while 73 percent of the same group said that female-headed households with minor children found it "difficult" or "very difficult" to acquire decent housing. (Among the respondents as a whole, 40 percent said minorities had a "difficult" or "very difficult" time, and 70 percent said the same for female-headed households with minor children.)

Still, 55 percent of the total respondents indicated that the situation for minorities has gotten better in the last five years, and an additional 17 percent said it had stayed the same.

CITY RESPONSES TO HOUSING NEED

Despite federal cutbacks, cities surveyed are themselves devoting resources to provide assisted housing to needy households. For example, 74 percent of the respondents stated that housing related activities are a "very important" part of their Community Development Block Grant (CDBG) program. But the funding squeeze is clearly evident—42 percent of the respondents said that contributions for housing activities had declined over the last 2 years.

A major aspect of CDBG funded housing work is through rehabilitation of existing dwellings. According to the survey, the "lump sum drawdown," through which communities are able to draw down large parts of an annual CDBG award to use in rehabilitation programs, was used heavily—by 67 percent of the respondents. Nearly a quarter of the respondents—23 percent—said that this technique was "critical" to their program's success, and another 24 percent ranked it between "important" and "critical". This finding is especially important in light of repeated Administration attempts to eliminate this provision from the CDBG statute.

In the public housing area, too, cities are contributing to upkeep and maintenance. Although only 29 percent of the respondents said that the housing authority is part of the municipal government, 41 percent said their contributions to the housing authority had increased or remained the same over the last two years.

In addition, 39 percent of the respondents said they have used tax-exempt financing to build low income housing; 33 percent said they had used it for other rental housing; and 30 percent said they have used tax exempt financing for owner-occupied housing development.

THE HEROIC CROSS-COUNTRY RUN OF JEFF KEITH

● Mr. CHILES. Mr. President, I rise today to bring to my colleagues' attention the heroic cross-country run of Jeff Keith. While this is a difficult enough task in itself, Jeff Keith has an additional obstacle to overcome—he has only one leg.

Keith, who lost his right leg to cancer 10 years ago, will be making his way through the Washington area tomorrow en route to Los Angeles to promote the message, as he puts it, "cancer can be beat and that disabled doesn't mean unabled."

His journey, which began in June, will cover over 3,300 miles and take approximately 6 months. Keith's run will benefit the American Cancer Society and the National Handicapped Sports & Recreation Association. Along the way, Keith will be visiting rehabilitation centers and hospitals to offer encouragement to those handicapped individuals with problems similar to his own.

After meeting with congressional leaders, Keith will continue his run at 6 p.m. by departing the East Steps of the U.S. Capitol with several Members of the House and Senate running with him. I am honored to have the opportunity to participate in Jeff Keith's inspirational and courageous journey across America.●

RICHARD H. VANKLEECK

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I rise in tribute today to a gentleman and devoted public servant: Mr. Richard H. VanKleeck of the Senate Republican Conference staff, who died June 16 after a valiant struggle with cancer.

Dick was well-known to many here on Capitol Hill for his meticulous and detailed grasp of the complexities of the legislative process. He was cherished by the conference staff, as much for genial humor and courtly manners as for his erudition and professional expertise.

In his final days of staff service, Dick, though wracked with physical pain, was a paradigm of the quiet courage which sustains the bravest and best of our people. He will be sadly missed, but never forgotten, by those of us who had the privilege to work beside him.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a tribute to him, published in the June 18 edition of the Asheville Citizen, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

R.H. VANKLEECK DIES; CRITIC, PATRON OF ARTS

Richard Houghton VanKleeck, local arts patron and former art critic for the Asheville Citizen-Times, died Saturday in an Asheville hospital. He was 56.

VanKleeck first came to Asheville in 1961 to inventory and catalogue the library at Biltmore House. He returned in 1969 to become arts coordinator of the Civic Arts Center and the Asheville Art Museum.

He wrote a weekly arts column for the Sunday Citizen-Times for over 10 years.

A native of Boston, Mass., he was a son of the late Walter and Margaret Storiey VanKleeck. He was a graduate of Noble and Greenough Prep School in Dedham, Mass., and was graduated from Harvard University in 1949.

He later taught at the Noble and Greenough School and served as head of the fine arts and drama departments.

VanKleeck was also director of the Civic Symphony Association of Boston, and was a board member of the Footlight Club, Jamaica Plain, Boston, the oldest "amateur" theatrical group in the United States.

He was an estate and financial planner for the National Shawmut Bank of Boston from 1962 to 1969.

VanKleeck had been vice president and secretary of United Chemical Co., a research analyst with Bradford & Co. and later with McCarley & Co. and had served as staff assistant to former Congressman William Hendon. At the time of his death, he was a staff assistant with Senate Republican Conference.

He was a member of All Souls Episcopal Church, the Biltmore Forest Country Club, the Downtown City Club, the Kittansett Club and the Acres Group. He had been a member of the old Mountain City Club in Asheville.

Surviving are a niece, Joan S. Shute of Bedford, N.H.; and a nephew, Arthur Mitton III of Marshfield, Mass.

Services will be at 11 a.m. Tuesday in All Souls Episcopal Church. The Revs. C.A. Zabriskie and Fredrick H. Dennis will officiate. Burial will be in Calvary Churchyard cemetery.

The family will receive friends from 7 to 9 p.m. Monday at Morris Funeral Home.

In lieu of flowers, memorials may be made to Life After Cancer Group, 93 Victoria Road, Asheville, 28801.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii.

HISTORICAL NOTE: RECTIFYING THE RECORD TO HONOR CAPT. CHARLES McVAY III

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, often during war, lives are lost which in hindsight could have been saved—if only somebody had done this, or somebody else had done that. Some of these tragic deaths are so heartrendingly painful to the survivors and the rest of us that there is an understandable drive to fix blame, whether rightfully or wrongfully, in order to relieve the pain of grief. Such has been the case of the infamous sinking of the U.S.S. Indianapolis, exactly 39 years ago, on July 30, 1945, by an enemy submarine. Marooned sailors were slowly, cruelly decimated by swarming sharks and by hallucinations induced by the searing sun and lack of drinking water. The memory is so strong of the stark terror of that 5-day ordeal that it recently served as a protagonistic force in the recent classic suspense movie series, "Jaws."

Of the crew of 1,196 men, a mere 316 survived; 800 of those who died were either eaten alive by sharks or drowned after abandoning ship, while half the number perished in the submarine torpedo attack itself. The enormity of the tragedy struck a discordant chord in the heart of the Nation when the incident was revealed after V-J Day. A court-martial was subsequently convened and the commander of the U.S.S. Indianapolis was assessed full blame.

The conclusions of the court-martial have come under closer scrutiny in the last two decades and it now appears that Capt. Charles B. McVay III may have, in a manner of speaking, "taken the rap," being the gentleman and fine officer that he was. Captain McVay was accused of failure to order a zigzag course and delaying the order to abandon ship. The investigation into the charges failed to prove that the order to abandon ship was in fact delayed. As for the other charge, zigzagging generally was considered a tactic of dubious value in avoiding enemy submarines and, hence, was regarded as only an optional maneuver.

The U.S.S. Indianapolis was at the time traveling from Guam to the Philippines in what was regarded as safe waters far from the war zone where zigzagging would seem to have been more appropriate. Many of those familiar with the case believe that Captain McVay took all reasonable precautions in view of the circumstances to avoid disaster. Unfortunately, Captain McVay did not receive crucial information which would have put him on alert to impending dangers. Although the waters were generally regarded safe, U.S. intelligence sources had information that there were four Japanese submarines roaming the area. Because this information had the highest security classification at the time, Captain McVay was not informed. In addition, he was not told that just a few days earlier the U.S.S. Underhill had been sunk, with the loss of 119 men in the same area. The U.S.S. Indianapolis entered these same treacherous waters without proper detection equipment and without an antisubmarine escort.

The death toll was higher than it should have been because a search party was not sent out even after the heavy cruiser failed to arrive in the Philippines on schedule. The commander to whom Captain McVay was to report had not been informed of the U.S.S. Indianapolis' orders because they had been misaddressed inadvertently. Those who knew of the destination of the cruiser did not report its failure to arrive because they were obeying orders which prohibited confirmations of arrivals of warships.

The survivors of this, the greatest wartime sea disaster, were sighted by happenstance by the crew of a bomber flying over the area, 5 grueling days after the cruiser had been sunk.

Those who survived did not blame Captain McVay for the tragedy. As a matter of fact, Captain McVay was always an honored guest at their many reunions held after the war. The families of many of those who did not survive, however, were understandably grieved beyond reason and blamed Captain McVay for the death of their loved ones. For years after the incident, Captain McVay received hate mail. Such mail was a source of excruciating torment to one who loved his men as deeply as did Captain McVay. As his son Kimo Wilder McVay of Honolulu relates,

> My father hated to open his mail on any given holiday. Usually these cards said something like, "If it weren't for you, my son, brother, etc. would be with us this Easter, Christmas, Father's Day, etc."

On November 6, 1968, Captain McVay was found on the lawn of his house with a bullet wound in his head. He had a .38 caliber pistol in his right hand, and a blue toy sailor tightly grasped in his left.

What an unbecoming demise for such a distinguished officer who dedicated his life to the service of his country. Despite the adverse ruling of the court-martial against him, Captain McVay was permitted to remain in service and retired from the Navy in June 1949 as a rear admiral because of his numerous combat citations. It should be noted at this point that the U.S.S. Indianapolis was just returning from a most historic mission when it met its most untimely fate on July 30, 1945. The 9,950-ton cruiser had successfully delivered the first atomic bomb from the United States to the bomber base on Tinian Island for the first nuclear airdrop over Hiroshima, Japan, which took place on August 6, 1945. The trip from San Francisco to Tinian was made in a recordbreaking 10 days.

The story of Captain McVay is a tremendously moving one. As one who myself witnessed my comrades-in-arms die in the line of battle in World War II, I can readily imagine how Captain McVay must have been saddened by the loss of his men aboard the ill-fated U.S.S. Indianapolis. This was truly a national tragedy, which heaped an incredible amount of pain and suffering on the American people, immeasurably upon the families of those who did not return.

Although Captain McVay was convicted of "failing to zigzag" to avoid enemy submarines, recent surfacing of new information suggests that such accusations were unfounded, and it is increasingly contended that Captain McVay was the unfortunate scapegoat for the incident. In two books on the subject, "Abandon Ship" by Richard F. Newcomb and "All the Drowned Sailors" by Raymond B. Lech, the authors suggest that McVay did not act irresponsibly. Not only was McVay not informed of the presence of Japanese submarines, he took every reasonable precaution and did not delay the order to abandon ship. Any misjudgments which contributed to the magnitude of the disaster were not the fault of Captain McVay, but of others who failed to inform him of Japanese submarine operations in the area.

It may well be that some U.S. military personnel were directly or indirectly responsible for the large number of deaths in the U.S.S. Indianapolis incident, but Captain McVay was not one of those persons. For 19 years he lived with this unfair assessment of blame, until Novermber 6, 1968, when he could no longer bear it and took his own life.

It is time, in the cause of pure justice and fair play, for us to publicly redeem this man's good name. Capt. Charles B. McVay III was a fine and exemplary naval officer and should be remembered as such. As one who has been fully informed of the facts, and as a Member of this august body, I salute Captain McVay and commend him for the meritorious service he rendered his country, posthumous as it may be, on this the 39th anniversary of the sinking of the U.S.S. Indianapolis.

In the hope that the misinformed may be led to seek the truth and be set free from their grief and hatred, I ask unanimous consent that a feature article written by Jim Borg, which appeared in the Honolulu Advertiser of July 29, 1983, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DID SKIPPER OF 'INDY' GET A BUM RAP?—NEW RESEARCH CASTS DOUBT ON GUILT OF WW II NAVY CAPTAIN

(By Jim Borg)

For five days and four nights, the sailors floated on rafts and in life-jackets. When a shark picked a victim, his fellow crewmen prayed he would stop screaming soon.

The sun and lack of drinking water made them crazy. A common delusion was that there was a layer of cool, fresh water below the surface, maybe six or eight feet down. Sailors who stripped off their life jackets and dove for a drink were never seen again.

Torpedoes from the Japanese submarine I-58 struck the heavy cruiser USS Indianapolis just after midnight on July 30, 1945, sinking it in about 13 minutes.

Of the 1,196 men aboard, about 400 went down with the ship. Of the 800 or so who made it into the water, only 316 survived.

Blame quickly was fixed on the ship's captain, Capt. Charles B. McVay III, a distinguished career officer and the son of a former four-star commander of the U.S. Asiatic Fleet.

After the war, in an unprecedented case the Japanese submarine skipper was brought to Washington, D.C., to testify at McVay's court-martial. McVay was convicted of "failing to zigzag" as a precaution against enemy submarines.

Although zigzagging generally was considered a tactic of dubious value and was an option available to the captain—not a requirement, McVay's career was ruined. He was assigned to a shore job in New Orleans and on June 30, 1949, was transferred to the retired list with the rank of rear admiral because of earlier combat citations.

"With that much of a disaster, they had to have a pigeon or somebody to blame," says Ken Stretch, a Hawaiian Electric Co. executive who was engineering officer aboard the USS Ringness, which picked up McVay and some other survivors. "I don't think many believed that zigzagging would make diddly-damn difference. The route we were on, we didn't zigzag."

For years, according to his family, McVay received hate mail from some of the parents, wives and children of the 880 lost crewmen.

"My father hated to open his mail on any given holiday," says Honolulu promoter Kimo Wilder McVay, "Usually, these cards said something like, 'If it weren't for you, my son, brother, etc., would be with us this Easter, Christmas, Father's Day, etc.' It was cruel."

On Nov. 6, 1968, at his house in Litchfield, Conn., plagued with a number of personal problems, McVay put a bullet through his head.

Thirty-eight years after the Indy went down, new information is still surfacing about the Navy's worst disaster at sea.

Why wasn't the ship reported overdue?

Why wasn't McVay warned that another ship, the USS Underhill, had been sunk by an enemy submarine in the same area days earlier?

Why was the captain singled out for punishment?

In 1958, "Abandon Ship," a book by former Associated Press editor Richard F. Newcomb, went a long way toward vindicating McVay. Given that the Indianapolis had no sonar equipment and no destroyer escort, Newcomb noted that the captain took reasonable precautions on what he and his superiors considered merely a routine three-day run far from the main wartime action.

And when the Indy was hit, McVay gave the order to abandon ship neither too soon nor too late. Either the ship's distress message was never heard or the radio equipment was too damaged to transmit.

McVay was the last survivor into the water and, five days later, the last to be plucked from the sea.

In "All the Drowned Sailors," published last year (Stein and Day, $16.95), Raymond B. Lech, a former Marine, focuses more on what he calls a "cover-up" than on the catastrophe. McVay was a scapegoat, pure and simple, Lech contends.

Just days before it was sunk, the Indianapolis had completed a historic mission. The former flagship of the 5th Fleet had delivered the parts for the atomic bomb to Tinian in the northern Marianas. Without knowing the nature of his secret cargo, McVay made a record-breaking run from San Francisco via Pearl Harbor in 10 days, arriving at Tinian on July 26, 1945.

(McVay's obituary in the New York Times noted with irony that, had the ship been sunk en route to the Marianas, the entire U.S. supply of fissionable uranium would have been lost, prolonging the war for perhaps two years.)

From Tinian, McVay sailed to Guam, where he was ordered to proceed to Leyte in the Philippines for training for his crew, many of whom had come aboard at San Francisco.

What he sailed into, Lech suggests, was a maelstrom of error and incompetence.

Rather than courtmartialing McVay, the Navy would have done better to examine the performances of some other actors in the drama. Among them:

Capt. E.T. Layton, chief of combat intelligence at Pearl Harbor. Layton had information that a group of four Japanese submarines was operating in the area between Guam and the Philippines. Unfortunately, he classified it "ultra secret," the highest and most secure category. "Essentially," says Lech, "it was so secret that people were afraid to talk about it."

Commodore James Carter, assistant chief of staff and operations officer at Adm. Chester Nimitz' advance headquarters in Guam. Carter was aware of the four Japanese subs and knew that one of them had sunk the USS Underhill on July 24, killing 119 men. But in a conversation with McVay on July 27, Carter mentioned neither. "I don't remember that we discussed intelligence information," Carter said later. "It wasn't normal for captains to request that of me. He was only in my office a very short time; and that intelligence was provided by the port director at the time the ship was routed, as a normal procedure."

Capt. Oliver Naquin, surface operations officer for the commander, Marianas. Carter told Naquin about the Japanese submarines, but the report stopped there "as if it had hit a brick wall," Lech says. "At this point in the command structure, the information went no further. Captain Naquin did absolutely nothing with it."

Lech says the intelligence department of the Guam Naval Base, which briefed officers of ships before they sailed, depended entirely on the commander, Marianas—and specifically on Naquin—for word of enemy activity in the area. But the Guam office never got the word, and neither did McVay or Cmdr. John Janney, his navigator, when they got the routing instructions and intelligence briefing the day before Indy left for Leyte.

When routing officers called Naquin's office to see if there was an escort ship available for the Indianapolis, they were told tersely that "no escort was needed."

At Leyte, McVay was to report to Rear Adm. Lynde McCormick commander of Task Group 95.7, with headquarters aboard the battleship Idaho. McCormick was sent a copy of the orders, but some unknown member of his communications staff had decoded the addressee as 75.8 instead of 95.7. Because of that mistake, and because the message had the low security classification of "restricted" instead of "secret" or "top secret," the staff did not feel it was worth the effort to decipher it.

McCormick never knew the cruiser was coming.

The office of the Leyte port director knew it, but two unfortunate factors came into play.

First, it was not unusual for warships to be diverted at sea without port directors being told of the change. Second, in January 1945 Nimitz ordered that the arrivals of fighting ships were not to be reported. This was to reduce message traffic and to keep the Japanese from learning the whereabouts of the fleet.

Trouble was, there was no specification in the order about what to do when ships did not arrive. (This was quickly corrected in August 1945.)

Lt. Stewart Gibson, operations officer for the Leyte port director, knew by sundown on July 31, the day the ship was due, that the Indianapolis had not arrived. If he had raised a fuss, he would have been a hero and hundreds of lives would have been saved.

He mentioned it to no one. "Since his orders firmly stated that he was not to report arrivals, it never occurred to him that he still might be required to report non-arrivals," Lech says. "Gibson later claimed that it was not imposed upon him by any directives existing at that time to report nonarrivals, and he respectfully asked, 'How can I be guilty of failing to perform a duty which never existed?' "

As the Indy's crew fought sharks and delirium and watched planes pass blindly overhead, the ship's presumed progress was mapped at Pearl Harbor and Guam until, at the end of three days, it was erased from the charts. The Indianapolis was simply assumed to have reached Leyte Gulf.

On Aug. 2, the crew of a twin-engine Ventura bomber happened to spot some rafts.

News of the disaster was swallowed up in the announcement—made the same day, Aug. 14—that the war with Japan had ended. But McVay's tribulations were far from over.

Lech calls the initial investigation into the sinking "a mockery." For one thing, one of the members of the court of inquiry was Vice Adm. George Murray, commander of the Marianas, who was Naquin's superior and the commander in whose jurisdiction the ship had sunk. Lech suggests the admiral was not a disinterested party.

The court recommended McVay be court-martialed. Nimitz disagreed. "His failure to order a zigzag course was an error in judgment, but not of such nature as to constitute gross negligence," Nimitz said. He said he would give McVay a letter of reprimand instead.

But on Sept. 25, 1945, Fleet Adm. Ernest King, chief of naval operations, overruled Nimitz and ordered a trial.

On what charges? Failure to zigzag was not reason enough for a court-martial because McVay readily admitted he was on a straight course.

So Rear Adm. O.S. Cullough, the judge advocate general, recommended that McVay also be charged with failing to order abandon ship soon enough. Although the investigation showed this to be untrue, Cullough observed that "full justification for ordering a trial on Charge II springs from the fact that this case is of vital interest not only to the families of those who lost their lives but also to the public at large."

Excuse me? Since when are people brought to trial purely on the basis of public interest in the case? The second charge, of course, was disproved.

On the stand, Naquin testified that he had considered it a "very low" risk that the Indy would be attacked by submarines.

Yet days before his court testimony, according to documents obtained by Lech, Naquin admitted to the Navy inspector general that he indeed knew of the four Japanese subs operating in the area, a number he called "more than average."

Why this and other wrinkles in the case were not ironed out at the court-martial remains a mystery.

Says Kimo McVay, "My father was completely innocent, if not heroic. The Indy survivors, who meet once every 10 years, certainly didn't hold my father to blame. He was their honored guest until his death."

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, does the Senator mind if that time counts toward his time under cloture?

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I do not mind.

RECESS UNTIL TOMORROW AT 11 A.M.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, is there further business to come before the Senate? If not, I move, in accordance with the previous order, that the Senate stand in recess until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, at 8:04 p.m., recessed until Tuesday, July 31, 1984, at 11 a.m.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate July 30, 1984:

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES

Charles D. Baker, of Massachusetts, to be Under Secretary of Health and Human Services, vice John A. Svahn, resigned.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Edward J. Streator, of New York, a career member of the Senior Foreign Service, class of Career Minister, to be representative of the United States of America to the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, with the rank of Ambassador.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

LET US WAKE UP AND DO SOMETHING ABOUT TERRORISM

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, now is the perfect time to do something about terrorism. The ball is in Congress' court. Improving our Nation's intelligence collecting abilities as well as upgrading Embassy security are two key battles in our fight against the scourge of international terrorism. The following article on terrorism highlights the issue before us.

Congress can help our intelligence community by increasing the resources for intelligence gathering. Intelligence is the first barrier against a terrorist attack both here in the United States and overseas. It is far easier to prevent a terrorist attack than to defend against one. Specific intelligence information about a planned terrorist operation can be used to either confront the group with the assembled information in hopes that the organization will abort their operation, or to use that intelligence to frustrate, prevent, or protect against the attack.

Physical security for our overseas facilities is also a key element in the equation. Although good security does not guarantee that a terrorist attack will be stopped, enhanced security certainly makes the terrorist's task far more difficult. A well defended building also provides a psychological deterrent that may serve to discourage a potential attacker from launching an operation against one of our missions around the world. Perimeter security, electronics, guards, ballistic materials, and additional professional security personnel all help to protect our public servants assigned overseas.

In all of these areas Congress can help by seriously studying the executive branch's requests for more resources in the areas of intelligence and Embassy security. Although we must always keep our budget levels in mind, the fight against terrorism must be won, and additional resources will certainly help us in this battle.

Terrorism, be it criminally inspired or politically motivated, a random act or preplanned, affects the very nature of our society and works to undermine those precepts that serve as the foundation of Western civilization. Fortunately, the President has already identified combating terrorism as one of his key priorities.

Recently, the President sent to Congress an antiterrorism legislative package consisting of four proposed bills. We all know that our country has gaps in its laws. The President's package is a step toward filling some of those gaps. Two pieces of legislation are designed to implement two international conventions that the Senate has previously approved. These are relatively noncontroversial. Two other proposals are now before the House Foreign Affairs Committee and the House Judiciary. One of those proposed bills would authorize the payment of rewards for information regarding acts of terrorism in the United States, or abroad. After some redrafting, the fourth bill would require that certain services to foreign countries be licensed in order to stop such services from being provided to countries involved in terrorist activities. I hope that my colleagues will see the urgency of the situation and work together to approve the legislative package.

With these thoughts in mind, I strongly recommend the following article concerning terrorism to all of my colleagues in the Congress.

The article follows:

TAKING STEPS TO CONTAIN TERRORISM

(By William E. Colby)

(William E. Colby, who was Director of Central Intelligence from 1973 to 1976, is senior adviser to International Business-Government Counselors Inc., a firm that analyzes country risks for possible investors.)

WASHINGTON.—Terrorism is having yet another periodic revival as a major political issue.

President Reagan and Secretary of State George P. Shultz have denounced state-supported terrorism and insisted at the economic summit meeting in London that the industrialized democracies collaborate better to bring this under control. Debate is raging over the implications of the Italian prosecutor's report on the attempted assassination of Pope John Paul II, which implies that the Bulgarian Government, and perhaps even the Soviet Government, were behind the attack. A bill has been submitted to Congress that would impose criminal sanctions on Americans assisting or training terrorists identified by the Secretary of State. Behind these problems looms the nightmare of possible nuclear terrorism.

Such concern is hardly new. We heard much the same unease and the same call for a definitive remedy after the Palestine Liberation Organization attack on the Munich Olympics in 1972, the Red Brigades' kidnapping and murder of the former Italian Prime Minister Aldo Moro in 1978, the attack by the Japanese Red Army at Lod Airport in Israel in 1972, and on back to concerns about the Bolsheviks in the 1920's. None of this concern is unwarranted, but we should beware of undue alarmism and unrealistic hopes for a comprehensive solution.

In fact, the more grave the terrorist threat, the more certain it is that it will be suppressed before it causes serious disruption, threatening the state or the public order. Today, the Red Brigades are impotent, the Bader-Meinhoff gang, in West Germany, has been suppressed and the Japanese Red Army is hardly existent. The extensive terrorist actions in the 1960's by the Argentine Montoneros and the Uruguayan Tupemaros were brutally but effectively suppressed by the military of those countries. India's crackdown on the Sikhs is the latest demonstration of a state's ability to crush such a threat to its authority.

Besides, in most cases, the drama of terrorism grossly exaggerations its real effect. Thus, Irish Republican Army terrorism has made essentially no progress against British rule in Northern Ireland. Che Guevara's romanticism brought concern over possible mass insurgency in Latin America but little change in its political or social systems. Certainly, the Symbionese Liberation Army and the Weathermen had little effect upon the ordinary American citizen's life, compared to many social problems we tolerate with equanimity such as the 23,000 Americans who die each year from handgun misuse or the 25,000 killed by drunken drivers.

What exactly is terrorism? It is a tactic of indiscriminate violence used against innocent bystanders for political effect—and it must be distinguished from the selective use of violence against the symbols and institutions of a contested power, which is unfortunately a norm of international life.

The difference is critically important: Without it, there is no way to distinguish "your" terrorist from "my" freedom-fighter or to differentiate aid to terrorists from covert support of friendly forces like the Nicaraguan contras, or counterrevolutionary fighters. Aid to friendly guerrilla forces, from the American colonists to the Afghans today, is s regular part of the international contest, whereas the indiscriminate use of violence can be denounced on a solid moral basis.

We probably cannot eliminate terrorism, but we can take steps to contain it. Intelligence is the first arm of defense against the terrorist, identifying him, his cause and his supporters. Such intelligence can provide tips about general plans or specific tactics that can lead to the frustration or capture of the terrorist. Along with the careful accumulation and collation of data, it may often include exchanging information with other friendly nations and occasionally launching risky and difficult missions to infiltrate terrorist groups.

This requires resources, but it also requires that the intelligence services not be hamstrung in their operations by great public exposure or excessive legalistic restraints. Obviously, the innocent citizen must be protected from excessive governmental intrusion, but reasonable protection can be obtained by legislative and judicial supervision.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

The second major step to protect against terrorists involves security practices that make their task more difficult. The barriers around public buildings, the electronic screening of crowds, irregular schedules for multinational executives and effective police work can all be carried out with minimum inconvenience to the public but maximum deterrence against the would-be terrorist.

But finally—and this may be the most important rule for any government hoping to protect itself and its citizens from terrorists—success against terrorism can be achieved only if the public supports the effort. The difference between a public that reports evidence of terrorists to the authorities, even at some personal risk, and one giving covert support or even cowed into silence, can mean the entire difference between success and failure.

In this, international public opinion can also be enormously important. The international rejection of the South American tactic of "disappearances" severely weakened those governments who practiced such abduction and arbitrary killing. The death squads in Central America have made it difficult for international friends to support the governments in some of those nations.

Moreover, the best way to insure public support is to insist that the rule of law be fully applied in the fight against the terrorists. The French use of torture in Algeria in the 1960's was widely repudiated by French public opinion, greatly undermining what has been a successful strategy against the National Front for Liberation.

Why is the rule of law so important? The most successful tactic against the guerrilla or terrorist is to recruit him, not shoot him. To do that, he must be confident that he will benefit from any amnesty that is offered and be subjected only to a coherent rule of law. The terrorist also must be turned from his belief that violence can advance a cause valuable to his compatriots by a demonstration that a better result lies in the programs and policies of a government determined to ameliorate the lot of its people and to treat even its enemies with justice, even if this must be stern in some cases. If terrorism is the indiscriminate use of force against innocent bystanders, it is clear that a government resisting terrorism must be discriminate in the use of force to insure the safety of its bystanders.●

A FINE AMERICAN

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, recently the following article appeared about the father of one of America's foremost journalist Helen Thomas.

The story of George Thomas typifies the story of so many Lebanese and Syrian immigrants who became role-model Americans. Recently people of Middle Eastern ancestry have undergone tremendous bias in this country. This is the story of a man who is indicative of the positive elements of this fine culture. It is a tribute to all immigrants who become model Americans. I hope by repeating this beautiful story, we not only pay tribute to the wonderful Thomas family.

The story follows:

ALL THROUGH THE DEPRESSION, HE FED OUR WHOLE NEIGHBORHOOD

(George Thomas came to America from Lebanon as a teenager in 1902, "the classic immigrant story," says his daughter, UPI White House correspondent Helen Thomas. He married ten years later and raised nine children, supporting them as a pushcart peddler in Winchester, Kentucky, and then as a grocer in Detroit. In his home, the language, food, and culture were Arabic, but the drive to succeed was all American. When her father died in 1950, Helen had already been working on high school and college newspapers, "and he knew I was hooked on journalism.")

My father looked like Teddy Roosevelt, with wonderful bearing and a big, brushed mustache. He was at least six feet tall. He was a man of tremendous generosity and warmth. He loved people and loved company. All through the Depression, he fed our whole neighborhood. My father had a grocery store in Detroit and couldn't bear to see anyone go hungry. Whenever anyone would be sick, he'd go to them with food. He had a few rental properties during the Depression, maybe $10 a month, and when he didn't collect, he didn't collect. He never evicted anyone.

We were a big family of nine kids, and our father was a sort of guiding light. He had about seventeen cents when he landed on Ellis Island. He had come over after hearing about the opportunities in the New World. He didn't know the language, and he couldn't read or write. But he was equipped with energy, enthusiasm, a will to achieve, and pride. He had a computer in his head for figuring out bills that had to be paid. And even though he couldn't understand our report cards, he was thrilled when we'd tell him what the grades were. He made sure we all went to college—even the women, which was unheard of in the culture he came from.

We kids were raised in two cultures at home. My father spoke Arabic while we were busy trying to make the family American. At school we were still considered foreigners, even though we had been born in this country. But we kept the Old World culture in the home with the food, the music and the hospitality. My father would tell us stories of the old country. But he also drove us to excel in American society.

In a family of nine, there wasn't much of a personalized upbringing. Dad sat with us at dinner, and we went to church together, but that was the extent of the father-child relationship. At the dinner table there were always arguments. It was a pretty volatile situation. By the time I arrived, third from the bottom in a family of nine, all discipline had collapsed. So I always felt a sense of freedom in my family. I can never remember being punished. My father was a quiet man and not one to add to the tantrums going on around him. I never heard him shout; it was more his style to walk out into the yard to be alone.

My father was very interested in worldly affairs, although he didn't read newspapers. He learned about events from his friends. The house was always open for friends to drop in, and they'd bring information. When he voted for the first time with an X mark for FDR in 1936, there was a celebration in the family. We thought it was a landmark event. My father was a liberal, although he didn't articulate it. And he was a strong patriot: Just to be an American was a great thing. My brother used to say, "I'm sure glad he didn't miss the boat." We all felt that way.

I picked up a few of my father's mannerisms. I find myself crossing my arms and bending my head down like he did. I have a photograph of myself standing in the Rose Garden with President Kennedy—both of us with the same gesture, staring at each other with the same look. It's the picture of me that my family cherishes the most. It's not a typical female gesture, and I guess I picked that up from my father. That and my father's expression Inshalla, meaning "God willing."

I feel that my ethical basis for life came from my father. He gave me a strong sense of right and wrong—and all the guilt that comes with defying it. He gave me a sense of morality almost by osmosis. Every time I make a stand for integrity, I feel my father. My desire to be a better person comes from him. That's why I'm always fighting about discrimination and civil rights and the people's right to know. My father saw injustice around, but I never heard him complain. He was not a man to upset the status quo. His children did that.●

ROLLCALL VOTES TAKEN ON THURSDAY, JULY 26, 1984

HON. WILLIAM E. DANNEMEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I was unfortunately absent during the session of the House on Thursday, July 26, 1984. Had I been present, I would have cast the following rollcall votes:

Rollcall 317: "Yea"; approving the Speaker's approval of the Journal of the previous day's proceedings.

Rollcall 318: Quorum call.

Rollcall 319: "Yes"; Walker amendment to the Coats amendment. The Coats amendment would have denied Federal funds to schools which deny students the right to participate in voluntary prayer, both spoken and silent prayer. The Walker amendment would have made it clear that school personnel could restrict spoken prayer during instructional periods. (Rejected, 194–215).

Rollcall 320: "Yes"; Gunderson amendment to the Hunter substitute for the Coats amendment. The Gunderson amendment strikes the provision which would deny Federal funds to schools which do not permit voluntary prayer and puts in its place language making it unlawful for a school to deny a student's rights to engage in voluntary prayer. This makes the enforcement a judicial action rather than an administrative denial of funds. (Adopted, 378–29).

Rollcall 321: "Yes"; Hunter substitute, as amended by the Gunderson amendment, for the original Coats amendment. The Hunter substitute amendment precludes a school from denying an individual's opportunity to participate in silent prayer. (Adopted, 356-50).

Rollcall 322: Quorum call.

Rollcall 323: Quorum call.

Rollcall 324: "Yes"; Goodling amendment to the Ford substitute for the original Goodling amendment. The original Goodling amendment, and the amendment to the Ford substitute, would have reduced the authorization levels in the bill to conform with the assumptions of the House-passed budget resolution. (Rejected, 169-233).

Rollcall 325: "Yes"; Goodling, as amended by the Ford substitute—which was adopted by voice vote. As amended, would reduce the authorization levels in the bill by 50 percent below those in the committee-reported bill, but still 50 percent above those in the House-passed budget resolution. (Adopted, 397-0).

Rollcall 326: "Nay"; final passage of H.R. 11, a bill to extend the authorization of appropriations through fiscal year 1989 for certain education programs.

Rollcall 327: "Yes"; motion to recommit H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act, to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to make designated changes. (Rejected, 128-231).

Rollcall 328: "No"; final passage of H.R. 4784, the Trade Remedies Reform Act. (Passed, 259-95).●

A TRIBUTE TO RAQUEL MARQUEZ FRANKEL

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, March 11, 1984, Raquel Márquez Frankel, a leader of the Hispanic Community and one of the founders of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, passed away. Although she is gone, the contributions she has made toward improving the quality of life for Hispanics across this Nation will always remain.

Raquel was born in Albuquerque, NM, and grew up in northern New Mexico. Her parents, always active in community affairs, prepared Raquel for a life of serving others.

After completing her masters in social work at Loyola in Chicago, Raquel went to work, literally nonstop, helping Hispanics across the Nation. Her success in raising this Nation's awarness with respect to the concerns and needs of the Hispanic community was indeed extraordinary. She was instrumental in the founding of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, the National Association of Latino Elected & Appointed Officials, Mujeres en Acción, and the Mexican American National Women's Organization. She contributed her time and efforts to a number of other community organizations including the Spanish Education Development Center, the Washington Urban League, and the Hispanic Women's Center.

Time after time, Raquel gave of herself, and put the betterment of the Hispanic community ahead of any personal gain. Her impact on our society will never be forgotten. And the positive influence she had on each and every life she touched will always be cherished.●

IN COMMEMORATION OF FLAG DAY 1984

HON. CHARLES WILSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, it is with pride that I request the following be entered in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The author, Mary Howell, is a valued friend and a constituent. She is a talented and courageous woman, and she has a great love for her country and her flag. Mary is the editor of one of our local east Texas newspapers, the Sabine County Reporter. Although this column was written to commemorate Flag Day 1984, the effectiveness of Mary's sentiments made this worthwhile reading for Americans on any day of the year.

The article follows:

THE FLAG STILL WAVES

(By Mary Howell)

Today, June 14, is American Flag Day. The following personification, written by Mary Howell, pays tribute to America's symbol of democracy.

I am the American Flag. I am proud to represent my country. On land, air or sea, my stars and stripes comprise the banner of freedom. I stand for peace and I bring hope to all Americans.

The earliest mention of my predecessor "Stars and Stripes" as Washington's Coat of Arms was by Lawrence Washington of Northampton, England in 1532. Passed from father to son, the Stars-and-Stripes family shield was brought to the United States by Sir John Washington, great-grandfather of George Washington who hoisted a red, white and blue banner on January 2, 1778.

But the honor of my creation goes to Betsy Ross, who, with one snip of her scissors, showed Washington how to make a five-pointed star. And on June 14, 1777, I was adopted and authorized by the Continental Congress. My thirteen stars and stripes represented the thirteen existing States of the Union.

In 1779, I defiantly fluttered at the masthead of the Bon Homme Richard as the galiant vessel sank with her dead in the moment of victory. I stood in the struggle's front at Brandywine in September, 1777. I was in battle at Germantown, Saratoga and Valley Forge, inspiring weary soldiers, where history was written in blood before it was written in ink.

I first flew over foreign territory January 28, 1778, at Nassau, Bahama Islands, which had been captured by the Americans in the course of the war for independence.

I was in a succession of triumphs at Camden, King's Mountain and Eutaw Springs. I was displayed in the China Sea in 1784. My first journey around the world was completed in 1790 as I wave from the masthead of the Columbia with Captain John Kendred.

In 1794, I was suspended by the side of the Colors of the French in the hall of the National Conference in Paris—my first time in Paris.

The addition of states changed my design and in May, 1812, I floated for the first time over a public school in Conrain, Massachusetts. More states were admitted, forcing the question of my future design. In 1818, Congress declared by law that the number of my stripes be reduced to thirteen red and white stripes and twenty stars representing existing states, with a new star to be added for each future state. The law remains today as then enacted, with the number of my stars having grown to fifty.

The name "Old Glory" was given to me by Captain William Driver at Salem, Massachusetts on August 19, 1831. Later in 1854, I was carried by M. C. Perry into the Harbor of Yokohama, where Japan negotiated the first treaty, opening foreign trade.

I was the first flag to be raised on the walls of Peking in the assault of allied armies in 1900. In 1903, I was planted on the Himalayas at a height never before attained. In 1904, I was raised at Panama to denote the marriage of the Atlantic and the Pacific, and a few years later I became the first of all flags to reach the North Pole.

I am not a stranger to the scene of conflict. I was carried by sunlight and starlight at Trenton and was borne by brave soldiers at Palo Alto and Mexico City. I floated over the battle smoke at Fredericksburg and in the wilderness at Gettysburg.

Startled eyes saw me torn to tatters at Pearl Harbor. I was pierced with bullets at Wake Island. Dying hands clutched my splintered staff at Okinawa. I was carried in the jungles of Vietnam, where enemies looked upon me in hatred while brave American soldiers looked upon me with love.

I soared into space and was planted on the crevices of the moon as astronauts took "one small step for man—one giant step for mankind".

I stand for the sovereignty of the individual. I belong to all Americans, to every man, woman and child in the United States. I stand for freedom of speech. I stand for a pure ballot box, as well as a square deal. I stand for freedom of assembly and the freedom of worship.

Floating from the pinnacle of American idealism, I am a beacon of enduring hope. I symbolize all that my people hold most dear, God, home and country. I represent universal peace among the nations.

Though I have had twenty-seven designs, my thirteen stripes and fifty stars unite together in red, white and blue to form the national banner. For 208 years, I have brought hope to my people. I have touched the lives of millions as they looked upon me for courage while fighting for their country.

For 208 years, I have stood for my country. I have served along the side of forty Presidents of the United States. Generations after generations have marched into history. I have witnessed the perils of defeat and the glories of victory. In time of war and in time of peace, Americans on homeland and foreign soil have pledged their allegiance to me and my country. The sight of my stars and stripes has brought tears of joy and streams of hope to millions, who gave their lives for their beloved America.

With pride, I wave my stars and stripes. With love and respect, I represent my country. With dignity, I pledge my allegiance to the United States of America.

I am the American Flag.●

LEGISLATION TO REDUCE USE OF LEAD IN GASOLINE

HON. ANTHONY C. BEILENSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill which will help reduce the serious environmental pollution caused by the use of lead in gasoline. Enactment of this bill will result almost immediately in a sharp drop in the consumption of leaded gasoline followed soon by a drastic reduction in the amount of lead added to each gallon of the much smaller amount of leaded gasoline that continues to be consumed.

Together, these two steps will contribute greatly to a major improvement in air quality. The use of lead in gasoline is a serious problem because of the terrible damage lead does to human health—and especially neurological damage to children. Furthermore, leaded gasoline also contains ethylene dibromide [EDB], a potent carcinogen which is added to leaded gasoline to prevent buildup of lead deposits inside automobile engines. The EPA has estimated that 300,000 pounds of unburned EDB are emitted annually from the tailpipes of cars using leaded gasoline, and persons living or working near gas stations and refineries are exposed to potentially dangerous concentrations of evaporated EDB in the air.

Mr. Speaker, leaded gasoline also destroys catalytic converters when burned in cars requiring unleaded gasoline, the great majority of new cars sold today. Fuel switching, the deliberate use of leaded gas—because it is 7 cents cheaper per gallon—in cars designed for unleaded, is a serious problem estimated to occur at a rate of about 10 to 20 percent. Only a few tankfuls of leaded gasoline will destroy the effectiveness of a catalytic converter, rendering a car a worse polluter than one without a converter. One estimate projects that by 1990, fuel switching will result in 20 percent more emissions of hydrocarbons and carbon monoxide.

We can greatly curtail fuel switching almost overnight by removing the economic incentive to buy leaded gasoline. Under this bill, retailers and wholesalers would be required to sell leaded gasoline for at least as much as regular unleaded gasoline. Eliminating the price advantage for leaded gasoline makes it cheaper in the long run to use unleaded, since more frequent tuneups are required when lead inevitably fouls spark plugs.

The second part of this bill would require a dramatic reduction of the amount of lead used in leaded gasoline by January 1, 1986. Some cars must use leaded gasoline to prevent valve wear, but much less is required than the 1.1 grams of lead added to each gallon today. The EPA has found that engines are protected with as little as 0.1 grams of lead per gallon, so this bill would ban the addition of more than 0.1 grams of lead per gallon by 1986. Cars requiring leaded gasoline could still use it, but the amount of lead in each gallon would be reduced by more than 90 percent.

By removing the economic incentive for fuel switching and reducing the lead in the remaining leaded gasoline by more than 90 percent, we can make tremendous progress toward cleaner, more healthy air. This bill would begin that process, and would produce a significant improvement almost immediately and even more improvement by 1986. The problem has been studied and debated for years, and now it is time to act. I hope all my colleagues will join me in sponsoring this important legislation.●

IN OBSERVANCE OF CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to call to the attention of my colleagues the 26th annual observance of "Captive Nations Week." We in this Chamber must do everything we can to ensure that no more countries are added to the already long list of captive nations. This celebration reminds the world of the many nations suffering under the burdensome oppression of the Soviet Union, and international communism.

During Captive Nations Week, we in America and free men around the globe reflect on the many freedoms and liberties that we often take for granted. It is a time when we rededicate ourselves to the support of those millions living in captive nations who yearn for the day when they will know the joy of liberty. Captive Nations Week also gives us the opportunity to reflect on what the future may bring if we fail to heed the Soviet threat.

The Soviet Union has been rightly described as an empire. Let me give you some startling facts about how the Soviet Empire has grown over the years and how international communism has entrapped many previously free nations. In 1920, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Byelorussia, Cossackia, Georgia, Udel-Ural, North Caucasia, and the Ukraine fell to Soviet domination. Other countries were to suffer similar fates: In 1922, the Far Eastern Republic and Turkestan; in 1924, Mongolia; in 1940, Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania; in 1946, Albania, Bulgaria, and Yugoslavia; in 1947, Poland and Romania; in 1948, Czechoslovakia and North Korea; in 1949, Hungary, East Germany, Mainland China; in 1951, Tibet; in 1960, Cuba; in 1975, Cambodia, South Vietnam, and Laos; in 1980, Afghanistan.

In recent years, we have seen the intimidation of the Polish labor union Solidarity, the attempted assassination of the Pope, Cuban involvement in Grenada, and Cuban-Soviet support of revolutionary Nicaragua. The tragic downing of the Korean airliner last year with the loss of hundreds of innocent victims is proof of the little regard that the Soviets have for human life. Who will be next? El Salvador, Honduras, and, someday, maybe our closest neighbor in Central America, Mexico? Just look around and the evidence becomes obvious. We are faced with a broadening circle of potential captive nations in our own backyard. The growing Soviet, Cuban, and Nicaraguan influences in this vital area will create waves of dispossessed refugees who flee from these oppressive Communist governments.

As we talk of the many captive nations around the world, let us pause and consider the effects of our actions here in the Congress regarding Central America and what the future holds for the poor, struggling democracies there. Let us keep in mind that our actions and votes must never serve to add more countries to the already long list of captive nations.

I am certain that my colleagues will join me in looking forward to the day when we will no longer have to hold this observance. That day will come when no nation on this planet is deprived of independence, freedom and human rights.●

POSTAL SERVICE CONTRACT NEGOTIATIONS

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to voice my serious and profound displeasure with the actions of the U.S. Postal Service last week regarding the negotiations with the postal unions. As you know, the postal unions have been negotiating a master contract for the past several months with the U.S. Postal Service. This bargaining has resulted in an impasse.

Though I have been quite concerned with the course of negotiations since bargaining commenced on the new contract, I have not made any public statements hoping that the collective bargaining process would resolve the extreme differences between the two parties. But I can no longer remain silent as a result of the actions last week of the Postal Service in unilaterally implementing, prior to the conclusion of factfinding and arbitration, a reduced pay and benefit level for new hires.

It was certainly the intention of the Postal Reorganization Act of 1970 to require that no changes in wages and working conditions should be established before the Postal Service and the unions either reach agreement on a new contract or the impasse procedure has been fully exhausted. Unlike the private sector where employers are permitted to implement their last offer during bargaining once negotiations have broken down, the right to strike is not available to postal unions. Since postal employees have been forbidden from striking by the Postal Reorganization Act, then, in my opinion, this same law precludes postal management from unilaterally changing working conditions.

Mr. Speaker, through their actions over the past several months, the Postal Service, under the firm control of the Reagan-appointed Board of Governors, has demonstrated an utter disregard for the collective bargaining process. Their issuance of inflammatory statements concerning postal employees' pay and benefit levels during bargaining and their most recent unilateral changes in working conditions have made a mockery of collective bargaining. For any negotiations to be successful, both parties must enter them in a good-faith effort to reach agreement. I, for one, have reluctantly concluded that the Postal Service has not been dealing in good faith and is being guided more by political considerations dictated by the Reagan-controlled Board of Governors than by a determination to reach a fair and equitable settlement with the postal employees.

It is terribly unfortunate that we are now facing a true crisis in the Postal Service. Yet, in many respects, this is simply another chapter in the Reagan administration's lengthy compendium of antiworker actions. The history of bargaining by Postal Service management over the past several months is an affront not only to the postal employees and their unions, but to every working American who believes in the principles of collective bargaining and the procedures of fairness which underlie them.

It is my hope that the Postal Service will reconsider their misguided actions. I am certain that all Americans who rely upon the prompt and efficient delivery of the mail join me in urging a fair and just settlement of these negotiations. Certainly, as a member of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, I fully intend to do everything within my power to achieve this result.●

PRAYER BREAKFAST ON ISSUE OF JERUSALEM

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, on July 25, 1984, I was honored to host, along with our colleague from Michigan, DAVE BONIOR, a prayer breakfast on the issue of Jerusalem. Serving on the panel were: Rev. Frederick Allen of the United Methodist Church; Rev. James Andrews of the United Presbyterian Church; Rev. Dr. Charles V. Bergstrom of the Lutheran Council; Dr. Dale Bishop of the United Church of Christ; Rev. John Collins of Clergy & Laity Concerned; Rev. Dr. Milton B. Efthiniou of the Greek Orthodox Archdiocese; Rev. Ernest Gibson of the Council of Churches of Greater Washington; Father Bryan Hehir of the U.S. Catholic Conference; James Henderson of the National Office for Black Catholics; Rev. Rufus Jones of the National Association of Evangelicals; Charles Kimball of the National Council of Churches; James Matlack of the American Friends Service Committee; David Nelson of the American Lutheran Church; Msgr. John G. Nolan of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of New York; Rev. George Rados of the Antiochian Orthodox Archdiocese; Martin Sovick of the Lutheran Council; Rev. Donald Wagner of the Palestine Human Rights Campaign; Canon Michael Hamilton of the Washington Episcopal Cathedral.

These distinguished members of the clergy and laymen expressed their opposition to the politicizing of the Holy City of Jerusalem through the United States moving our embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. This move is perceived by the many denominations represented at the breakfast as being a move which would destroy the special status which Jerusalem holds for three great religions: Christianity, Judeaism, and Islam.

The opening prayer was given by the Very Reverend George Courey of the Antiochian Orthodox Christian Archdiocese.

I would also like to take this opportunity to thank my colleagues who joined us at this breakfast: The gentleman from New York, BEN GILMAN; the gentleman from California, TOM LANTOS and his wife; the gentleman from Utah, HOWARD NIELSON; the gentleman from New Jersey, BILL HUGHES; the gentleman from Nevada, HARRY REID; and the gentleman from Georgia, BUDDY DARDEN. Their concern for the views of this panel was appreciated by all in attendance. In addition, over 30 Members' offices sent staff representatives as well as three Senate offices.

It is evident to me that the outstanding turnout and response to this breakfast is proof that there are many religious organizations and churches in the Christian world, as well as the Islamic world, who fear the loss of the special status of Jerusalem through the moving of our Embassy in Israel.●

MENTAL ILLNESS AWARENESS WEEK RESOLUTION

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to introduce a joint resolution to authorize the President to issue a proclamation designating the week of October 7-13, 1984 as "Mental Illness Awareness Week."

I am joined in this effort by 12 of my respected colleagues, including Congressmen WAXMAN, CONTE, and SHANNON. This resolution will focus attention on concerns surrounding mental illness and advances that have been made in the treatment of this disease.

Mental illness is commonly and unnecessarily feared and misunderstood in our society. This resolution will help to bring new light to this increasingly treatable and preventable problem.

Currently, 31 to 41 million Americans suffer from clearly diagnosable mental disorders involving significant disability with respect to employment, school attendance, and independent living. Mental illness affects people of all ages, from the 12 million children who suffer from this affliction to the elderly who are particularly vulnerable to mental illness. And we all bear the burden of mental illness: it costs our Nation $65 billion annually in health care expenses and lost productivity.

Mental illness is an increasingly curable disability, and the prospects for recovery increases with earlier recognition and treatment. About two-thirds of all mentally ill patients show significant signs of recovery with their initial treatment. Much of the progress in treatment can be attributed to research performed in recent decades.

As a result of new attention and research in this area, there are now a wide variety of treatments available to suit the needs of the patient. And treatment is becoming more effective as well.

Mental health treatment can provide an effective cost-containment tool since treatment often results in reduced utilization of more costly hospital, medical, and surgical services. A recent study by the National Institute of Mental Health found that utilization of medical and surgical services dropped anywhere from 5 to 85 percent following psychiatric care.

In these days of skyrocketing health costs, when even the most needed health care services are becoming less and less affordable, we can't afford to overlook a way to reduce unnecessary utilization of high cost health care services.

I urge my fellow colleagues to support this resolution to shed light on a subject kept too long in the dark.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.●

THE PLIGHT OF VALERY MARCHENKO

HON. BRUCE A. MORRISON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues the plight of Valery Marchenko, the Ukrainian human rights activist who was sentenced to 10 years in a labor camp and 5 years of internal exile on March 14, 1984.

Mr. Marchenko, a former journalist and translator, graduated with distinction from the philology faculty at Kiev University in 1969. He was arrested in 1973 on charges of "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda" and sentenced to 6 years of imprisonment and 2 years of internal exile.

Now Mr. Marchenko has again been imprisoned on the same charges. This time he received the maximum sentence possible under the Ukrainian criminal code when the only wrong he committed was to exercise his right to peaceful freedom of expression.

Furthermore, Mr. Marchenko is said to be in very poor health, suffering from a kidney ailment and from high blood pressure. One court session was postponed because of his illness and he was unable to stand or remain seated throughout the trial.

I have written to Chairman Konstantin Chernenko and to Ambassador Anatoly Dobrynin to express my concern about Valery Marchenko. I strongly urge my colleagues to join me in this effort.●

EXPLANATION OF MISSED VOTES

HON. MICHAEL G. OXLEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Mr. OXLEY. Mr. Speaker, due to official business, I was out of town for recorded votes on Thursday, July 26, 1984. Had I been present, my votes would have been:

Rollcall No. 319; "aye."
Rollcall No. 320; "aye."
Rollcall No. 321; "aye."
Rollcall No. 322; "present."
Rollcall No. 323; "present."
Rollcall No. 324; "aye."
Rollcall No. 325; "aye."
Rollcall No. 326; "aye."
Rollcall No. 327; "aye."
Rollcall No. 328; "no."●

A TRIBUTE TO KENNETH DALE ERDLEY

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to pay tribute to a young man, Kenneth Dale Erdley, a constituent of mine from Hershey, PA. In an unabashed search for excellence, the Rickover Science Institute has selected Kenneth to participate in a summer educational program for the gifted youth of the United States.

As a student, Kenneth has demonstrated an excellence in all academic areas, especially math and science, and is ranked in the top 10 percent of all juniors in the United States.

The program combines theoretical training with practical experience, such as bona fide research projects with Government agencies, academic institutions, and private corporations in the Washington, DC, area.

I am proud to congratulate Kenneth for his superb academic performance. His dedication and intellectual capabilities are an inspiration for all youths of America.●

SORROW OVER THE PASSING OF ALLEN SYLVANE

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, it is with deepest sorrow that I learned of the death of my longtime friend, a great community leader and loyal constituent, Allen Sylvane. Allen was a dedicated, inspirational, action-oriented member of Neponsit, a small community nestled between Jamiaca Bay and the great Atlantic.

Neponsit was Allen's home and he displayed a sense of pride for the activities that went on in the community. He also helped others carry this same sense of pride and improve on conditions when it was needed. Al was a real leader. He took part in so many different activities that almost everyone in the community, in one way or another knew him. Always, he practiced that leadership was not just giving orders or organizing the ranks but getting one's hands dirty as well. To Allen, taking part in our lives was taking stake in the future.

We will remember Allen for all his outstanding duties and achievements. As president of the Neponsit Property Owners Association, as president of Peninsula Hospital Center, as trustee of the West End Temple—all his roles were forever distinguished and diverse.

Traveling through the community, it is important for us to remember the commitment of men like Allen Sylvane to Neponsit has shaped our lives. While the tangible improvements he brought about are important, equally important was the unbounded energies and familial direction Allen Sylvane was guided by. His spirit will forever be considered the heart and soul of the Neponsit community.●

REMEMBRANCE OF MARY ELIZABETH PRUETT FARRINGTON

HON. CECIL (CEC) HEFTEL

OF HAWAII

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Mr. HEFTEL of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to remember Mary Elizabeth Pruett Farrington, a longtime resident of Hawaii who has recently passed away. The untimeliness of Mrs. Farrington's death is compounded by the irony that this is the 25th anniversary year of Hawaiian statehood.

Betty Farrington was the first woman elected to represent the Territory of Hawaii in Congress, and, as a Congresswoman, was an adamant advocate of statehood for Hawaii. Although statehood was not achieved while Mrs. Farrington served in Congress, her eloquence and unyielding determination allowed her to pave the way for her successors to bring about statehood for Hawaii in 1959.

Mrs. Farrington lived a life characterized by achievement. In addition to her work in Congress, she was the director of the Office of Territories of the Department of the Interior. In the private sector, she was the president, publisher, and director of the Honolulu Star Bulletin.

Mary Elizabeth Pruett Farrington will be remembered as a most noteworthy figure in Hawaiian history. She devoted virtually all of her adult life to the advancement of Hawaii, and the Farrington name will not be forgotten by the people of the State of Hawaii.●

EPA: WHAT REALLY HAPPENED

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call my colleagues attention to an article that appeared in the Washington Post last Sunday, July 29. The article chronologizes the destruction of the programs at the Environmental Protection Agency that we in Congress have painstakingly tried to build up over the past 10 years.

The woman who Reagan appointed to be his "Lizzie Borden" of the Environmental Protection Agency, has now been rewarded for the task she performed by being appointed chair of the National Oceans and Atmosphere Committee, a Committee which she calls a "Nothingburger and a joke." Congress cannot let this appointment stand.

I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 6015 to dissolve the current National Advisory Committee on Oceans and Atmosphere, because I believe that the Committee will serve no purpose with Ann Burford in charge. I also urge my colleagues to support me in calling for the Senate to pass S. 1098. The House passed S. 1098 in March with an amendment which would establish a new Commission to Develop Oceanic Policy for the United States and would be free of the taint of political cronyism. I believe that we should establish this new Commission and get on with the business of developing sound environmental policy.

The article follows:

EPA: WHAT REALLY HAPPENED

(By Jonathan Lash)

On a blustery afternoon in March 1983, less than two weeks after Anne Burford had been forced to resign as administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, the man President Reagan had named to replace her came to EPA headquarters to give a speech. The only space large enough was the shopping mall beneath the EPA offices. Several thousand people were jammed between the stores and the sandwich shops, straining to see the man who already seemed a hero.

"Here we go again," he began, and the audience broke into applause.

William D. Ruckelshaus was back at the same agency he had left 10 years earlier, and many at EPA were relieved and flattered. He joked. They laughed. He promised openness, fairness and strict enforcement of the law. They clapped and cheered.

One staffer said it was like "the liberation of a prison camp." A top official mused, "A prison camp—I guess so, but Anne was as much a prisoner as the staff." Ruckelshaus had already seen part of the prison-camp image. His old friend Ernst Minor, a high-level EPA employe, had quietly taken him one Sunday morning to look at his future offices. "There were," Minor said, "locks and bolts and safes and security systems all over the place. Bill just looked at me and asked: 'What's been going on around here?'"

Ruckelshaus' warmth, his openness and his acceptance of EPA's "transcendent" obligation to protect "human life and that which sustains human life, our natural environment," contrasted dramatically with the skepticism his predecessor showed for the mission of the agency. Ruckelshaus recruited and won White House approval of able and experienced professionals to replace the dozen top officials who had left the agency. EPA's ability to function has begun to recover, too, but that has been a slow and halting process.

Although Ruckelshaus has healed EPA's spirit and is tending its wounds, he acknowledges that it is "harder to bring back trust between the agency and the society. The level of mistrust with the press, with the environmental organizations, and with the Congress was very high."

Ruckelshaus has ardently sought to improve the administration's environmental image. A man of moderation, he has kept his agency out of controversies. He gives frequent speeches and regularly meets with reporters and editors to emphasize the need to proceed calmly and deliberately in dealing with environmental problems. He helped to convince the White House to launch a campaign of presidential meetings and speeches on the environment.

In June and July, the president went to parks and refuges to affirm his commitment to protection of the environment and to extol his administration's record on environmental issues. He invited environmental leaders to meet with him (even promising to read the book from which this article is adapted).

But in the midst of all the carefully engineered environmental hoopla, he appointed Anne Gorsuch Burford to chair an environmental advisory group. Ruckelshaus was not consulted.

These events revived a question that has followed Ruckelshaus since he returned to Washington. Which is the real Reagan environmental policy?

Mistrust of Ronald Reagan's environmental policies was born even before he was elected president. He had spent decades attacking federal bureaucrats as people who "think control is better than freedom." In campaign speeches, he had criticized environmental laws and blamed EPA for the woes of the steel and auto industries.

The nomination of James G. Watt to be secretary of the Interior exacerbated the fears of environmentalists. Watt challenged both environmental protection and the motives of its advocates, asking whether their "real" goal was to 'weaken America." He set out, he said, to make the policies of the past and the civil servants who have implemented them "yield to my blows."

When Anne Burford (then named Anne Gorsuch) came on the scene several months after Watt's appointment, the stage was already set.

She did not think of herself an anti-environmental any more than she labeled herself an environmentalist. In this she and Reagan were much alike. Both said they believed in protecting the environment, but they seemed to believe the problems of doing so and the consequences of not doing so were much exaggerated.

In speeches and testimony during her first year as administrator, Burford rarely mentioned pollution or its effects on human beings. When she did refer to the problems that her agency was responsible for solving, it was in brusque terms—mechanical problems subject to technical solutions.

Like the president to whom she remained loyal through good times and bad, Burford, top aides said, believed the problem was too much government: too much government interferes with industry, the great engine of American prosperity, and requires too much taxation to support a wasteful and bloated bureaucracy. Government regulators had gotten out of hand, and environmental regulators were among the worst of them.

She knew what had to be done. She planned drastic cuts and swift policy changes, and she distanced herself from much of the staff at EPA. Burford later said she had isolated herself from the EPA staff on the advice of Watt. "Watt told her," said Joe Foran, her deputy chief of staff, "that it's a lot easier to fire people you don't know."

After she was sworn in, Burford spoke to the EPA staff. Already shaken by rumors about her plans, the staff was told of hopes that "the EPA of the Reagan administration will be remembered for the money it saved taxpayers because we streamlined regulation, cut down on permit-processing time and we together cut back on the required paperwork for EPA projects. We should work together to keep a lid on those unnecessary regulations which have created hardships on our national industries, driving up the cost of consumer goods."

Burford believed enormous savings could be achieved through simple improvements in management. "With each passing day, I find that to say that the agency has been mismanaged in the past is charitable. It has not been managed at all."

During the summer of 1981, Burford began to work on the budget for 1983. The EPA operating budget had been $1,355 million when Reagan took office; Burford proposed $975 million. Some who worked on the budget with her say she believed she could make the cuts without harm. But, said a senior budget official: "She didn't understand the budget gaming that went on within the administration. She thought OMB [Office of Management and Budget] would just congratulate her for carrying out the president's program."

Burford's 1983 budget called for a 28 percent cut from the 1981 budget. Considering inflation, it would put EPA back where it was in 1973, before the passage of the Resource Conservation & Recovery Act, the Toxic Substances Control Act, the Safe Drinking Water Act and the "Superfund" hazardous waste cleanup act.

On Friday, Nov. 13, 1981, EPA received its "passback," from the OMB. The agency demanded cuts nearly twice as deep as those proposed by Burford. The cuts would reduce EPA to little more than half its size. The cuts reflected the view, expressed in one OMB briefing package, that "fewer regulators will necessarily result in fewer regulations and less harassment of the regulated."

Burford was furious, said senior staff members. She had brought EPA in line with the president's program. Now OMB was suggesting she had not done enough. Her staff urged her to appeal. She agreed. They worked all weekend on a lengthy and stongly worded letter.

She wrote to OMB that she was "deeply committed to meeting the president's environmental and fiscal objectives" and believed she had done so. The OMB cuts, she wrote, threw "in disarray a number of major redirections I have proposed. . . ." The pass-back, she continued, "smacks of a bottom line in search of a reason."

It was a remarkable letter, and it concluded with a threat to appeal to the president.

A Nov. 19 meeting with Stockman did not go well. He told her she was a political appointee and that it was her job to take the heat for the President's programs, said senior staff members. Nothing was resolved, but the discussions revealed OMB's deep antagonism toward EPA and Stockman's apparent conviction that long-term control of EPA regulations required much deeper cuts. There was hostility to EPA research, which, it was believed, would only fuel demands for more regulation in the future.

On Monday, Dec. 7, 1981, EPA officials took the dispute to the White House Budget Review Board, presided over by presidential counselor Edwin Meese and Chief of Staff James Baker. Burford argued, senior staff members said, the EPA had offered cuts as deep as those at any agency. Stockman would not budge. By then he was aware that the recession and the president's tax cuts were going to cause huge federal deficits.

Baker, said senior EPA officials, was concerned about political ramifications. Like Stockman, said John Hernanadez, then deputy administrator of EPA, Baker and Meese viewed the EPA from "a general interest in regulatory reform, and they viewed budgetary reform as one of the ways you did it."

Only one minor issue was resolved. Emerging from the meeting, Burford exploded in frustration. Staff members recalled she said, "OMB just doesn't play fair." Stockman, too, say several officials who were involved, was upset. He felt that Burford had broken her earlier promise to him to cut the agency's budget by 50 percent if necessary.

Three days later, Burford went to the President. For three hours, she and Hernandez argued their case. "It was surprising to me," Hernandez said. "The reception by the President was so warm and so easy going that I had no problem talking, being fluent, debating Stockman . . ."

On each issue, Hernandez said, the President said: "We'll certainly take each of these under consideration. We'll consult with the vice president, and we'll make a decision on it." A short time later, the President called to tell Burford she had won, but asked if she might find additional research cuts.

The final cuts left the 1983 EPA budget 29 percent below the 1981 budget—30 percent cuts in staff, and 42 percent in research.

A few days after William Ruckelshaus was confirmed as the new EPA administrator in May 1983, the House of Representatives rejected the President's request for cuts in the 1984 EPA budget and voted to restore the budget to 1981 levels.

Ruckelshaus said he told Reagan before he accepted the job that "if I went over and took a look and decided [EPA] needed more money, I was going to come back and ask him. He said fine." By May, Ruckleshaus had recommendations from his staff to ask for more than the House had voted.

Stockman argued against an increase over 1983 levels, said one high-level EPA official. Stockman suggested the Senate and House would compromise on the higher House figure, giving EPA a generous increase.

When the Senate and House conferees met to resolve differences, Stockman threatened a presidential veto unless they adopted the low Senate figure, according to an EPA staffer.

During the summer of 1983, Ruckelshaus worked to prepare his 1985 budget—a large increase back to 1981 levels. OMB cut it sharply—back again to 1983 levels, eliminating funds for indoor air pollution research and other health effects studies, and cutting back on enforcement.

Ruckelshaus, like Burford before him, apparently was surprised. OMB officials had told his staff that the agency's problems had been Burford's fault for not making a strong enough case for EPA. Ruckelshaus thought he had a mandate from the president to increase the budget. He appealed.

Ruckelshaus and other EPA officials took their case to Stockman, Baker and Meese in 1983, a few days after Ruckelshaus' wife, Jill, had publicly criticized the Reagan administration over its terminations of members of the Civil Rights Commission. "[William] Ruckelshaus seemed," said one participant at the meeting, "to be eager to reassure them he was a team player. He was very low-key." Stockman, however, was tough.

The appeal meetings went on for more than five hours. A few days later, Ruckelshaus met with Reagan. In the end, he got less than half the increase in operating funds he wanted.

Ruckelshaus also had sought authority to seek an expansion of the "Superfund." Created in 1980—over the bitter opposition of then-congressman Stockman—to deal with dangerous abandoned toxic waste dumps, Superfund was a major factor in Burford's problems. Administration policy seemed to be to spend as little of the fund as possible in hopes it could expire in 1985. By 1983 only a few dumps had been cleaned up, while EPA estimates of the number of dangerous sites in the country had increased tenfold to more than 1,500.

Ruckelshaus wanted a major cleanup program. The president promised to seek reauthorization of Superfund, but not necessarily an expansion, in 1985.

"I guess I am surprised," said a senior EPA career official, "that [Ruckelshaus] didn't have a blank check after all. He may have been surprised too, but he didn't show it."

Three weeks after she took office, Burford announced a reorganization that eliminated EPA's enforcement office. The 2,100 lawyers, technicians and staff who had enforced air, water, hazardous waste, pesticide and toxic chemicals laws were transferred to offices on regulations and policy.

EPA staffers said Burford believed no one had tried hard enough to cajole violators into voluntary compliance. Seth Hunt, who designed the reorganization for Burford, said one of the agency's problems had been that it was "full of attorneys. Way more than we needed." Enforcement attorneys, Hunt said, were "just hanging 'round waiting for something to do."

Shortly after the reorganization, William Sullivan, the enforcement counsel, told EPA regional administrators not to send cases to headquarters until they had explored "every opportunity for settlement."

The regions referred 313 cases in 1980. The number fell to 59 in 1981. "The enforcement program just descended into chaos," said Tom Gallagher, chief of EPA's investigative arm.

By the end of a year, not a single hazardous waste case had been referred for prosecution. Enforcement of air and water laws was almost at a standstill.

Late in April 1982, Burford called the 10 regional administrators to Washington. She asked Mike Brown, the new enforcement counsel, to write a speech for her demanding more enforcement. "It was a hot day and the air conditioning wasn't on yet," recalled Brown. Burford, who released the speech to the press, did not read it word by word to her administrators. Brown said Burford told them "If you think it's hot now, wait until you see what happens if I don't see some action."

Valdus Adamkus, a regional administrator whose office had by far the best enforcement record, was bewildered. A large warm voluble man, Adamkus grew up in Lithuania and came to the United States after spending much of World War II as a refugee. He worked his way through college and engineering school, and gained some local fame delivering Lithuanian votes for Republicans in the overwhelmingly Democratic city of Chicago. He speaks with the thick accents of Eastern Europe and with the eloquence of emotion and sincerity.

"I said, 'I would like to clear the air. I was told to negotiate until I was blue in the face and it would be a black mark against me if I referred a case [to Washington headquarters for enforcement review]. Now I hear that is not so. What do you really want?'

"At this point, I was brutally interrupted by [Burford adviser James] Sanderson. He said, 'What the administrator told you is very clear.' Sanderson said that to speak as I did could only be said by someone who does not understand English. I was so hurt."

The room was silent. Finally, they broke up for coffee. "One person after another," said Adamkus, "came to us to apologize for what Sanderson had said and to say I was right to speak as I did. Later Sanderson came to me, and he smiled and told me he had not meant what he said, but he had to say it because there were too many career staff in the room and my remark might leak out."

Brown said Burford "had learned she had to have enforcement, but she could not admit she had made a mistake, so she had to revise history; she had to say, 'I never told you not to enforce.' "

Nevertheless, EPA's enforcement machinery was crippled. "There was," Sullivan said, "no direction, no positive program. Anne never did set any substantive goal. She was like a drama critic who sat down to write a play. She only knew what she didn't like."

Ruckelshaus and EPA deputy administrator Alvin Alm decided not to reestablish the enforcement division, to try to make the new structure work. But the enforcement statistics for the last three months of 1983 were worse than the same period a year earlier. When Ruckelshaus asked why, he was told that it was the states' fault, that the organization was unworkable, that there was a shortage of resources, that he had not provided enough guidance.

He delivered a blistering speech to the enforcement management. He said the statistics were "terrible . . . We have to develop a certain controlled sense of outrage in this agency if we are going to get these laws enforced. And someplace along the way we have lost that." The states, he said, could not do the enforcement job "unless they have a gorilla in the closet . . . and the gorilla is EPA."

Nevertheless, a number of enforcement attorneys in the field still complain that the tough talk has not been matched by resources.

EPA has continued under Ruckelshaus, as it did under Burford, to do battle with OMB. A senior political appointee said, "They just don't think of us as team players. Oh, they put Bill [Ruckelshaus] in kind of a great man category now—nothing is his fault—they blame it all on Al [Alm] or the staff. They and the White House hate Al because he's a Democrat and he worked for Carter and he's from Harvard."

OMB still holds up dozens of EPA regulations. "OMB's attitude toward us," said a Ruckelshaus staff member, "is like the attitude of the Soviet Union toward its borders—they shoot to kill."

Stockman, a vitriolic opponent of EPA while he was a congressman, had written a memorandum to Reagan shortly after the 1980 election in which he characterized EPA's growing responsibilities as "a ticking regulatory time bomb," an "incredible morass of new controls and compliance procedures" and a "monument to mindless excess." He urged "swift, comprehensive, and far-reaching regulatory policy corrections" to choke off the "mind-boggling outpouring" of regulations from "heavily biased," "McGovernite no-growth activists" who had taken over government regulation.

Many of the statutes EPA administers are before Congress for renewal, but Ruckelshaus has either asked Congress explicitly to wait until next year, as in the case of Superfund and the pesticides law, or simply refused to push for action this year. Ruckelshaus has put the blame on environmentalists and Congress.

"Everybody knows what's going on," said a Senate aide. "They're hoping the gridlock will hold and they can deal with these laws in a more 'favorable' atmosphere in 1985."

Many environmentalists believe the ceasefire in the attack on environmental protection that has been in effect since May last year will end after the election if Reagan wins. They point to a recent memorandum to the Cabinet Council on Natural Resources and Environment written by Christopher DeMuth, director of the office of information and regulatory affairs at EPA. The memo urged that the Clean Air and Clean Water acts and related environmental laws be superseded by "laws that emphasize economic incentives rather than mandatory federal standards." The DeMuth memo, they suggest, accurately portrays the administration's second-term environmental agenda.●

TARNOPOLSKY: HELD IN IRON CAGE

HON. KEN KRAMER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, in the last few years, we have witnessed a constant decrease in the number of Jews permitted to emigrate from the Soviet Union. The fact that levels of emigration have plummeted and that the instances of harassment and denial of exit visas have increased clearly reflect the intensification of Soviet repression toward Soviet Jews. Jews are denied opportunities to gain higher education. They are prevented from securing good jobs, and they are not permitted to study their own culture or the Hebrew language. Make no doubt about it, anti-Semitism is rampant in the Soviet Union.

The inhumane actions of the Soviet authorities violate both the spirit and the letter of the Helsinki accords, as well as other relevant international agreements to which the Soviet Union is a signatory.

The letter I am about to enter in the RECORD today is just another example of the inhumane and harsh conditions found in the Soviet prisons. Yuri Tarnopolsky is an unfortunate example of the "inhumanity" found in the Soviet Union today. I ask that this letter, headlined "Tarnopolsky: 'Held In Iron Cage,'" be printed in the RECORD.

[From Publication of the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews]

TARNOPOLSKY: "HELD IN IRON CAGE"

In October 1982, Tarnopolsky went on a forty-day hunger strike to protest the continuing unlawful denial of his request to emigrate. In May 1982, Tarnopolsky was one of the signers of a protest letter by Khakov refuseniks and later that same year, he composed an article describing the ordeal of the refuseniks.

On March 15, 1983, Tarnopolsky was arrested. He is now serving 3 years in a labor camp. On February 1, 1984, he began a hunger strike.

The following is an excerpt of a letter from Tarnopolsky to his wife in Kharkov, April, 1984:

. . . Since the beginning of the hunger-strike, i.e. from the 1st of February, I was subjected daily to psychological pressures by representatives of the administration. It consisted mainly of threats. Thus, on 8th February the director of the camp and another man who introduced himself as a procurator talked to me and the conversation ended by the director's threat that they'd organized a beating for me by the prisoners. The procurator supported the threat.

On 11th February, the seventh and last day of my stay in solitary confinement and on the eleventh day of my hunger-strike, I found out about Andropov's death. I declared that I was discontinuing my hunger-strike. I ate a piece of bread as otherwise I could not have left the cell. I had no more strength left and was lying on the floor most of the time. I was allowed to leave the punishment cell in the evening.

Prisoners did all they could for me: They helped me wash and shave (I could not do this myself), they prepared clean clothes and bed-clothes for me, they collected some food for me and even some sweets. However, the impossibility to stop the hunger-strike gradually led to my having suffered pains in the stomach, nausea and back pains for two weeks. There were also disorders in urination. On 13th February I had to go back to work.

I would like to ask that all the aforementioned is to be considered. My complaint addressed to the International Red Cross and protesting against the cruel treatment which had taken the form of depriving me of a meeting with my wife and the use of torture for the purpose of making me give up my demand for the meeting and making me stop my hunger-strike.

In my statement written to the Director prior to the hunger-strike I wrote that I protest against barbaric cruelty which expressed itself in the fact that my wife was not allowed to see me despite the fact that she travelled 6000 kilometers in order to see me for two hours.

After the hunger-strike I sent a statement to the Procurator in which I wrote the following: In response to my hunger-strike protesting against cruelty, I have been subjected to an even more cruel treatment which could not be qualified as anything but torture. Everything that happened to me since 1979, when I submitted my application for emigation from the USSR, in accordance with Soviet and international law, completely contradicted legality, humanism and common sense and was a series of actions of increased cruelty, arbitrariness and absurdity. I also stated that this increased cruelty acquired a form that threatened my health and my life.

In view of the fact that I did not receive any replies to my statements I sent on 21st March another statement addressed to the Procurator. I wrote in it that I will resume my hunger-strike if the question of my meeting with my wife will not be resolved in the near future. I wrote that the resumption of my hunger-strike would pursue the following purpose: To clarify whether the policy of cruel repression directed against Jews wishing to leave the USSR in accordance with Soviet and international law is continuing.

I became convinced on the basis of my own experience that the cruelty of the authorities in regards to repressions against Jews has no limit. I would like my own fate to be of assistance to the world public in its understanding of this question under the conditions when there has been a change of leadership in the USSR and when new hopes have been appearing there.

I appeal to the world public with the above-mentioned statements and request that everything possible be done in order to put an end to the shameful and barbaric refusal (of the authorities to allow us to emigrate). I appeal for assistance in my reunification with my wife and daughter. The authorities separated us, referring to the principle of reunification of families. My crime consisted solely of my having already appealed to the world public, having told the truth about the "state of refusal" and the dangerous character of mass moral destruction which it has acquired. I appeal for preventing its turning into physical destruction.

I INTEND TO RESUME MY HUNGER-STRIKE ON 25TH APRIL

From 27th February to 12th March I was in the district prison hospital from which I was released with the diagnosis "hyper-tension of 2nd degree". My blood pressure was absolutely normal before the arrest.

I would also like to say that the prisoners in the camp are being held in iron cages covered on the top by an iron net, like the ones used for animals in a zoo. A cage is adjacent to living quarters housing some 300 men (two detachments). The case is smaller than the living quarters and there is hardly enough space in it for standing there. The construction of this zoo for human beings started last year. Contacts between prisoners in different cages is forbidden. There are six such cages in the camp. One is not allowed to leave the cage other than go to the dining hall or to go to work. The camp has an extremely poor reputation in the district because of the harshness of its regime. I shall refrain from describing the regime and the administration. The easiness of work should not mislead anyone.

I hereby conclude the official part of my letter which can be quoted and published anywhere, both in full and in part, under my name.

His address is: 6702022 Chita, p/a ya G14/6, 5th Group.●

10TH ANNIVERSARY OF TURKISH INVASION OF CYPRUS

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, last week marked the 10th anniversary of the Turkish invasion of Cyprus. For 10 years, we have hoped that some resolution of that terrible situation could be achieved. For 10 years, we have been disappointed.

Not only has Turkey refused to withdraw their troops from the island, but they have become the only country in the world to recognize the illegal declaration of independence by the Turkish Cypriots made last November. The situation has deteriorated over the years, and the hopes of many people to see it resolved have diminished. It appears that the only time the Turkish Government will take serious steps to reunify Cyprus is when a major vote on aid from the United States is pending before the House of Representatives or Senate. Just as soon as any vote is completed however, the Turks decide not to follow through with their promised action.

For these reasons, both Houses of Congress should support definite, strong limitations on aid to Turkey until concrete steps are taken to correct the unfortunate situation in Cyprus. At the same time, we must encourage the diplomatic efforts of U.N. Secretary General Javier Perez de Cuellar to negotiate a solution to this problem. These avenues must be pursued in the hope they will bring some positive progress to the Cyprus situation. Any other possible paths to settlement must be explored as well, because 10 years is far too long a time for this matter to have existed. It is my hope that this particular anniversary will never have to be marked in the House of Representatives again.●

COMMENDING THE MERCHANT'S SECURITY PROGRAM—A CRIME IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM SPONSORED BY THE 165TH STREET MALL IMPROVEMENT ASSOCIATION OF JAMAICA, NY

HON. JOSEPH P. ADDABBO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 30, 1984

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, crime is a problem in every city in America. Whether it is violent crime in which assaults are committed against our neighborhood citizens, or thefts, narcotics peddling, and arson that taint a neighborhood, the end result is the same. Our people leave their apartments and the community deteriorates. As families leave, schools close, businesses close up and the criminal element takes over. That is why when I see a crime program working, I believe it is important to call my colleagues' attention to it and ask for their support.

In our community of Jamaica, NY, a partnership has been formed between the Federal and State Government, the merchants, and the local police department. This coordinated effort is aimed at taking stock in the 165th Street pedestrian mall. This mall is at the center of a tremendous redevelopment project in downtown Jamaica. In addition to building the largest Social Security Administration Center in the United States, we have made a community commitment to expanding York College of the City University, building new stores and housing, and in the process provide jobs to meet the needs of the community.

Over the past few years, the crime rate in this area has been discouraging. But through this new network, we are noticing a change. Installed by the Crime Prevention Unit of the New York City Police Department, 250 stores are participating in this innovative program. HUD money, $50,000, along with money put up by these merchants is currently funding this crime prevention plan.

There are many people who have been involved with this program. Community members, city officials, local businessmen, and countless others. I believe it is important to recognize that this is a total community commitment. At the same time, it is necessary to highlight the work of several individuals whose untiresome efforts finally made this program happen. These men, to whom I refer include: Deputy Inspector Nicholas Drakos and Lt. Robert McInerney of the New York City Police Department's Crime Prevention Unit, who helped design the program; Police officers Anthony J. Luizzo, John P. Brady, and Henry J. Forberg, who supervise the program; and finally, Bob Richards of the Jamaica Chamber of Commerce, who encouraged owners of these businesses to participate in the crime prevention plan.

Their work is a stake in our community's future. United, we will bring families back to Jamaica. And with them, businesses and jobs. The rejuvenation of downtown Jamaica is of paramount importance. This is our stand against the criminal element. This redevelopment plan must be complemented with crime prevention plans in order to work. In our capacity in Congress, we must do everything we can to assist in these efforts. It is a total commitment to redevelopment what is necessary to ensure a brighter future for downtown Jamaica. Today, I am proud to say this fine example is working in my community.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Tuesday, July 31, 1984, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.
